122 h6

A GENERAL

DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION
of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interſperſed with ſeveral thouſand LIVES never before publiſhed.

The whole containing the Hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of all Ages and Nations, particularly thoſe of Great Britain and Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accompliſhments.

With Reflections on ſuch Paſſages of Mr. BAYLE, as ſeem to favour Scepticiſm and the Manichee Syſtem.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH;
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

And the Articles relating to ORIENTAL HISTORY
By GEORGE SALE, Gent.

VOLUME II.

LONDON,
Printed by James Bettenham,
For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, T. HATCHET in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. BATLEY in Pater-Noſter-Row; T. WORRALL, J. SHUCKBURGH in Fleetſtreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR, in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New Bond-ſtreet; C. CORBET without Temple-Bar; C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship between the Temple Gates, and ſold at their Shop in SCARBOROUGH.

MDCCXXXV.

A DICTIONARY:

GENERAL

HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL:

IN WHICH

A NEW AND ACCURATE TRANSLATION

OF THAT OF THE CELEBRATED

MR. BAYLE,

WITH THE

ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS printed

IN THE LATE EDITION AT PARIS, IS INCLUDED: AND INTERSPERSED

WITH SEVERAL THOUSAND LIVES never before published.

THE WHOLE CONTAINING THE HISTORY OF THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONS OF ALL AGES

AND NATIONS INTERMINGLED OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, DISTINGUISHED

BY PROPER HEADS, ADDED, LETTERS AND OTHER ACCOMPLISHMENTS.

WITH REFLECTIONS ON EACH PASSAGE OF MR. BAYLE, AS FAR AS TO FAVOUR RELIGION AND

THE MANNERS OF MEN.

By the Ingenious Mr. THOMAS BIRCH.

AND OTHER HANDS.

VOLUME II.

LONDON:

Printed by James Bettenham.

For C. Harper, J. Clarke, J. Hatchet in Cornhill; J. Cleve in the Temple; J. Batley in Paternoster-Row; T. Worrall, J. Shuckburgh in Holborn; J. Wilcox, A. Millar, in the Strand; T. Osborne, in Gray's-Inn; J. Peele in Ave Maria-Lane; C. Corbett, without Temple-Bar; C. Ward, and R. Chandler, at the Black Boy in Pater-Noster-Row.

MDCCXXXVI.

TO

RICHARD MEAD M.D.

Fellow of the COLLEGE of PHYSICIANS,

AND OF THE

ROYAL SOCIETY,

AND

PHYSICIAN to his MAJESTY;

This SECOND VOLUME of the

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical,

Is Dedicated by

His moſt Obliged and moſt

Obedient Humble Servants,

The Authors.

The Author.

Obedient Humble Servant

His most Obliged and most

Is Dedicated by

Historical and Critical

GENERAL DICTIONARY

This SECOND VOLUME of the

PHYSICIAN to his MAJESTY:

AND

ROYAL SOCIETY,

AND OF THE

Fellow of the COLLEGE of PHYSICIANS,

RICHARD MEAD M.D.

TO

A GENERAL DICTIONARY Hiſtorical and Critical.

☞ ANGELIS (DOMINICO DE), author of ſeveral pieces relating to the hiſtory of Literature [A], was born the 14th of October 1675 at Lecce, the capital of Otranto in the Kingdom of Naples, of one of the nobleſt and moſt conſiderable families of that city. He began his ſtudies of polite Learning, Philoſophy, Divinity, and Civil Law in that city; and at ſeventeen years of age went to finiſh them at Naples, where he applied himſelf likewiſe to the Greek tongue and Geometry. Having made himſelf maſter of theſe parts of Learning, he removed to Macerata, and was admitted Doctor of Law there. The deſire of improving his mind, and enlarging his knowledge of things, induced him afterwards to travel into France and Spain, and he raiſed himſelf a great reputation wherever he went. Several Academies of Italy were ambitious of procuring him for a member, and therefore we find his name not only in thoſe of Trasformati and Spioni of Lecce, but likewiſe in that of the Inveſtiganti of Naples, in that of Florence, and that of the Arcadians at Rome, into which he was admitted the 8th of Auguſt 1698. He received holy Orders very early, and was afterwards Canon and Grand Penitentiary of the Church of Lecce, Vicar General of Vieſti, Gallipoli, and Gragnano; firſt Chaplain of the Troops of the Kingdom of Naples and of the Pope, Auditor of M. Nicholas Negroni, and afterwards of the Cardinal

[A] Author of ſeveral pieces relating to the Hiſtory of Literature.] I. Diſſertazione intorna alla patria di Ennio; i. e. A Diſſertation upon the country of Ennius." Rome 1701, in 8vo, pagg. 55. Florence 1712, in 8vo. This ſecond Edition, in which are ſeveral additions, was printed at Naples, tho' the title ſays at Florence. The Author endeavours to prove, that the town of Rudia two miles from Lecce, and not Rudia near Tarento was the country of that Poet. II. Vita di Monſignor Roberto Caracciolo, Veſcovo d'Aquino e di Lecce; i. e. "The Life of "Signior Roberto Caracciolo, Biſhop of Aquino and "Lecce." Naples 1703 in 4to. And among the Lives of the Letterati Salentini, firſt part, p. 1. III. Della Vita di Scipione Ammirato, Patrizio Leccheſe, libri tre; i. e. "The Life of Scipio Ammirato, a Patrician "of Lecce, in three books." Lecce 1706, in 8vo, and in the firſt part of the Vite de' Letterati Salentini. IV. Vita di Antonio Caraccio, da Nardo; i. e. "The "Life of Antonio Caraccio of Nardo;" It is publiſhed among the Vite de gli Arcadi Illuſtri, Tom. 1, p. 141, and the Vite de' Letterati Salentini, firſt part. V. Vita di Andrea Peſchiulli, da Corigliano; i. e. "The Life of Andrew Peſchiulli, of Corigliano." Inſerted in the abovementioned Collections. VI. Vita di Giacomo Antonio Ferrari; i. e. "The Life of James "Antonio Ferrari." Lecce 1715, in 8vo, and in the Vite de' Letterati Salentini, part 1. VII. Vita di Giorgio Baglivo, Leccheſe. i. e. "The Life of George "Baglivo of Lecce." The Journal of Venice, which gives an account of this book, mentions neither the year when, nor the form in which it was printed. VIII. Lettera diſcorſiva al March. Giovan. Gioſeffo Orſi, dove ſi tratta dell' origine e progreſſi de' Signori Accademici Spioni, e delle varie loro lodevoli applicazioni; i. e. "A Diſcourſe by way of letter to the "Marquis John Joſeph Orſi, in which an account is "given of the origin and progreſs of the Academi-"cians of Spioni, and of their ſeveral commendable "employments." Lecce 1705, in 8vo. We have obſerved in the text of this article, that our Author was a Member of this Academy. IX. Diſcorſo hiſtorico, in cui ſi tratta dell' origine e delle fondazione della citta di Lecce, e d'alcune migliori e piu principali notizie di eſſa; i. e. "An hiſtorical Diſcourſe concerning the original and foundation of the city of Lecce, "and ſome of the remarkable things relating to it." Lecce 1705, in 8vo. X. Le Vite de' Letterati Salentini parte 1ª. i. e. "The Lives of the learned men of "Terra d'Otranto, part 1." Florence 1710, in 4to. This edition was printed at Naples, tho' the title mentions Florence. The ſecond part was publiſhed at Naples 1713, in 4to. The Authors, whoſe Lives are given in the firſt part of this work are, 1. Robert Caracciolo, who died the 6th of May 1495. 2. Antonio Galateo, who died the 12th of November 1517. 3. Scipio Ammirato, who died the 30th of January 1600. 4. James Anthony Ferrari, who died in 1587. 5. Andrew Peſchiulli, who died the 19th of Jan. 1691. 6. Antonio Caraccio, who died the 14th of February 1702. In the ſecond part are contained the Lives 1. of Laurentio Scupoli, who died the 28th of November 1610. 2. John Charles Bovio, Archbiſhop of Brundufium, who died in September 1570. 3. John Baptiſta Criſpo, who was living in 1591. 4. Quinto Mario Corrado, who died in 1575. 5. Bonaventure Morone, a Franciſcan Monk, who died in 1621. 6. Aſcanio Grandi, who was living in 1632. 7. Ferdinand Donno, who died in 1649. 8. Fulgentio Gemma, who died in 1634. 9. Epiphanio Ferdinando, who died the 6th of September 1638. 10. Peter Galatino. Theſe Lives are very curious, and written with great accuracy and judgment. XI. Orazione Funebre, recitata in occaſione della morte dell' Imperadore Giuſeppe, nel Veſcoval Domo di Gallipoli; i. e. "A Funeral Oration ſpoken upon the occaſion of the "death of the Emperor Joſeph in the Epiſcopal Palace "of Gallipoli." Naples 1716. XII. Scritto Iſtorico-legale ſopra le ragioni della ſoſpenſione del l' Interdetto locale generale della chieſa di Lecce e ſua dioceſi; i. e. "An "hiſtorical and law Treatiſe upon the reaſons of the "ſuſpenſion of the local general interdict of the Church "of Lecce and the Dioceſe of it." Rome 1716. XIII. Tre Lettere legale. Theſe three Letters were written in defence of the rights of the Church of Lecce. XIV. He wrote likewiſe ſeveral Poems, and particularly ſeven Sonnets, which are publiſhed in the ſecond part of the Rime Scelte del. Sign. Bartolommeo Lippi. Printed at Lucca 1719, in 8vo (1). T.

(1) See Memoires pour ſervir &c. p. 283, 284, 285, 286; and the Journal of Venice, tom. 33. Part 2. p. 254.

Cardinal his uncle. While King Philip V of Spain was maſter of the Kingdom of Naples, he was honoured with the title of his principal Hiſtoriographer, and afterwards became Secretary to the Duke of Gravina. He died at Lecce the 9th of Auguſt 1719, in the forty third year of his age, and was interred in the Cathedral of the City (a).

(a) Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt. tom. 16. p. 282, 283. edit. Paris 1731.

☞ANGELUS (CHRISTOPHER) a learned Greek in the ſeventeenth Century, and author of ſeveral works [A], was born at Peloponneſus in Greece, and obliged by the Turks to abandon his country on account of his religion, having before ſuffered a variety of torments in defence of it. He came afterwards to England, and having landed at Yarmouth, was ſupported by the benevolence of the Biſhop of Norwich, and ſeveral of the Clergy there. By that Biſhop's recommendation he went to Cambridge, and ſtudied for about three years in Trinity College. About Whitſuntide 1610 he took a journey to Oxford, and ſtudied in Baliol College, where he did great ſervice among the young ſcholars of the Univerſity by inſtructing them in the Greek Language; which province he executed till his death, which happened on the firſt of February 1638, leaving behind him the character of an excellent Grecian, and a man of great integrity (a).

(a) Wood, Athenæ Oxon. Vol. 1. Col. 618. 2d edit. 1721.

[A] Author of ſeveral works.] I. Of the many ſtripes and torments inflicted on him by the Turks for the faith, which he had in Jeſus Chriſt. Oxon. 1617, in Greek and Engliſh. II. Enchiridion de Inſtitutis Græcorum; i. e. "A Manual concerning the Cuſtoms "of the Greeks." Cambridge 1619, 4to, in Greek and Latin. The Greek copy of this falling into the hands of George Fhelavius a Miniſter of Dantzick, he tranſlated it into Latin, and wrote learned Notes upon it; and it was printed at Francfort 1655, in 8vo. This tranſlation of Fhelavius is intitled Status & Ritus Eccleſiæ Græcæ; i. e. "The State and Rites of the "Greek Church." III. An Encomium of the famous Kingdom of Great Britain, and the two flouriſhing Siſter-Univerſities, Cambridge and Oxford. Cambr. 1619, in 4to. IV. De Apoſtaſia Eccleſiæ, & de homine peccati, ſcil. Antichriſto, &c. i. e. "Of the "Apoſtacy of the Church, and of the Man of Sin, "namely, Antichriſt." London 1624, Greek and Latin, in 4to (1). T.

(1) Wood, Vol. 1. Col. 618.

ANGIOLELLO (JOHN MARIO) born at Vicenza, compoſed in Italian and the Turkiſh Language the Hiſtory of Mahomet II, which he dedicated to him. It was very kindly received by that haughty Sultan, who beſides the civilities which he ſhewed to Angiolello, gave him very conſiderable marks of his liberality. The author had been an eye-witneſs of what he related; for being one of the ſlaves of the young Sultan Muſtapha, he followed him in the expedition to Perſia in 1473. I mean that dreadful war which Mahomet carried on in perſon with almoſt two hundred thouſand ſoldiers into the dominions of Uſſun-Caſſan. It is ſomewhat ſurprizing that Angiolello, who knew without doubt the haughty diſpoſition of this Emperor of the Turks, ſhould venture to repeat the abuſive terms, which Uſſun-Caſſan uſed in reproaching him with his illegitimate birth, when he viewed the army of the enemies from a hill upon the bank of the Euphrates. Perhaps Mahomet never knew that his hiſtory had immortalized that reproach upon him; for Princes do not know all that is contained in the books dedicated to them. However that be, Angiolello's book was not the leſs kindly received, or the leſs amply rewarded (a). Thoſe who tell us he flouriſhed in 1524 (b), conſider him too late in the decline of his life; but what they add, that he wrote the life of Uſſun-Caſſan is more juſt. There was printed at Venice in 1553 a piece of Giov. Mario Angiolello della Vita & Fatti di Re di Perſia (c); and we find in the Library of Mr. de Thou (d), Relatione della Vita e de' Fatti del Signor Uſun-caſſan; i. e. An Hiſtory of the Life and Actions of Signor Uſuncaſſan, by our Angiolello. They have forgot to mention the date and place of the impreſſion.

(a) See the Hiſtory of Mahomet by Guillet, tom. 2. p. 210, 218, 234.

(b) Konig, Biblioth. vet. & nova, in the word Angelellus.

(c) See the Catalogue of Oxford.

(d) Firſt part of the Catalogue, p. 450.

ANGLUS (THOMAS) an Engliſh Prieſt, as well known for the ſingularity of his opinions, as the multitude of little books which he wrote in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born of a very good family, which he frequently tells us in the title page of his works [A]. He bore ſeveral names [B]; and there are few countries in Europe which he did not live in for ſome time. He was principal of the College at Liſbon, and ſubprincipal of that at Doway (a). He made a long ſtay at Rome and Paris. He was a conſiderable time a domeſtick of Sir Kenelm Digby's; and he teſtified to the publick that he had a very great eſteem for the opinions of that Gentleman [C]. He piqued himſelf upon perſiſting in the Peripatetic Philoſophy, and oppoſing the lights which Mr. Des Cartes

(a) See his book intitled Statera appenſa, &c. p. 50.

[A] He was born of a good family, which he frequently acquaints us with in the title-page of his works.] For inſtance, his three Dialogues de Mundo, printed at Paris, in 1642, contain in the title, Authore Thoma Anglo, è generoſâ Albiorum in Oriente Trinobantum proſapiâ oriundo.

[B] He went by ſeveral names.] See what Mr. Baillet remarks upon this point. "Sir Kenelm Dig- "by had with him the famous Thomas Anglus, an "Engliſh Gentleman, and a Catholic Prieſt, born "of one of the moſt ancient families in England, "who ſeemed an Iriſhman to outward appearance, "living in very great tho' voluntary poverty. His "true ſirname was White, which he uſed to diſguiſe, "ſometimes under that of Candidus, ſometimes that "of Albius *, ſometimes that of Bianchi, and ſome- "times that of Richworth; but he was moſt known "in France under that of Thomas Anglus..... Des "Cartes generally called him Mr. Vitus (1)." We ſee at the bottom of ſeveral of the Dedications of Thomas Anglus, that of Thomas ex Albiis.

* Albius was equivocal, becauſe of Albion and Albus.

(1) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 245, under the year 1644.

[C] He had a particular eſteem for the opinions of Digby.] The title of one of his books, printed at Lyons in 1646, is as follows; Inſtitutionum Peripateticarum ad mentem ſummi clariſſimique Philoſophi Kenelmi Equitis Digbæi; i. e. "Inſtitutions of the Peripa- "tetic Philoſophy according to the hypotheſis of the "great and celebrated Philoſopher Sir Kenelm Dig- "by." The Preface gives the reaſon of this title in this manner: Quod ad mentem ſummi Viri & clariſſimi Philoſophi Kenelmi Equitis Digbæi ſcriptas pronuntiem, inde eſt quod cum in invidendo illo de animæ immortalitate

Cartes was willing to have given him [D]. He pretended even to make the principles of Ariſtotle ſubſervient to the explaining of the moſt impenetrable myſteries of religion, and upon that view he engaged in the diſcuſſion of free-will and grace. He was very much embaraſſed in this point, and by giving too great a ſcope to his own thoughts, he pleaſed neither the Moliniſts nor Janſeniſts. He had a genius very penetrating aad extenſive; but he had no talent at diſtinguiſhing the ideas which ſhould have ſerved as the rule and foundation of his reaſonings, nor at clearing the points which he was engaged in (b). He was a Philoſopher and a Divine of a very ſingular form. Some of his works were cenſured at Rome by the Congregation of the Index Expurgatorius, and in other places by the Univerſities [E]. He had a very peculiar notion concerning the ſtate of ſouls ſeparated from the body, and the eaſineſs of obtaining ſalvation. I cannot tell in what year he died; it was not till after the reſtoration of King Charles II. I have ſeen ſome of his books compoſed after the marriage of that Monarch with the Infanta of Portugal. He was no friend to the Jeſuits, and would have been glad that they had thought immortalitate libro totam naturæ compoſitionem à prima corporis ratione uſque ad inviſibiles animæ ſpiritualis articulos diſſecuerit, & in omnium oculos intulerit; alia quam ipſe præceſſerat incedere neque volui neque potui. Quicquid itaque de illo ſubjecto vides, inde tranſlatum eſt: That is, "With regard to what I ſay, "that I have written this book according to the hy-"potheſis of the great and celebrated Philoſopher Sir "Kenelm Digby, it is upon this account, that ſince "he in his excellent books of the Immortality of "the Soul has examined into the whole compoſition "of Nature from the firſt principles of body to the "inviſible properties of the ſoul, and explained them "in a juſt manner, I was neither willing nor able to "proceed in any other method than he has done. So "that what you have here upon that ſubject, is borrowed "from thence." He was not contented to pay him homage on account of his philoſophical opinions: but alſo raiſed him to the character of a Divine, and this even in the moſt ſublime myſteries; as appears from his book intitled, Quæſtio Theologica, quomodo ſecundum principia Peripatetices Digbæanæ, ſive ſecundum rationem & abſtrahendo, quantum materia patitur, ab authoritate, humani arbitrii libertas, ſit explicanda, & cum gratia efficaci concilianda (2); i. e. "A Theolo-"gical Queſtion, in what manner, according to the "principles of Sir Ken. Digby's Peripatetic Philoſo-"phy, or according to reaſon, abſtracting as much as "the ſubject will permit, from authority, the free-"dom of man's will is to be explained and reconciled "with efficacious grace." He printed in 1652 his Inſtitutiones Theologicæ ſuper fundamentis in Peripateticâ Digbæanâ jactis extructæ; i. e. "Inſtitutions of "Divinity built upon the foundations laid down in "Sir K. Digby's Peripatetic Philoſophy."

(b) See with regard to his obſcurity the remark [D].

(2) It is in 120. The place and date of the impreſſion do not appear. We find by the preface that the author was then old.

[D] He oppoſed the lights, which Mr. Des Cartes was willing to have given him. I ſhall have recourſe to Mr. Baillet. "Thomas Anglus, ſays he (3), was a "Peripatetic of a more extraordinary form than even "Sir Kenelm Digby, and he certainly exceeded him "in the obſcurity of his ideas, and the unintel-"ligibleneſs of his thoughts. However he was "one of the moſt ſubtle Philoſophers of his age, and "entirely diſengaged from any attachment to the "doctrine of the ſchools, which moſt of the Ariſto-"telians ſubmit to. Mr. Des Cartes had conceived a "great eſteem for him upon the advantageous cha-"racter, which Sir Ken. Digby gave of him. He "permitted Thomas Anglus to make his objections. "The nature of theſe objections, and the high idea "which Sir Kenelm gave of his genius, made him "hope to ſee him ſoon a proſelyte to his Philoſophy; "but the event ſhewed that he preſumed too much "upon the flexibleneſs of Thomas Anglus's temper. "He perplexed his brain with the abſtruſe points of "predeſtination, free-will, and grace, which began "to diſturb the faculties of Divinity at Louvain and "Paris. Being poſſeſſed with the notion, that Mr. "Des Cartes was not ſent by God to give the neceſ-"ſary ſolutions to theſe difficulties, which are en-"tirely above human comprehenſion, he choſe rather "to recur to Ariſtotle's hypotheſes, in order to pe-"netrate into theſe obſcure myſteries. What he wrote "upon this ſcheme is very like the ancient Oracles "for obſcurity; and this is probably that, which "made him ſo unintelligible to the congregation of "the Index Expurgatorius at Rome †, and ſo be con-"ſidered as a barbarous Divine § by the Jeſuites."

(3) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 245.

† Decret. Sacr. Cong. Collect.

§ He was called by Labbe Theologaſter, a trifling Divine.

It will not be amiſs to mention here, what he replied to thoſe, who accuſed him of obſcurity: His anſwer may give us a clearer notion of the peculiarity of his genius. I value myſelf, ſays he (4), upon ſuch a brevity and conciſeneſs, as is ſuitable for the Teachers of the ſciences. The Divines are the cauſe, that my writings continue obſcure; for they refuſe to give me any occaſion of explaining myſelf. In ſhort either the learned underſtand me, or they do not. If they do underſtand me, and find me in an error, it is eaſy for them to refute me; if they do not underſtand me, it is very unreaſonable for them to exclaim againſt my doctrines. This ſhews the temper of a man, who ſeeks only to be talked of, and is vexed in not having antagoniſts enough to draw the regard and attention of the Publick upon him. Riſerunt aliqui hominem quod evidentiam jactet, cum tamen perobſcurè ipſum ſcribere, quotquot eum legunt, queritentur. Reſponait ille, ſe brevitati ſcientiarum traditoribus aptæ ſtudere; Theologos in cauſa eſſe, quod obſcura maneant ipſius ſcripta, dum ſeſe explicandi anſam præbere refugiunt. Addit vel doctos eum intelligere poſſe; unde &, ſi errores ſcribat, ipſum confutare in proclivi eſt; vel non intelligere, & ſic neque debere ipſi occlamitare; cum peſſimus ſit animi morbus calumniari quod neſcis. There is ſomething very ſophiſtical in this Dilemma.

(4) Præfat. Statera Appenſa.

[E] Some of his works have been cenſured by the congregation of the Index Expurgatorius at Rome, and in other places by the Univerſities.] The Decree of this Congregation of the 10th of June 1658 condemns theſe four treatiſes of Thomas Anglus, Inſtitutiones Peripateticæ; Appendix Theologica de Origine Mundi; Tabula ſuffragialis de terminandis fidei litibus ab Eccleſia Catholica fixa; Teſſeræ Romanæ Evulgatio. The two laſt pieces were publiſhed againſt the famous Father Macedo, who in all conteſts of the pen, has been a conſtant adventurer, a kind of Knight-Errant, always ready to break a lance. He attacked Thomas Anglus (5); but inſtead of replying to the Tabulæ ſuffragiales, and the Teſſeræ Romanæ Evulgatio, which had been oppoſed to his attack, he had recourſe to intrigues, and got theſe books condemned by the Congregation of the Index (6). The Doctors of Doway cenſured two and twenty propoſitions extracted from the Sacred Inſtitutions of Thomas Anglus. He oppoſed to their cenſure his Supplicatio poſtulativa juſtitiæ, in which he complains, that they had given a vague uncertain cenſure of him, attended only with a reſpectivè, i. e. reſpectively, without taxing any propoſition in particular (7). He ſhews them, that this is acting like prevaricating Divines. And in reality, does not this method tend to deceive the ignorant, and lead them to ſlander their neighbours character? If you pronounce in general upon thirty propoſitions, that they are reſpectively raſh, dangerous, heretical, where is the man, whom you will not expoſe to take that for heretical, which is only a raſh aſſertion, or for raſh only, that, which is hereſy in its utmoſt extent? This reflection will have the more weight, if I repreſent it, as it is expreſſed in the Letter of an anonymous Author, who appears to be a man of genius and judgment. It is thus he ſpeaks upon the ſubject of the Decree of the Inquiſition of the 7th of December 1690 againſt one and thirty propoſitions: "I cannot tell, Sir, ſays the Prelate, addreſſing him-"ſelf to the Doctor, whether you have underſtood "all the artifice and management of the cenſure. "You know the manner in which theſe Gentlemen

(5) He publiſhed in 1654, Sonus Lituî adverſus Sonum tubæ. Thomas Anglus had before publiſhed in 1653, Sonus Buccinæ, cum Appendice adverſus mentem divinitus inſpiratam Innocentio.

(6) See the Preface to the book intitled, Statera appenſa quoad ſalutis aſſequendæ facilitatem, printed at London in 1661, in 120.

(7) See the ſame Preface. A Reflection upon the cenſure of propoſitions extracted from a book.

thought him worthy their reſentments [F]. I have been informed, that at the beginning of the conteſts between King Charles I and the Parliament, he wrote in Engliſh in defence of the doctrine of the Church of England concerning paſſive obedience.

" uſe to characterize the propoſitions, not by giving " to every one of them in particular its proper note " and name, either of ſcandalous, or erroneous, &c. " but in ranging at firſt all the propoſitions, if there " be five hundred, one after another; and then un- " der theſe propoſitions in general, to give them all " the characteriſtics they think proper, by adding a " reſpectivè, i. e. reſpectively at the end. So that " every particular Divine is to gueſs himſelf, which of " theſe propoſitions are condemned only as ſcandalous, " and which are heretical or otherwiſe (8)." In the next page there is a Counſellor of Parliament introduced ſpeaking thus: " But eſpecially, we ſhould " think we trifled with juſtice, and expoſed ourſelves " to the public ridicule and indignation, if we gave " in our Decrees on one part all the pretenſions of " the parties, and all the heads of the proceſs, and " on the other confuſedly and in groſs all the diffe- " rent deciſions with a reſpectivè, which would ren- " der the Decree unintelligible, and prove the occa- " ſion of a thouſand diſputes, that would never end." See the Reflections made upon this ſame Decree of Alexander VIII by the Author of the Difficulties propoſed to Mr. Steyaert (9). I return now to Thomas Anglus. He formed ſeveral doubts againſt every particular cenſure of the Divines of Doway; and pretended, that if they did not give him ſatisfaction, it would turn to their ſhame and confuſion and his honour (10). Whenever a cenſure is carried againſt any book by caballing rather than reaſon, the perſon cenſured is ſure to confound the Author of it. We may remember the Letter, which Mr. Arnauld wrote in 1683 to the Univerſity of Doway.

(8) Lettre d'un Abbé a un Prelat de la Cour de Rome, p. 29. In the title of my edition it is Jouxte la Copie imprimée a Thoulouſe, 1691.

(9) Difficult. a Steyaert. IX Part p. 249.

(10) Præfat. Statera &c. See the quotation (6).

I have not yet mentioned all that I have to ſay of the cenſures which were fixed upon Thomas Anglus's books. As ſoon as his Statera Morum appeared, the Archbiſhop of Mechlen, and the Biſhop of Antwerp, complained to the Nuncio at Bruſſels. There was a pragmatical perſon, who went to England to get hands to ſign againſt the doctrine of this Author (11); and it appeared, that the Biſhop of Chalcedon diſapproved of the treatiſe de Medio Animarum Statu, and there was a rumour, that he had cenſured it publickly (12).

Father Baron obſerves, that the Sonitus Buccinæ was cenſur'd, and that the Author maintained, that the Church had no power to determine, but only to give her teſtimony to tradition (13).

(11) See the ſame preface to the Statera.

(12) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the book of Thomas Anglus, intitled, Vellicationis ſuæ de medio Animarum ſtatu ratio, printed in 1653.

(13) Baro, Apologiæ lib. 4. pag. 344.

[F] He would have been glad, that the Jeſuites had thought him worthy their reſentments.] This appears from the Preface, which I have ſo often quoted (14). The Author of that Preface and the Book, which follows it, is not perhaps a different perſon from Thomas Anglus. It is probable he wrote againſt his own Statera Morum, as well to clear the difficulties of it, as to engage the publick to take notice of a book, which was in danger of being neglected amidſt ſuch a croud of new books. However that be, the Author of this Preface ſeems to be a perſon well acquainted with the thoughts of Thomas Anglus, and no enemy to him. Let us ſee then what he ſays with regard to the Jeſuits. Increbuerunt ſæpiuſculè rumores comminatam eſſe doctam illam ſocietatem ſe contra D. Albii opera ſtricturam calamum. Hoc idem ab iis maximè expectabant omnes, ut quos præcipue ac pæne unicè ſcriptis ſuis laceſſiverat. Attamen ſive ex motivis prudentialibus ſuppreſſi ſint libri illi jam ſcripti, ſive nulli omnino ſcripti fuerint, nihil dum editum eſt. Hic triumphat maximè D. Albius, & cauſam ſuam hoc diſcurſu tueri ſolet: Minas illas, quas intentabant, clamores, quibus ipſi paſſim obſtrepebant, manifeſta eſſe indicia non defuiſſe VOLUNTATEM illam confutandi: Neque eo genio eſſe PP. Societatis, ut quicquam famâ ſuâ charius habeant; unde evidenter conſtare ſolum iis defuiſſe potentiam, poſtquam ad tam inſignem ignominiam propellendam adeò tardi extiterint. That is, " There have been fre- " quent reports, that this learned Society had threatned " to write againſt the works of Mr. Albius. This " every body expected from them, as he had attack- " ed them, and ſcarce any but them, in his writings. " But whether thoſe books, which they wrote, were " ſuppreſſed upon prudential motives, or whether they " never wrote any, nothing has been publiſhed. This " is a great occaſion of triumph to Mr. Albius, who " uſes to defend his cauſe in this manner; that their " menaces and clamours againſt him, are plain proofs " that they did not want a will to confute him; and " as the Society values nothing ſo much as their re- " putation, it follows from thence, that they only " wanted power to do it, ſince they have been ſo ſilent " upon ſuch a flagrant attack upon them." You ſee here a man, who not being able to procure the honour of engaging with the Jeſuits, takes advantage of their ſilence, and defends himſelf by imputing it to their weakneſs, and not their inſenſibility.

(14) Præfat. Statera appenſa, &c. See the quotation (6).

☞ANGRIANI, or AYGNANI, or AIGNAN (MICHAEL) commonly called MICHAEL. of BOLOGNA, a Divine of diſtinguiſhed learning in the fourteenth Century, was born at Bologna in Italy, where he entered himſelf into the Order of the Carmelites (a). He ſtudied afterwards in the Univerſity of Paris, where he received the degree of Doctor. In the General Chapter of his Order, which was held at Ferrara in 1354, and in that of Bourdeaux in 1358, and in that of Treves in 1362, he was named Regent of the Convent at Paris. It was during this employment that he wrote his Commentary upon the four books of Sentences (b). In the year 1372 he was preſent at the General Chapter held at Aix in Provence under the character of Definitor of the Province of Bologna, and received the title of Maſter, that is, Doctor of Divinity, which was likewiſe given him in the General Chapters held at Puy en Velay in 1375, and at Bruges in 1379, where he aſſiſted as Provincial of his Province (c). He was choſen Vicar General [A] the 19th of April 1380; and in 1381 unanimouſly elected General of his Order by the General Chapter held at Verne. The Provincials of the Provinces that declared for Pope Clement VII not being preſent, their places were ſupplied by other Monks, who were named in

(a) Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſt tom. 5. p. 392, 393. edit. Paris 1728; and Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 88. edit. Paris 1702.

(b) Memoires, ubi ſupra.

(c) Ibid.

[A] He was choſen Vicar General.] The great ſchiſm, which divided the Church after the death of Pope Gregory IX, occaſioned likewiſe a great diviſion among the religious Orders, and particularly that of the Carmelites. The Convents of Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Pruſſia, Flanders, Frieſland, and ſeveral other provinces contiguous to Germany, together with Tuſcany, Lombardy, and the other countries of Italy acknowledged Pope Urban VI. But the Convents of France, Spain, Scotland, and Naples maintained the party of Pope Clement VII, which was joined alſo by Bernard Olenſis or Oleri the ſeventeenth General of the Order of the Carmelites; and for this reaſon he was depoſed by Pope Urban, who gave orders in the General Chapter, which was held at Bruges in 1379, that another ſhould be elected out of the countries, which had ſubmitted to his authority. The Chapter obeyed the Pope's directions, and choſe Angriani under the title of Vicar-General, which was confirmed by a Bull of that Pope, dated the 13th of the Calends of May, that is the 19th of April 1380 (1).

(1) Memoires pour ſervir, &c. p. 394, 395.

in their room: in the General Chapter held in 1385 at Bamberge in the Province of Upper Germany, the ſame dignity was conferred upon our Angriani. But the year following going to Genoa to meet Pope Urban VI, he was depoſed from his office without any cauſe alledged for it, except that it was urged by ſome, that he was a friend and confident of ſeveral Cardinals, who were put to death by the Pope's order about that time; but others ſaid, that it was on account of ſome ſuſpicions which the Pope entertained of the Archdeacon of Bruges, who had been Angriani's ſcholar (d). Our author being diſcharged from his employment retired to the Convent of Bologna, where he finiſhed the works which we have of him [B]. Notwithſtanding his being depoſed from his office of General of the Order, Pope Boniface IX made him Vicar General of the Province of Bologna in 1394, with a full power of governing it; and in 1396 he was preſent at the General Chapter of Placentia, as Definitor of the ſame Province (e). He died at Bologna the 16th of November 1400, according to Father Lewis de Sainte Thereſe (f), or the firſt of December 1416, the laſt year of the reign of Winceſlaus the Emperor, and under Pope Boniface IX, according to Trithemius (g) and Du Pin (h). The firſt opinion is more agreeable to the epitaph in the church of the Carmelites at Bologna, engraven upon a marble monument before the great altar. But the obſcurity and barbarous ſtyle of it might give occaſion to Trithemius's aſſertion. We ſhall give this epitaph in a note [C]. Trithemius tells us (i), that he was a perſon extremely well ſkilled in the Scriptures, and ſecular Learning, and in Canon Law.

(d) Ibid. pag. 395.

(e) Ibid. pag. 396.

(f) Ibid.

(g) De Script. Eccleſ. c. 674.

(h) Ubi ſupra.

(i) Ubi ſupra.

ANICETUS

[B] The works, which we have of him.] I. Ad Cardinalem S. Mariæ trans Tyberim inſigne opus & præclarum de Conceptione S. Mariæ Liber 1; i. e. "A "noble and excellent work addreſſed to the Cardinal "of St. Mary beyond the Tyber concerning the Con"ception of the Virgin Mary, in one book;" in MS. Arnoul Boſtius, a Carmelite Monk, who died at Ghent the 31ſt of March 1499, ſays, that this work of Angriani is every where full of expreſſions of this kind: Tota pulchra, tota formoſa eſt Maria, amica ſpiritûs almi, verbi divini genetrix, æterni patris comparentalis, eundem cum eo filium habens, & macula originalis non eſt in eâ: i. e. "The Virgin "Mary is all beautiful and amiable; ſhe is the Mi"ſtreſs of the Holy Ghoſt, the Mother of the Divine "word, nearly related to the Eternal Father, having "the ſame ſon with him; and the ſtain of original "ſin is not in her (2). II. Super Sententias Libri IV; i. e. "Commentaries upon the Sentences in four books." The firſt edition of this was printed at Milan in 1510; and afterwards it was publiſhed at Venice in 1632 in fol. by Father Leo Prioli, a monk of the ſame Order (3). III. Queſtiones Sententiarum, liber unus: i. e. "One book of Queſtions upon the Sentences." In Evangelium Matthæi liber: i. e. "One book upon "the Goſpel of St. Matthew." Tabula moralium ſancti Gregorii Papæ; i. e. "A Table of the Morals of "St. Gregory the Pope." Tabula Decreti; i. e. "A "Table of the Decree." In Ethicam Ariſtotelis liber; i. e. "Upon the Ethics of Ariſtotle in one book." In Valerium Maximum liber; i. e. "Notes upon Va"lerius Maximus in one book." Sermones varii, liber unus; i. e. "Several Sermons in one book." Theſe tracts are mentioned by Trithemius (4), to which he adds, In Evangelium Lucæ, liber unus; i. e. "Com"mentaries upon the Goſpel of St. Luke in one book." The Author of the Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. &c. has quoted all but the laſt; and he obſerves, that we have only the titles of them remaining, unleſs ſome Library in Italy, where Angriani lived for the greateſt part of his Life, has preſerved them in MS. (5). IV. Lectura ſuper Michæam; i. e. "A Lecture upon "the Prophet Micah." This work is cited by Angriani in his Commentary upon the 67th Pſalm, verſe 8 (6). V. Poſtilla ſuper Joannem; i. e. "A "Poſtill upon St. John." He refers likewiſe to this Tract in his Explications upon the 76th Pſalm ver. 1. and 13 (7). Poſtillæ in Apocalypſin; "Poſtills up"on the Revelations." This work is quoted in his Explication of his 77th Pſalm; as alſo the following. VI. Sermones quadrageſimales; i. e. "Lent-Sermons" (8). VIII. This perhaps is the ſame, that is called Quadrageſimale by Trithemius (9), and it is mentioned by Du Pin (10). VIII. Dictionarium Divinum; i. e. "A Divine Dictionary", in MS. This is a Dictionary of the Bible, explaining all the words, which are mentioned in the Scriptures; but death prevented him from finiſhing it. He had only diſpatched the three firſt Letters (11). The MS. of this work, as well as the MSS. of the four preceding are preſerved in the Libraries of the Carmelites at Bologna and Ferrara (12). IX. Commentaria in Pſalmos; i. e. "Commentaries upon the Pſalms." This work was firſt publiſhed at Alcala in 1524 by John Jonſica Biſhop of Burgos from a MS. in the Library of the Monaſtery of St. Jerom Los Totos de Guiſando. As the name of the Author was not prefixed to it, it was printed under the name of Ignotus or the Unknown; and in the ſame manner it was publiſhed at Lyons in 1588 and 1603 (13). But Father Baſil Anguſſola, a Monk of the Order of the Carmelites found in the year 1600 in the Library of that Order at Bologna a MS. divided into five volumes, at the end of which were theſe words, Explicit Lectura primæ, ſecundæ, &c. partis, Pſalterii compilata per F. Michaelem de Bononia Ordinis, B. M. de Monte Carmelo inter Theologos Doct. Pariſienſes Minimum; i. e. "Here ends the "Lecture upon the firſt, ſecond, &c. part of the "Pſalter, compiled by Brother Michael of Bologna "of the Order of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary of Mount "Carmel the leaſt among the Doctors of Paris." He found likewiſe another MS. about the ſame time in the Library of the Carmelites at Venice, part of which was written in the year 1397, and the reſt in 1424, divided likewiſe into five volumes, at the beginning of which were theſe words: Incipit lectura ſuper Pſalterium edita & compoſita per Fr. Michaelem de Aygnanis de Bononia ſacræ Theologiæ Doctorem eximium Ord. Fratrum. S. Dei Genetricis Mariæ de Monte Carmelo; i. e. "Here begins the Lecture upon "the Pſalter publiſhed and compoſed by Brother Mi"chael de Ayguanis of Bologna, an excellent Doctor "of Divinity, of the Order of St. Mary the Mother "of God of Mount Carmel." Upon the firſt leaf of every volume was painted a Profeſſor ſitting in a chair in the habit of a Carmelite with his auditors dreſſed in different habits below; and at the end of every volume the name of the Author was likewiſe written. Both theſe MSS. were preſented to the Patriarch of Venice and the Archbiſhop of Bologna, who named proper perſons to verify them by the Commentary printed at Lyons under the name of Incognitus upon the Pſalms; who finding them agreeable to that edition, a new one was undertaken from theſe MSS. and others as ancient, which were found in ſeveral Libraries of the City of Bologna, which had the ſame inſcriptions. After all this examination and precaution therefore theſe Commentaries were publiſhed with the true name of the Author, firſt at Venice in three volumes in 4to, printed by John Guerili, the firſt volume in 1600, and the two others in 1602: at Paris in 1626 in two volumes fol. and at Lyons in 1652 and 1673 in the ſame form (14).

(2) Ibid. p. 397.

(3) Ibid. p. 393 and 397.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

(5) Memoires, &c. p. 397, 398.

(6) Ibid. p. 398.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ubi ſupra.

(10) Ubi ſupra.

(11) Trithem. ubi ſupra.

(12) Memoires, ubi ſupra.

(13) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, ſays in 1602.

[C] We ſhall give this Epitaph in a note.]

Michael Doctor hic eſt Ayguana Bononias illum
Stirps dat, Carmeli, quem tulit ordo, caput.
In David ejus ovat calamus; ſtupor eſtque Latinis
Et Gallis virtus, ingeniumque ſenis.
Bis ſeptingentos annos patet eſſe Novembrem,
Atque bis octenos explicuiſſe dies (15).

(14) Memoires, &c. p. 399, 400, 401.

(15) Ibid. pag. 396, 397.

☞ANICETUS a franchis'd ſlave, Tutor to Nero in his infancy, and afterwards Commander of his Fleet. As Tacitus is the chief author who has furniſhed us with the materials of this article, we ſhall draw it up moſtly in the words of Mr. Gordon's tranſlation. Anicetus was violently hated by Agrippina Nero's mother, and he with equal virulence returned the hatred. Nero intending to be rid of his mother, was at a loſs how to compaſs that deſign [A]. Anicetus proffered his ſervice and dexterity; he explained how a veſſel might be ſo contrived, that by the ſudden and artificial burſting of one particular quarter of it in the open ſea, Agrippina might be overwhelmed without the leaſt warning or apprehenſion. Nothing, he ſaid, was ſo fertile of diſaſters as the ſea, and if ſhe was thus diſpatched by ſhipwreck, who could be ſo injurious as to aſcribe the malignity of winds and waves to the malice and contrivance of men? Beſides, the Prince would of courſe beſtow on his deceaſed mother a temple and altars, and all other honours proper to create an oſtentation of filial grief and piety. Nero was pleaſed with the device [B], a veſſel was contrived accordingly; Agrippina was enticed to come to Baiæ, where the Emperor then was; he entertained her very magnificently, and when ſhe went away, he prevailed upon her to embark on board the fatal veſſel, which ſhe did, with only two of her attendants. They had not ſailed far, when ſuddenly, upon a ſignal given, the deck, over that quarter where Agrippina lay, was looſened, and being purpoſely loaded with a great quantity of lead, ſunk violently down. Agrippina was happily defended by the poſts of the bed, which happened to be too ſtrong to yield to the deſcending weight. She eſcaped with ſwimming, and with the aſſiſtance of ſome fiſher-boats, which rowed out to ſuccour her, ſhe reached the Lake Lucrinus, and was thence conducted to her own Villa. Nero, while he was hourly expecting expreſſes to appriſe him, that the parricide was executed, was informed, that ſhe had eſcaped only with a ſlight hurt, having ſo far felt the danger, as to remain in no uncertainty who it was that ſought her life. At this Nero became mortally ſtruck with agonies and diſmay [C]; he ſent immediately for Burrus

[A] Nero, intending to be rid of his mother was at a loſs how to compaſs that deſign.] "He was in ſuſpenſe about the means, whether by poiſon, or the "ſword, or any other effectual violence: that of poiſon "was preferred at firſt; but to adminiſter the ſame "was difficult: if it were done at the Prince's table, "its operation could never paſs nor be underſtood as "a ſudden and accidental death, ſince in the like "manner Britannicus had already periſhed; to apply "to her own domeſticks appeared a great riſque; as "ſhe was a woman, who from her own long intima"cy with frauds and blood, was wary and vigilant "againſt all ſnares and circumvention, and moreover "always ſecured herſelf by counterpoiſons againſt the "efforts of poiſon: And, how to diſpatch her with "the ſword, and yet cover the appearance of the "execution, no one pretended to deviſe; it was fear"ed too that the orders would be rejected, to whom"ſoever they were given, for the perpetration of ſo "hideous an iniquity (1)." Xiphilinus adds, that it was atteſted by ſeveral credible perſons, that Seneca himſelf prompted Nero to this murther, either to cover his own guilt, εἴτ' οὖν τὸ ἔγκλημα καθ' ἑαυτοῦ ἐπηλογίσασθαι βουληθείς, or, that Nero by this heinous crime might ſooner draw an entire ruin upon himſelf (2). In tranſlating the Greek words we have quoted, we follow H. Stephens's remark, who ſays, that theſe Greek words ſignify, crimen cui affinis erat, or word for word, crimen quod adverſus ſe erat; and adds, that the crime, which Seneca wanted to hide, was that he himſelf was contriving Nero's death, quod ipſemet Neronis vitæ inſidiaretur (3). But why ſhould Seneca adviſe Agrippina's death, in order to hide his own conſpiracy againſt Nero? Except it be ſuppoſed, that he had entered into ſome plot with Agrippina againſt the Emperor, of which there is not the leaſt hint in Hiſtory. It is true Xiphilinus ſays in another place (4), that Seneca conſpired with ſome other illuſtrious men againſt Nero; but not to ſay that this happened after Agrippina's death, for what reaſon ſhould Seneca adviſe Nero to kill her in order to hide his own conſpiracy? I obſerve then, that tho' ἔγκλημα ſignifies ſometimes a crime, yet it means more properly a charge, an accuſation, eſpecially being followed by the prepoſition κατὰ, which with the genitive caſe ſignifies againſt; and I take Xiphilinus's ſenſe to be, that Seneca adviſed Agrippina's death, either to avoid any charge againſt himſelf, as tho' he had been concerned in the plot, of which Agrippina was accuſed, or to render Nero more obnoxious. However that be, it is plain from Tacitus, that Seneca was conſulted by Nero concerning the murther of Agrippina; we have given the paſſage of that Hiſtorian in the text of this article, and we ſhall make an obſervation upon it below (5).

(1) Tacit. Ann. XIV. tranſlated by Mr. Gordon, tom. 1. p. 351. See alſo Xiphilin. Dionis Epitom. in Nerone, p. 162. ed. H. Steph. 1592. fol.

(2) Xiphil. ibid.

(3) Steph. in Xiphil. ad pag. 162.

(4) P. 181.

(5) In the remark [D].

[B] Nero was pleaſed with the device.] It was ſo much the more agreeable to him, that it was alſo favoured by the juncture of time, that of the ſolemn feſtival of Minerva, called Quinquatrus, which he was then celebrating at Baiæ. Thither he inticed his mother; for he was frequently declaring "That the haſty "humours of parents were by all means to be borne "withal, and towards her it behoved him to ſuppreſs "every irritation of his own ſpirit;" by ſuch declarations he meant to raiſe a general rumour of his own reconcilement to her; a rumour, which he hoped would reach Agrippina, and find credit with her, from the credulous genius of women, prone to believe whatever feeds their wiſhes, and promiſes matter of joy. When ſhe approached he met her upon the ſhore (for ſhe came by ſea from Antium) preſented her his hand, and embraced her; then conducted her to Bauli (6): Here amongſt ſeveral other veſſels lay one more gaudy and ornamental than the reſt; as if in this particular too he meditated freſh honour to his mother; for ſhe had been always wont to be carried in a galley with three banks of oars, rowed by mariners from the fleet. Moreover the banquet, to which ſhe was invited, was ſo timed, that under the dark ſhades of night the horrid execution might be covered. It was however apparent, that ſomebody had betrayed the deſign, and that Agrippina, upon hearing the perfidious machination, tho' ſhe was doubtful whether ſhe ought to believe it, had ſome thoughts of being carried to Baiæ by land; but upon her arrival there, the plauſible and frank behaviour of Nero aſſwaged her fears; for beſides his receiving her graciouſly, placing her at table above him, regaling her magnificently, treating her with all tenderneſs and careſſes; he entertained and amuſed her with great variety of converſation; this minute breaking out into ſallies of youthful frankneſs; the next with an air compoſed and grave, diſcourſing of weighty affairs, as if he had, in truth, therein ſought her counſel and participation: and after he had with this hollow fondneſs drawn out the banquet into a great length, he attended her aſſiduouſly to the ſhore, at parting hung upon her more ardently than before, kiſſed her eyes, kiſſed her boſom, and left it uncertain, whether, by ſuch paſſionate behaviour, he only meant to compleat this baſe ſcene of diſſimulation, or whether the laſt ſad ſight of a mother juſt going to periſh, really pierced him, and check'd his ſpirit however fierce and ſavage (7). How ſhocking muſt ſuch a behaviour appear to every breaſt, that ſtill retains the leaſt principle of humanity!

(6) So the Villa is called, which lying between the Cape of Miſenum and the Gulph of Baiæ, is waſhed by the ſea, which winds round the Point.

(7) Tacit. ubi ſupra, pag. 351, 352.

[C] Nero became mortally ſtruck with agonies and diſmay.]

Burrus and Seneca; they were both ſilent for a conſiderable time, at length Seneca proved the more forward of the two, but no further than to look at Burrus, and aſk, "Whether the orders for this execution were not to be truſted to the ſoldiery? Burrus anſwered, that the Pretorian guards were ſo zealouſly attached to the whole family of the Ceſars, ſo fond in particular of the name and memory of Germanicus (a), that againſt any deſcendant of his they could never be animated to any thing that was cruel and bloody, it therefore behoved Anicetus to acquit himſelf of his engagement" [D]. Neither did Anicetus pauſe one moment, but even demanded the office of compleating the murther. Nero became revived with theſe words, and declaring himſelf to be that day preſented with the Empire, owned his franchized ſlave for the author of the mighty preſent, and urged him to diſpatch, leading with him for his aſſiſtance ſuch as were moſt prompt to obey. The freedman however having heard that Agerinus was arrived from Agrippina, with the news of her diſaſter and eſcape, contrived a plot to turn the treaſon upon her, and therefore as the other was delivering his meſſage, dropped a dagger between his legs, and then, as if he had caught him in the terrible fact, called for irons to be inſtantly caſt upon him. By this fable he purpoſed to ſupport another, by feigning that the deſtruction of the Prince had been concerted by his mother; and that being ſtruck with confuſion upon the diſcovery of her treaſon, ſhe had deſperately put an end to her own life. Anicetus then went to the Villa, where Agrippina was; he beſet it with a guard, and burſting open the gates ſeized or ſecured all ſuch of her ſlaves as appeared to ſtop him. He then advanced towards her chamber, where he found the door guarded by very few, all the reſt were ſcared away by the terror and violence of his entrance. In her chamber was a ſmall light and only one of her damſels. Agrippina herſelf was more and more toſſed with anxious thoughts, that no ſoul had yet arrived from her ſon, nor had even Agerinus returned; ſhe perceived from without ſtrange viciſſitudes, and an unuſual ſcene, the deſertion of her own people, and the ſudden violence and tumult of ſtrangers, with all the warnings of her laſt fate; inſomuch that ſeeing her maid too about to depart, ſhe ſaid, "Thou likewiſe art going to abandon me;" and that moment ſhe ſpied Anicetus accompanied with Herculeus Captain of a Galley, and Oloaritus a Centurion of the Navy. She told him, "if he came from the Emperor to be informed of her health, he ſhould acquaint him, ſhe was well refreſhed and recovered, if upon any bloody deſign, ſhe would no wiſe believe him commiſſioned by her ſon; her ſon could never give unnatural orders for parricide." The aſſaſſins having placed themſelves round her bed, the Captain was the firſt that wounded her, ſtriking her upon the head with a club, and as the Centurion was drawing his ſword to diſpatch her, ſhe preſented her belly, and with a loud voice, "Strike thy ſword into my womb" [E], ſhe cried, and was inſtantly aſſaſſinated with a multitude of wounds (b). This was not the only murther in which Anicetus was concerned. When Nero was reſolved to be rid of his wife Octavia, it was agreed to procure ſome one, who ſhould own himſelf guilty of adultery with her, one againſt whom might be alſo feign'd a plauſible charge of meditating a revolution in the State. Anicetus was judged a proper man for this vile purpoſe. He was held by the Emperor in ſome ſlight favour, juſt after the bloody ſervice he had done him in the murther of Agrippina, but from that time in heavier deteſtation; For Princes, (ſays the Hiſtorian very juſtly) (c), ever behold the miniſters of their cruelties diſmay.] Having ſent for Burrus and Seneca, he ſwore to them in paſſionate terms, "That, without peradventure, ſhe (his mother) would preſently be at hand, bent upon taking haſty vengeance; whether by arming the ſlaves, or by ſtirring up againſt him the rage of the ſoldiery, or by flying to the Senate and people, with a tragical repreſentation of the veſſel wreck'd, herſelf wounded, her friend's murther'd, and her ſon the author of all: and againſt this menacing event what reſource, what protection had he, unleſs ſuch could be propoſed by Burrus and Seneca (8)?" Thus it appears in what fears and agonies Nero was: and tho' Agrippina counterfeited perfect ſecurity and fearleſneſs, yet ſhe knew the danger in which ſhe was: And conſidering the character of that woman, who made a jeſt of murther, it was a political prudence for Nero to prevent her.

(a) Agrippina's father.

(b) Tacit. Ann. IV. Mr. Gordon's tranſlation vol. 1. p. 351—356.

(c) Ibid. p. 395.

(8) Ibid. p. 354.

[D] It behoved Anicetus to acquit himſelf of his engagement.] This advice of Burrus could not but pleaſe Nero; but, as we have ſaid in the foregoing remark, it was now neceſſary. For Burrus and Seneca apprehended, ſays Tacitus (9), that it was in vain to perſuade Nero to drop his deſign of deſtroying his mother, and perhaps they believed it to be already puſhed ſo far, that unleſs Agrippina ſoon periſhed, Nero certainly muſt. The ſame Hiſtorian had ſaid before, that it is not certain, whether, before the affair at Baiæ, Burrus and Seneca were unacquainted with the conſpiracy. Now it is very probable that they adviſed Nero to diſpatch his mother, leſt, if he were prevented by her, as there were good reaſons to apprehend it, they might be thought and accuſed to have acted in concert with her. Thus the paſſage of Xiphilinus, quoted above (10), is clear; Seneca adviſes Nero to kill his mother, either to prevent any charge againſt himſelf, in caſe Nero was prevented by Agrippina, or to render the Emperor more odious, by ſo heinous a crime. I own that theſe reaſons don't juſtify Seneca nor Burrus, for promoting a parricide, but it muſt be confeſſed that they may in ſome meaſure be excuſed, if we conſider the abominable character both of Nero and of his mother; it was doing mankind a real ſervice, to rid the world of ſuch monſters.

(9) Ibid. p. 355.

(10) Remark [A] quotat. (2).

[E] Strike thy ſword into my womb, ſhe cried.] Xiphilinus relates this circumſtance more fully. He tells us (11), that as ſoon as ſhe ſaw the aſſaſſins, and knew for what purpoſe they came; ſhe jumpt out of her bed, and having diſcovered her womb, ſtrike this, ſays ſhe to Anicetus, ſince it has borne Nero. This ſeems to contradict what Tacitus relates, that ſhe told Anicetus, "if he came upon any bloody deſign, ſhe would no wiſe believe him commiſſioned by her ſon." But this is no real contradiction; Agrippina might very well affect to believe, that her ſon would not deſtroy her, and yet finding there was no way for her to eſcape, ſhew by her laſt words, ſhe was not ignorant who it was that ſought her life; nay it was very natural for her in her deſperate condition to repent of what ſhe had done for ſuch a monſter, as Nero was.

(11) Epitom. Dion. in Nerone, p. 164.

cruelties and iniquity as men whoſe looks wound their guilty ſouls with inceſſant ſtings and reproaches. Nero therefore ſummoned him, and reminding him of his former meritorious exploit, "Thou alone (ſaid he) didſt protect and relieve me from the black conſpi-"racies of a mother: an opportunity of doing me ſervice of no leſs merit at preſent in-"vites thee, if thou canſt but diſcharge me effectually of an irkſome and diſaffected "wife: nor in this taſk needeſt thou either ſtrength or weapon; thou art only to ac-"knowledge that with Octavia thou haſt been engaged in adultery." For this ſervice Nero promiſed him rewards of great value, though at firſt it was neceſſary, he ſaid, they ſhould continue private and unknown; as alſo, upon his mock condemnation, lovely and delightful places of retirement; but in caſe of refuſal, threatened him with death. Anicetus prompted by the native bent of his frantick ſpirit, and by the protection and impunity which had followed all his former enormities, carried his fictions even beyond orders, and communicated them, as ſecrets, to his friends; a ſet of men whom the Prince had ſet about him, as it were to aid him by their counſels in his deſigns. Then as one convicted by his own confeſſion he was baniſhed to Sardinia, where he underwent a ſort of baniſhment, but one far from neceſſitous or miſerable, and died at laſt by the lot of nature (d). Tacitus mentions another ANICETUS, of whom we ſhall give ſome account in a note [F].

(d) Idem, ibid. P. 395, 396.

[F] We ſhall give ſome account of another Anicetus mentioned by Tacitus.] This Anicetus was a Barbarian, and had been a freedman to Polemon King of Pontus, once a Commander of that King's Navy, and under him in time paſt mighty in power: he was full of bitterneſs and regret ever ſince the Kingdom of Pontus had been changed into a Roman Province. Arraying therefore in the name of Vitellius the ſeveral nations that dwell in Pontus, and with the proſpect of ſpoil ſeducing all ſuch as were extremely indigent, he ſaw himſelf leader of no inconſiderable band, and with great rapidity aſſailed and entered Trapeſund, a city of Aſia exceeding ancient, founded by the Grecians upon the utmoſt confines of Pontus: There a cohort was ſlain ---. Anicetus likewiſe burnt the Fleet of the Romans, and with ſcorn and inſults ſcoured the ſea then unguarded ---. This affair merited the attention of Veſpaſian (12), who to end it, choſe out a body of Vexillaries from the Legions, and for their Leader, Verdius Geminus, an Officer diſtinguiſhed in war. He, aſſailing the enemy, whilſt they were diſconcerted and roaming aſunder in purſuit of prey, drove them into their veſſels; then in ſome gallies made with diſpatch, chaſed Anicetus into the mouth of the river Chobus, where he relied for ſafety upon the protection of Sedochus, King of the Lazians, an ally whom he had purchaſed by money and preſents. And at firſt the King, in defence of his ſupplicant, betook himſelf to menaces and arms; but as ſoon as a recompence for his treachery was propoſed, and a war threatened, if he refuſed, his fidelity vaniſhed like that of other Barbarians; he ſtruck a bargain for the life of Anicetus, and ſurrendred all the fugitives (13).

(12) Who was ſtill Vitellius's competitor.

(13) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 3. p. 187, 188 of Mr. Gordon's tranſlation.

ANICIUS, a Roman family. It was more illuſtrious under the Chriſtian Emperors than in the time of the Commonwealth, though it produced ſeveral Conſuls before the birth of Julius Cæſar. We find in Pliny one Q. ANICIUS PRÆNESTINUS, who was made Ædilis Curulis in the fifth Century of Rome (a). L. ANICIUS GALLUS was Pretor in the next age, that is in the year 585, and commanded in Illyricum with ſo much ſucceſs, that he was but a month in conquering it [A], and taking King Gentius priſoner. The honour of a triumph was granted him the year following (b). One of the Conſuls for the year 593 had the name of L. ANICIUS GALLUS. I find under the firſt Emperors only ANICIUS CEREALIS, who was appointed Conſul for the 813th year of Rome (c). He was engaged in a plot againſt Nero, and killed himſelf in the year of Rome 819. He was the leſs regretted, becauſe it was remembred that he diſcovered to Caligula a conſpiracy that was carried on againſt his life (d). The Conſulſhip was very frequently in this family after the reign of Diocleſian; and there never were two brothers ſeen Conſuls together till the year of our Saviour 395, when Probinus and Olybrius were Conſuls. They were ſons to Probus, whom we ſhall ſpeak of in his proper place; and they were deſcended from ANICIUS the firſt Nobleman of Rome who embraced Chriſtianity [B]. The immenſe riches of this family expoſed them to envy and reproach,

(a) Plinius, lib. 33. c. 1.

(b) See Sigonius de Faſtis Roman.

(c) Tacit. Ann. lib. 15. cap. 74.

(d) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 17.

[A] He was but one month in conquering Illyricum.] It never happened till then at Rome, that they heard of the ending of a war, before they knew it was begun. And yet in this war there was a neceſſity of ſubduing the ſtrong fort of Scodra. The ſucceſs was ſo entire, that the Prince, whom he fought with, and his mother, wife, children, brother, and all the chief perſons of his Kingdom, fell into the hands of Anicius, beſides a conſiderable booty. Livy ſpeaks as follows: Anicius bello Illyrico intra triginta dies perfecto nuncium victoriæ Perpennam Romam miſit, & poſt dies paucos Gentium regem ipſum cum parente, conjuge, ac liberis ac fratre aliiſque principibus Illyricorum. Hoc unum bellum prius perpetratum quam cœptum Romæ auditum eſt (1). Hoc bellum, ſays Florus (2), ante finitum, quam geri Romæ nunciaretur. Theſe priſoners of quality were only part of the ornaments of the triumph, the riches, and the ſpoils brought from Illyricum, and the rewards beſtowed on the ſoldiers, made it very conſiderable. The General received greater praiſes from his army, than Paulus Æmilius, who had triumphed a little before, had done from his. Lætior hunc triumphum eſt ſecutus miles, multiſque dux ipſe carminibus celebratus (3). Mr. Lloyd obſerves, that the Conſul for the year 593 was ſon to him, who conquered Gentius; but he quotes no authority for it.

(1) Livius, lib. 44. cap. 32.

(2) Florus, lib. 2. cap. 13.

(3) Liv. lib. 45. cap. 43.

[B] One Anicius was the firſt Nobleman at Rome, who embraced Chriſtianity.] I have no other proof for this, than theſe words of Prudentius:

Fertur enim ante alios generoſus Anicius urbis
Inluſtraſſe caput (4).

(4) Prudent. in Symmach. lib. 1. ver. 553.

Baronius conjectures, that this Poet meant Anicius Julianus, who was Conſul in the year 322. Lloyd more poſitive aſſures us, without quoting any Author, that Anicius Julianus was the firſt Roman Senator, who embraced the Goſpel, as Flavius Conſtantine was the firſt Roman Emperor, who did ſo; and that it was upon this account, that almoſt all the Roman Emperors afterwards took upon them the ſirname of Flavius, and almoſt all the Senators that of Anicius. I ſhould be glad to ſee a proof for all this. If the conjecture of Baronius were true, we might compare A-reproach, as I ſhall ſhew in the article of PROBUS. The Benedictines pretend, that the founder of their Order was of the family of Anicius; and there have been books publiſhed, wherein they have endeavoured to ſhew, that the Auguſt Houſe of Auſtria is likewiſe deſcended from it. Richard Streinnius has written againſt this fabulous ſtory. His book is intitled Anti-Anician. It was never printed; and is only in manuſcript in the Emperor's Library (e). We ſhall mention ſomething very curious upon the ſubject of this book [C].

(e) Lambecius, Comment. Biblioth. Vindobon. tom. 1. num. 50.

nicius Julianus with that French Nobleman, who was baptized firſt of all after the example of Cloris, and took for his word in battle, Dieu aide au premier Chretien, i. e. "God aſſiſt the firſt Chriſtian." It is ſaid, that the Lords of Montmorenci are deſcended from this latter, and are called for this reaſon the firſt Chriſtian Barons.

[C] I ſhall mention ſomething very curious concerning the book entitled Anti-Anician.] According to Mr. Baillet the manuſcript of Streinnius will never be publiſhed for two reaſons; one is, that, which Lambecius has mentioned, becauſe the work is imperfect; and the other is of more importance, and what he did not care to ſpeak of, and this is, that the ANTI-ANICIAN is not written upon the prejudices of the common people in hereditary countries, nor upon the principles of thoſe, who in order to make their court to their Emperor derive the houſe of Auſtria from the oldeſt families in ancient Rome. . . . . The author undertook to railly the Benedictine Monks upon their chimerical pretenſions of being related to the houſe of Auſtria, and to confute in particular the book of a Flemiſh Benedictine named Arnold Wion, who by a ſtrange chain of reveries, had attempted to ſhew the two branches of the Anician family of Rome, one in favour of the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, and the other of their Founder St. Benedict (5). Mr. Baillet adds, that if Richard Strein has not ſpoken of the Anicians in his book of the Roman families, it is becauſe this was not one of the families of the old ſtock. He tells us, that Lambecius had a deſign to anſwer the ANTI-ANICIAN of Streinnius in his Prolegomena to the Annals of Auſtria, which he promiſed . . . . and it ſeems that he choſe for the foundation and model of his anſwer * a book, publiſhed by a Benedictine Abbot, tho' of the Ciſtercian Order, named John Seyfrid, twelve years after the death of Streinnius, under the title of ARBOR ANICIANA; but tho' this Seyfrid had deſigned to attack the ANTI ANICIAN, yet it may be ſaid, that Streinnius would have been ſufficiently revenged by Scioppius, who publiſhed in the year 1651 a ſhort Diſſertation, to ridicule this Seyfrid and men of his ſtamp, juſt at the time, when a Benedictine Monk, named Bucelin, to encreaſe the number of Viſionaries, publiſhed his AQUILA IMPERII BENEDICTINA. He was not, ſays Mr. Baillet, upon this occaſion any longer the ſevere and ſatyrical Scioppius. He was a faithful and zealous ſervant of the Houſe of Auſtria, a Counſellor of the Emperor and King of Spain, attached to the Princes of their name by more than one obligation; he was infinitely more learned than theſe idle dreamers; he had made himſelf formidable in point of falſe Genealogies above forty years before by his Scaliger Hypobolimæus. If Scioppius therefore, who was ſo much devoted in other reſpects to the Houſe of Auſtria, thought proper to oppoſe the chimera's of theſe Monks concerning the Anician Genealogy, it is a ſtrong prejudice, that their inventions are not the leaſt honourable to the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, nor to the followers of St. Benedict; and that the ANTI-ANICIAN of Streinnius muſt be a work of importance. . . . . Tho' Seyfrid has aſſerted, that Saint Thomas was of the illuſtrious family of the Anicians, yet it is hardly to be expected that any French Dominican will ever attempt to give us an AQUILA IMPERII THOMISTICA. This perhaps is reſerved for ſome German or Spaniſh Dominican, who is zealouſly attached to the Houſe of Auſtria. I deſire the reader will conſider me in this whole affair as nothing but a mere copier.

(5) Baillet, tom. 2. of his Anti, num. 154. pag. 228, and the following.

* Tom. 2. Comment. Biblioth. Vindobon. p. 418, & ſeq.

☞ANNA COMNENA, the daughter of Alexius Comnenus Emperor of Conſtantinople, and the Empreſs Irene, wrote an Hiſtory under the title of Alexias [A]. She was born in that city in the year 1083 (a). She was at firſt deſign'd for the marriage of Conſtantine, the ſon of Michael Ducas; but upon his death ſhe was married to Nicephorus Bryennius (b). She applied herſelf ſo intenſely to the ſtudy of Literature, that ſhe gained the reputation of being the moſt accompliſhed Lady of that age. Having loſt her mother firſt, and afterwards the Emperor Alexius her father in 1118, and her huſband in 1137, ſhe endeavoured to mitigate the ſenſe

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Sæc. 12. p. 568. edit. Coloniæ Allobrog 1720.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] Wrote an Hiſtory under the title of Alexias.] It is divided into fifteen books, and it contains an Account of the Church of Conſtantinople, and the controverſies in Religion, which were agitated in the Eaſtern Churches. This work was finiſhed in 1148, many years after the death of her father Alexius (1). It is extant in MS. in the Library of Cardinal Barberini at Rome, in that of St. Laurence at Florence, and in ſeveral other Libraries in Italy (2). The firſt eight books were publiſhed in Greek at Augsburg with the Tranſlation and Notes of David Hœſchelius, in 4to, in 1610, as Du Pin and Dr. Cave inform us (3), or, according to Oudin (4) in 1618. But the intire Hiſtory was publiſhed from the MS. in the Library of Barberini at Rome at Paris in fol. in 1651, with an elegant Latin Verſion, Gloſſary, and Preface, by Peter Poſſin a learned Jeſuit, and Hœſchelius's Notes (5). The celebrated Charles du Freſne has written hiſtorical and philological Notes upon this work, and ſubjoined it to his edition of Johannes Cinnamus, printed at Paris in folio in 1670 (6). The Alexias was continued by the abovementioned Cinnamus, who flouriſhed about the year 1150 (7). Voſſius tells us (8), that Anna Comnena has given a very different account of her father in many points, from what the Latins relate; who almoſt univerſally, except Albert Canon of Aix, deſcribe that Emperor as a treacherous and perfidious perſon. But it is very probable, as that learned Critic obſerves, that the Latins gave too great a looſe to their hatred of this Greek Emperor, and his daughter Anna Comnena indulged herſelf in a greater partiality towards him, than the Laws of Hiſtory allow. Multa verò de parente ſuo longè aliter narrat, quam Latini ſolent; qui omnes propè, ſi unum excipias Albertum, Canonicum Aquenſem, Cæſarem eum deſcribunt, tanquam fraudulentum ac perfidum. Sed ſatis veriſimile eſt, tum Latinos ſuo erga Græcum Imperatorem odio, tum filiam Comnenam amori erga patrem ſuo, aliquanto amplius indulſiſſe quam per leges hiſtoriæ liceret. The reader may ſee in Oudin (9) the teſtimonies of Robert Abbot of St. Remigius at Rheims in his ſecond book De Profectione Chriſtianorum Principum in Syriam; i. e. "Of the Expedition of the Chriſtian "Princes into Syria," in which he was preſent himſelf; of Otto Friſingenſis in his 7th book, c. 10. of his Chronicles; of Guillelmus Tyrius L. 2. c. 5. &c. De Bello Sacro; i. e. "Of the holy War;" of Gotfridus Viterbienſis in the 18th part of his Chronicle; of Conrade Abbot of Urſperg in his Chronicle under the year 1101; of Matthew Paris in his Hiſtoria Major, under the years 1096 and 1113; and of Matthew of Weſtminſter in his Flores Hiſtoriarum under the year 1105; all which writers unanimouſly repreſent him as a man of the greateſt art and the moſt treacherous and perfidious temper imaginable. Albert Canon of Aix, mentioned by Voſſius, whoſe book was publiſhed by Reiner Reineccius under the title of Chronicon Hieroſolymitanum without the Author's name, ſpeaks of him in much more advantageous terms, ſo that he ſeems to have deſigned a direct Apology for that Emperor. T.

(1) Oudin. Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. Col. 1176.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Aut. Eccleſ. tom. 9. p. 203. edit. Paris 1697; and Cave, ubi ſupra.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

(5) Cave, Du Pin, and Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(6) Cave and Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(7) Oudin, ubi ſupra.

(8) De Hiſt. Lat. lib. 2. c. 27.

(9) Ubi ſupra, Col. 1176, 1177, 1178 and 1179.

ſenſe of her grief by writing the abovementioned hiſtory of her father from the year 1069 to 1118 (c). Zonaras the Hiſtorian gives her a noble character (d), and tells us, that ſhe engaged very vigorouſly in the purſuit of Learning, and had a peculiar Attic elegance in her ſtyle; and being endowed with a genius adapted for elevated contemplations, ſhe improved her natural abilities by intenſe ſtudy; for ſhe was perpetually reading, or converſing with men of Learning.

(c) Idem, ibid. and Oudin, Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. Sæc. 12. Col. 1175.

(d) Annal. tom. 3. prope finem.

☞ ANNAND (WILLIAM) Dean of Edinburgh in Scotland, and Author of ſeveral works [A], was ſon of William Annand, Miniſter of Air, the Head-Burg Royal of the Shire of Air in the Dioceſe of Glaſgow in Scotland, and born in that Burgh in 1633. In 1638 his father was obliged to retire with his family into England on account of the commotions in his own country. In 1651 our author became a ſcholar in Univerſity College; and though he was under the care of a Preſbyterian Tutor, yet he took all opportunities of frequenting the Sermons of the contrary party (a). He took his Degree of Batchelor of Arts January 30, 1656 (b), and in Auguſt the ſame year received holy Orders from Dr. Thomas Fulwar Biſhop of Ardfert or Kerry in Ireland, and was appointed Preacher at Weſton on the Green near Biſter in Oxfordſhire (c). He was made Maſter of Arts July 6th 1658 (d), and became Vicar of Leighton Buzzard in Bedfordſhire, where he continued in great reputation for his excellent talent in preaching till 1662, when he attended John Earl of Middleton Lord High-Commiſſioner of Scotland into that Kingdom as his Chaplain. In the latter end of 1663 he was inſtituted in the Tolbooth Church at Edinburgh, and ſeveral years after in the Trone Church in that city, which is likewiſe a Prebendſhip. In April 1676 he was made Dean of Edinburgh, and October 1ſt 1685 he commenced Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of St. Andrews. He died the 13th of June 1689, and was honourably interred in the Grey-Friars Church, but without a funeral Sermon, which was not permitted by the Preſbyterians, in whoſe hands the Magiſtracy then was (e). His life was very exemplary, and his death attended with all the ſentiments of piety and devotion.

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. 2. Col. 832. 2d edit. 1721.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. fol. 108.

(c) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(d) Idem, Faſti Oxon. Col. 122.

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. Col. 833.

[A] Author of ſeveral works.] I. Fides Catholica: or, the Doctrine of the Catholick Church in eighteen grand ordinances, referring to the word, ſacraments, and Prayer, in purity, number, and nature, catholickly maintain'd, and publickly taught againſt hereticks of all ſorts. London 1661-2, in 4to. II. Solutions of many proper and profitable queſtions ſuitable to the nature of each ordinance &c. printed with the Fides Catholica. III. Panem quotidianum; or, a ſhort Diſcourſe tending to prove the legality, decency, and expediency of ſet forms of prayer in the Churches of Chriſt, with a particular Defence of the book of Common-Prayer of the Church of England. London 1661, in 4to. IV. Pater noſter; Our Father; or the Lord's Prayer explained, the ſenſe thereof, and duties therein, from Scripture, Hiſtory, and Fathers methodically cleared, and ſuccinctly opened. London 1670, in 8vo. V. Myſterium Pietatis; or, the Myſtery of Godlineſs, &c. London 1671, in 8vo. VI. Doxologia; or, Glory to the Father, the Churches Hymn, reduced to glorifying the Trinity. London 1672, in 8vo. VII. Dualitas; or, a twofold Subject diſplayed and opened, conduceable to godlineſs and peace in order: firſt Lex loquens, the Honour and Dignity of Magiſtracy, with the Duties thereupon, &c. Secondly, Duorum Unitas; or, the Agreement of Magiſtracy and Miniſtry at the election of the honourable Magiſtrates at Edinburgh, and opening of the Dioceſan Synod of the Rev. Clergy there. Edenburgh 1674, in 4to (1). T.

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. 2. Col. 833.

ANNAT (FRANCIS) Confeſſor to Lewis XIV, was born in Roüergue (a), the fifth of February 1590. He became a Jeſuit in February 1607, and profeſſed the fourth vow in 1624. He taught Philoſophy at Toulouſe ſix years, and Divinity ſeven; and having acquitted himſelf with great applauſe, he was ſent for to Rome in order to take upon him the office of Cenſor-general of the books publiſhed by the Society, and that of Divine to the General of the Society. Upon his return to his own Province, he was made Rector of the College of Montpellier, and afterwards of that of Toulouſe. He aſſiſted at the eighth Congregation-general of the Jeſuits, which was held at Rome in 1645, as Deputy of his Province, and gave ſuch ſignal proofs of his merit, that Father Vincent Caraffa, General of the Jeſuits, thought no perſon was more qualified to diſcharge the office of Aſſiſtant of France, which had been vacant about eighteen months. The ninth Congregation-general gave him again the ſame poſt under Francis Picolomini, General of the Society, after whoſe death he was made Provincial of the Province of France. While he was engaged in this poſt, he was choſen Confeſſor to Lewis XIV; and having executed this function for ſixteen years, he was obliged to demand his diſcharge, becauſe his great age had extremely weakened his hearing. The King being very much pleaſed with him, diſmiſſed him with a great deal of regret. Father Annat lived but four months after he had left the court. He died in the Maiſon Profeſſe at Paris the 14th of June 1670. Father Sotuel, from whom I have borrowed theſe particulars, gives him the character of a perſon of great virtues, perfect diſintereſtedneſs, prodigious modeſty and humility, an exact attachment to the obſervances and diſcipline of his Order, great caution in uſing his credit for his own private advantage, or the advantage of his family, and of uncommon zeal for religion (b). He was the hammer of hereſies, ſays he (c), and he attack'd particularly with incredible zeal the new hereſy of the Janſeniſts. He ſtrenuouſly endeavoured to get it condemned by the Pope, and reſtrained by the authority of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty. Beſides which he confuted it by his pen, with ſuch ſtrength of argument, that his adverſaries had nothing ſolid to reply to him. There are a great number of perſons, whom Father Sotuel will never convince of this laſt point; but with regard to the diſintereſtedneſs of Father Annat, there needs little pains to evince that; for every one who has a mind mind to inform himſelf, may be aſſured, that this Father Confeſſor never advanced his family. It is reported that the King was heard to ſay, that he knew not whether Father Annat had any relations (d). There were ſome who did not forget themſelves, and went to him at the Louvre; but they received no benefices by their ſollicitations. There are times when the great and the little nepotiſm are in vogue; ſometimes the little nepotiſm, while the great is extinguiſhed. In the time of Father Annat the great nepotiſm (e) was at its height; but the little nepotiſm, with regard to the Fathers Confeſſors, was at its loweſt ebb in Paris. I make uſe of this reſtriction, becauſe there are a great many other perſons in church preferments, who continue to heap every thing they can procure upon their relations. Several of them without doubt purſued their uſual courſe, while Father Annat never ſuffered about him the wolves that came with open mouths from Roüergue. We read in the Amours of the Royal Palace, that he was deſirous to quit his poſt [A], while Mademoiſelle de la Valiere was in favour. If this was true, it would be one of the nobleſt paſſages of his life, and the fineſt ſubject for panegyric that can be found in the Confeſſor of a King. The author of this ſatyr, who, according to the genius and nature of this kind of writings, endeavours to give a ſpiteful turn to every thing, ſaw this very plainly; and it is upon that account that he has managed it ſo, that the reader finds nothing commendable in it. There has been handed about a ſatyr of much later date, in which ſo many publick and notorious falſities are added to his true or pretended demand of leave to retire [B], that it is ſcarce poſſible to comprehend, that there ſhould

(a) Ruthenonſis.

(b) Sotuel. Bib. Scriptor. Societ. Jeſu, p. 211.

(c) Hæreſium malleus, & nomi natim novæ Janſeniſtarum Hæreſeôs oppugnator acerrimus. ibid.

(d) Adeo ut dixiſſe aliquando perhibeatur ſua Majeſtas neſcire ſe an P. Annatus haberet alianos ſanguine ſibi conjunctos. Ibid.

(e) That is that of the court of Rome.

[A] It is ſaid in the Amours of the Royal Palace (1), that he was deſirous to quit his poſt.] The paſſage is as follows: "Poor Father Annat, Confeſſor "to the King, by the ſuggeſtions of the Queens, went "likewiſe to him, and pretended that he wanted to "quit the court, inſinuating that it was on account "of his criminal converſation with her. The King, "ſmiling, gave him his congé very readily. The "Father ſeeing himſelf taken at his word would "have accommodated the affair again; but the King, "ſtill ſmiling told him, that for the future he would "have no other Confeſſor than the Curate of his "Pariſh. It is inexpreſſible what a reſentment the "whole Order conceived againſt him for this weak "conduct of his." There may be three queſtions ſtarted upon this ſubject: I, Whether it is really true, that Father Annat asked leave of the King to retire: II, Whether this was only by way of feint, and out of complaiſance for the Queens: III, Whether he retired in reality, or whether the Jeſuits had addreſs enough to accommodate the affair. I can only anſwer the firſt queſtion, that I know nothing of the matter, and that the authority of a Satyriſt is of no weight in the leaſt. I pay no regard to what ſuch a one ſays, any further than he proves it. Thoſe, who write an Hiſtory, are diſpenſed from ſwearing to every thing they ſay, and giving us their witneſſes for it (2). They are believed upon their word, without calling upon them to ſwear to it; but as for the writers of libels, it is a mere favour and civility to them, even to credit them upon their oath, tho' it is confirmed by witneſſes. I am ſtill more at a loſs about the ſecond queſtion; I never pretend to dive into the ſecrets of a man's heart. With regard to the third, I cannot tell any thing but what is publickly known, and that is, that Father Annat was without any interruption Confeſſor to the King of France till ſpring in the year 1670.

(1) This book firſt appeared about the year 1665.

(2) Quis unquam ab Hiſtorico juratores exegit? Seneca de Morte Claudii, init.

[B] A Satyr of a much later date (3), tells us a great many falſities upon this ſubject.] The Author of this Satyre ſuppoſes, that Father la Chaiſe had been very ſerviceable in bringing the Pope to grant what the King deſired, after the inſult offered to the French Embaſſador by the Corſican Guards, and that Cardinal Mazarin, in acknowledgment of this ſervice, careſſed him very much, recommended him to the King, and even during his own life got him admitted into his Council of Conſcience, which was properly ſpeaking to make him aſſiſtant to the Confeſſor (4). In the margin there is marked the year 1663, when the Cardinal firſt began to careſs him; and the year 1665, when he was admitted into the Council of Conſcience. What an ignorance is this of modern Hiſtory? Every body knows, that Cardinal Mazarin died 1661. The Author adds, that Father la Chaiſe ſupplanted Father Annat, by excuſing the amour of the King with Madam la Valiere from the conſideration of the infirmity of human nature, while the Confeſſor was every day teazing the King upon that ſubject, and never let him reſt (5). He adds likewiſe, that la Valiere, knowing what were the maxims of Father la Chaiſe, wiſhed to have him for her Confeſſor, and propoſed the thing to him by Mr. de Montauzier (6); but after a converſation, which ſhe had with that Jeſuit, ſhe choſe rather to procure him the place of Father Annat; and having mentioned it to the King, the affair was concluded in a few days, becauſe Father Annat, who was always denouncing the terrible judgments of God, and deſiring leave to retire, ſince his remonſtrances had no effect, was taken at his word (7). In the margin is marked the year 1667. I confeſs I cannot conceive any thing equal to the aſſurance of this writer; for it is univerſally known, that Father Annat did not quit the court till 1670; that a Jeſuit of Rouergue, whoſe name was Father Ferrier, ſucceeded him as Confeſſor to Lewis XIV; and that Father la Chaiſe was not choſen till after the death of Father Ferrier, which happened the 29th of October 1674 (8). What can thoſe think, who publiſh ſuch notorious falſities? How can they avoid ſeeing that they deſtroy their chief deſign by this? For what a prejudice muſt they raiſe againſt their whole book, when they appear to be ſo ignorant of things, which are known to the whole world, or impudent enough, to publiſh evident falſities? Do they follow the maxims of ſome people, who publiſh their pious frauds to the whole world, and reaſon in this manner? For one perſon, who ſhall know that I am miſtaken, there will be a thouſand, who will know nothing of the matter. A thouſand will be edified by my fraud, for one that will be ſcandalized at it. The diſadvantage will be but ſmall in compariſon of the good it will do. It is therefore charity and prudence to affirm this fiction before ſuch a numerous aſſembly. I cannot tell whether our writers of Libels reaſon after the ſame manner; but I am ſure they would gain their point much ſooner, if they would ſtudy Chronology more, and obſerve the rules of probability in their fictions. Eſt ars etiam maledicendi, ſays Scaliger (9); that is, "There is even an art in "lampooning a perſon;" thoſe, who are ignorant of it, defame their enemy much leſs, than they ſhew an inclination to do it. I have made this remark more for the ſake of the publick advantage, than that of any private perſon; it is neceſſary, that in this Age we ſhould be able to judge of the Satires, which have been publiſhed for theſe thouſand years, and that the following Ages may judge of thoſe, which we ſee now. To form a true judgment of them, we ought to pay no regard to this principle, It is not probable, that if this was notoriouſly falſe, they would have dared to publiſh it.

(3) Intitled, Hiſtoire du Pere La Chaize, Jeſuite, & Confeſſeur du Roi Louis XIV. a Cologne chez Pierre Marteau, en 1693 in 12°. The ſecond part was printed two years after.

(4) Pag. 106.

(5) Pag. 107.

(6) Pag. 108.

(7) Pag. 115.

(8) Ex Nathanael. Sotuelli, Biblioth. Societ. p. 449.

(9) Scaligerana II. p. 10.

Some thoughts about Satyrs.

This will be without doubt the chief uſe of this remark; for in any other reſpect the reflexions or cenſures, that are the beſt grounded, will never have any effect to ſtop the pen of ſuch kind of writers. The general indignation, which every perſon of honour expreſſed againſt the fabulous and ſatyrical writer of Father la Chaiſe's Life, did not hinder the publiſhing of another piece much worſe than that about five years after. It is from one end to the other a ſeries ſhould be men in the world who will venture to tell lies publickly with ſo little care. Father Annat wrote a great number of books [C], ſome in Latin and others in French. The Latin pieces are much better than the other, becauſe he acquired a much eaſier habit of treating a point of Divinity after the dogmatical and polemical manner of the ſchools, than to give it a turn ſuitable to the genius of the age. However what he wrote in French in anſwer to the Provincial Letters is very much commended (f).

(f) See remark [C] at the end.

What I have ſaid in general concerning the nephews of this Father Confeſſor ought not to be conſidered as any prejudice to their merit; for one of them, who is General of the Fathers of the Chriſtian Doctrine, is eſteemed a man of great Learning, and has publiſhed in Latin a work, which is very much valued. It is a methodical apparatus for poſitive Divinity (g). We have an extract from it in the Journal des Savans of the 13th of September 1700.

(g) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Avril 1700, p. 477.

of groſs fictions and chimerical adventures, related in the moſt impudent manner, and in a very obſcene ſtile. This fine piece is intitled, Hiſtoire des intrigues amoureuſes du P. Peters, Jeſuite, Confeſſeur de Jaques II, ci-devant Roi d'Angleterre, ou l'on voit ſes avantures les plus particuliers, & ſon véritable caractere, comme auſſi les conſeils, qu'il a donnez à ce Prince touchant ſon gouvernement. A Cologne, chez Pierre Marteau le jeune, Marchand Libraire, 1698. While there are people to be found, who buy ſuch books as theſe with pleaſure, there will be Bookſellers enough to pay for the writing and printing of them; and conſequently, men of little conſcience enough, to proſtitute their pens for hire. This evil therefore admits of no remedy.

[C] Father Annat wrote a great number of books.] His Latin Tracts, publiſhed at divers times, were collected in three volumes in 4to, and printed at Paris by Cramoiſi in 1666. The firſt contains his book de Scientiâ mediâ contra novos ejus impugnatores, una cum Exercitatione ſcholaſtica ſub nomine Eugenii Philadelphi, & Appendice ad Guilhelmum Camerarium. The ſecond contains his book intitled, Auguſtinus à Bajanis, hoc eſt, Janſenianis, vindicatus. In the third are the following tracts: Catholica Diſputatio de Eccleſiâ præſentis temporis; De incoactâ Libertate contra novum Auguſtinum Iprenſis Epiſcopi, incentium Lenem, Apologiſtam Janſenii, & Commentatorem quinque Propoſitionum; Informatio de quinque propoſitionibus ex Theologiâ Janſenii collectis, quas Epiſcopi Galliæ Romano Pontifici ad cenſuram obtulerunt; Janſenius à Thomiſtis gratiæ per ſeipſam efficacis defenſoribus condemnatus. Cavilli Janſenianorum contra latam in ipſos à Sede Apoſtolicâ ſententiam, ſeu Confutatio Libelli trium columnarum (10). Theſe five treatiſes in the third volume have prefixed to them ſeveral Advertiſements to the reader, and ſome Notes upon the Journal of Saint-Amour. The following are ſome of his French books. Réponſe au Livre, qui a pour titre THEOLOGIE MORALE DES JESUITES; Réponſe à quelques demandes touchant la premiere lettre de Mr. Arnaud. La bonne-foi des Janſeniſtes dans la citation des Auteurs; Recueil de pluſieurs fauſſetez & impoſtures contenues dans le Journal de tout ce qui s'eſt paſſé en France ſur le ſujet de la Morale, & de l'Apologie des Caſuiſtes (11); Remedes contre les ſcrupules, qui empêchent la ſignature du Formulaire; Remarques ſur la conduite, qu'ont tenue les Janſeniſtes dans l'impreſſion & dans la publication du Nouveau Teſtament imprimé à Mons; La Doctrine de Janſenius contraire au Saint Siege Apoſtolique, & à Saint Auguſtin. I omit the titles of ſeveral others; you may find them in Father Sotuel. But we may obſerve by the by, that Author and his predeceſſor Alegambe have forgot one thing, which ſhould have been obſerved. They ought to have given the titles of books in the ſame language, which the Author wrote in, and then have tranſlated them into Latin. We find every day amongſt the Bookſellers, that if you ask for books not by their proper titles, but only by the ſenſe of their titles, you muſt return without finding them, tho' they are in the warehouſe or ſhop of the Bookſeller. As old as the Jeſuit Annat was during the heat of the diſpute with the Janſeniſts, on account of the Formulary, and the Tranſlation of Mons, yet he publiſhed ſeveral little pieces in 4to upon that ſubject. He was not contented with ſerving the cauſe only by his intereſt with the King, but he was reſolved to defend it by his pen to the laſt drop of his ink.

(10) It is in Father Sotuel, Calumniarum.

(11) The Curates of Paris wrote an apology for this Journal, in their 8th and 9th pieces.

I ſhall not omit the Elogiums given him in an Anſwer to the Provincial Letters of Mr. Paſcal, which was reprinted in Holland in the year 1696 (12).

(12) Entretiens de Cleandre & d'Eudoxe, p. 79, 80. Holland edition.

" But with regard to the Jeſuits, who ventured to " write againſt Mr. Paſcal, what do you think of " Father Annat, who is the Author of a book intitled, La Bonne-foi des Janſeniſtes, and to whom
" the ſeventeenth and eighteenth Provincial Letters
" are addreſſed? Father Annat, anſwers Cleander,
" was in my opinion a man of great genius; the " Jeſuits wrote nothing ſuperior to what he publiſhed upon the points, which were then in diſpute.
" This good man (for I knew him to be ſuch, and
" he was even modeſty itſelf,) had an excellent talent
" at writing, even in French, if he had ſtudied our " language a little more. He has very often ſtrokes
" ſo fine, and lively, and agreeable, that I have ſeen
" nothing equal to them any where. I am of your " opinion, replied Eudoxus; and without mentioning
" his virtue, which I have heard commended even
" by thoſe of the contrary party, I find in him as " well as you a great exactneſs of judgment, and " ſometimes ſuch a turn of expreſſion and raillery, as
" is very extraordinary in a School-Divine."

ANNE, the name of ſeveral perſons mentioned in Scripture. The mother of Samuel the Prophet was called ANNE; ſhe was a very pious woman, and extremely beloved by Elkana her huſband. She was barren, and this misfortune afflicted her the more ſenſibly, becauſe ſhe ſaw herſelf expoſed to the raillery and inſults of the other wife of Elkana. She was ſo importunate in her prayers to God for a ſon, that ſhe was at laſt heard (a), for God gave her Samuel, and after him three ſons and two daughters (b). The book of Tobit, accounted Apocryphal amongſt Proteſtants, mentions another ANNE, the wife of Tobit, and mother of Tobias. In the Goſpel of St. Luke we have ANNE the Propheteſs, daughter of Phanuel (c). She was a very devout woman of about eighty four years of age, of which ſhe had lived but ſeven with her huſband. Baronius has repreſented her as a cloiſter'd Nun, but he is miſtaken in that particular [A]. The Goſpel likewiſe mentions a man

(a) 1 book of Samuel, ch. i.
(b) Ibid. ch. ii. ver. 21.
(c) St. Luke ii. 36.

[A] Baronius repreſents her as a cloiſtered Nun; but he is miſtaken in that particular.] I ſhall give his own words: *Quomodo autem Annam nunquam è templo diſceſſiſſe dicatur, ut merito eandem S. Cyrillus Hieroſolymitanus * religioſiſſimam monialem appellet, conſule quæ ſuperius dicta ſunt de præſentatione Dei genetricis in templo* (1). We find here two things; I, he takes this expreſſion of Luke literally, ſhe departed not from the temple (2): II, he thinks, that St. Cyril had a great deal of reaſon to call her a moſt religious Nun. But it is plain, that we ought not to extend the words of St. Luke further than the common meaning, which we always underſtand, when to ſignify that a man goes very often to a houſe, we ſay, he is never abſent

* Catechef. x.
(1) Baron. in Annal. Eccleſiaſt. tom. i. ad ann. 42 num. 41.

(2) Οὐκ ἀφίστατο ἀπὸ τῦ ἱεροῦ, νηστείαις καὶ δεήσεσι λατρεύουσα νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας. i. e. according to the Geneva tranſlation, She departed not from the temple, ſerving God, in faſting and prayers, night and day.

man, who was called ANNE in French, or ANNAS, and was High-Prieſt of the Jews in the time of our Saviour. His ſon-in-law Caiaphas held the ſame dignity when Chriſt was put to death. With regard to St. ANNE, the mother of the Virgin Mary, and the moſt famous of all others of that name among the Roman Catholicks, we have no trace of her in all the Scripture. The writings of the three firſt ages of the church make no mention of her. St. Epiphanius is the firſt who ſays any thing of her, and yet the ſucceeding ages have given us a long legend of St. ANNE, as we ſhall ſee in the article of St. JOACHIM her huſband. I am ſurpriſed that Eraſmus could find in the antient writings but three women whoſe names were Anne [B].

ſent from it, he is always there, that we find him there perpetually, day and night. This is what we ſay particularly of women of devotion, who go ſeveral times a day to church; They are never abſent from the altar; they are conſtantly at prayers in the church. As for what St. Cyril ſays, it is not true, that he calls the Propheteſs Anne a Nun. The Latin Tranſlator of that Father did not attend ſtrictly enough to his words. The Greek word ἀσκητὴς, ἀσκητρία, was not ſo peculiarly appropriated to the Monks and Nuns, but that it was likewiſe applied to all thoſe, who are exact in performing the exerciſes of Religion. This is what the learned Antagoniſt of Baronius has ſhewn very evidently (3).

(3) Cauſaubon, Exercitat. II. num. 13.

[B] I am ſurprized that Eraſmus could find in the ancient writings but three women, whoſe names were Anne.] The firſt is the ſiſter of Dido; ſhe was ſirnamed Perenna, and placed, ſays he, in the number of the Gods on account of the ſingular affection, which ſhe had for her ſiſter. Other Dictionaries have related in ſo full a manner the adventures of this Anne, that I think there is no neceſſity of touching upon them. The ſecond is the wife of Elkana. It is a ſufficient commendation of her, ſays he, to obſerve, that in her old age, and by the peculiar favour of God ſhe brought forth Samuel, who was a moſt pious Prieſt and an incorrupt Judge. Cujus ad laudem abunde ſatis eſt, quod & anus, & auſpice Deo, Samuelem pepererit, non utique ſibi, ſed Deo quidem Sacerdotem religioſiſſimum, populo verò Judicem incorruptiſſimum (4). The third is the mother of the Virgin Mary. He tells us this laſt Anne was very highly extolled by Rodolphus Agricola and Baptiſta Mantuanus. He has in this article omitted ſome particulars, and miſtaken others. What had the daughter of Phanuel, and the mother of Tobias done to him, that they were thus omitted? But where does he find, that the mother of Samuel was old? The ſacred Hiſtorian ſays nothing of it; but rather intimates, that ſhe was ſtill young enough. Had not ſhe five children after ſhe had weaned Samuel? The ſame Hiſtorian repreſents her as replying to Eli the Prieſt, who accuſed her of being drunk, that ſhe neither had drunk wine nor beer. Joſephus not thinking this particular enough, puts another anſwer into her mouth, that ſhe never had drunk any thing but water. Moreri choſe rather to follow the Jewiſh Hiſtorian than the Scriptures. The Lady, to whom Eraſmus wrote this Letter, in which he mentions theſe three Annes, would deſerve an article; he ſtiles her Annam Berſalam Principem Verianam. If I could poſſibly diſcover any thing of her family or life, I would very readily give ſome account of her.

(4) Eraſm. Epiſtola, 38. lib. 9. P. 500.

Since the firſt edition of this work, I have diſcovered ſomething relating to this ſubject. See the article BERSALA.

☞ANNICERIS, a Greek Philoſopher of the Cyrenaic Sect, and who gave the name of Annicerians to his diſciples [A], was born at Cyrene, and ſcholar to Paræbates (a). When Plato, by the command of Dionyſius the Tyrant of Sicily, was ſold as a ſlave at Ægina, our Philoſopher happened to be preſent, and redeemed him for twenty, or, according to others, thirty Minæ, and ſent him to Athens to his friends, who immediately returned the money to Anniceris; but he refuſed it, ſaying, that they were not the only perſons who deſerved to take care of Plato (b). He was particularly eminent for his ſkill in chariot-racing, of which he one day gave a proof before Plato, and drove many courſes round the Academy ſo exactly, that his wheels never went out of the track, to the admiration of all who were preſent, except Plato, who reproved him for his too great induſtry in thoſe affairs, telling him, that it was not poſſible but that he, who employed ſo much pains about things of no value, muſt neglect thoſe of greater importance, which are truly worthy of admiration (c). He had a brother who was named Nicoteles, a Philoſopher, and the famous Poſidonius was his ſcholar (d).

(a) Laertius, lib. 2.

(b) Idem in Vitâ Platonis.

(c) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. c. 27.
(d) Suidas.

[A] Gave the name of Annicerians.] They, as well as the reſt of the Cyrenaic Philoſophers, placed all good in pleaſure, and conceived virtue to be only commendable ſo far as it produced pleaſure. Atqui ab Ariſtippo, Cyrenaici atque Annicerii philoſophi nominati, omne bonum in voluptate poſuerunt; virtutemque cenſuerunt ob eam rem eſſe laudandam, quod efficiens eſſet voluptatis (1). They agreed in all reſpects with the Hegeſians (2), except that they did not aboliſh friendſhip, benevolence, duty to parents, and love to one's country (3). They held, that tho' a wiſe man ſuffer trouble for thoſe things, yet he will lead a life not at all the leſs happy, tho' he enjoy but few pleaſures. That the felicity of a friend is not deſirable in itſelf; for to agree in judgment with another, or to be raiſed above and fortified againſt the general opinion, is not ſufficient to ſatisfy reaſon; but we muſt accuſtom ourſelves to the beſt things, on account of our innate vicious inclinations. That a friend is not to be entertained only for uſeful or neceſſary ends, nor when ſuch ends fail, to be caſt off, but out of an intrinſic good will; for which we ought likewiſe to expoſe ourſelves to trouble and inconvenience. For tho' theſe Philoſophers, like the reſt of that ſect, placed the chief end and good of mankind in pleaſure, and profeſſed that they were uneaſy at the loſs of it, yet they affirmed, that we ought voluntarily to ſubject ourſelves to pain and trouble out of regard to our friends (4). T.

(1) Cicero de Offiiis, lib. 3.
(2) See the article of HEGESIAS.
(3) See Stanley's Lives of the Philoſophers, Part 4. p. 140. edit. 2. London, 1687.
(4) Idem, ibid.

ANNIUS of Viterbo, a famous impoſtor. See NANNIUS.

ANSELM, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, one of the moſt illuſtrious Prelates of his age, died the 21ſt of April 1109, aged ſeventy ſix years (a). He deſired to live a little longer in order to finiſh a treatiſe of the Origin of the Soul [A]. His article is very long long in Moreri's Dictionary; to which I refer the reader. The Monks of Lerins, who have given a place to this great Prelate in the Chronology of their Saints and illustrious Monks, are confuted by the author (b) of a book intitled Les Mons travestis (c). We shall see below that he made use of an argument for the existence of a God, which Mr. Des Cartes very much improved [B].

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Litteraria Script. Eccleſ. p. 627.

[A] He deſired to live to finiſh a treatiſe of the Origin of the Soul.] This deſire of his has made a Doctor of Louvain ſay, that the opinion of the propagation of the ſoul continued till the end of the 11th Century. Imo, ſays he (1), uſque ad tempora S. Anſelmi, hoc eſt annum Chriſti MC, in Occidente duraſſe videtur hæc de animarum traductione dubitatio. Nam cum paulò poſt moriturus S. Pater decumberet, dixiſſe ſcribit familiaris &c.

(1) Libert. Fromond. Philoſoph. Chriſt. de Animâ, lib. 4. cap. 3. p. 812.

(b) He calls himself Mr. Peter Joseph. His book was printed in 1698 in 12°.

(c) Moins Travestis, tom. 1. p. 49.

* Ediner. in Vitâ S. Anselmi, apud Surium, die 21 Aprilis.

(2) In Remark [E] of the article of AVERROES, quotation (47).

† Tom. 2. of his Letters, pag. 276, &c.

& convictor ejus Edinerus *.... "Si Deus mallet me "adhuc inter vos saltem tamdiu manere, donec quæ- "stionem, quam de animæ origine mente revolvo, ab- "solvere possem, gratiosus acciperem, eo quod nescio, u- "trum aliquis eam, me defuncto, sit absoluturus." I have quoted in another place (2) a passage of Thomas Bartholine, who has made a reflection upon this thought of St. Anselm.

[B] He made use of an argument for the existence of God, which Mr. Des Cartes has very much improved.] The Catalogue, which Mr. Baillet has given of the Authors, from whom Mr. Des Cartes is pretended to have stolen, contains these words: "They placed "likewise St. Anselm in the number of the ancients, "from whom Mr. Des Cartes † might borrow his "argument for the existence of God, which he "takes from this consideration, that an absolutely per-"fect Being, or at least the most perfect that we "can conceive, includes existence in it. This ar-"gument is found in a book, which this Saint "wrote against the Fool, in answer to an unknown "Author, who had written in favour of the Fool, "against a point of reasoning, which St. Anselm had "made use of in his book intitled Prosologion (3). Observe that Mr. Huet remarks, that Thomas Aquinas confuted this argument. Celebris illa argumentatio.... tota est Anselmi, & in Proslogio, & in Apologetico contra Gaunilonem: eandemque & exposuit Thomas Aquinas, & refellit (4).

† Wilh. Leibnitz. Epist. Mss. tom. 3. Oper. Anselm. edit. Colon.

(3) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 536, 537.

(4) Huetii, Cens. Philos. Cartes. p. 204.

ANSELM, a bare-footed Austin Friar, born at Paris, will be too often quoted in this Dictionary, and has furnished too much matter to Moreri, not to deserve a place here. He died at Paris the 17th of January 1694, aged sixty nine years. He had passed fifty of them in a detachment from all the monastic employment, applying himself wholly to the duty of a religious life, and the writing of books. He was ready to give a second edition of his Histoire Genealogique de la Maison de France, & des grans Officiers de la Couronne [A], with corrections and additions, which he had long been preparing. He undertook likewise a work, which treated of the sovereign houses, and most illustrious families in Europe, and he had then compleated it (a). I cannot tell how his manuscripts will be disposed of: I wish they were published.

(a) Mercure Galant for January 1694. See likewise the Journal des Savans of the 8th of Feb. 1694, p. 157.

[A] He was ready to give a second edition of his HISTOIRE GENEALOGIQUE DE LA MAISON DE FRANCE.] He had published this History, with that of the Grans Officiers de la Couronne, in 1674 in II Vol. in 4to. We had before that a large work written by him intitled, Le Palais de l'Honneur, ou les Genealogies historiques des illustres Maisons de France, & de plusieurs nobles Familles de l'Europe. This was printed at Paris in 1668. We find there a short account of an infinite number of things relating to Heraldry, the consecration of Kings, solemn entries, the Baptism of the children of France, the funerals of Kings, military orders, &c. There is not so much method in this large volume, as in the two, that followed it. They have all of them need of a new edition revised, corrected, and enlarged; but it is certain, that they have been of great use, and it is inconceivable what prodigious pains this good Fryar was at in amassing together so many names, marriages, births, and dates. Let a man do what he will, if nature inclines us to certain things, there is no preventing the gratification of our desire, tho' it is under a Monk's habit. Father Anselm was born for researches in Genealogy; the little relation, which that study had with the manner of life he devoted himself to, did not hinder him from pursuing his inclination. One of his Brother-Fryars, but not of the Bare-footed Order, ran about night and day after discoveries in Geography (1); this was his particular natural inclination; the habit of an Austin-Fryar made no change in it.

(1) Father Lubin: He died at Paris the 7th of March 1695. See his Elogium in the Journal des Savans of the 28th of March 1695.

☞ANTELMI (JOSEPH), was born at Frejus in France the 25th of July 1648. After he had finished his studies he was made Canon of the Cathedral of that City, upon the resignation of Peter Antelmi his uncle. A little piece, which he wrote about that time, and which was never printed, because it was properly but the rough draught of a larger work, De Periculis Canonicorum. i. e. "Of the Dangers of Canons," shews that he considered the office of a Canon, and the duties belonging to it, in a much stronger light than is commonly done. In short the discharge of his duty and his application to study engaged his whole attention (a). In the year 1680 he published a Latin dissertation upon the foundation of the Church of Frejus [A]. His skill in Ecclesiastical affairs was the reason of his leaving Frejus in 1684; for J. B. de Verthamon being appointed Bishop of Pamiers, and having occasion for a person of abilities in order to restore peace to his diocese,

(a) Memoires pour servir à l'Hist. des Hommes Illust. tom. 5. p. 145, 146. edit. Paris 1728.

[A] A Latin Dissertation upon the Foundation of the Church of Frejus.] It is intitled, De Initio Ecclesiæ Forojulienfis Dissertatio historica, chronologica, critica, prophano-sacra. Accesserunt I. Præsulum Forojulienfium Nomenclatura Chronologica. II. Diatriba de Ecclesia Reienfi & de Monasterio Lirinenfi: i. e. "An historical, "chronological, critical, profane and sacred Dissertation upon the beginning of the Church of Frejus. "To which are added I. A chronological List of the "Bishops of Frejus. II. A Discourse concerning "the Church of Reia and the Monastery of Lirins." Printed at Aix in Provence 1680, in 4to. Our Author having formed a design of writing a complete History of the City and Church of Frejus, thought proper to publish first this Dissertation, in which he endeavours chiefly to give an account of the antiquity and foundation of that Church. The entire History was in MS. in the hands of the Bishop of Grasse his brother (1). He places the foundation of that Church about the middle of the fourth Century. He extols the merit of five or six of its Bishops, who distinguished themselves in the fourth and fifth Centuries by their learning and the sanctity of their lives; and especially the famous St. Leontius, whom that Church acknowledges for its Patron. He gives likewise an account of the Dispute between Theodorus of Frejus and Faustus Abbot of the Monastery of Lirins, relating to the exemption of that Monastery, which dispute was adjusted in the third Council of Arles. Father Sirmond places that Council in 455, but our Author in 450 or 451. He mentions the original of this Monastery, the Monks of which followed the sentiments of Cassian with regard to grace, as appears from Antelmi. We find in this Dissertation several observations upon the discipline of the Church, particularly the custom observed by the Church of Frejus dioceſe, in which the affair of the Regale had raiſed a great deal of diſorder, choſe our Antelmi by the advice of Father la Chaize, (under whom he had ſtudied Divinity at Lyons, and who always preſerved a great friendſhip for him from that time,) and made him his grand Vicar and Official. Antelmi perfectly anſwered the expectation which had been conceived of him. He managed the people's minds with ſo much prudence and addreſs, that the Biſhop upon his arrival in his Dioceſe found the utmoſt peace and tranquillity. However the pains which he was obliged to take for that purpoſe did not prevent him from purſuing his ſtudies in ſuch a manner, that he publiſhed in 1689 ſeveral Diſſertations in Latin upon the Works of St. Leo the Great, and Proſper Aquitanus [B], and another upon the Athanaſian Creed [C], and wrote ſeveral other works [D].

(1) Memoires, &c. p. 147, 148; and Du Pin, tom. 18. p. 271.

Frejus from the fifth Century of giving the Communion of both kinds to infants immediately after they were baptized; which cuſtom was continued in the Church till the eighth Century. There are likewiſe in this work a great many curious obſervations upon the antiquity, origin, different names, and various fortune of the City of Frejus. Antelmi has not omitted the famous monuments erected by the Romans there, and among the reſt the noble aqueduct of that City, which he gives a deſcription of (2).

(2) Du Pin, ibid.

[B] Several Diſſertations in Latin upon the works of St. Leo the Great and Proſper Aquitanus.] They are intitled, De veris operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni & Proſperi Aquitani Diſſertationes criticæ, quibus Capitula de Gratia Dei, Epiſtolam ad Demetriadem, nec non duos de Vocatione omnium Gentium libros Leoni nuper adſcriptos abjudicat & Proſpero poſtliminio reſtituit Joſephus Antelmius; i. e. "Critical Diſſertations "concerning the genuine works of the holy Fathers "Leo the Great and Proſper Aquitanus, in which the "Capitula concerning the Grace of God, the Epiſtle to "Demetrias; and the two books of the Vocation of "all the Gentiles, lately aſcribed to Leo, are reſtored "to Proſper by Joſeph Antelmi." Paris 1689, in 4to, pagg. 431. Our Author in carrying on the Hiſtory of the Church of Frejus, was obliged to enter into an examination of the queſtions relating to the Semi-Pelagian doctrine, which was maintained by the Monks of Provence. This engaged him in a diſpute with Father Queſnel concerning the author of the three books abovementioned, which were allowed to be written by the ſame perſon. Father Queſnel aſcribed them upon conjecture to St. Leo; tho' they were generally ſuppoſed to be St. Proſper's, whoſe name they bear in ſeveral MSS. Antelmi on the other hand endeavours to refute his conjectures, and reſtore them to St. Proſper (3). The whole queſtion depends upon a very exact compariſon of the ſtyle and genius of both theſe Writers. There has been a diſpute among the learned, whether the Capitula or Ten Chapters concerning Grace againſt the Semi-Pelagians, which are publiſhed in the ſecond volume of the Councils, belong to Pope Celeſtinus or St. Proſper. Father Queſnel is the firſt, who aſcribed them to St. Leo. Baronius, Father Sirmond, Father Labbe, who made a Collection of the Councils, and Father Noris, who was afterwards made Cardinal, in his Hiſtory of Pelagianiſm, conjectured that Pope Celeſtinus was author of them. The Letter of that Pope prefixed to them inclined them to that opinion. But St. Proſper compoſed them in the year 430, having collected all the authorities of the Popes and Councils, that had condemned Semi-Pelagianiſm; and to give the greater weight and ſanction to this work, he procured an approbation of it from Celeſtinus, that by means of the authority of the See of Rome, he might more eaſily reduce the Monks of Provence, who oppoſed St. Auſtin's doctrine. Antelmi omits nothing in order to preſerve the honour to St. Proſper. He compares in different columns the ſtyle, turn and method of St. Proſper with that of the works in diſpute; and concludes from the conformity between them, that he cannot juſtly be deprived of them. He takes a great deal of pains likewiſe upon the treatiſe of the Vocation of the Gentiles. The Author of the Apology for the Fathers aſcribes this piece to an African Writer (4); and Mr. Baſnage de Beauval (5) obſerves, that there are a great many difficulties againſt ſuppoſing it to be the work of St. Proſper; and that our Author has endeavoured to clear them with more labour and learning, than the importance of the ſubject deſerved. Antelmi has examined alſo another queſtion relating to two Letters of St. Leo; one addreſſed to Septimius Biſhop of Altino, and the other to Januarius Biſhop of Aquileia. Theſe two Letters are very like each other. Father Queſnel denies that written to the Biſhop of Altino to be genuine; but declares the other written to the Metropolitan of Aquileia to be authentick. Antelmi on the contrary aſſerts, that the latter is ſuppoſititious, and the former genuine. He enters afterwards into a critical examination of the works of St. Leo. He pretends, that the Letters and Sermons under his name are the works of St. Proſper. He affirms, that the Chronicle of Proſper belongs to Proſper Aquitanus. Laſtly he gives us a Criticiſm upon St. Proſper's Poems, and promiſes a new edition of all his works (6). Father Queſnel anſwered our Author in a Letter inſerted in the Journal des Savans of the 8th and 15th of Auguſt 1689; in reply to which the latter publiſhed the following book: Deux Lettres de l'Auteur des Diſſertations ſur les Ouvrages de Saint Leon & Saint Proſper a M. l'Abbé . . . . pour ſervir de réponſe aux deux parties de la Lettre du P. Queſnel; i. e. "Two Letters from the "Author of the Diſſertations upon the works of St. "Leo and St. Proſper to the Abbot . . . . in anſwer "to two parts of the Letter of Father Queſnel." Paris 1690, in 4to. Mr. Du Pin has given the advantage to Father Queſnel in this diſpute. The Biſhop of Graſſe ſaid, that he had in his hands a ſheet of that Author's Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques, in which he declared, that he approved of the opinion of Antelmi; but that he ſuppreſſed it at the ſollicitation of Father Queſnel's friends, and printed another, in which he abſolutely declared in favour of the latter (7).

(3) Idem, pag. 271, 272.

(4) See Mr. Baſnage de Beauval, Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, tom. 7. Art. 9. April 1690. p. 363. edit. Amſterd. 1721.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Du Pin, pag. 272.

(7) Memoires, &c. p. 149, 150.

[C] Another upon the Athanaſian Creed.] It is intitled, Nova de Symbolo Athanaſiano Diſquiſitio; i. e. "A new Diſquiſition concerning the Athanaſian "Creed." Paris 1693, in 8vo. Father Queſnel imagined, that this Creed was compoſed by Virgilius Thapſenſis an African Biſhop in the 6th Century, who publiſhed ſeveral other works under the name of Athanaſius, and very often makes uſe of expreſſions employed in this Creed. Antelmi on the other hand has revived the conjecture of Mr. Pithou, that this Creed was drawn up by a Divine of France. His Diſſertation is divided into four parts. In the firſt he adds ſeveral proofs, which are very ſingular, to thoſe, which had been urged before to ſhew that this Creed was not and could not poſſibly be the compoſition of St. Athanaſius. In the ſecond he makes an exact enquiry into the time when this Creed was firſt known, and afterwards publiſhed under St. Athanaſius's name; and tracing it up from the tenth Century, in which Voſſius aſſerted that it began to be known, he places the Epocha of it about the middle of the fifth Century. In the third place he enquires into the Country of the Author of it, and whether he was of Africa or France, and endeavours to confute the ſyſtem of Father Queſnel, who aſcribes it to Vigilius Thapſenſis. The arguments, which he urges againſt it, are as follows: 1. That the treatiſes, in which we obſerve the forms and expreſſions, which are to be found in that Creed, are not certainly the works of Vigilius, even in the opinion of Father Chifflet, who publiſhed them under his name, and yet acknowledged them to be doubtful. Our Author proceeds ſtill further, and brings ſeveral reaſons to ſhew, that they belong to Idatius, and anſwers the arguments of Father Chifflet. 2. Tho' theſe works were written by Vigilius Thapſenſis, yet the conformity between ſome expreſſions in them and thoſe in the Athanaſian Creed, is not a ſufficient proof, that this Creed belongs to the ſame Author, ſince we find expreſſions of the ſame kind in St. Auſtin, to whom no perſon has ever aſcribed it. 3. It is ſaid, that Vigilius having publiſhed works [D]. His conſtitution was very tender and delicate, and he ſoon found the ill effects of his neglect of it; and his health was ſo much altered, that he was obliged at the beginning of the year 1697 to retire to his native air at Frejus. There were ſome hopes that he might have received benefit from a milk-diet; but his diſtemper encreaſing every day, he died at Frejus (b), and not at Pamiers, as Mr. Du Pin tells us (c), the 21ſt of June 1697 in the forty ninth year of his age. Mr. Du Pin is likewiſe miſtaken in aſſerting, that he was but forty years of age. That eminent Critic gives him this character; that he was a man of great genius, integrity, ſweetneſs of temper, and learning, but that he was too eaſily led away by his conjectures (d).

(b) Ibid. p. 147.
(c) Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 18. p. 273. edit. Amſterdam 1711.
(d) Ibid.

liſhed ſome of his works under the name of St. Athanaſius and other Fathers, in order to give the greater authority, it is the more probable, that he would give the name of that Saint to the Creed, which he had compoſed. Antelmi anſwers that this cannot poſſibly be ſo, becauſe this Creed appeared at firſt with the Author's name, and not under that of St. Athanaſius. In the laſt part he pretends, that he has diſcovered the French Author of it, who was Vincentius Lerinenſis. The conjectures, which he urges for that purpoſe, are the conformity between the expreſſions and phraſes of that Writer and thoſe of the Creed, and a paſſage, in which he promiſed to retouch more fully the expreſſions, which relate to the confeſſion of the myſteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation. The objection, which naturally ariſes upon this, is, that Gennadius does not mention this Creed in his book concerning the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, in which he ſpeaks of Vincentius Lirinenſis and his treatiſe againſt Hereſies. Antelmi is not much perplexed by this negative argument; and in order to invalidate it, he obſerves, that Gennadius has not mentioned a great many Authors, and has omitted ſeveral of the works of thoſe, whom he gives an account of; as particularly the Expoſition of the Creed by Hilary of Arles, the Author of whoſe Life extols it very highly (8).

(8) Du Pin, p. 272.

[D] Several other works.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them. I. De ſanctæ Maximæ Virginis Callidiani in Forojulienſi Diœceſi cultu & patria. Epiſtola ad V. Cl. Danielem Papebrochium:" i. e. "Of "the Worſhip and Country of St. Maxima the Virgin in the Dioceſe of Frejus, in a Letter to the "celebrated Daniel Papebroch." This Letter is publiſhed in the Antwerp edition of the Acta Sanctorum, 16th of May. II. De tranſlatione corporis S. Auxilii Epiſtola ad V. Cl. Ludovicum Thomaſſinum de Mazauge; i. e. "A Letter to the celebrated Lewis Tho-"maſſin de Mazauge concerning the Tranſlation of "the body of St. Auxilius." The Biſhop of Graſſe, who mentions this Letter (9), does not tell us when it was printed. III. De Ætate S. Martini Turonenſis Epiſcopi, & quorundam ejus geſtorum ordine, anno mortuali, nec non de S. Priccio Succeſſore Epiſtola ad R. P. Ant. Pagium; i. e. "A Letter to the Reverend "Father Anthony Pagi concerning the Age of St. "Martin Biſhop of Tours, the Order of ſome of his "Acts, and the Year of his death, and concerning "his Succeſſor St. Priccius." Paris 1693, in 8vo. Antelmi and Father Pagi laboured in conjunction upon this work; one of them engaged in the examination of Gregory Turonenſis, and the other in that of Sulpicius Severus (10). Aſſertio pro unico S. Eucherio Lugdunenſi Epiſcopo. Opus poſthumum. Accedit Concilium Regienſe ſub Roſtagno Metrop. Aquenſi anni 1285. nunc primo prodit integrum & notis illuſtratum opera Car. Antelmi deſignati Epiſc. Graſſenſ. Præpoſ. Foroj. i. e. "An aſſertion that there was but one St. Eu-"cherius Biſhop of Lyons: A poſthumous work. To "which is added the Council of Regium under Ro-"ſtagnus Metropolitan of Aix in the year 1285, "now firſt publiſhed intire, and illuſtrated with notes "by the care of Charles Antelmi elect Biſhop of "Graſſe, and Provoſt of Frejus." Paris 1726, in 4to. This work was the only one that the Biſhop found entirely finiſhed among our Author's MSS. to which he has added a Preface, in which he gives a ſhort account of the life and writings of his brother (11).

(9) In his Preface to Antelmi's Aſſertio pro unico S. Eucherio, &c.
(10) Hiſt. des Ouvrag. des Savans, Nov. 1692. and Memoires, &c. p. 150.
(11) Memoires, &c. p. 150, 151.

T.

ANTESIGNANUS (PETER), born, if I am not miſtaken, at Rabaſteins [A], a little town in Languedoc, in the Dioceſe of Albi, was one of the beſt Grammarians of the ſixteenth Century. He was ſo zealous in his employment, that he choſe rather to make himſelf uſeful to the youth, by engaging himſelf in explaining thoſe things which perplex them at their firſt entrance into ſtudy, than to raiſe his reputation by clearing of the greater difficulties in authors [B]. However he acquired ſuch a reputation, as drew upon

[A] He was born, if I am not miſtaken, at Rabaſteins.] What inclines me to believe this, is the Epithet Rapiſtagnenſis, which he gives himſelf in the title-page of his works. I ſee no City, that can give him this title more properly than Rabaſteins; for it is called in Latin Rapiſtanum, or Rapiſtagnum (1). I imagine that the Printers have made a blunder in the paſſage, where Papyrius Maſſo ſpeaks of this City; they have put Rupiſtagni incolis inſtead of Rapiſtagni incolis (2). The three radiſhes, which are the arms of Rabaſteins (3), induce me to think, that Papyrius Maſſo, or the Printers, have put the letter u inſtead of a.

(1) Catel aſſures us of this in p. 356 of his Memoires de l'Hiſtoire de Languedoc. Mr. Baudrand ſpeaks of this city under Rapiſtanum.
(2) In pag. 490 of his Deſcriptio Fluminum Galliæ, Paris edition in 1685.
(3) Catel, Memoires de l'Hiſt. de Languedoc, p. 356.

[B] He choſe rather to make himſelf uſeful to the youth . . . . than to raiſe his reputation by clearing of the greater difficulties in Authors.] Let him inform us this himſelf: I ſhall quote his words at length; they ſhew an honeſt and generous mind; and may be a leſſon of morality to thoſe proud ſpirits, who ſeek nothing but the applauſe of ſuch vain perſons as themſelves; and never direct their ſtudies to the advantage of thoſe, who have occaſion for their aſſiſtance. He had juſt told us, that ſeveral learned Commentators had written upon Terence, and then he adds: Verum pueri novitii, ad quos maxime hujus laboris fructus pertinebat, vix ullum ex accuratis & meditatis iſtorum commentationibus emolumentum percipere potuerunt. Videntur enim viri illi graves incubuiſſe in eam curam & cogitationem, quæ ſibi ſummam dignitatem & gloriam eſſet allatura. Itaque ardua tantum & obſcuriora interpretando explanaſſe contenti, minutiora cætera, quorum doctrina & tractatio præcedere, vel certe conjungi debuerat, leviter attigerunt, ut adoleſcentuli, qui his ſtudiis initiantur, ſe ad cognitionem hujus rei, quam ex communi quadam hominum opinione reconditiſſimam arbitrantur, deſperent poſſe pervenire. Ut igitur eos ab hujuſmodi deſperatione ad ſpem revocarem, ad minima iſta me demittere non recuſavi; neque enim hic difficilia tantum enodavimus, ſed ne unam quidem totius Terentii ſyllabam reliquimus intactam, quam ad unguem non excuſſerimus, idque abſque ulla verborum pompâ aut magnificentiâ, ſed nudis literarum notis, & methodo quam potuimus breviſſimâ & facillimâ. Doctrinæ opinionem affectent alii; ego pro mea virili parte me puerorum & formandis & promovendis ſtudiis omnem meam operam addixiſſe aperte & ingenuè fateor (4). Compare this with the paſſage of Quintilian, which I quoted in the project of this Dictionary (5); and add to them theſe excellent words of Eraſmus; which relate to the labour he was at in enlarging a Lexicon. Scimus hoc laboris genus eſſe minime glorioſum, præſertim quum pauci reputant quot autores ſint excutiendi, ut voces aliquot ab aliis præteritas ſeligas. Verum hoc plus debetur illis gratiæ, qui publicæ utilitatis gratiâ non detractant ingloriam ac moleſtiæ plenam induſtriam (6). That is, "We know that this kind of labour is not a very glo-"rious one, eſpecially ſince but few conſider how "many Authors are to be examined, in order to find "ſome words, which have been omitted by others. "But ſo much the more praiſe is due to them, who "for the ſake of the publick advantage undertake a "work of ſo little glory and ſo great fatigue."

(4) Pet. Anteſignan. Epiſt. Dedicator. Terent. initio.
(5) See the end of the 7th paragraph of this project at the end of the 4th volume of this Dictionary.
(6) Eraſm. Præfatione in Lexicon. It is the 21ſt Letter of the 28th book, pag. 1702. See likewiſe the end of the 1ſt chapter of the 18th book of Pliny's Natural Hiſtory.

upon him the envy of others [C]. What he publiſhed upon Terence may convince us, that he was the moſt laborious man in the world [D]. I am of opinion, that he taught a long time at Lyons. The epiſtle before his Terence is dated from that city in Auguſt 1556 (a). He addreſſed it to three brothers, who were his ſcholars. His Grammar of the Greek Tongue was printed ſeveral times. He was well enough verſed in Hebrew (b). to merit a place in the Gallia Orientalis of Colomeſius; and yet he has been omitted.

(a) Idibus Auguſti.

(b) He wrote in that language a letter to Peter Coſtus, which was printed. See the Epitome Geſneri.

[C] He acquired ſuch a reputation, as drew upon him the envy of others.] This is what he tells in a common place, which is too often inſerted into Epiſtles Dedicatory. He ſays, that thoſe, to whom he dedicated his Terence, ſeemed to him the propereſt perſons to ſecure him from the attacks of his enemies: Digni maxime atque idonei videbamini, qui noſtra à malevolorum morſu fortiter & induſtriè tutari poſſetis (7). There are ſcarce any compliments more falſe than that. The Critics have no manner of regard to the dignity or capacity of him, to whom a book is dedicated, if it appears to them to be a bad one. The Sieur des Accords rallies very agreeably this notion of being protected by the perſon, to whom a book is dedicated (8). D'Aubigné thought the reflections of this Author ſo juſt, that he choſe to borrow them himſelf, after he had changed them a little, and diſpoſed them in another manner (9).

(7) Anteſign. Epiſtol. Dedicat. Terentii.

(8) See the Preface to the Bigarrures of des Accords.

(9) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Confeſſion de Sanci.

[D] What he publiſhed upon Terence may convince us, that he was the moſt laborious man in the world.] He publiſhed the Comedies of that Poet in three different methods. Firſt with ſhort notes, and the arguments of every ſcene, and he mark'd the accents upon every word, which had more than two ſyllables, and likewiſe at the ſide of every verſe the manner of ſcanning it. In the ſecond place he publiſhed them with the entire notes of almoſt all the Authors, who had written upon Terence. And laſtly he publiſhed them with new marginal notes, and a French tranſlation and paraphraſe of the three firſt Comedies. He puts between crotchets whatever is in the tranſlation, and not expreſſed in the original: he marks with letters all the references from the tranſlation to the Paraphraſe. The various readings have likewiſe each their parentheſes, and their notes of reference. It is eaſy to collect from this how patient our Author was. Obſerve that he has given in the two laſt editions of his Terence all that was contained in the firſt. Matthew Bon-homme a Bookſeller at Lyons, was the perſon whom he employed in publiſhing this threefold edition. The date of the King's Privilege is in 1556. The laborioufneſs of this Author appears no leſs from his book intitled, Thematis verborum inveſtigandi ratio, and from his Praxis præceptorum linguæ Græcæ. They are to be found in ſeveral Greek Grammars.

ANTHERMUS, a Sculptor, born in the Iſle of Chios, ſon to Micciades, and grandſon to Malas, who were both of them Sculptors, left behind him two ſons of the ſame profeſſion; one of whom was named Bupalus, and the other Athenis [A]. It was againſt them that Hipponax wrote verſes, which were extremely ſatyrical, to revenge himſelf upon them for giving a ridiculous figure of him, as he was a man of a very odd form (a). I ſhall ſpeak more fully of this in the article of that Poet. See likewiſe the article of BUPALUS.

(a) Plinius, Hiſt. Nat. lib. 36. c. 5.

[A] One of his ſons was named Athenis.] Suidas calls him ſo (1). He was called Anthermus in the editions of Pliny; but Father Hardouin has reſtored Athenis in the room of it. See the remarks [C] and [E] of the article HIPPONAX. The Hiſtorical Dictionaries of Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Moreri, and Hofman, call him Anthermus, in ſpite of Suidas's authority.

(1) In Ἱππώναξ.

☞ANTHOINE (NICHOLAS) burnt at Geneva in the year 1632, for embracing Judaiſm, was born at Brieu in Lorrain. His father and mother were Roman Catholicks. They took a particular care of his education, and ſent him to Luxemburg, where he ſtudied for five years in the college of that city. From thence he went to Pont-a-Mouſſon, Triers, and Cologne, where he continued his ſtudies under the Jeſuits, till he was twenty years of age. Upon his return to his father, having conceived a diſlike to the church of Rome, he went to Metz, and applied himſelf to Mr. Ferry, a learned reformed Miniſter, who inſtructed him in the Proteſtant Religion; which he publickly embraced, and even endeavoured to convert his relations to it (a). From Metz he was ſent to Sedan to ſtudy Divinity, and from thence to Geneva, where he continued his Theological ſtudies; in the purſuit of which he had the misfortune to fall into Judaiſm [A]; and ſollicited the Jews in divers cities to admit him as a proſelyte among them; but in vain [B]. This induced him to return to Geneva, where he had more acquaintances than any

(a) See Bibliotheque Angloiſe par M. D. L. R. tom. 2. Part 1. Art. 9. p. 238; and Memoirs of Literature, 2d edit. Vol. 6. Art. 20. pag. 132; from which two pieces written by the ſame Author we have extracted this article.

[A] In the purſuit of which he had the misfortune to fall into Judaiſm.] Having applied himſelf particularly to the reading of the Old Teſtament, and finding ſeveral difficulties in the New, which ſeemed to him unanſwerable, he inwardly embraced the Jewiſh Religion about five or ſix years before his trial, which happened in 1632. His firſt doubts concerning the Truth of Chriſtianity aroſe from his comparing the two Genealogies of Chriſt as they are repreſented in the Goſpels of St. Matthew and St. Luke. But when he attempted to examine the paſſages of the Old Teſtament, which are applied to the Meſſiah in the New, he was ſo extremely ſhocked by this application, and it appeared ſo falſe to him, that he renounced Chriſtianity. The Author of the Bibliotheque Angloiſe obſerves (1), that it is probable Anthoine is the only Chriſtian, who ever abandoned the Chriſtian Religion upon ſuch a motive.

(1) Pag. 239.

[B] Sollicited the Jews in divers cities to admit him as a proſelyte among them; but in vain.] As new notions of Religion very often make more impreſſion upon the minds of men, than thoſe, in which they have been educated from their infancy, he became ſo zealous for Judaiſm, that he reſolved to make a publick profeſſion of it. For which purpoſe he left Geneva, and returned to Metz, where he diſcovered his ſentiments to the Jews of that City, and deſired to be admitted into their Synagogue. But they refuſed him for fear of bringing themſelves into trouble, and adviſed him to go to the Jews of Amſterdam or Venice. Upon this he went to Venice, and deſired the Jews there to circumciſe him; but he was diſappointed, for they told him, that the Senate had prohibited them to circumciſe any perſons, who were not born Jews. Anthoine being extremely deſirous of receiving the ſeal of the Jewiſh Covenant, went to Padua, in hopes that the Jews of that city would be more favourable to him; but they gave him the ſame anſwer. Theſe Jews, as well as thoſe of Venice, told him, that he might be ſaved, without making an open profeſſion of the Jewiſh Religion, provided he remained faithful to God in his heart. This made him reſolve upon returning to Geneva (2).

(2) Ibid. p. 239, 240; and Memoirs of Literature, Vol. 6. p. 132, 133.

any where elſe. Mr. Diodati Miniſter and Profeſſor in that city, took him into his houſe as tutor to his children. He pretended to go on with his Divinity ſtudies, and was for ſome time teacher of the firſt claſs. Afterwards he diſputed for the Chair of Philoſophy, but without any ſucceſs. All this time he lived outwardly like a Chriſtian; for he confeſſed before his judges, that he had conſtantly received the Communion, but in private he lived and performed his devotions like a Jew. At laſt being weary of the condition, which he was in, and having occaſion for a ſettlement, he deſired a teſtimonial of the Church of Geneva, which was granted him; and he went to the Synod of Burgundy aſſembled at Gex, in order to be admitted into the Miniſtry. He was admitted according to cuſtom, promiſing to follow the doctrine of the Old and New Teſtament, and to conform to the diſcipline and confeſſion of faith of the reformed churches of France. Upon which the Synod appointed him to be Miniſter of the church of Divonne in the country of Gex. Here he ſoon began to be ſuſpected, and falling into a fit of diſtraction uttered ſuch things as increaſed thoſe ſuſpicions [C], ſo that upon the recovery of his ſenſes he was committed to priſon [D]. Mr. Ferry (b), who had converted him to the Proteſtant religion, hearing of the danger he was in, wrote a letter to the Miniſters and Profeſſors of the Church and Academy of Geneva [E]. And Mr. Meſtrezat, a learned Divine of

(b) See Mr. Bayle's article upon this Divine.

[C] Began to be ſuſpected . . . and uttered ſuch things, as increaſed thoſe ſuſpicions.] The Lord of the place perceived that he never mentioned Jeſus Chriſt either in his Prayers or Sermons; that he took his texts only out of the Old Teſtament; and that he applied to other perſons thoſe paſſages of the Old Teſtament, which are applied by Chriſtians to Chriſt. This occaſioned great ſuſpicions againſt him; which he being informed of was extremely perplexed, and as he was naturally of a melancholy diſpoſition, he fell into a fit of madneſs in February 1632. This accident was conſidered as a real judgment of God upon him, becauſe it happened the day after he had explained the ſecond Pſalm without applying it to our Saviour. This fit of diſtraction was ſo violent, that he moved upon his hands and feet in his chamber, and exclaimed againſt the Chriſtian Religion, eſpecially in the preſence of ſome Miniſters of Geneva, who went to ſee him. He inveigh'd likewiſe againſt the Perſon of Chriſt, calling him an Idol, &c. and he affirmed that the New Teſtament was a mere fable. He called for a chafing-diſh full of burning coals, and told the Divines, who were in his chamber, that he would put his hand into the fire in defence of his doctrine; and defied them to do the like for their Meſſias. At laſt in a tranſport of madneſs, he eſcaped in the night from thoſe, who guarded him, and ran to the gates of Geneva, where he was found the next morning in the dirt half-naked. Then having pulled off his ſhoes in the name of the true God of Iſrael, he worſhipped him bare-footed, and proſtrate upon the earth, and uttered ſeveral blaſphemies. The Magiſtrates of Geneva ordered him to be carried to an Hoſpital, where the Phyſicians took care of him, and he was viſited by ſome Divines.

[D] So that upon the recovery of his ſenſes he was committed to priſon.] His mind was compoſed by degrees; and then he ceaſed from ſpeaking reproachfully of the Chriſtian Religion; but he continued ſtrongly to maintain Judaiſm. After he was thus recovered of his madneſs, he was committed to priſon, where he was detained a conſiderable time before the Magiſtrates took cognizance of that affair. He was viſited there by the Divines, who uſed all their efforts to convince him of the falſity of his doctrine, and the enormity of his conduct, and to reduce him to the Chriſtian Religion; but he perſiſted in his opinions.

[E] Wrote a Letter to the Miniſters and Profeſſors of the Church and Academy of Geneva.] It was dated the 30th of March 1632. It is full of good ſenſe, and contains ſeveral particulars relating to the hiſtory of that unhappy man. The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee it at length in the tranſlation of Mr. de la Roche (3). It is as follows: "Gentlemen, and "moſt honoured Brethren. I beg your pardon for the "fault I am going to commit, if you take it to "be ſuch. And indeed I don't pretend to repreſent "any thing to you, but in order to ſubmit it to your "cenſure. I have heard with an unſpeakable grief "what has happened to that poor wretch, who is "amongſt you; and I beſeech you to forgive my "freedom in writing to you about it. I don't do it "altogether without the requeſt of others. Beſides "one muſt not expect a call to preſerve an unfortunate man who runs himſelf into deſtruction; ſince "God and nature, and our ancient acquaintance and "friendſhip, may be a ſufficient motive for me to do "it. To which I add, that having been inſtrumental in bringing him to ſalvation, I think I have "great reaſon to deſire that he may not undo himſelf, and to endeavour with your leave to prevent "it. I thank God, ſince he has thought fit to make "him a new example of human frailty, that he has "brought him amongſt you, that you might prevent "his doing miſchief, and endeavour to reclaim him. "I think, Gentlemen, that mildneſs and patience "will be the moſt proper means to ſucceed in it. I "make no doubt that his illneſs proceeds from a black "and deep melancholy, to which I always perceived "he was very much inclined; eſpecially after he had "ſeduced a young man whom he brought hither "from Sedan, in hopes to get ſomething by teaching him Philoſophy; and then he privately carried "him farther, tho' I had earneſtly deſired him to "ſend him back, and exhorted the young man to return to Sedan, which was M. du Moulin's deſire, "to whom he had been recommended. From that "time he could not bear the light in any room of "a Gentleman's houſe, where I had placed him, being always uneaſy, reſtleſs, and ſilent. Nay, he "had much ado to expreſs himſelf, and it was a hard "matter to make him ſpeak, tho' I had earneſtly "deſired him to be more free, and ſent for him, "and made him dine with me now and then, and "took all poſſible care of him. Which we aſcribed "to the ill ſucceſs he had in a Synod of the Iſle of "France, whither he had been ſent with a Teſtimonial and Recommendation of the Church and Academy of Sedan, notwithſtanding which he did not "appear ſufficiently qualified for the Miniſtry. After "he had inticed away that young man, he writ ſeveral letters to me, wherein he expreſſed a great "grief for it; and in all of them he uſed many "words, which ſhewed his mind was very much dejected, being above all things ſenſible of the reproofs he had received for it. So that I thought "myſelf obliged to write to him now and then, to "clear his mind of thoſe needleſs ſcruples, and of "ſuch an unreaſonable and dangerous vexation, and "to exhort him to apply himſelf to his ſtudy with "chearfulneſs, and a reſolution to do better for the "time to come. It is therefore highly probable, "that his melancholy has been heightened by thoſe "cloudy thoughts, and likewiſe the poverty and want "of many things, into which he fell ſoon after, and "whereof he complained to me in his letter, ſo far "as to mention the temptations, under which his "mind was almoſt ready to ſink. To this I may add "the nature of his ſtudies bent upon the Old Teſtament, on which he writ to me, that he was drawing up a Concordance. However tho' thoſe things "were not the true cauſe of his illneſs, you know, Gentlemen, that there is a ſort of melancholy, in which "the Phyſicians acknowledge Θεῖον τι, which is neither a crime, nor a divine puniſhment, but a great "misfortune. Certainly that which he lies under is "very deplorable; but, Gentlemen, I think I may "ſay, that tho' nature is the inſtrument of God's providence, of the Church of Paris, wrote two letters to Mr. Chabrey his brother-in-law, Minister at Geneva, of which we shall give two passages in the note [F]. He was mistaken in imagining that Anthoine had been a Monk. While he was in prison, he presented three petitions to the council [G]. On the 11th of April 1632 he was brought to his trial. He declared

(3) Memoirs of Literature, pag. 140, &c.

" vidence, yet all accidents ought not to be looked " upon as punishments, or signs of a wicked life, " nor the madness of that poor wretch as a formal " chastisement for his error, there being so many rea- " sons to believe that it proceeds from the disorder " of the brain and from melancholy. His madness " seems to be only an exorbitant fit of melancholy, which " being allayed by remedies, he appears now in his " former state. And tho' he errs only in the single " point, for which he is prosecuted, there is no reason " to infer from it, that he speaks in cold blood and " with a sound mind. For it is the property of that " sort of melancholy to have but one object, leav- " ing the mind free in all other things, as you know " better than I. There are some who speak upon " any subject with great learning and sedateness, and " have but one grain of madness, which they dis- " cover only by intervals, to those who hit upon " it. I am the more willing to compare that unfor- " tunate man to them, because in that very thing " wherein he pretends to be wise, he appears most " ridiculous; for he says what he would be ashamed " of out of his fit, tho' he were no Christian; since " he denies, as I hear, what the very Heathens and " Jews acknowledge. And therefore it is not a here- " sy but a blasphemy, which proceeds from a mind " rather distempered than perverted. His usual " frights and horrors are in my opinion a certain sign " of it; and there is no reason to ascribe them to a " divine judgment, and to infer from thence that he " is a reprobate. After all, Gentlemen, it is certain " he imposes upon you, when he tells you, that he " believed eight or ten years ago what he believes " now: for since that time, he has not only given " all manner of proofs of his Christianity, but also " brought over to the reformed Religion his eldest bro- " ther, who lives honestly among us; and he has en- " deavoured to work the same effect upon his father, " to whom he has writ many letters, several of which " I have opened: wherein he expressed a great zeal " and a wonderful love for Jesus Christ, and the " Christian truths, that are taught in our churches. " And in order to bring over his relations to our Re- " ligion, he writ to them, that he was ready to die " for it, if God required it of him. Nay, when he " was admitted into the Ministry, he acquainted me " with it in a Letter from Geneva, dated the 29th " of November; being used to call me, as he did " then, his Dear Ghostly Father, whom God had been " pleased to make use of, in order to bring him to " the knowledge of the true Religion. And he desir- " ed me to acquaint his relations with it, being fully " resolved for the future to lead a better life than " ever, and to perform his duty to the utmost of his " power. And therefore, Gentlemen, and most ho- " noured brethren, I think he ought not to be believed " in what he says during such a disorder of his mind; " and I hope that if you allow him some time to " recover from his frenzy, as I understand you " do, he will no longer blaspheme, and God will " give you comfort after your labour and patience. " To that end, I wish none may have access to him, " but such as are familiarly acquainted with him, " or for whom he has a particular respect and vene- " ration, and by whom he may be gently used, lest " his mind should be exasperated by too many visi- " tants, or by an unseasonable, tho' just severity. " Gentlemen, give me leave to tell you, that it seems " highly necessary for the edification of the Church, " that this affair should be managed with great pru- " dence. If you make an example of him, it will " doubtless prove extremely prejudicial. I entreat " you to consider the great scandal it will occasion " far and near, and what might be said against the " office and profession of a man converted from Popery, " who has learned to Judaize among us in the most fa- " mous Academies, conversing every day with several " Pastors. Besides Judaism being no dangerous sect, " it does not seem necessary to prevent the ill conse- " quences of it by a publick punishment. Nay per- " haps every body would not approve of it. There " are some extraordinary crimes, for which when the " guilty person is to be punished, it is not done in " publick; and the proceedings are suppressed to clear " the present age from such an infamy, and to leave " no marks of it to posterity. However there is no " need of being too hasty in a thing that may be " done as well in time, and when a delay cannot be " prejudicial, but rather useful. Servetus had a long " time allowed him for his amendment, tho' he had " dogmatized above twenty years in cold blood, and " in several places, both by word of mouth, and in " written and printed books, about things much more " subtle and dangerous. And yet, Gentlemen, you " know the various discourses, that were occasioned " by his execution. I don't say this, because I find " fault with it; on the contrary, I think such perni- " cious errors could not be better suppressed, than by " committing the Author to the flames. But this " man cannot be compared to Servetus; I pray God " to give him a better end. And I beseech you, " Gentlemen, and most honoured Brethren, not to " grow weary in this work of your great charity, " wherein God will direct you to use such remedies " as are necessary to reclaim that unfortunate man, " and to preserve the Church from such an infamy. " This is the design of this Letter, which I humbly " beseech you not to be offended with. Otherwise " I should be sorry to have writ it, excepting the " wishes I have just now made, and my further " prayers to God, that he would plentifully bless you " and your holy labours, increase your Church, and " ever keep your State under his protection. I beg " of you the continuation of your benevolence, being " with great sincerity, &c. FERRY."

[F] We shall give two passages of it.] His first Letter is dated from Paris, March 12, 1632. I am troubled for you, says he in that Letter, about your Antitrinitarian. The writings of our predecessors de puniendis Hæreticis, have not been very edifying, and prove very prejudicial to us in the countries where the Magistrates are our enemies. 'Tis true, the enormity of that man, his blasphemies, his profession of Christianity, and his Ministry, aggravate his crime. May God almighty direct your Magistrates in the matter! If every body had the same thoughts of Monks as I have, none of them should ever be admitted into the holy Ministry. I pray God to remove by the efficacy of his word the scandal occasioned by that profligate man, and to keep you under his protection. His second Letter is dated from Paris likewise the 30th of March 1632. The following passage is to be found in it. As for what concerns your Jewish Monk and revolted Minister, the most judicious persons in this city wish he may be confined to a perpetual imprisonment, and not be allowed to see any body, but such as are qualified to reclaim him. They are very much afraid of the consequences of a publick execution, lest it should be inferred from it by our adversaries in these parts, that words spoken against the Pope, (the pretended Vicar of Jesus Christ) or against the Host of the Mass, are likewise blasphemies against Christ, and ought to be punished in the same mannner. For they talk in the same strain; and all supreme Magistrates are Judges of consequences in their jurisdictions. These two passages, as the Author of the Bibliotheque Angloise (4) observes, do a great deal of honour to the memory of Mr. Mestrezat. It appears from them, that this learned Divine did not approve of putting hereticks to death. What he says with regard to the blasphemies of persons, who are heterodox, deserves a particular attention.

(4) Pag. 255, 256.

[G] He presented three petitions to the Council.] The first is dated the 11th of March 1632, and begins thus: In the name of the great God of heaven, who is the mighty God of Israel: His holy name be blessed for ever. Amen. He desires the Council to get some papers concerning his faith restored to him, which he had delivered to a Minister of Geneva by their order, that he might revise, correct, and finish them, before they were produced against him. And then declared that he was a Jew, beſeeching God that he might die in the Jewiſh religion; that he believed there had been ſuch a man as Jeſus Chriſt, but he knew not whether he had been crucified; that he did not believe him to be God, nor the Son of God, nor the Meſſiah, ſince there is but one God, without diſtinction of perſons, and the time of the Meſſiah was not yet come; that he rejected the New Teſtament, becauſe he found many contradictions in it, and becauſe it did not agree with the Old; that he had entered into the Miniſtry, becauſe the Jews had told him, that he might make an outward profeſſion of any religion without endangering his ſalvation, and becauſe he wanted a livelihood; that when he took the uſual oaths, it was with a mental reſervation to what was true and reaſonable; that being ſo far engaged, he could not avoid reciting the Apoſtles Creed, and adminiſtring the Communion; that he never pronounced diſtinctly the Articles of the Creed, which relate to our Saviour; that he took his texts out of the Pſalms, and the Prophet Iſaiah; that it was true, that in February, the day after he had preached upon the ſecond Pſalm, without applying it to Jeſus Chriſt, he fell into a fit of madneſs, as he was ſinging the lxxivth Pſalm (c); that he had loſt his ſenſes, when he came to Geneva, and called Jeſus Chriſt an Idol, &c. that it was true he had affirmed, that the paſſages of the Old Teſtament quoted in the New, were ſtrained, and far fetched, & qu'ils crioient miſericorde; that he had renounced his baptiſm, and continued to do ſo. He was then interrogated, and in particular concerning his former profeſſions to the contrary, and with regard to his morals [H]. On the 16th of April he was then he adds: Enquire of my life. I have always endeavoured to live in the fear of God, and to ſeek and follow the right way to ſalvation. God diſcovers his ſecret to thoſe who honour him. What I do, is only to give an account of my faith to the glory of God, and for the ſalvation of my ſoul. God knows my heart, and is a witneſs to my integrity and innocence. Don't draw innocent blood upon your heads, nor upon your families, and your city; and God, in whoſe hands we all are, will bleſs you, if you love his holy ways. I beſeech him with all my ſoul to bleſs you, and to touch your hearts; that you may be moved with pity and compaſſion towards me, the poor and afflicted ſervant of the Lord, &c. He preſented his ſecond petition the day following, which we ſhall inſert at length. " In the name of the Lord, " the God of Iſrael. Magnificent and moſt honoured " Lords, what I am going to repreſent to you, is not " with an intent to avoid death. According to God " I don't deſerve it; for I fear him, I love him, I " bleſs him, and will bleſs and worſhip his holy, " glorious, and adorable name to my laſt breath. Ne- " verthelefs, according to your laws and belief, and " what is commonly objected to me, you will think I " juſtly deſerve it. If God would be pleaſed to do " it, he would ſhew his great wonders by delivering " me, not for my ſake, who am a poor and miſerable " ſinner, but to glorify his great and adorable name, " and that all the earth might know, that he is the " Almighty God, who reigns in the world. I in- " voke his holy name, and implore his grace and " mercy. Whoſoever puts his truſt in the Lord, ſhall " never be aſhamed. Why ſhould we be afraid of " men? God is above all, and nothing comes to paſs " without his permiſſion. Magnificent and moſt ho- " noured Lords, ſince two things are commonly ob- " jected to me. 1. That I have ſtrayed from the " way of ſalvation. 2. That though I were in the " right way to ſalvation, yet having ſuch a belief, I " ſhould not have embraced the office of a Miniſter, " nor come into your city to give you offence; by " your leave I ſhall endeavour to anſwer thoſe two " points in a few words. As to the firſt point, I be- " lieve I am in the way to truth and ſalvation, and " ſhall perſevere in it, till I am ſhewed the contrary " by good reaſons taken from the Old Teſtament. " I worſhip one only God; I endeavour to follow " the law to the beſt of my power; I will fear, " love, and bleſs the holy name of God to the end " of my life. As to the ſecond point, your Lord- " ſhips muſt know that the people of Iſrael refuſed " to admit me among them, and told me, that I " might live every where, and among all nations, in " the fear of God, without diſcovering my opinions. " I have endured a thouſand hardſhips in my way " to Venice, and in that city, where I have been " for ſome time in a very miſerable condition; and " I came away more afflicted ſtill, and more miſe- " rable: nevertheleſs, I always put my truſt in the " Lord. I could not reſolve to live among the Pa- " piſts; for I had ſworn to do it no more, having " a great abhorrence for their idolatry. Beſides, I " was afraid of being charged with inconſtancy. " Nay, had I been diſcovered among them, they " would have been more cruel to me than your " Lordſhips uſe to be towards thoſe who are not ac- " cuſed of any crime, but only proſecuted for religi- " on. I have embraced the Miniſtry, becauſe I " thought I was ſufficiently qualified for it; becauſe I " was far in years; becauſe I was willing to keep houſe, " and perhaps to marry in time; and I had no mind to " diſcover myſelf at that time. How many are mar- " ried, and perhaps have quite another belief than " yours, and yet will not leave and forſake their " children upon ſuch an account? As for what is " ſaid, that I have ſcandalized you and your city by " my ſtrange proceedings, it was through a diſordered " mind. It is not I; I don't know who it was: " God knows it. And therefore I think I deſerve to " be pardoned in that reſpect, ſince it was not I, but " a terrible, dreadful, and ſupernatural power; as " the whole town may witneſs, and no body will be " offended at it. Rather than come and ſurrender " myſelf into your hands of my own motion, I " would have fled to the remoteſt parts of the world. " Magnificent and moſt honoured Lords, have a care " you don't draw innocent blood upon your heads, " and families, and city, by putting me to death; " for perhaps you know not the wonders of God, " the mighty God of Iſrael, and why he has ſo " miraculouſly tranſported me into this town. If " the beginning of it has been miraculous, perhaps " the end will be more miraculous ſtill. I ſhall ne- " ver be aſhamed, becauſe the Lord is my truſt and " my refuge. Let the holy name of the Lord, the " great God of Iſrael, be for ever bleſſed and glo- " rified by all men and in all places. Magnificent " and moſt honoured Lords, if you think I deſerve " to be put to death, and if the Lord God is pleaſed " it ſhould be ſo, his will be done. If you releaſe " me, you will releaſe an innocent ſoul, which fears " the God of heaven. I pray God with all my " heart, that he would be pleaſed to pour his moſt " holy bleſſings upon you, and to move your hearts, " if it be his good will, being, magnificent and moſt " honoured Lords, your moſt humble ſervant and " priſoner, N. ANTHOINE.

(c) D'où vient, Seigneur, que tu nous as épars.

[H] He was then interrogated, and in particular concerning his former profeſſions to the contrary, and with regard to his morals.] He was asked firſt, whether being one day viſited by a certain Lord and a Miniſter, he had not told them, that he believed only in the God of Iſrael, and that what is worſhiped and ſerved by all other nations is as mere idols, adding, that if this Chriſt be God, let all the curſes of the law and thunder fall upon me; but if he be not, let them fall upon you; and that this Chriſt is an idol, &c. Anthoine anſwered, that he did not remember this, but that it might poſſibly be ſo (5). They ſhewed him then a confeſſion written with his own hand, but not ſubſcribed by him, which contained was brought again to the bar; and declared, that he had never dogmatiz'd at Geneva; that when he gave the Communion in his church at Divonne, he uſed theſe words, Remember your Saviour; that he adminiſtred baptiſm as other Miniſters did; that he was in the way of ſalvation, and reſolved to die for the truth of his doctrine. Upon this the council condemned him on the 20th of April 1632 to be carried to the place called Plein-Palais, and there ſtrangled and burnt; which ſentence was executed the ſame day (d). It imports, that Nicholas Anthoine laying aſide all fear of God, was guilty of apoſtacy and high-treaſon, having oppoſed the Holy Trinity, denied our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, blaſphemed againſt his holy Name, renounced his baptiſm to embrace Judaiſm and Circumciſion, and perjured himſelf; which are great and horrid crimes, &c. Mr. Ferry's letter abovementioned made ſo great an impreſſion upon the Miniſters of Geneva, that they went in a body to the Council, to deſire the Magiſtrates to ſuſpend the execution of the priſoner for ſome time; but it was to no purpoſe. He left ſeveral pieces written with his own hand [I]. We ſhall give the reflections of an ingenious Author upon this extraordinary incident [K].

(5) Bibl. Angl. p. 263, 264.

(d) Biblioth. Angl. p. 266.

theſe words: I acknowledge and confeſs that Jeſus Chriſt crucified is the true God, Saviour, and Redeemer of the whole world, and that he is the ſame with the Father and the Holy Ghoſt, as to his Eſſence, but diſtinct as to his Perſon. He replied, that he had been forced to write that confeſſion, but diſowned the doctrine contained in it. Then the famous paſſage of Joſephus (6) concerning our Saviour was alledged againſt him, to which he made no anſwer. This paſſage was probably unknown to him (7). Being asked whether he perſiſted in renouncing of his baptiſm, he ſaid he did. Being exhorted to confeſs whether he had frequented the Brothels at Venice, he anſwered, that he could make no ſuch confeſſion, and prayed God to diſcover his innocence; adding, that the moſt beautiful woman in the world could not have tempted him; and then bending his head, he entreated God to have pity upon him, &c. The author of the Bibliotheque Angloiſe obſerves upon this (8), that ſome of the Orthodox imagine that great Hereticks are at the ſame time great ſinners; but thoſe who underſtand human nature ſufficiently, are of a contrary opinion. The firſt Syndic alledged to him ſeveral paſſages out of the Old Teſtament concerning Chriſt; and then the priſoner was recommitted.

(6) Mr. le Clerc has inſerted a curious diſſertation upon this paſſage, which he received from Paris, in the 7th volume of his Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne.

(7) Biblioth. Angl. p. 265.

(8) Ibid.

[I] He left ſeveral pieces written with his own hand.] Mr. de la Roche in his Bibliotheque Angloiſe (9) tells us, that he had ſeen them, and that they are as follows: I. Some paſſages of the Old Teſtament, with a Prayer. II. A Prayer, which he uſed in the evening, before he went to bed, and another Prayer, which he uſed after his Sermons. The ſtyle is almoſt the ſame with that of the Reformed Divines; but he makes no manner of mention of Jeſus Chriſt. Theſe Prayers are compoſed in a ſtrain of great devotion. III. A ſmall paper containing eleven philoſophical objections againſt the doctrine of the Trinity. IV. A long writing, in which the Author makes a confeſſion of his faith, in twelve articles; to which are added the proofs. He ſent this paper to the Council, while he was in priſon, and deſired the Magiſtrates to communicate it to their Miniſters. He ſign'd it the ſame day in which he was executed. Theſe twelve articles are as follows: 1. That there is only one God, without diſtinction of perſons. 2. That there is no other way of ſalvation, than by fulfilling the Law of Moſes. 3. That Circumciſion ought to be practiſed for ever. 4. That the Sabbath ought always to be obſerved. 5. That the diſtinction of clean and unclean meats ought always to ſubſiſt. 6. That ſacrifices will be reſtored. That the temple and city of Jeruſalem will be rebuilt. 8. That the true Meſſiah is to come, and that he will be a glorious, holy, and juſt King, and reſtore the Kingdom of Iſrael. 9. That there is no imputation of Adam's ſin. 10. That there is no predeſtination, by which God has decreed to ſave ſome perſons and to damn others; but that men ſhall be rewarded or puniſhed, according to their actions. 11. That no perſon can make ſatisfaction for us; but that if we ſin, there is room for repentance. 12. That the New Teſtament is not agreeable to the Old.

(9) P. 266, 267.

At the end of this long writing are ſubjoined two others. In the former he pretends to prove that the paſſages of the Old Teſtament, in which there is mention made of a new Covenant, ought to be underſtood only of the confirmation of the old Covenant made with Abraham, Moſes and the Fathers. The latter piece is an explication of the 53d chapter of Iſaiah. Anthoine imagined that the Prophet ſpoke there of the pious Iſraelites, who were puniſhed on account of the wicked, and involved in the ſame misfortunes with them. Mr. de la Roche obſerves upon this, that if a literal ſenſe diſtinct from the myſtical were to be admitted in that chapter, that explication would perhaps be the beſt, which could be given of it. Mr. le Clerc, he thinks, has given one very analogous to this in his Bibliotheque Hiſtorique & Univerſelle.

[K] The reflections of an ingenious Author upon this extraordinary incident.] The Author we mean is Mr. de la Roche abovementioned; who obſerves, 1. That Nich. Anthoine was a weak and extravagant man for embracing Judaiſm, becauſe he could not fully reconcile the two Genealogies of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſeveral paſſages of the Old Teſtament alledged in the New (10). It was a misfortune to him that he did not know that a great many Chriſtian Commentators acknowledge a double ſenſe in ſeveral Propheſies, which relate to the Meſſiah. A book like that of Surenhuſius, which was publiſhed in 1713, and intitled, Βιβλος καταλλαγης, in quo ſecundum veterum Theologorum Hebræorum Formulas allegandi, & modos interpretandi, conciliantur loco ex V. in N. T. allegata; i. e. "A treatiſe, wherein the paſ-" ſages of the Old Teſtament, quoted in the New, " are vindicated and reconciled, according to the forms " of quoting, and the ſeveral ways of interpreting " the Scripture, uſed by the ancient Hebrew Theo-" logers;" ſuch a book would have prevented his apoſtacy (11). 2. That Mr. Ferry and Mr. Meſtrezat, two of the moſt eminent Divines of the Reformed Churches in France, did not approve of putting him to death. They were only for confining and inſtructing him: Errantis pœna doceri (12). 3. That he was perfectly mad and diſtracted when he ſpoke ſo extravagantly againſt the Chriſtian Religion (13). 4. It is ſurprizing, that he ſhould be guilty of ſo much diſhoneſty as to preach every Sunday in a Chriſtian Church, tho' he was a Jew. But this will appear leſs extraordinary if we conſider, that many Jews have acted the ſame part in Spain (14). 5. Thoſe men are to be pitied, who are apt to ſink under any difficulty, that may be raiſed againſt the New Teſtament. One would think the minds of ſuch perſons are wholly taken up with an objection, without conſidering whether it may not be anſwered to the ſatisfaction of a reaſonable man. Let all our enquiries into matters of Religion be attended with great conſideration, uprightneſs of heart, and a profound reſpect of the Deity; and then, as we are bound to think freely, we ſhall alſo think ſoberly, and never publiſh, either directly or indirectly, any opinions inconſiſtent with the good of mankind (15). T.

(10) Memoirs of Literature, Vol. 6. p. 154.

(11) Biblioth. Angloiſe, pag. 269, 270.

(12) Ibid. and Memoirs of Literat. ubi ſupra.

(13) Memoirs, &c. ubi ſupra.

(14) Ibid. and Bibl. Angloiſe, ubi ſupra.

(15) Memoirs, &c. ubi ſupra.

ANTINOE, or ANTINOPLIS [A], a city in Egypt upon the Nile [B], built or [A] Antinopolis.] Mr. Baudrand tells us twice in the ſame page, that Stephanus Byzantinus calls it ſo, I cannot find this either in Pinedo's or Berkelius's edition; but only, that the city Ἀντινόεια, Antinoïa was likewiſe called Adrianopolis. Moreri has not obſerved that this laſt name and Adrianople are not two different names; but he gives them as ſuch.

[B] A city of Egypt upon the Nile.] Dion Caſſius tells or repaired by the Emperor Hadrian in honour of Antinous. It was the Capital of Thebais, if we believe an Author of the fourth Century (a). This Author adds, that it was ſo well inhabited, that there were to be ſeen in his time twelve monaſtries of women (b). Ammianus Marcellinus repreſents it as one of the three moſt famous Cities of Thebais (c). It is falſe, that Leo of Africa tells us, that it was called Anthios [C]. See the remark [D] of the article ANTINOUS; you will find there ſeveral other particulars concerning this city.

(a) Palladius, Hiſt. Lauſiac. cap. 47. apud Triſtan. Comment. Hiſt. tom. I. p. 541.

(b) Idem, ibid. cap. 137. apud eundem, ibid.

(c) Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22. c. 16.

tells us poſitively, that Hadrian built it in the ſame place, where Antinous died. Ὡς ἐ πόλιν ἐν τῷ χωρίῳ ἐν ᾧ τοῦτ' ἔπαθε, συνοικίσαι, καὶ ἐπωνύμως ἀπ' αὐτοῦ: That is, "So that he ordered a city to be built in "the place, where he died, and to be called by his "name" (1). He had juſt before ſaid, that according to the account of Hadrian, this unhappy youth fell into the Nile. Since Hadrian therefore would have the world believe, that Antinous was drowned in that river, it follows then, that the city, which he conſecrated to this favourite, muſt have been ſeated upon the banks of the Nile, and near the place, where he periſhed. Pauſanias tells us expreſly, that this city was ſituated upon the Nile: Ἐπὶ τῷ Νείλῳ πόλις Αἰγυπτίων ἐστὶν ἐπώνυμος Ἀντίνου (2); That is, "There is a city in "Egypt upon the Nile, which received its name "from Antinous." We may conclude from thence, that the ruins, which are to be ſeen ten leagues from the Nile, according to Moreri, are not thoſe of Antinopolis. And we may conclude the ſame thing with much more certainty againſt the ruins of a city, which Mr. Baudrand has placed forty nine leagues from the Nile.

(1) Xiphil. in Adriano.

(2) Pauſan. l. 8. p. 244.

[C] Leo of Africa does not ſay, that it was called ANTHIOS.] This is another miſtake of Mr. Baudrand. I think I am not miſtaken in aſcribing the occaſion of it to the liberty, which is taken in paraphraſing upon the Authors, which are made uſe of. Let us conſider theſe words of Ortelius, Anthios hodie dici ex Joannis Leonis Africæ Deſcriptione deprehenditur: That is, "It appears from John Leo's Deſcrip-"tion of Africa, that it is now called Anthios." Compare them with theſe of Mr. Baudrand, Nunc in ruinis jacet, Anthios dicta, teſte Leone Africano: That is, "It now lies in ruins, and is called Anthios, as "we are aſſured by Leo of Africa." You ſee, that if this latter writer had kept exactly within the bounds of the former, he would not have expoſed himſelf to cenſure. Ortelius might have diſputed the point by applying in the beſt manner he could what Leo of Africa ſays; but Mr. Baudrand can have no recourſe to applications and conjectures; he is obliged to ſhew, that this Leo has aſſerted poſitively, that the ancient city of Antinoe is now called Anthios. Now this is what can never be proved; for Leo of Africa ſays nothing, but that Anthius was built by the Romans upon the Nile on the ſide of Aſia, and that there are ſtill to be ſeen ſeveral Latin Inſcriptions upon marble (3). He ſpeaks of it as of a very fine city, which is become conſiderable by the induſtry and agreeable humour of the inhabitants; ſo far is he from aſſerting, that it is now intirely in ruins. Mr. Baudrand adds, that it is forty nine leagues from the Nile to the Eaſt. It is not therefore the Anthios of Leo of Africa. Moreri cuts off nine and thirty leagues of this diſtance: We ſee, ſays he, the ruins of it about ten leagues from the Nile. We have proved in the preceding remark, that Antinopolis was ſituated upon this river.

(3) Leon. African. Deſcript. Africæ, lib. 8. fol. 360.

ANTINOUS, the favourite of the Emperor Hadrian, was born at Bithynus (a) in Bithynia. We find nothing relating to his family. His beauty engaged the heart of Hadrian in ſuch a manner, that there never was ſeen a more boundleſs and extravagant paſſion, than that which this Emperor was poſſeſſed of towards this youth. But there never appeared a more outrageous inſtance of it, than after the death of Antinous; for there were no divine honours [A], which Hadrian thought too high for this object of his affections. Some Authors ſay, that Antinous had given him the greateſt mark of love that was poſſible; in ſhort, that he died for him [B]. Others aſſure us, that he was drowned in the Nile, during the reſidence of Hadrian in Egypt, about the year 132 of

(a) This city was called Claudiopolis. Xiphil. in Adriano.

[A] The Emperor Hadrian gave him divine honours of every kind.] I ſhall not inſiſt upon the prodigious number of ſtatues or images, which he raiſed to him almoſt in every part of the world (1). I mean that he built temples, and appointed Prieſts and ſacred games (2), and conſecrated myſterious rites (3) to him. Pauſanias tells us, that the worſhip of Antinous was eſtabliſhed at Mantinea, by the Emperor's peculiar care, becauſe Antinous's country was a Colony of Mantinea (4). Games were celebrated every five years in honour of this favourite; but as for the myſterious rites, which were dedicated to him, they were performed every year. They, who conclude from his having Prieſts appointed him, who took upon them the name Prophets, that he had an Oracle, ſeek myſteries, where there are none (5). Theſe Prophets were the Prieſts, which Antinous had in Egypt in a City of his name (6); a City, which was the Mother-church, and chief of the order in that new kind of worſhip (7). Now in the Colleges of the Prieſts of Egypt, thoſe were called Prophets, who were a kind of Deans and Heads of them. See the proofs of this collected by the learned Henry Valeſius in his notes upon Euſebius (8). There is an Inſcription, in which Antinous is placed upon the ſame throne with the Gods of Egypt, σύνθρονος τῶν ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ Θεῶν (9). The dignity of Aſſeſſor to the Gods was much inferior to this. I ſhall not conceal, that the Philoſopher Celſus aſſerts, that the Egyptians would not ſuffer Antinous to be equalled with Jupiter and Apollo (10). Origen maintains the contrary; but I own he brings no proof for his aſſertion, and I cannot underſtand the force of his reaſoning.

(1) Xiphil. in Adriano.

(2) Hegeſippus, apud Euſebium, Hiſtor. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 4. cap. 8.

(3) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 244.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) See Caſaubon And. Salmaſius, upon Spart. Vit. Adrian. p. 137, 143.

(6) Hegeſippus, apud Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 4. cap. 8.

(7) See remark [D].

(8) Ad cap. 8. lib. 4.

(9) See Spanheim. de Numiſm. p. 657.

(10) Apud Orig. lib. 3. p. 133.

[B] Some ſay, that he died for Hadrian.] Hadrian did not mention this; but Dion paid no regard to that Emperor's Hiſtory, in which he read, that Antinous fell into the Nile, and was drowned. He tells us as an undoubted fact, that a magical operation, which Hadrian was engaged in, required that ſome perſon ſhould give up his life voluntarily, and that Antinous accepted of this condition. Xiphilin his Abbreviator has plainly omitted ſome circumſtances, which would explain this myſtery a little; for it is very improbable, that Dion Caſſius ſhould relate ſuch a fact as this in ſo imperfect and abrupt a manner. However that be, we cannot conclude from Xiphilin's account, that Antinous gave up his life either to ſave or prolong that of Hadrian's. We may with more reaſon conclude, that he reſigned it, in order that from the inſpection of his bowels the Soothſayers might diſcover ſome future events, which Hadrian deſired to know. I cannot admit what one of our Antiquaries ſays (11), that if it was only a curioſity to inſpect the entrails of a youth in a point of Divination, it was not neceſſary to expoſe to ſo cruel an experiment one, whom he loved above all the world: there were other boys of exquiſite beauty in his vaſt Empire, (if beauty was the thing required (12)), who might have been employed in this infamous myſtery. I cannot, I ſay, admit this objection; for this very writer himſelf acknowledges the inſufficiency of it, by adding immediately after theſe words: However it is poſſible, that the ſecret of this art of Necromancy required, that he, as he was the peculiar object of the Emperor's affection, ſhould be ſacrificed, in order to make the ſacrifice more effectual. He ſhould have added, what Dion ſays expreſly, that the victim muſt offer himſelf voluntarily; now the other youths, which the Emperor might have deſigned

(11) Triſtan. Comment. Hiſt. tom. 1. p. 541.

(12) This ſhould not have been mentioned in a doubtful manner. See Apulei Apolog. p. 301.

of the Christian Æra. However that be, this Emperor shed tears at his death (b), and ordered temples and altars to be built for him, which was executed with all the zeal that might be expected from a nation long accustomed to the most shameful flatteries [C]. He would have a notion likewise propagated, that Antinous gave forth Oracles. Some of them were dispersed about upon that account; but it was generally believed that they were forged by Hadrian (c). He ordered the city where his favourite died to be rebuilt, and to be called by his name [D]. He was very well pleased to be told that a new star was seen in heaven, which was the soul of Antinous [E], and he professed himself that he saw the star of Antinous (d). What is most surprizing in this affair, is, not the profane complaisance, which was paid to the unreasonable humour of this Emperor, which was otherwise ridiculed (e); but to see, that a long while after his death they continued the

(b) Muliebriter flevit. Spartian. p. 135.

(c) See the remark [D] at the end.

(d) Xiphilin. in Adriano.

(e) Idem, ibid.

designed for this sacrifice, would never have submitted of their own accord. Do we imagine, that there was not a dreadful violence used to those fine young Gentlemen, who were delivered by Heliogabalus to his Magicians? Cædit & humanas hostias, lectis ad hoc pueris nobilibus & decoris per omnem Italiam patrimis & matrimis; credo ut major esset utrique parenti dolor. Omne denique magorum genus aderat illi operabaturque, quotidie hortante illo, & gratias Diis agente, quod amicos eorum invenisset, quum inspiceret exta puerilia, & excuteret hostias ad ritum gentilem suum (13): That is, "He offered human sacrifices, and for that purpose "chose out of all Italy the noblest and most beautiful "youths, who had their fathers and mothers living; "I presume, that both the parents might have the "keener sorrow. In short he had about him every "day all sorts of Magicians, who were employed "by him, while he was encouraging them, and giving thanks to the Gods that he had found their "friends, and while he inspected the entrails of the "boys, and examined the victims after the manner "of his country." The Magic of those Ages demanded such sacrifices as these; and St. Justin observes, that they chose such children, whose chastity was never violated: Νεκρομαντικὰς μὲν γὰρ ἢ αἰ ἀδιαφθόρων παίδων ἐπισκίψεις (14); that is, "Their Necromancy, "and inspection of boys of unstained chastity." Upon that foot Antinous would have been a very improper person. To return to Hadrian, we ought I think to suppose, I, That he did not consent to offer up his favourite but upon the most pressing necessity; II, That the desire of avoiding death was a thing of greater importance to him, than the curiosity of discovering future events; I should choose therefore rather to follow Aurelius Victor, than Xiphilin. Aurelius Victor writes thus: Quæ quidem alii pia volunt religiosaque, quippe Hadriano cupiente fatum producere, cum voluntarium ad vicem magi popposcissent, cunctis retractantibus, Antinoum objecisse se referunt (15): That is, "Hadrian desiring to prolong his life, when "the Magicians required a voluntary sacrifice in "the room of him, and all refused it, they say that "Antinous immediately offered himself." Add to this these words of Spartian: De quo (Antinoo) varia fama est, aliis eum devotum pro Hadriano asserentibus: That is, "Of whom (Antinous) there are various re-"ports, some asserting that he devoted his life for "Hadrian."

(13) Lampridius. in Vita Heliogab. cap. 8.

(14) Justin in Apol. p. 65. See Salmasius upon Spartian in Adriano, p. 136. and Apul. Apolog. p. 301.

(15) Aurel. Victor, in Cæsaribus.

(16) Spartian. p. 135.

[C] They raised temples and altars to him ..... with all the zeal of a Nation long accustomed to the most shameful flatteries.] Casaubon ranks among the instances of mean complaisance, which was paid to Hadrian's passion what was done by the Poet Pancrates (17); which was as follows: He shewed to Hadrian, as if it had been a miracle, a flower of the Lotos, which was like a rose, and told him that he ought to give it the name of Antinoian, and assured him, that it sprung up in a place, which had been sprinkled with the blood of a lion, which Hadrian had killed in hunting. The Emperor was so highly pleased with this discourse, that he ordered a pension to be allowed to Pancrates in the Museum of Alexandria (18). Athenæus does not explain the reason why this Poet would have the name of Antinous given to this flower; but it is easy to imagine, that his intention was to do honour to the memory of that favourite. I was for some time of opinion, that this passage of Athenæus had given occasion to a fiction of Moreri, which I have mentioned at the end of this article; but I have changed that notion, since I read those words of a modern Author. Hadrian ... gave the name of this wretched youth (Antinous) to a city of Egypt .... as he did likewise to a star, a flower, to temples, sacrifices, oracles, and games, and in short made a God of him (19). Those, who compare this passage with the article of Antinous in Moreri, may soon judge whether that writer knew how to make a proper use of the books, which he consulted.

(17) Casaub. in Spart. Vit. Adriani, p. 137.

(18) Athen. lib. 15. c. 6. p. 677.

(19) Tristan, Comment. Hist. tom. 1. p. 541.

[D] Hadrian ordered the city, where Antinous died, to be rebuilt, and called by his name.] I have followed the Translator of Xiphilin, who speaks only of it as a city rebuilt, tho' Xiphilin himself uses the word ἀνοικίσαι. Others, who are not so accurate in this point, tell us, that Hadrian built a city of the same name as Antinous: Πόλιν ἔκτισεν ἐπώνυμον Ἀντινόου (20). It was situated in Thebais, and was anciently called Besa, which was likewise the name of the particular God, who was worshipped there. Casaubon assures us of this (21), and observes, that the Egyptians left the new name to the Greeks, and continued still to call it Besa; but there were some people, who joined the ancient and modern name, and called it Besantinous. This is what Helladius did, who was born there (22). I shall not omit to observe, that the tomb of Antinous was there. We learn this from the following words of St. Epiphanius: Ὡς ὁ Ἀντίνοος ὁ ἐν Ἀντινόῃ κεκηδευμένος ἐν τῷ ἰδιαιτέρῳ πλοίῳ κλαυσάντες ὑπὸ Ἀδριανοῦ κατετάγη (23): That is, "After this manner "Antinous, who is buried in the city of his own name, "with a pleasure boat, was ranked in the number of "the Gods by Hadrian." We find in Origen, that there was a report of miracles being performed in the temple of Antinous (24). It is here that Salmasius has placed the pretended Oracle of this false and ridiculous Deity. Licet in multis, says he (25), Græciæ urbibus templa & sacerdotes habuerit Antinous, præcipuè tamen eum coluisse videntur Ægyptii in ea urbe quæ ab ipso nomen accepit, nam ibi sepultus est, ibi oracula per eum reddi credebantur, ibi & prophetas habuit: That is, "Tho' Antinous had Temples and "Priests in a great many cities of Greece, yet the "Egyptians seem to have worship'd him with the most "peculiar reverence in the city, which took its name "from him, for there he was buried, and there O-"racles were supposed to be given forth by him, and "there he had Prophets devoted to his service.

(20) Hegisipp. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. 4. c. 8. See likewise Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 22. cap. 16.

(21) Casaub. in Spart. Vit. Adriani, p. 138.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Vide Photium, Biblioth. p. 1596.

(24) Origen. adversus Celsum, lib. 3. p. 132.

(25) Salm. in Spart. Vit. Adrian. p. 143.

What relates to the Oracle is attested by Origen (26), if we read the passage as Salmasius has quoted it: Πεῖσαι θεσπίσαι ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἀντινόου πρόσωπα (27) See likewise Scaliger upon Eusebius num 2145, where he does not quote it as Salmasius, tho' Spencer asserts the latter reading in page 44 of his Notes upon Origen against Celsus. Now this is what induced me to say, that it was a pretended Oracle. I had in view these words of Spartian: Et Græci quidem volente Adriano eum consecraverunt, oracula per eum dari asserentes, quæ Adrianus ipse composuisse jactatur (28): That is, "And indeed the Greeks worship'd him at the de-"sire of Hadrian, and asserted that he gave out Ora-"cles, which are said to have been forged by Ha-"drian himself."

(26) Origen. contra Celf. l. 3. p. 132.

(27) Salmas. in Spart. Vit. Adrian. p. 143.

(28) Spartian. in Adriano, p. 137.

[E] Hadrian was very well pleased to be told, that a new star was the soul of Antinous.] The same piece of flattery was used towards Julius Cæsar. Ludis, quas primo consecratos ei hæres Augustus edebat, stella crinita per septem dies continuos fulsit, exoriens circa undecimam horam, creditumque est animam esse Cæsaris in cælum recepti, & hac de causa simulacro ejus in vertice additur stella (29); That is, "At the time of "the Games, which his [Julius Cæsar's heir] Augustus "first dedicated to him, a Comet appeared for seven "days successively, rising about the eleventh hour, "and the worſhip of this new Deity. This reverence was ſtill kept up under the Emperor Valentinian (f), when the reaſons of flattering the Prince, and dreading a ſevere edict, which eſtabliſhed that worſhip (g), were abſolutely ceaſed. It was therefore through an abſurd attachment which people have for every thing, which they find eſtabliſhed, that continued their adoration of Antinous. The Fathers of the Church make a great advantage of this fooliſh ſuperſtition, in order to ſhew the vanity of Paganiſm. It was very eaſy to trace this new Deity to the firſt ſource and reaſons of his Apotheoſis, and by that means to render the origin of all others very much ſuſpected. They ſpoke differently of Antinous, according to the times; they were not ſo imprudent as to mention the infamous occaſion of his deification, when they addreſſed themſelves to Antoninus Pius, the adopted ſon and ſucceſſor of Hadrian, or to Marcus Aurelius, who was adopted by Antoninus Pius, conformably to Hadrian's intention. At that time they touched very lightly upon that ſubject (b); but Tertullian, who lived at a greater diſtance of time from it, and under thoſe Emperors, who had not the ſame intereſt in the affair, proceeds much further in his raillery, and is extremely ſevere upon it. Prudentius has ingeniouſly obſerved, that Hadrian's favourite was raiſed to a much higher ſtation than even that of Jupiter himſelf [F], ſince Antinous had the honour of ſitting at the table, while Ganymede only ſerved the wine. He might juſtly ſay, (f) Triſt. Comment. Hiſt. pag. 543.

(29) Sueton. in Cæsar. cap. 88. See the Pensees diverses sur les Cometes, p. 219.

(g) S. Athanaſius contra Gent. and Theodoret in his 7th Sacred Diſc. quoted by Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. p. 543, tells us, that there was an expreſs edict of HADRIAN for the worſhip of ANTINOUS.

(b) Juſtin. Martyr. Apoleg. ad Antoninum Pium. Athenagoras ad Marcum Imper.

——Mediis videor diſcumbere in aſtris
Cum Jove, & Iliacâ porrectum ſumere dextrâ Immortale Merum (i).

(i) Statius, Silv. 2. lib. 4. ver. 10.

That is,

"——I ſeem with Jove
" Plac'd in high heaven to taſte the glorious banquet,
" And drink immortal nectar in full bowls,
" Which Ganymede ſtands ready to preſent me.

It is certain that in all ages mankind have paid their court with more care and exactneſs to the Gods of the earth than to thoſe of heaven. I cannot imagine upon what account Moreri has told us, that Hadrian believed that Antinous was changed into a Flower and a Temple (k); and that he likewiſe raiſed an altar to him. Does not this ſeem to intimate, that he built no temples to him? and is there any more truth in this, than in the metamorphoſis of Antinous into a Flower?

(k) See the remark [C].

" and was ſuppoſed to be the ſoul of Cæſar, who was " received into heaven; upon which account a " ſtar was added to the head of his ſtatue." Ovid has concluded his Metamorphoſes with that of Cæſar's ſoul into a ſtar:

Vix ea fatus erat, media cum ſede Senatus
Conſtitit alma Venus nulla cernenda, ſuiq;
Cæſaris eripuit membris, nec in aëra ſolvi
Paſſa recentem animam, cæleſtibus intulit aſtris.
Dumque tulit lumen capere, atque ignoſcere ſenſit,
Emiſitq; ſinu. Luna volat altius illa
Flammiferumq; trahens ſpatioſo limite crinem
Stella micat. Ovid, lib. 15. Metam. ver. 843.

That is,

" This ſaid, inviſible fair Venus ſtood
" Amid the Senate; from his corps with blood
" Defil'd, her Cæſar's new-fled ſpirit bare
" To heaven, nor ſuffer'd to reſolve to air;
" And as in her ſoft boſom born, ſhe might
" Perceive it take a pow'r, and gather light;
" When once let looſe, it forthwith upward flew;
" And after it long-blazing treſſes drew.

Sandys.

Before this the Greek Poets had uſed the ſame kind of fiction with regard to Berenice's hair. The Emperor Hadrian was too learned not to know all this; and yet he gratified himſelf with a piece of flattery, which wanted the recommendation of novelty. What could be the reaſon, that ſome of theſe flatteries placed this favourite only in the loweſt ſphere of the heavens? in the orb of the moon? Πῶς ὁ τεθνὼς Ἀντίνοος μετῳκίσθη ἐν τῇ σελήνῃ ἀφανὴς καθίδρυται (30); that is, " How " came the beautiful youth Antinous, when he died, " to be placed in the moon?

(30) Tatian. Orat. contra Græcos. p. 1.

[F] Prudentius has ingeniouſly obſerved, that Antinous was raiſed to a much higher ſtation than the favourite of Jupiter himſelf.] His verſes deſerve to be quoted more correctly than they are by Triſtan, in his Hiſtorical Commentaries upon the Medals of the Roman Emperors (31), and by Moreri in his Hiſtorical Dictionary. We have them thus in the edition of Nicholas Heinſius:

(31) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. P. 542.

Quid loquar Antinoum cæleſti in ſede locatum?
Illum delicias nunc Divi Principis; illum
Purpureo in gremio ſpoliatum ſorte virili
Hadriani; Dei Ganymedem, non cyathos Dis
Porgere, ſed medio recubantem cum Jove fulcro
Nectaris ambroſii ſacrum potare lyæum,
Cumq; ſuo in templis vota exaudire marito (32.)

(32) Prudent. contra Symmach. lib. 1. ver. 271.

That is,

" Why ſhould I mention
" Antinous rais'd to heav'n, the favourite
" Of Hadrian, now diveſted of mortality,
" The Ganymede of this new Deity.
" He ſerves not now the Gods, or bears the cup,
" But ſits with Jove, amidſt th' ætherial banquet,
" And quaffs immortal nectar, and enſhrin'd,
" With his great husband, hears his vot'ries' prayers.

ANTIPATER, by country an Idumean [A], illuſtrious by his birth [B],

[A] By country an Idumean.] Euſebius makes him an Aſcalonite (1). A troop of robbers, ſays he, who had plundered the temple near Aſcalon, carried away Antipater with the reſt of their booty into Idumea, where he continued, becauſe his father was not able to pay his ranſom. What I ſhall mention in the following remark confutes this account. Photius ſeems here a little blameable. Giving an abſtract from Joſephus, he aſſures us, that Herod was ſon to Antipater, who had ſerved in the temple of Aſcalon: Ὁ τοῦ Ἀντιπάτρου τοῦ Ἀσκαλωνίτου τοῦ ἱεροδούλου (2). It is not in Joſephus that we find this; and yet where is the reader, who does not imagine, that all that Photius ſays is in the books, which he mentions? In another place (3), he ſays that Antipater was of Idumea, and of the city of Aſcalon, and a great enemy to Hyrcanus, out of friendſhip to Ariſtobulus. This laſt error ought not to be imputed to Photius; for all the ſe-

(1) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 6 and 7, ex Africano.

(2) Phot. Bib. num. 76. p. 168.

(3) Idem, ibid. num. 238. pag. 969.

birth [B], riches, and abilities, very prudently took advantage of the confuſions into which the diſcord between Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus had plunged Judea. Theſe were two brothers, who were engaged in a conteſt for the High Prieſt's office. Antipater warmly eſpouſed Hyrcanus's party, and engaged Aretas King of the Arabians, and after that Pompey General of the Roman armies ſo far in his favour, that Hyrcanus got poſſeſſion of it (a). Under his government Antipater obtained the abſolute direction of all affairs, which he always turned to the advantage of the Romans, whenever he had an opportunity. Upon this account he was honoured with ſeveral important commiſſions by the Generals of that Commonwealth, Scaurus, Gabinius, and Caſſius, who paid great regard to his counſels (b). He did a ſignal piece of ſervice to Julius Cæſar, during the war of Alexandria: he brought him proviſions and troops, and ſhewed a prodigious courage and reſolution; ſo that beſides the commendations he received, he obtained of Julius Cæſar the right of a Citizen of Rome, and the adminiſtration of Judea (c). The complaints of Antigonus (d) had no effect upon his intereſt. His application to buſineſs, and his great abilities, made him ſo conſiderable, that he was equally honoured as if he had been inveſted with the royal authority in form (e). The method which he took to ſecure himſelf againſt a change of fortune, by giving to one of his ſons the government of Jeruſalem, and to the other that of Galilee, with the command of the troops, gave juſt grounds to ſuſpect, that he had a deſign to prevent every perſon from being his ſuperior as well in name as in reality. A certain Jew named Malichus, who was full of ſuſpicions, took a reſolution to prevent the evil, and finding no better way than to diſpatch Antipater, poiſoned him (f). This action was attended with the moſt flagrant ingratitude in him; for Antipater had done a great many kindneſſes to him, and even ſaved his life (g). He left amongſt other children the famous Herod, who was afterwards King of the Jews (b).

(a) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 14. c. 2, & ſeq.

(b) Ibid. ſc. 9, & ſeq.

(c) Ibid. cap. 14 and 15.

(d) He was ſon to Ariſtobulus.

(e) Joſeph. Antiq. c. 17.

(f) Ibid. cap. 19.

(g) Ibid. cap. 18.

(b) His wife, named Cypris, was of a noble family in Arabia. Joſeph. de Bello Judaic. lib. 1. cap. 6.

quel of his diſcourſe ſhews, that he joins Antipater to Hyrcanus. The Publiſhers, and not the Author himſelf, are accountable for this; but he is chargeable with another miſtake. Aſcalon was not a city of Idumea; and after all it was not Joſephus, who ſaid that Antipater was of Aſcalon. Now Photius pretends here to give us an extract of him.

[B] Illuſtrious by his birth.] His father named Antipater was Governor of Idumea under Alexander Janneus, King of the Jews. Euſebius calls him Herod, and repreſents him as a ſervant belonging to the temple, and ſo poor, that he could not pay the ranſom of his ſon, who was taken priſoner by a band of robbers: Τοῦτον δ' Ἡρώδην τινὲς Ἀσκαλωνίτην τῶν περὶ τὸν νεὼν τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος ἱερόδουλον καλυμένον γεγονέναι (4): That is, "His father was Herod an Aſcalonite, one of the "ſervants of the temple of Apollo, which is at Aſca"lon." But learned men are agreed, that in this point Euſebius and Africanus, whom he copied, followed bad memoirs; and that we ought to pay greater regard to Joſephus, who aſſures us, that King Alexander, and his Queen, gave the government of Idumea to Antipater, who by a prodigious number of preſents procured the friendſhip of the Arabians and of the inhabitants of Gaza and Aſcalon (5). In another place Joſephus ſpeaking of Antipater the ſon, obſerves, that he was the chief perſon of Idumea as well on account of the antiquity of his family, as of his riches (6). Hegeſippus ſays of the ſame Antipater, that he was illuſtrious in his country upon the account of his anceſtors (7). It has been uſual in every Age to undervalue the birth of thoſe, who have been raiſed by fortune to the higheſt ranks and dignities (8). To conclude, the ambiguity of a paſſage in Joſephus has led ſome to imagine, that the grandfather of Herod was not named Antipater but Antipas.

(4) Euſeb. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 6. See Valeſius upon it.

(5) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 14. cap. 2.

(6) Idem, de Bello Judaic. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(7) Hegeſipp. de Excid. lib. 1. cap. 14.

(8) See remark [A] of the article TOUCHET

☞ ANTISTHENES, a Greek Philoſopher, and Founder of the Sect of the Cynics [A], was born at Athens. His father was of the ſame name with him, and his mother was a Thracian, as Laertius tells us (a), or as Plutarch (b), a Phrygian, in whoſe behalf, when he was reproached that ſhe was a foreigner (c), he anſwered, Cybele, the mother of the Gods, was a Phrygian. He likewiſe ridiculed the Athenians for boaſting of their being natives or Aborigines, telling them, that they were not in the leaſt more noble in that reſpect

(a) Lib. 6. in Vitâ Antiſthen.

(b) De Exilio.

(c) The Author of the Abregé des Vies des Anciens Philoſophes, Paris 1726 in 8vo, ſays that ſhe was a Slave.

[A] Founder of the ſect of the Cynics.] After the death of Socrates, of whom he learned the virtues of patience and apathy, he choſe the Cynoſarges, a Gymnaſium at Athens juſt without the gates, as the fitteſt place for his Lectures in Philoſophy (1). It was called ſo upon this occaſion. As Didymus the Athenian was ſacrificing in his own houſe, a white dog, that ſtood by, ſnatched the victim, and running away with it, laid it down in another place. Didymus being very uneaſy at this, conſulted the Oracle, which enjoined him to erect a temple in the place where the dog had laid down the victim, and to dedicate it to Hercules, which was called Cynoſarges, ὁ κυνὸς ἀργοῦ ναός; i. e. "the Tem"ple of the white Dog (2)." From hence Antiſthenes and his followers were called Cynics; and by thoſe, who diſapproved of their inſtitution, Dogs; and Antiſthenes himſelf was termed Ἁπλοῦν; i. e. "the "ſimple Dog (3)." His peculiar aſſertions were theſe; that virtue may be taught; that thoſe are noble, who are virtuous; that virtue was ſelf-ſufficient to felicity, and wanted nothing but a Socratic courage; that virtue conſiſts in actions, not requiring many words nor much learning, and is ſelf-ſufficient to wiſdom; for all other things have a reference to it. That infamy is good, and equal to labour, and that a wiſe man ought not to govern the Commonwealth according to the Laws in force, but according to virtue. That a wiſe man, in order to have iſſue, may make choice of a beautiful woman, and love her; for a wiſe man only knows what ought to be loved (4). Diocles (5) adds theſe: That nothing is new to a wiſe man. That a good man deſerves love. That virtuous perſons are friends. That we ought to procure ſuch aſſiſtants in war, as are powerful and juſt. That virtue is an armour, which can never be taken from us. That it is better with ſome few good men to oppoſe all the wicked, than with many wicked men to contend with the few good. Obſerve your enemies, for they firſt diſcover your faults. Eſteem a juſt man more than your neighbour. The ſame virtue belongs to man as to woman. Thoſe things are good, which are honeſt, and thoſe ill, which are diſhoneſt. Eſteem all ill things ſtrange to you. Wiſdom is the ſafeſt fortification, for it will neither fall away, nor can be betrayed. In theſe invincible things we ought to build forts by meditation. Aulus Gellius tells us (6), that he eſteemed pleaſure the greateſt evil; and therefore uſed to ſay, that he had rather be mad than addicted to pleaſure. Antiſthenes Socraticus ſummum malum [voluptatem] dicit: ejus namque hoc verbum eſt, μανείην μᾶλλον ἢ ἡσθείην. With regard to the particular ſect of the Cynics, if we conſider them, as Laertius obſerves (7), not as a mere form and inſtitution of life,

(1) Laert. in Vitâ Antiſthenis.

(2) Suidas.

(3) Laert. ubi ſupra.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Apud Laert. ubi ſupra.

(6) Noctes Attic. l. 9. c. 5.

(7) In Vitâ Metrocli.

reſpect than ſnails and locuſts (d). Nor had Socrates the leſs eſteem of him on that account; but on the contrary hearing that he had behaved himſelf with great reſolution in the battle at Tanagra; he ſaid of him, that he knew that two parents, who were both Athenians, could not poſſibly beget ſo excellent a perſon (e): He firſt heard Gorgias the Orator, for which reaſon his dialogues were written in a very florid and rhetorical manner. Hermippus in Laertius (f) ſays, that at the Iſthmian Games he uſed to make Orations in honour of, and Invectives againſt the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians; but afterwards perceiving that there was a great concourſe from thoſe cities there, he diſcontinued that cuſtom. At laſt the great reputation of Socrates excited his curioſity to go and hear him; and he was ſo charmed with his manner of teaching, that he adviſed all his ſcholars to become his fellow-diſciples under that Philoſopher. As he lived in the Piræum, he was obliged to go every day forty ſtadia to hear Socrates (g). While he was his ſcholar, he affected to wear a mean habit; and having one day turned the torn part of his garment outermoſt, Socrates obſerving it, ſaid to him, I ſee vanity through a hole (h); or as Ælian expreſſes it (i), Do you uſe this oſtentation before us too? Upon the death of Socrates he was the occaſion of baniſhment to Anytus, and of death to Melitus, who had been the great enemies of that Philoſopher; for ſome young men of Pontus being invited to Athens by the fame of Socrates, met with Antiſthenes, who carried them to Anytus, telling them that he was much wiſer than Socrates; upon which thoſe who were preſent, with great indignation, drove Anytus out of the city, and put Melitus to death (k). We have a great many Apophthegms of his [B]. Laertius tells us, that there were ten tomes

(d) Laertius, ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid. Mr. Stanley in his Lives of the Philoſophers, Part 7. p. 404, quotes Laert. in Vitâ Socrat. for this particular, which is a miſtake.

(f) Ubi ſupra.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Idem, ibid.

(i) Var. Hiſt. lib. 9. cap. 35.

(k) Laert. ubi ſupra.

life, but as a true ſect of Philoſophy, their character was on. Being aſked by a man what kind of wife he ſhould take, he replied, that if he choſe a beautiful one, ſhe would be common (11); if an ugly one, ſhe would be a torment (12). Hearing that Plato ſpoke ill of him, he ſaid that it was like a King to do well, and be ill ſpoken of. When he was initiated into the Orphic Ceremonies, the Prieſt telling him, that they, who were initiated into thoſe rites, were intitled to many excellent things in the next world: Why then, ſays he, do you not die? Being reproached that both his parents were not free; Neither, ſays he, were they Wreſtlers, and yet I am a Wreſtler. When he was demanded, why he had ſo few diſciples, he replied, that he beat them away with a ſilver ſtaff. Seeing an adulterer running away, he ſaid, Unhappy man, how much danger might you have eſcaped for one half-penny? He ſaid, according to Hecaton, that it is better to fall among ravens, than flatterers; for thoſe only devour the dead, but theſe the living. Being demanded what was moſt happy for man, he anſwered, to die in proſperity. To a friend complaining, that he had loſt his notes; You ſhould have writ them, ſays he, in your mind, and not in your book. He obſerved, that as ruſt conſumes iron, ſo does envy the envious man. He ſaid, that thoſe, who would never die, muſt live piouſly and juſtly; and that Cities were then periſhing, when they could not diſtinguiſh the good from the bad (13). When he heard that he had been commended by ſome wicked men, he ſaid, that he was troubled, to think what ill he had done. He ſaid, that the cohabitation of brethren, who agree, is firmer than any wall. That we ought to carry ſuch proviſion with us, as if we ſhould happen to be ſhipwrecked, we might ſwim away with. He anſwered thoſe who reproached him for converſing with wicked perſons, that the Phyſicians did ſo with their patients, yet are not ſick themſelves. He ſaid, that it is abſurd to ſeparate the corn from the weeds, and in war to reject thoſe, who are unſerviceable; yet in a Commonwealth not to extirpate the vicious. Being asked what he had gained by Philoſophy, he anſwered, to converſe with himſelf. At a feaſt to one, who ſaid to him, Sing, he replied, Do you then pipe. Diogenes demanding a gown, he bid him double his cloak. Being asked what learning is moſt neceſſary, he anſwered, To unlearn bad things. He adviſed thoſe, who were provoked by reproaches, to bear it with greater fortitude, than if ſtones were caſt at them. He ridiculed Plato, as being proud; and ſeeing at a ſhow a horſe walking in a ſtately manner, he turned to that Philoſopher, and told him, that he would have acted the part of that horſe very well. He ſaid this, becauſe Plato at the ſame time had commended the horſe. Another time viſiting Plato, as he lay ſick, and looking into the baſon, in which he had vomited, I ſee here, ſays he, the choler, but not the pride. He adviſed the Athenians to elect aſſes to be horſes, which they thinking to be abſurd; And yet, ſaid he, you chooſe thoſe for Generals, who have

(11) Κοπρίνα.

(12) Πονηρά.

(13) Laert. ubi ſupra, and Stanley, ubi ſupra, p. 405.

(8) See Stanley's Lives of the Philoſophers, Part 7. p. 404. edit. 2. 1687.

What good and ill
Our houſes fill.

They likewiſe rejected the liberal Sciences; and therefore Antiſthenes ſaid, that they, who had acquired temperance, ought not to ſtudy any learning, leſt they ſhould be diverted by other things. They took away alſo Geometry, Muſic, and other ſciences of that kind. And therefore Diogenes ſaid to one, who ſhewed him a watch, that it was an excellent invention againſt ſupping too late; and to one, who entertained him with Muſic;

Wiſdom the greateſt cities does protect;
But Muſic cannot one poor houſe direct.

They affirmed with the Stoics, that to be happy was to live according to virtue, as Antiſthenes aſſerted in his Hercules; for, as Mr. Stanley obſerves (9), there is a kind of affinity between theſe two Sects; and therefore the Stoics affirmed the Cyniſm to be the neareſt way to virtue; and in that manner lived Zeno the Cittiean. Their diet was ſlender: Their food only ſuch as might ſatisfy nature; their cloaks ſordid. They deſpiſed riches, glory, and nobility. Some of them fed only upon herbs and cold water, living under ſuch ſhelters as they could find, or in tubs, as Diogenes did, who affirmed, that it was the privilege of the Gods to want nothing; and that thoſe, who ſtand in need of the feweſt things, come neareſt to the Gods. They affirmed alſo, according to Antiſthenes in his Hercules, that virtue may be acquired by learning, and that it cannot be loſt. That a wiſe man deſerves to be loved, and never ſins, and is a friend to ſuch as are like him, and truſts nothing to fortune. They took away with Ariſto the Chian all things between virtue and vice.

(9) Ubi ſupra.

[B] We have a great many Apophthegms of his.] He firſt defined ſpeech thus; Speech is that, which declares that which is or was. To a young man of Pontus, who came to be his diſciple; and asked him what he muſt bring with him, he anſwered, Βιβλιαρίου καινοῦ, καὶ γραφείου καινοῦ, καὶ πινακιδίου καινοῦ; i. e. "A new book, a new pen, and a new tablet; where the word καινοῦ is equivocal, and ſignifies, when it is divided, καὶ νοῦ, wit. The Author of the Abregé des vies des anciens philoſophes (10) repreſents this in a different manner, and tells us that Antiſthenes returned this anſwer to the father of the young man, who asked him what his ſon had occaſion for; and that he intimated by that reply, that the mind of the youth ſhould be a mere Tabula raſa, without any impreſſi-tomes of his works [C]. The great number of these was ridiculed by Timon, who, as the same author informs us, called him an ingenious trifler. Among the Socratic Epistles there is one under his name [D]. He was a man of great austerity, and lived in a very severe manner. He desired the Gods rather to inflict madness upon him, than give him an attachment to sensual pleasures. He treated his scholars with prodigious severity; and when he was asked the reason of it, he said, that the Physicians used their patients in the same manner. He first doubled his old sordid cloak, and wore it alone without a coat, as Diocles in Laertius affirms. He carried likewise a staff and satchel. Neanthes quoted by the same author says, that he was the first who used a single cloak. Theopompus (l) commends him above all the disciples of Socrates, as a man of so agreeable and charming a conversation, that he could draw over any person to whatever he pleased. And this Laertius tells us appeared likewise from his books, and the Symposium of Xenophon. He died of sickness. As he lay upon his death-bed, Diogenes came to him, and asked him, whether he wanted a friend. Another time he came to him with a dagger; and Antisthenes crying out, Who will free me from this pain? he shewed him the dagger, saying, This will. Antisthenes replied, that he meant from his pain, and not from his life (m). It is probable that he boasted that Hercules was the first inventor of the Cynic Philosophy; for Ausonius the Poet represents him as speaking to that purpose in one of his Epigrams (n). And we find in Laertius, that he proved labour to be good from the examples of Hercules the Grecian, and Cyrus the Barbarian. There were three other persons of this name, one a Philosopher of the school of Heraclitus; another an Ephesian; and the third an Historian of Rhodes (o).

(10) P. 265.

(l) Apud Laert. ubi supra.

(m) Laert. ubi supra.

(n) See Abregé des Vies des Anciens Philosoph. p. 273.

(o) Laert. ubi supra.

nothing to recommend them but your votes. Being told, that many praised him, he asked what ill he had done. Being asked by a person, what he should do to be a good and honest man; he replied, by learning of intelligent men, that the vices, which he had, were to be avoided. Hearing a luxurious manner of life highly extolled, Let the sons of my enemies, says he, live delicately. To a young man, who desired that his statue might be made handsomer than himself; Tell me, says he, if the brass itself could speak, what you think it would boast of? The other answered, Of its handsome figure. Are you not ashamed then, replies he, to be proud of being like a dumb thing? A young man of Pontus promised to supply him, as soon as his ship came home laden with salt-fish; upon which he took him to a woman, who sold meal, and filling his satchel, departed: She calling to him for the money; This young man, says he, will pay you as soon as his ship comes home. Whenever he saw a woman richly dressed, he went to her house, and bid her husband bring out his horse and arms, that if he were so provided, he might allow her those freedoms, being better able to justify the injuries they occasioned; otherwise that he should take off her rich habit. He said, that neither a feast is pleasant without company, nor riches without virtue (14). That those pleasures, which come not in at the door, must not go out at the door, but by incision or purging with Hellebore (15), or by starving (16), in order by that means to punish those surfeits, which we have incurred by a short pleasure. That whoever fears others is a slave, tho' he know it not himself (17). That no covetous man can be a good man, or a King, or a freeman (18). Being demanded what a feast is, he answered, that it was the occasion of surfeits (19). He said that we ought to aim at such pleasures as follow labour, not at those, which go before labour (20). That common executioners are better than tyrants; for the former put only guilty men to death, but the latter the innocent (21). That we ought to wish our enemies all good things but fortitude; for what they possess would fall into the hands of the conqueror, not the owner (22). That we must not contradict again the man, who contradicts us, but instruct him; for a madman is not cured by another's growing mad likewise (23). That a man should always have in readiness his wits or a rope (24). Seeing the Thebans extremely elated with their success at the battle at Leuctra, he said, that they were like boys, who triumph, when they have beaten their masters (25). Hearing a Piper commended, he said, But he is an ill man; for else he would never have been so good a Piper (26).

(14) Stobæus, Serm. 1.
(15) Idem, Serm. 38.
(16) Id. Serm. 44.
(17) Id. Serm. 50.
(18) Id. Serm. 53.
(19) Id. Serm. 87.
(20) Id. Serm. 117.
(21) Id. Serm. 148.
(22) Id. Serm. 171.
(23) Id. Serm. 212.
(24) Plutarch, de Stoic. Contrarietatib.
(25) Id. in Vitâ Lycurg.
(26) In Vitâ Periz.

[C] Ten tomes of his work.] The same Author mentions the titles of them. The first tome contained these. Of Speech, or of Characters. Ajax, of the Speech of Ajax. Ulysses, or of Ulysses. An Apology for Orestes. Of Lawyers, Isegraphe, or Defias, or Isocrates. Against Isocrates's Ἀμάντυρον. The second tome contained these: Of the Nature of Animals. Of Procreation of Children, or of Marriage, Erotic. Of Sophists, Physiognomic. Of Justice and Fortitude, Protreptic 1, 2, 3. Of Theognis. The third tome contained these: Of Good. Of Fortitude. Of Law or Policy. Of Law, or of the beautiful and just. Of Freedom and Servitude. Of Faith. Of a Guardian, or of trusting. Of Victory, Oeconomics. The fourth volume contains these: Cyrus. Hercules the Greater, or of Strength. The fifth tome; Cyrus, or of a Kingdom. Aspasia. The sixth tome; Truth. Of Dissertation, Antilogic. Sathon, of Contradiction 3. Of Dialectic. The seventh tome; Of Discipline, or of Names, 5. Of Dying. Of Life and Death. Of things after Death. Of the use of Names, or Eristic. Of Interrogation and Answer. Of Opinion and Science 4. Of Nature 2. Interrogation concerning Nature 2. Opinions, or the Eristic. Problems concerning Learning. The eighth tome contained these: Of Music. Of Interpreters. Of Homer. Of Injustice and Impiety. Of Chalcas. Of the Spy. Of Pleasure. The ninth tome; Of the Odysseis. Of Minerva's Wand, or of Telemachus, Helena, and Penelope. Of Proteus. The Cyclops, or of Ulysses. Of the use of Wine, or of Drunkenness, or of the Cyclops. Of Circe. Of Amphiaraus. Of Ulysses and Penelope. Of the Dog. The tenth tome contained these: Hercules or Midas. Hercules, or of Prudence, or of Strength. The Master or Lover. The Masters or Spies. Menexenus, or of Government; Alcibiades. Archelaus, or of a Kingdom.

[D] Among the Socratic Epistles there is one under his name.] We shall give it in the learned Mr. Stanley's translation (27). "ANTISTHENES to ARISTIPPUS. It is not the part of a Philosopher to "live with tyrants, and to waste time at Sicilian "feasts, but rather be content with a little in his "own Country. But you esteem it the greatest excellence of a virtuous person to be able to acquire "much wealth, and to have powerful friends, riches "are not good; neither if they were in themselves "good, are they such, being thus obtained; nor can "a multitude of unlearned persons, especially tyrants, "be true friends. Wherefore I would counsel you "to leave Syracusa and Sicily; but if, as some report, you are in love with pleasure, and aim at "such things, as beseem not wise persons, go to "Anticyra, and cure yourself by drinking Hellebore, "for that is much better for you than the wine of "Dionysius. This causeth madness, that assuageth "it. So that as health and discretion differ from "sickness and folly, so much shall you be better than "you are in these things, which you now enjoy. "Farewell." T.

(27) See his Lives of the Philosophers, pag. 407.

ANTONIA. See the Article immediately preceding ANTONIUS.

ANTONIANO

ANTONIANO (SILVIO) a Cardinal of great learning, raiſed himſelf from a low fortune by his merit; for he was of mean birth, and his parents were ſo far from being able to ſupport him in his ſtudies, that they wanted the charity of others. It is ſaid that he was born out of lawful marriage; but Joſeph Caſtalio, who wrote his life, has ſhewn the contrary (a). However that be, he was born at Rome in the year 1540 [A]. He made ſuch a quick and ſurprizing progreſs in his ſtudies, that one can ſcarce credit what is reported of it. At the age of ten years he wrote verſes [B] upon any ſubject which was propoſed to him, which were ſo proper and excellent, though pronounced ex tempore, that even a man of genius could not have compoſed as good without a great deal of care and time. There was an experiment made of this at the table of the Cardinal of Piſa, when he made a feaſt one day for ſeveral Cardinals. Alexander Farneſe, taking a noſegay, gave it to this youth, and ordered him to preſent it to him of all the company who ſhould come to be Pope. He preſented it to the Cardinal of Medicis, and made an elogium upon him in verſe. This Cardinal, who ſome years after was Pope under the name of Pius IV, imagined that all this was a contrivance, and that the Poem had been prepared before with a great deal of art, in order to ridicule him; ſo that he ſeemed very much diſpleaſed; but they proteſted to him with an oath, that it was an ex tempore performance, and deſired him to put the boy upon a trial. He did ſo, and was convinced of the extraordinary talents of the youth, who explained upon the ſpot in elegant verſe every ſubject, which was propoſed to him [C]. The Duke of Ferrara coming to Rome to congratulate Marcellus II upon his being raiſed to the Pontificate, was ſo charmed with the genius of Antoniano, that he carried him to Ferrara [D], where he furniſhed him with excellent maſters to inſtruct him in all the Sciences. From thence he was ſent for by PIUS IV, who recollecting the adventure of the Noſegay, as ſoon as he was raiſed to St. Peter's Chair, wanted to know what was become of the young Poet. When he had found him out, he brought him to Rome, and gave him an honourable poſt in his palace. After that he made him Profeſſor of Polite Literature in the College at Rome. Antoniano diſcharged this function with ſo much reputation, that on the day when he began to explain the Oration pro Marco Marcello, he had for his auditors not only a prodigious number of people, but even five and twenty Cardinals. He was afterwards choſen Rector of the ſame College; and after the death of Pius IV, being poſſeſſed with a ſpirit of devotion, he joined himſelf to Philip Neri, and accepted the office of Secretary to the Sacred College, which was offered him by Pius V. He executed this for five and twenty years, and procured himſelf the character of an honeſt and able man. He refuſed a Biſhoprick which Gregory XIV would have given him, but not the office of Secretary to the Briefs, which was offered him by Clement VIII, who made him his Chamberlain, and afterwards a Cardinal. It is reported, that Cardinal Alexander de Montalto, who had behaved a little too haughtily to Antoniano, ſaid, when he ſaw him promoted

(a) Scripſit Silvii Cardinalis Antoniani Vitam, quem tum rationibus, tum publicarum tabularum teſtimoniis ab eorum calumniis vindicare conatus eſt, qui illum à parente minus juſta uxore genitum aſſerebant. Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I. p. 167.

[A] He was born at Rome in the year 1540.] Nicius Erythræus tells us he was born at Rome: Romæ, humili loco . . . ortus (1); but le Toppi makes him a native of Caſtelli in Abruzzo, and quotes an Inſcription, written by Mutius Panza, where he is ſaid to be ex Caſtellorum oppido oriundus (2). This may mean only that his father was of that place. However that be, I conclude that he was born in the year 1540, from this, that he died, according to father Oldoïni, the 16th of Auguſt 1603, aged ſixty three years (3). Nicius Erythræus does not mention in what year of the Century he died; but only that it was in his Climacteric of ſixty three years. Mr. de la Rochepozai in his Nomenclator Cardinalium places his death on the 16th of Auguſt 1604. I chooſe rather to follow Father Oldoïni.

(1) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. 1. p. 36.

(2) Toppi, Bib. Napolet. p. 283.

(3) Oldoïni, Athen. Roman. p. 605.

[B] At the age of ten years he made Verſes.] Father Strada, who has inſerted in one of his Prolufions, with a great deal of elegance, the account of his adventure, ſays that Antoniano was not then full twelve years of age (4).

(4) Fam. Strada, Prolus. Acad. 3. lib. 2.

[C] He made . . . Verſes upon the ſpot upon every ſubject, which was propoſed to him.] Father Strada tells us, that as the Cardinal of Medicis was thinking upon a ſubject to propoſe to him, the clock, which was in the hall, ſtruck; which was the occaſion of his propoſing a clock for the ſubject of his Verſes. This Author quotes thoſe, which he ſuppoſes Antoniano made ex tempore, and adds, that the Cardinal of Trent rewarded him with a gold chain.

[D] The Duke of Ferrara would have him at Ferrara.] Antoniano pronounced three ſeveral Orations, which were printed (5) with thoſe which he ſpoke at Rome: this inclines me to think, that he was Profeſſor at Ferrara. Nicius Erythræus mentions only the Sciences, which were taught Antoniano there: why were not thoſe mentioned, which he taught? Theſe are not things, which ſhould be ſuppreſſed for fear of prolixity. I have not been able yet to conſult the Life of this Cardinal, written by Joſeph Caſtalio, where we have undoubtedly an account in what ſtation he was at Ferrara, and what year he died, with many other particulars. Much leſs could I ev r find a book, which Mr. Conrart ſent to Mr. de Balzac. It was called Italian Diſcourſes of the oratorical Philoſopher (6). Mr. de Balzac had no opinion of them: It is true, ſays he (7), that the Elogium of Cardinal d'Oſſat, and that of Cardinal Silvio Antoniano, are two pieces of pretty good ſenſe, and in which the Author has not ill imitated the compariſons of Plutarch's Lives. The long invective, which he makes againſt the Nobility, is the greateſt effort of his genius. I have obſerved ſeveral fine ſtrokes, and ſomething of his own invention, beſides thoſe, which he borrowed from others, and particularly from the Oration of Caius Marius in the Jugurthine war. I believe however, that without doing injury to his ſubject he might have ſhortened his digreſſion. That common place, which he has extended ſo much, and repreſented with ſuch labour and pomp, ſhould not have been touched upon but by the bye. Beſides by this means he raiſed himſelf very powerful and dangerous enemies. He had no occaſion to diſoblige all the Nobility in the world, to prove that it is no fault to be the ſon of an artificer or countryman.

(5) By the care of Joſeph Caſtalio in 1610.

(6) See the Diſſertations at the end of his Socrate Chrêtien, p. 10.

(7) Ibid. p. 47.

" Jerom Ruſcelli in the 7th chapter of his Rima-
" rio tells us wonderful things of the Talent, which
" Silvio Antoniano, whom he erroneouſly calls Anto- " nio, had at ex tempore verſification. He gives a " proof of it, which was ſhewn at Venice in the preſence
" of the Queen of Poland *, Cardinal Trivulcio, and
" the Cardinal of Augsbourg. Antoniano was not " then ſixteen years of age. The Princes d'Eſt de" tained him at Ferrara, where he read publick Lec" tures, as the ſame Ruſcelli aſſures us in the paſſage
" above quoted." This note was communicated by Mr. de la Monnoie.

* Bonna Sforza, who in the year 1555 left Poland to retire to Bari in Apulia.

promoted to the purple, that henceforward he would never deſpiſe a man of the caſſock and little band, how low and contemptible ſoever he might appear, ſince it might happen, that he, whom he had deſpiſed, might become not only his equal, but even his ſuperior. Antoniano killed himſelf by too intenſe labour: he ſpent whole nights in writing letters, which occaſioned the ſickneſs of which he died in the ſixty third year of his age. He wrote with ſo great eaſe and fluency, that he never made a blot or raſure; and it is ſaid he preſerved the flower of his virginity his whole life (b). See in one of my remarks what relates to his works [E]. Cardinal Bentivoglio will furniſh me with a conſiderable ſupplement to this article [F]. I find that Antoniano was one of the managers in the diſpute, which was raiſed concerning the precedency of the Patriarchs [G].

(b) Ex Jan. Nicio Erythræ. Pinacoth. 1. p. 36.

[E] What relates to his works is as follows.] We have theſe books written by him, De Chriſtianâ Puerorum Educatione; Diſſertatio de Obſcuritate Solis in morte Chriſti; De Succeſſione Apoſtolicâ; De Stylo Eccleſiaſtico, ſeu de conſcribendâ Eccleſiaſticâ Hiſtoriâ; De Primatu S. Petri; Lucubrationes in Rhetoricam Ariſtotelis & in Orationes Ciceronis; ſeveral pieces in Verſe, ſome Sermons, Notes and Prefaces upon the Romance of Achilles Tatius, and the Terence of Gabriel Faernus (8), a great number of Letters, &c. It is ſaid that he had a ſhare in the Catechiſm of the Council of Trent (9). With regard to his Letters, they are Apoſtolical Briefs, which he wrote while he was Secretary. I ſhall ſay ſomething of them in the following remark. They are ranked amongſt the Letters, whence the Writers of Secret Hiſtory ought to take their extracts (10). The other ſources of that kind of writing are the Letters of the Cardinals Bembo and Sadolet, thoſe of Peter Martyr, &c. We may obſerve, that his book de Chriſtianâ Puerorum Educatione, written in Italian at the deſire of Cardinal Charles Borromeo, was printed at Verona, by the care of Auguſtino Valero, Biſhop of that place and Cardinal (11).

(8) Nomenclat. Cardinal. p. 178.
(9) See Colomies, Biblioth. choiſie. p. 36.
(10) Varillas, Preface des Anecdotes de Florence.
(11) Poſſev. Apparat. Sacr. tom. 2. p. 405, 443.

[F] Cardinal Bentivoglio will furniſh me with a conſiderable Supplement to this Article.] He ſays, that it was ſtill uncertain whether Antoniano was born at Rome; but there was no doubt that he was educated there from his infancy (12). He was placed by Pius IV in the ſervice of Cardinal Borromeo his nephew; he was Latin Secretary to that Cardinal, attended him to Milan, and returned with him to Rome. He was choſen Secretary to the ſacred College; and filled that poſt with great reputation. He was admitted into the ſtricteſt confidence with Clement VIII, whoſe Briefs he wrote in ſo elegant a manner, that this Pope had no reaſon to envy Leo X his Sadolets and Bembo's. He introduced with a great propriety ſeveral paſſages of Scripture. But he was cenſured for this by a Critic, who was too rigid, and ſaid, that this manner of writing made ſome of the Pope's Letters ſavour more of the Cloiſter, than the Court of Rome, and repreſented the character of a Preacher, rather than that of a ſovereign Pontiff. Che percio, alcuno di loro ſapeſſero più di clauſtro regolare, che di Corte Eccleſiaſtica, e repreſentaſſero quaſi più la perſona d'un Predicatore, che d'un Pontefice (13). He laughed at this criticiſm, and replied, that to judge properly of things, there were not too many expreſſions of Scripture in his Letters; that on the contrary, he thought they were not full enough of them, conſidering the character of him, who ſpoke in them, which was that of the ſovereign Paſtor of the Church; and conſidering likewiſe that they were not profane Letters, where the gaiety of thought and expreſſion, which is uſed upon ſecular occaſions, might be employed. Anzi che alui pareva, che più toſto mancaſſero in queſta parte, havuto reguardo all' eſſere i Brevi Apoſtolici ſcritti dal ſupremo Paſtor della chieſa, e non lettere profane, che haveſſero a luſſureggiare con ſenſi e parole tratte dalle Secrittarie de Principi temporali (14). He adds, that in the Briefs of Sadolet and Bembo there was not that decorum obſerved, which the Papal Dignity neceſſarily required; and that there are ſome Briefs, wherein Bembo, thro' an affectation of writing pure Latin, ſinks not only into a profane and ſecular manner of expreſſion, but even into Paganiſm itſelf. Antoniano in his laſt ſickneſs was viſited by Clement VIII, and received the Apoſtolical Benediction. He was a man of modeſty, an agreeable converſation, and of a prudence, which even the Spirit of a Court could never pervert (15). He had been in ſeveral Conclaves, and ſpoke of them with a peculiar pleaſure, not without making a great many ſolid reflections upon the vanity of human affairs, Men, ſaid he, fatigue themſelves with a thouſand uneaſy cares to gain their ends; but the Providence of God almoſt always appears ſuperior to them all. Per occaſione d'eſſere ſtato Secretario del ſacro Collegio tant' anni, s'era trovato egli in multi Conclavi, e di quei ſucceſſi diſcorreva con guſto particolare, e monſtrava ſpecialemente in quanti modi vi ſi affatticaſſe l'induſtria humana, ed in quanti vi appariſſe e vi prevaleſſe ordinariamente la Providenza Divina (16). He meant without doubt that the beſt concerted intrigues, and thoſe, which have been managed with the greateſt care and attention, fail of ſucceſs in the Conclave, on account of ſome unforeſeen conjunctures of affairs. If he meant, by this, that the influence of Providence appears in a peculiar manner in the Aſſemblies, where the Popes are choſen, he is much miſtaken; for in all the Courts of the world, we may obſerve, that the moſt politic ſchemes ſucceed, or are diſconcerted, by certain fortuitous circumſtances of affairs, which may convince us of the truth of that proverb, Man propoſes, God diſpoſes.

(12) Bentivoglio Memorie overo Diario, Capitolo vii. p. 109. edit. d'Amſtel. nell' an. 1648.
(13) Ibid. pag. 111.
(14) Ibid. Capitolo vii. p. 112.
(15) Ibid. pag. 113.
(16) Ibid. pag. 152.

[G] He was one of the managers in the diſpute, which was raiſed concerning the Precedency of Patriarchs.] Read this paſſage, which I have taken from a Letter written by Perenda from Rome the 11th of December 1589. La Cauſa della precedenza patriarcale non è ancor venuta à fine, & ſe tratta tuttavia nella congregatione delle ceremonie. Si ſcrive, & le ſcritture vanno per manus, & ſi come diſſi già il parer della congregatione è contra la pretendenza de gli Arcivescovi e de Patriarchi. Solamente l'Antoniano ſoſtien queſta parte, & ſcrive, & ſtà ſaldo. Sarà un brav' huomo, ſe ſarà teſta tanto che baſti, havendo da contraſtar con Monſignor Illuſtriſſimo Geſualdo (17). That is, "The cauſe relating to the Precedency of "Patriarchs is not yet concluded, but is ſtill de"bating in the Congregation of the Ceremonies. "Writings are handed about; and it is ſaid the "judgment of the Congregation is againſt the pre"tenſions of the Archbiſhops and Patriarchs. An"toniano alone defends the contrary ſide of the que"ſtion, and writes upon it, and continues firm. "He will ſhew himſelf a brave man, if he makes a "ſufficient ſtand, having the moſt illuſtrious Monſig"nor Geſualdo to contend with."

(17) Lett. di Gio. Franceſco Peranda, 1 Part. p. 224. edit. di Venet. nel 1604.

☞ ANTONIDES [A] VANDER GOES (JOHN) an eminent Dutch Poet, was born at Goes in Zealand the third of April 1647. His parents were Anabaptiſts, and in mean circumſtances. Antonides was four years old when his father and mother went to

[A] ANTONIDES.] His father's Chriſtian name being Anthony (in Dutch Antoni) he was firſt called John Antoniſz, that is, John ſon of Anthony, acording to the cuſtom, which was formerly in uſe in ſeveral countries in Europe; but a certain learned man (1), foreſeeing the future glory of our Poet, adviſed him to alter his ſurname into that of Antonides, and to add to it the name of the city in which he was born (2). Thus our Poet came to have a name with a Greek termination. His mother's name was Magdalen Stenaarts, but we know nothing of her family.

(1) We are not told who that learned man was.
(2) Hoogſtraaten, Life of Antonides.

to live at Amſterdam, where in the ninth year of his age he began his ſtudies under the direction of Hadrian Junius, and James Cocceius. Abraham de Graaf, a famous Arithmetician, taught him Arithmetick; but his greateſt paſſion was for Poetry, which he in a manner inherited from his father, who had made ſeveral pretty good pieces of Poetry, moſt of them on the marriage of his friends. Antonides firſt exerciſed himſelf in Latin Poetry; he read carefully Virgil, Horace, and the other ancient Poets, and took a delight in comparing them with the modern, as Grotius, Heinſius, &c. By this means he perfected his taſte for Poetry, improved his ſtyle, and enriched his mind with noble ideas. And though the Latin tongue well enough ſuited his poetic genius, yet the glory which the famous Vondel, and before him Sir Peter Cornelius Hooſd had acquired by their Dutch Poems, raiſed his emulation, and animated him to tread in the ſame path. He firſt attempted to tranſlate ſome pieces of Ovid, Horace, and other Ancients; and having formed his taſte and judgment by theſe excellent patterns, he undertook one of the moſt difficult taſks in Poetry, which was a Tragedy entitled Trazil, or The Invaſion of China [B]. Some time after, the peace being concluded between Great Britain and Holland in the year 1667, Antonides wrote a piece entitled Bellona aan band; i. e. "Bellona chained," which contains ſeveral hundred verſes, and is ſo elegant, that the famous Vondel confeſſed he would readily adopt it as his own. The applauſe with which this piece was received, excited him to try his genius in ſomething more conſiderable. He thought it would be very glorious for him to ſhew, that thoſe are miſtaken, who think it is impoſſible for any modern, not only to excel, but even to equal the Ancients in Epic Poetry. He undertook a Poem, which he entitled the River Y (a). We ſhall give an account of that Poem in the remark [C]. Antonides's parents had brought him up to the buſineſs of Apothecary; but his great genius for Poetry ſoon gained him the eſteem and friendſhip of ſeveral perſons

(a) In Dutch De Y-ſtroom. The Y is not properly a River, but rather an Arm of the Zuiderſee, and ſeparates South-Holland from North-Holland; neither does the Dutch word Stroom, properly ſignify a River, but in general any great collection of Water, as a Lake, &c.

[B] A Tragedy entitled Trazil, or The invaſion of China.] Antonides was ſo modeſt, as not to permit, that this piece ſhould be publiſhed. Vondel, who was then engaged in a ſubject of the like nature, which was taken alſo from ſome event that happened in China, read Antonides's Tragedy, and was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he declared, that if the Author would not print it, he would take ſome paſſages out of it, and make uſe of them in his own Tragedy, which he did accordingly (3). It was certainly very much to the glory of Antonides, to have written what might be adopted by ſo great a Poet, as Vondel was acknowledged to be by all good judges.

(3) Hoogſtraaten, ibid.

[C] An account of his Poem on the river Y.] It is well known that the city of Amſterdam is built on the banks of that river, or rather lake, and that a vaſt number of ſhips conſtantly ride in that harbour. The deſcription of that lake is the ſubject of the Poem, which is divided into four books. In the firſt the Author makes a very pompous deſcription of all that is remarkable on that bank of the Y, on which Amſterdam is built. He neglects no ornament that is capable of embelliſhing and diverſifying his ſubject. When he ſpeaks of a certain bridge, called the New-Bridge, he repreſents it as the ſeat of fame, and the reſort of the news-mongers; moſt of whom are themſelves the authors of the news which they tell; and publiſh them only, to make the ſtocks riſe and fall, according to their own private intereſt. He deſcribes the chief of theſe news-mongers, ſurrounded with a multitude of attentive hearers, whom he compares to the Court of Dido, in Virgil, flocking round the Trojan Hero, when he related the dreadful calamities of his deſolate country. A little after this, the Poet endeavours to account for the origin of a certain ſhelf of ſand, called Pampus, over which the ſhips muſt be drawn by engines: but his fiction on this occaſion ſeems very odd and unworthy of ſuch a genius as Antonides. He feigns that a diſpute ariſing between the God of the Y and the God of the Amſtel (4), the two Deities prepared to engage in battle; but juſt as they were going to fight, Neptune, to aſſwage the fury of the Y, caſt a vaſt quantity of mud and ſand into his mouth, which threw him into a terrible faintneſs, till he had vomited it up again. This mud and ſand mixed together, produced the Sand-ſhelf we have mentioned. Antonides is much happier in the deſcription he gives us of that part of Amſterdam, which is called the New Iſland. He compares the quick manner in which the buildings were raiſed there, to the manner in which the walls of Thebes raiſed of themſelves at the ſound of Amphion's lyre: But, continues he, this iſle, with all its ſtately palaces, which one day will ſink by their own weight, ſhall not be known to poſterity, but by the fame and glory it ſhall receive of having been Admiral De Ruiter's dwelling-place. He then takes an opportunity to celebrate that great man's praiſes; and afterwards continues to deſcribe the prodigious buildings, which are upon the Y; and ſpeaking of the Weſt-India houſe, relates the wars, in which that Company has been engaged againſt the Portugueze. He then comes to the ſtore-houſe belonging to the Admiralty, and makes an admirable but dreadful picture of all the inſtruments uſed in war. Then proceeding to the Eaſt-India houſe, a pompous building, he obſerves that it belonged in former times to the greateſt Monarchs only to build a Capitol, or an Eſcurial, but here even Merchants dare to raiſe up to the ſkies a building far ſuperior to the moſt magnificent Palaces. The power and greatneſs of this Company of Merchants might perhaps be called in queſtion, were it not for theſe witneſſes, that the Eaſt ſubmitted to their laws, and they raiſed this prodigious building, which receives the light thro' above three thouſand and three hundred windows, and ſurpaſſes all the pyramids and amphitheatres of antiquity.

(4) A little river, from which the city of Amſterdam takes its name.

In the ſecond book the Poet opens to himſelf a larger field, and takes into his deſign the whole univerſe, as one of his admirers expreſſes himſelf. He begins with the praiſes of Navigation, and deſcribes the large Fleets, that cover the Y as an immenſe foreſt, and thence go to every part of the world to bring home whatever may ſatisfy the neceſſity, luxury, or pride of men. On this occaſion he mentions the bold enterprizes of Admiral Heemskerk, who endeavoured to find a paſſage to the Eaſt Indies thro' the North. He then deſcribes the misfortunes which the riches of the Indies have drawn upon their inhabitants. Here he introduces Attabaliba, who being pleaſed to find that the Dutch are the enemies of thoſe, who have butchered him and his ſubjects, relates to them in very ſtrong terms the cruelties he and his people ſuffered from the Spaniards. The Poet afterwards borrows Pegaſus from the Muſes, and follows the Fleet into the Indies; he flyes over the different countries, which furniſh the Fleet with all their precious merchandiſes, and deſcribes in a lofty ſtyle the countries themſelves, as well as what they produce. Having given the reader an exalted idea of the Dutch trade in the remote parts of the world, he gives a noble repreſentation of the power of the Eaſt-India Company, by deſcribing a ſea-fight, in which the army of the Company gains a compleat victory over the inhabitants of Macaſſar. Thence the Poet returns to the Y, and gives us a deſcription of ſeveral countries over which he flies in his way home. He enters then into a particular relation of the ſeveral valuable ſons of diſtinction, and eſpecially of Mr. Buiſero, one of the Lords of the Admiralty at Amſterdam, and a great lover of Poetry. He put our Poet in a condition of purſuing his ſtudies at the Univerſity of Utrecht, and generouſly maintained him there, till he had taken his degree of Doctor of Phyſick; and then this noble Mecænas gave him a place in the Admiralty, that he might have more leiſure to follow the Muſes. In the year 1678 he married Suſanna Bermans, a Miniſter's daughter. This young Lady had alſo ſome taſte for Poetry, and her huſband ſaid of her, that ſhe was more beloved by the Muſes than himſelf; but this may perhaps be conſidered as a compliment. However that be, his marriage was celebrated by ſeveral eminent Poets, and the celebrated Peter Francius, a Profeſſor of Eloquence, made ſome Latin verſes on this occaſion, which ſeem to approach very near to the ſtyle of the Ancients [D]. Antonides was now employed about a work much more conſiderable than his River Y. In the preface to this Poem he had promiſed the life of the Apoſtle St. Paul, which like Virgil's Æneid was to be divided into twelve books. But in all probability he never finiſhed that deſign, for the publick has only ſeen a few fragments of it. The reaſon he gave for not compleating this valuable commodities, which from the other parts of the world are carried into Holland as a tribute to the induſtry and courage of the Dutch; and ſpeaking of the wines and other commodities, that are ſent from France, he inveighs with as much ſtrength as good ſenſe againſt the vices, which from that country are propagated thro' Holland.

The third book is an ingenious fiction. The Poet all of a ſudden is carried to the bottom of the river Y; there he ſees the Deity of that river with his Demi-Gods and Nymphs, adorning and dreſſing themſelves to go to a feaſt, that was to be celebrated at Neptune's Court upon the anniverſary of the marriage of Thetis with Peleus. In this fiction the Poet does not follow Ovid, nor any other of the ancient Mythologiſts. He ſuppoſes that Thetis having been formerly married to old Triton, and being tired with the coldneſs of her ſuperannuated husband, retired from Neptune's Court, to bewail her misfortune in a ſad retirement. Neptune and the other Deities of the ſea pitying her, reſolve to annul her marriage, and to unite her for ever to the brave Peleus, on whom they alſo beſtow immortality with everlaſting youth. Thetis gladly accepts this propoſal, and the cold Triton much more delighted with the pleaſures of eating and drinking, than with thoſe which love affords, willingly ſubmits to the decree of the Gods. The memory of this marriage is every year celebrated with great ſolemnity: to one of theſe feaſts it was the God prepared himſelf. The Poet is conducted to it by the Deity of the river, and places himſelf in a corner of Neptune's palace, whence he could ſee every thing without being ſeen. The Gods of the other rivers reſort to this palace, and as they enter, the Poet is informed by his companion of their names, origin, and power. This is deſcribed in ſuch a lively and poetical manner, that one may juſtly affirm it to be the fineſt paſſage of the whole Poem. All the Gods of the moſt famous rivers in the world come to the table, and Thetis by Neptune's command places the God of the river Y above all the others. Several Deities are offended at it, but eſpecially the proud God of the river Seine (5), who having kept his reſentment hid for ſome moments, being heated with wine, breaks out at laſt into very offenſive words againſt the Y; he upbraids him with the ſmall extent of his courſe, the contempt in which it lay for ſeveral ages, and eſpecially the meanneſs of his extraction; he extols on the contrary the vaſt extent of his own ſtreams, and the antiquity of his pedigree; he even pretends that his Fleets are not leſs conſiderable than theſe of the Y, which perhaps, he ſays, are the ſole foundation of the pride of ſo deſpicable a Marſh. He ridicules the name of his enemy, and endeavours to find in the only letter which compoſes that name, an exact conformity with the meanneſs of the God. As ſoon as the river Seine has vented his paſſion, the Y riſes up, and anſwers him with as much eloquence, as mildneſs and modeſty. He calls upon that Deity himſelf as a witneſs of his power; and alledges the teſtimony of all the other rivers in the world, with whom he had entered into a cloſe union and friendſhip by the ſhips he ſends to them. With regard to his extraction, he ſays that the Roman yoke and ſlavery had began to give ſome reputation to the Seine, at a time when the Y ſtill maintained his liberty againſt the ambitious maſters of the world; and that the moſt potent Deities of the waters did not diſdain to enter into an alliance with him. With regard to his ſmallneſs, it is well known, that the heavieſt bodies are not always the ſtrongeſt, and that too extenſive an Empire is often deſtroyed thro' its own greatneſs. He adds, that his name, though compoſed of one letter only, is not for that reaſon to be deſpiſed, ſince Pythagoras had found in the Letter Y an emblem and figure of the fate of human kind. This diſcourſe ſtill more inflames the fury of the God of the Seine; he turns himſelf to the Ebro (6), and calls him a coward, becauſe he tamely ſuffered the pride of a rebellious ſubject, who, ſays he, would ſoon have been forced to undergo the yoke, if my maſter (7) had been his. To this the Ebro gravely replies, that the hatred he was formerly animated with againſt the Y, had been purified by the fire of the war; that he had acknowledged him free; and that with regard to the imputation of cowardice, it was ſufficiently confuted by his victories over the Moors. Laſtly he deſires the God of the Seine to remember how many years his ſtream had been ſubject to the THAMES. Upon this a conteſt ariſes; the God of the Seine falls upon the Deity of the Ebro, who would have been vanquiſhed, if the Thames, the Baltick, and the Y, had not confederated together, and delivered him out of the hands of the Seine, who had already torn off a part of his gown. Neptune at laſt ſuppreſſes the tumult, and maintains the Y in his rank and dignity, as his moſt deſerving favourite. This is a beautiful allegory to repreſent France's invading the Low-Countries, and the triple alliance.

In the fourth and laſt book the Poet deſcribes the other bank of the Y, adorned with ſeveral cities of North-Holland. This would be a very barren ſubject, if the fruitful imagination of the Poet did not ſupply this defect, and draw from the moſt inconſiderable objects the fineſt embelliſhments. When he ſpeaks of Edam (8), formerly called Y-dam, that is the Dike or Mole of the Y, he mentions an ancient ſtory of a Syren being taken near that city by ſome fiſhermen. He transforms her into a Sybil, and makes her deliver a beautiful Oracle concerning all the hardſhips and dangers which the Batavi ſhould undergo and overcome, before they could arrive at that power, which the Poet has deſcribed with ſo much beauty and ſtrength. This Oracle or Prophecy contains an abſtract of the whole hiſtory of Holland; and this paſſage is one of thoſe, in which the ornaments of Poetry are diſplayed with the greateſt profuſion. The Syren ends her diſcourſe with a dreadful picture of the ſea-fights, which were once to happen on the coaſt of Holland between England and that Republic. In the cloſe of the work, the Poet addreſſes himſelf to the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam, to whoſe wiſdom the Poet juſtly aſcribes the riches and flouriſhing condition of that powerful city.

If this Poem does not abſolutely claim the epithet of Epic, becauſe with regard to the ſubject and the whole diſpoſition of it it differs very much from the Iliad and the Æneid; yet it is not unworthy of that name, if we conſider the happy invention that runs through it, and the noble thoughts and expreſſions with which it abounds. We dare not prefer this maſter-piece of Antonides to Vondel's beſt pieces, though it be not inferior

(5) On which Paris is ſituated.

(6) One of the chief rivers of Spain.

(7) The King of France.

(8) A city in North-Holland.

this work was, that he durſt not meddle with Theological ſubjects, being perſuaded, that how moderate ſoever he was, it would be impoſſible for him to pleaſe every party. It ſeems, that after his marriage he did not much indulge his poetic genius: His buſineſs prevented him; and within a few years he fell into a conſumption, which, after he had languiſhed under it ſome time, put an end to his life, Sept. the 18th 1684, being then but thirty ſeven years and a few months old, leaving no children behind him. He is eſteemed by the beſt judges, the moſt eminent Dutch Poet after Vondel, whom he in every thing ſtudied to imitate; and indeed he excels him in ſome particulars, as in the ſweetneſs of his expreſſions, and the ſmoothneſs of his ſtyle; but for accuracy and loftineſs he is inferior to his original. It might perhaps be ſaid, that he is in compariſon to Vondel, what Statius is with regard to Virgil. But if we conſider that his genius was ripe very ſoon, and that he was but twenty four years old when he publiſhed his Poem on The River Y, it may well be ſuppoſed, that if he had lived long enough to prune the luxuriance of his youthful imagination, to moderate the force of his genius, and to poliſh his ſtyle, he would perhaps have arrived to the utmoſt degree of perfection. It is certain that there are very few Dutch Poems, in which are found ſuch ſtrong, and at the ſame time ſuch eaſy and ſmooth expreſſions, as are to be met with in his River Y. Some imagine the great uſe he makes of compound words render his ſtyle turgid and too ſwelling; but others ſay, that if this is a fault, it ſhews however the Poet's fruitful invention. Theſe compound words have a great ſtrength in the Dutch tongue, and ſerve to expreſs at once whole actions, and convey by one ſingle ſtroke the livelieſt and ſtrongeſt images to the mind. The works of our Poet have been printed ſeveral times, either ſeparately, or all together, having been collected by his father Anthony Janſz (b). The laſt edition of all his works was printed by Nicholas Ten Hoom at Amſterdam in the year 1714 in 4to, under the direction of David van Hoogſtraaten, one of the maſters of the Latin ſchool in that city, who added to it the life of that famous Poet (c). We ſhall give in a note the judgment, which ſome learned Gentlemen have paſſed on Antonides's works [E].

(b) That is John's Son, or Johnſon.

(c) Extracted from the Life of Antonides, by Hoogſtraaten.

rior to them. Mr. Hoogſtraaten thinks, the Poet is too bold, in having formed of his own authority, a great number of compound words; though it muſt be owned, they give a great ſtrength to the Dutch language (9).

(9) Journal Literaire, 1714, Mars & Avril, p. 392, &c.

[D] Latin verſes, which ſeem to come very near to the ſtyle of the Ancients.] The reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to find them here.

Calliopen Batavam Batavo conjungere Phœbo,
Et vatem vati nectere gaudet Hymen.
Rottera conjugio quid non ſperabis ab iſto?
Quanta poëtarum mox oritura ſeges?
Dotibus ingenii patrem ſi filius æquat,
Quot natos, vates tot dabit eſſe torus.
Dotibus ingenii referat ſi filia matrem,
Quot natas, vates tot dabit iſte torus.
Altera Pïeridas, proles dabit altera Phœbum;
Parnaſſum referet ingenioſa domus.
At vos æterno ſociati fœdere amantes,
Unum quos ſtudium junxit, & unus amor,
Vivite fœlices, & plures reddite Phœbos,
Et plures olim reddite Pïeridas.

That entitled Bellona chained, is not much inferior to it; but it muſt be confeſſed that he, as well as Vondel, mixes ſometimes very low expreſſions amongſt thoſe that are the moſt lofty and ſublime. His periods are alſo frequently ſo intricate, that it is very difficult to find the conſtruction of them. But he makes ſufficient atonement for theſe defects by the ſprightlineſs of his genius, and the inexhauſtible fertility of his imagination. In the collection of his works, publiſhed by Mr. Hoogſtraaten, there are ſeveral Epithalamiums and Elegies; and among the latter, thoſe on the deaths of De Ruiter and Vondel are the moſt perfect. But with regard to the former, we may preſume that the author wrote them in haſte; for the ſame thought is found in all, and the turn of them is not much varied. Sometimes we ſhall find ſix or ſeven of theſe pieces following, which all conclude in the ſame manner, conducting the new married couple to bed, and wiſhing them iſſue after nine months; and all this expreſſed in a very turgid ſtile (11). But as our Poet died young, and compoſed but few pieces, if any, except his River Y, after he was married, it is not unreaſonable to think, that theſe were the fruits of his younger days, when his muſe had not yet acquired that perfection, to which ſhe arrived afterwards.

(11) Journal Literaire, ubi ſupra, p. 409, 410.

P.

(10) At the end of the remark [C].

[E] The judgment which ſome learned Gentlemen have paſſed on Antonides's works.] We have obſerved already (10) what is ſaid of his Poem on the River Y.

☞ANTONINUS PIUS (TITUS AURELIUS FULVIUS or FULVUS BOIONIUS) the Roman Emperor, was born at Lanuvium in Italy, the 19th of September in the year of the Chriſtian Æra 86 (a). His father's family was originally from Niſmes in Languedoc. His father Aurelius Fulvus, and his two grandfathers were advanced to the higheſt offices at Rome. Arrius Antoninus his grandfather by mother's ſide, was twice Conſul, and a man of great reputation for probity and virtue, and remarkable for having pitied his friend Nerva on account of his being made Emperor (b). Our Antoninus was educated firſt under his two grandfathers Arrius Antoninus, and Aurelius Fulvus, and behaved in ſuch a manner towards his relations, that he endeared himſelf to all of them; upon which account he had ſeveral conſiderable eſtates left to him. He was extremely fond of a country life, which however did not prevent him from being preferred to ſeveral offices of importance, which he diſcharged to the ſatisfaction of every perſon. His character in all reſpects is one of the nobleſt that can be imagined [A]. He was (a) Jul. Capitolin. in Vitâ Antonini Pii. c. 1. edit. Schrevelii, Lugduni Batavorum, 1661.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] His character in all reſpects is the nobleſt that can be imagined.] To begin with that, which was of leaſt importance, the advantages of his perſon; he was tall and well made, his voice was agreeable, his countenance majeſtic (1), and at the ſame time had all the marks of humanity and benevolence in it (2). He was facetious, and eaſy in converſation (3). He was exact and diligent in his œconomy, and took great care of his eſtate; but was ſo far from uſurping upon the properties of others, that he was very liberal of his own, and even magnificent in his expences upon all proper occaſions. He lent conſiderable

(1) Capitolin. in Vitâ Anton. c. 13.

(2) M. Antoninus's Meditations tranſlated by Caſaubon, book 6. cap. 28.

(3) Ibid. book 1. cap. 13.

was Conſul in the year 120; and one of the four Conſular Perſons choſen by Hadrian for the government of Italy, and afterwards Proconſul of Aſia, where he acquired a greater reputation than even his grandfather himſelf. Upon his return to Rome Hadrian gave him ble ſums at a very low intereſt. He was extremely ſober and temperate; ſo that nature having no occaſion for any diſcharge but at the regular periods, he paſſed whole days together, without moving out of his place (4); and that he might have ſtrength enough for the management of affairs, he took in the morni a little piece of dry bread before he admitted thoſe perſons, who came to pay their compliments to him (5). He never affected any thing extraordinary in his diet, or lodging, and contented himſelf with whatever offered, without being in pain for the luxuries of life (6). He took a reaſonable care of his body without too much adorning or neglecting of it. He preſerved his health, not as a man fond of life, but ſo far as was expedient to prevent the neceſſity of having recourſe to Phyſicians (7). He had an excellent genius, great learning and politeneſs, and a very powerful eloquence; and at the ſame time was a man of prodigious application (8). He was ſubject to exceſſive pains of the head; and yet after thoſe were over, he returned freſh and vigorous to his affairs (9). He was maſter of great ſagacity, and took care for the moſt inconſiderable events, with a mind that was always calm and ſerene; and he never acted any thing without the advice of his friends. He examined all that was propoſed to him with prodigious attention, and enquired into the bottom of affairs, without being amuſed by appearances, reſolving to underſtand the whole, before he determined to act. But he continued firm and inflexible in what he had once reſolved upon after ſufficient deliberation. He was no leſs exact in obſerving the manners and diſpoſitions of men, than in the conduct of affairs (10). He was not at all ambitious of honours and preferments (11); and Hadrian, when he gave him the title of Cæſar, ſaid, that he knew that he was a man, who of all others was leaſt ſollicitous to have a ſhare in the Government, and was ſo far from wiſhing to obtain the ſovereign power, that he received it with reluctance (12). When he exhibited the publick ſpectacles, and in all the publick buildings, congiaries, and other things of that nature, he regarded only what he thought it was his duty to do, without conſidering the judgment, which men might paſs upon it. For he was very far from that abſurd vanity, which leads men to be fond of the applauſes of the people, and to endeavour to procure them by low and ſervile flattery, and condeſcenſions to them. He was averſe from flattering others, or ſuffering others to flatter him (13). He was never the leaſt jealous of thoſe, who were diſtinguiſhed for their eloquence, their knowledge of the laws, or any other eminent qualification; and always readily yielded them the ſuperiority, and contributed to the utmoſt of his power, that every one of them might appear conſpicuous in their profeſſion (14). He obſerved with the greateſt exactneſs all the Roman laws and cuſtoms, but without ſeeming to affect an oſtentatious attachment to them (15). He was religious without any tincture of ſuperſtition (16). The Hiſtorians obſerve, that he always performed himſelf the ſacrifices and other acts of Religion, unleſs he was indiſpoſed, and ſhewed through the whole a ſtrong regard and veneration for the Deity (17). Reineſius (18) mentions an inſcription of the year 143 upon a monument, which the Senate and people of Rome had erected to the honour of this Emperor, on account of his care and peculiar reſpect for all the publick ceremonies. This inſcription commends him likewiſe for having joined the greateſt goodneſs and benevolence with the ſtricteſt regard for juſtice. As he was very exact in ſtudying the real characters of men, and conſequently choſe none but perſons of the moſt ſolid merit for his friends, ſo he was firm and conſtant in his friendſhips, without ever relaxing the leaſt in his regards for them. He never hearkened to any ſuggeſtions againſt them; he was never jealous or ſuſpicious, or ready to reproach them for the ſlight faults, which they might commit. There were but few things which he concealed from them; and thoſe were never any affairs relating to the State (19). But what added the greateſt grace to all theſe noble qualities of Antoninus, was that there was nothing of exceſs or oſtentation in his conduct; nothing mean, or affected, nothing unbecoming or ſingular, in ſhort nothing that ſavoured of the Declaimer or Sophiſt. Every thing ſhewed him to be a man of the moſt conſummate character, firm, and ſerious, always equal, always great, maſter of himſelf, and worthy of the ſuperiority over others; without the leaſt violence, impetuoſity or irregularity, and actuated by the moſt perfect rules of wiſdom. It was remarkable, that he knew extremely well when to ſhew himſelf reſolute and firm, and when to uſe condeſcenſion and mildneſs; for his natural diſpoſition was eaſy and gentle. He was grave and ſteady, without appearing like ſome perſons of a ſevere and moroſe temper, and without being inflexible to entreaty. On the contrary he was generous and humane to every body, and even to ill men, whom he was contented with reſtraining from doing miſchief, without puniſhing them with the ſeverity, which they deſerved. When Hadrian conſulted him upon any point, he was always for the moſt favourable advice; and after he was raiſed to the Empire, he was never known to do an act, which ſhewed the leaſt inhumanity and rigour (20). When he was Proconſul of Aſia, he lodged at Smyrna in the houſe of Polemon the Sophiſt, becauſe it was the beſt in that city. The Sophiſt, who was then abſent, and who was of an harſh temper, as ſoon as ever he returned, and found his houſe filled with people, began to clamour extremely, as if he had been driven out of his own habitation; ſo that Antoninus reſolved immediately to leave it, tho' it was late at night, and to remove to another. Polemon ſome years after came to Rome, and went to pay his compliments to Antoninus, who was then Emperor. Antoninus received him with the utmoſt civility, and only put him in mind in a merry and agreeable manner of what had paſſed at Smyrna. For when he ordered an apartment to be prepared for him, he added, that no body ſhould oblige him to remove out of it. An Actor likewiſe complaining, that Polemon had forced him out of the theatre at noonday, and appealing to him for juſtice; he replied, that he had forced him out of the houſe at midnight, and yet he had not appealed (21). We have many other inſtances of the goodneſs of his temper under the higheſt provocations. Viſiting Valerius Omulus, and admiring among other things the porphyry pillars in his houſe, he asked whence he had them; upon which Omulus, inſtead of conſidering it as an honour, that the Emperor ſhould commend the ornaments of his houſe, anſwered him bluntly, that he ought to be deaf and dumb at another man's houſe. Antoninus ſhewed no manner of reſentment at this, and upon many other occaſions bore extremely well the ill manners of this Omulus. Inter alia etiam hoc civilitatis ejus præcipuum argumentum eſt, quod quum domum Omuli viſens, miranſque columnas porphyreticas, requiſiſſet unde eas haberet; atque Omulus ei dixiſſet, Quum in domum alienam veneris, & mutus & ſudrus eſto, patienter tulit. Cujus Omuli multa joca ſemper patienter tulit (22). Having ſent for Apollonius, the Stoic Philoſopher, from the Eaſt, in order to be Preceptor to M. Aurelius, Apollonius brought with him ſeveral of his diſciples; and when he arrived at Rome, Antoninus ordered him to come to him, to receive the young Prince under his care; but he anſwered, that it was the ſcholar's duty to come to his Maſter. The Emperor only ſmiled at this odd humour of the Stoic, who had condeſcended to come from the Eaſt to Rome, and yet would not go from his houſe to the palace. However he ſent Aurelius to hear his Lectures (23). Yet with all theſe eminent virtues he did not eſcape cenſure; for Julian the Apoſtate in his Cæſars (24) reproaches him for having indulged his paſſions with regard to women, tho' at the ſame time he commends his Government; and there was a publick report, that he had raiſed Fabius Repentinus to the office of Prefect of the Prætorium upon the recommendation of a miſtreſs of his. Sed Repentinus famoſâ voce percuſſus eſt, quod per concubinam Principis ad præfecturam veniſſet (25). Julian (26) likewiſe animadverts upon him for being too exact in things of little conſequence.

(4) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. Part 2. p. 499. edit. Bruxelles 1711.
(5) Capitol. ubi ſupra, and Victor in Vitâ Anton. Pii.
(6) Antoninus's Medit. lib. 1. cap. 13. and lib. 6. cap. 28.
(7) Ibid.
(8) Tillemont, p. 500.
(9) Anton. Medit. ubi ſupra.
(10) Tillem. p. 500, 501, and M. Anton. Meditat. B. 6. cap. 28.
(11) Antonin. Meditat. B. 1. c. 13.
(12) Dion Caſſius, lib. 69.
(13) Anton. Meditat. lib. 1. cap. 13. and l. 6. cap. 28; and Tillemont, pag. 501.
(14) Anton. Meditat. B. 1. cap. 13.
(15) Ibid.
(16) Ibid. B. 6. cap. 28.
(17) Pauſan. lib. 8.
(18) Inſcript. p. 308. edit. Lipſiæ and Francof. 1682.
(19) Anton. Meditat. B. 1. cap. 13; and B. 6. cap. 28.
(20) Tillem. p. 502, 503.
(21) Philoſtrat. 25. p. 533, 534.
(22) Capitol. c. 11.
(23) Idem, cap. 10. and Lucian. de Vitâ Demonact. p. 552. apud Tillemont, pag. 503.
(24) Tom. 2. edit. Petav. Paris 1630.
(25) Capitol. c. 8.
(26) Ubi ſupra.

him a place in his council, in order to conſult him in the adminiſtration of affairs (c). That Emperor upon the death of L. Ælius Verus Cejonius, whom he had adopted, reſolved to adopt our Antoninus in his room [B], which was executed the 5th of February 138, upon this condition, that he ſhould likewiſe adopt M. Annius Verus, his wife's nephew, who was afterwards called M. Aurelius, and L. Commodus, the ſon of L. Verus Cejonius deceaſed (d). Hadrian dying the tenth of July following he was raiſed to the Empire, and had the title of Pius given him by the Senate [C]. We have no particular or regular account of the tranſactions of his reign, ſince Capitolinus has written in a very confuſed manner; and we have only an abridgment of Dion Caſſius's Hiſtory by Xiphilin now remaining. So that we have nothing but a general idea of his conduct and government, which is a great and noble one [D]. He took prodigious care of the (c) Idem, ibid. and 3.

(d) See Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 2. Part 2. pag. 507. edit. Bruxelles 1711.

[B] Reſolved to adopt our Antoninus in his room.] Some Authors write (27), that Hadrian adopted him for his ſucceſſor on account of his filial piety, having obſerved one day that he ſupported his father or father-in-law, who was infirm with old age, as they came into the Senate; which appears to have been his uſual cuſtom. This regard to ſo near a relation was no very conſiderable action with reſpect to him. But Hadrian had many other ſtrong proofs of his merit (28), and adopted him, becauſe he thought him a perſon well qualified for the Empire, and very able to ſupport him, when his body or mind ſhould decline thro' age. Antoninus after his adoption gave very conſiderable largeſſes to the army and people out of his own private eſtate, and paid all that Hadrian had promiſed for that ſolemnity. The Cities upon thoſe occaſions uſed to offer to the Princes very large ſums of money inſtead of crowns. But he remitted the whole to the cities of Italy, and half of it to the reſt. He contributed likewiſe very liberally to the works which Hadrian had undertaken, and acted with the utmoſt deference and obedience to him as long as he lived (29), except when that Emperor wanted to put an end to his own life, or ordered the execution of others (30).

(27) Capitol. c. 4. and Aurel. Victor.

(28) Tillem. p. 506.

(29) Capitol. cap. 4.

(30) Spart. in Vitâ Adriani, c. 24.

[C] Had the title of Pius given him by the Senate.] Mr. Tillemont (31) tranſlates this word by the French bon or good, becauſe that word properly ſignifies the tenderneſs and affection mingled with reſpect, which we obſerve in perſons of good temper towards thoſe who are related to them, as parents, children, and likewiſe towards their country. Antoninus had always diſcharged this duty towards all his relations; and it is ſaid, that the care which he took in aſſiſting his aged father-in-law and Hadrian in his ſickneſs contributed to the procuring him this ſurname (32). Several other reaſons are mentioned beſides this; as particularly his reſcuing ſeveral perſons from the reſentments or frenzy of Hadrian; his innate mildneſs and good temper; his regard for religion; and, according to Dion Caſſius (33), becauſe when ſeveral complaints were made to him againſt thoſe who had managed affairs under Hadrian, and divers of them were accuſed by name, he refuſed to hear all thoſe complaints, and ſaid, that he ought not to begin his reign with actions, which were invidious and diſagreeable. He is ſtiled Pius even in the medals of the year 138, and all the ſucceſſive ones; and it is particularly by this glorious title that he is diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory. Pauſanias (34) tells us, that he deſerved not only this title, but likewiſe that which was antiently given to Cyrus of Father of Mankind. The Games which he appointed at Puteoli in honour of Hadrian, were called Pia (35). Commodus and the reſt of the Emperors who ſucceeded him, aſſumed the ſame title of Pius, which only ſerved for the moſt part to ſhew the world more conſpicuouſly how unworthy they were of it.

(31) Pag. 508.

(32) Idem, ibid.

(33) Lib. 70.

(34) Lib. 8.

(35) Spanheim de Præſtantiâ & uſu Numiſmat. lib. 8. apud Tillemont, p. 509.

[D] A general idea of his conduct and government, which is a great and noble one.] He lived in the ſame manner after he was Emperor as he had done, while he was a private perſon, or rather he ſhewed himſelf to have been an excellent man, while he continued in a private ſtation, and his merit appeared ſtill greater, when he was advanced to the Empire. He raiſed the Imperial dignity by his condeſcenſion and familiarity with others. He admitted his friends to his preſence with the utmoſt freedom. He would ſuffer none but his ſlaves to wait upon him. He treated the Senate with the ſame regard, as he himſelf deſired to meet with from the Emperors, when he was a Senator. He gave an account of every thing that he did both to the Senate and the People. When he asked for the Conſulſhip and other offices for himſelf and his ſons, he ſollicited for them like a private perſon (36). Marcus Antoninus tells us (37), that it was this Emperor, who after he had adopted him, diveſted him of all pride and vain-glory, and reduced him to the opinion, that it was poſſible to live in the court without a troop of guards and followers, magnificent apparel, torches, ſtatues, and other circumſtances of pomp and grandeur; but that a man may contract himſelf almoſt to the ſtate of a private perſon, and yet for all that not become the more baſe or remiſs in thoſe publick affairs, in which power and authority are requiſite. He lived with his friends, as Capitolinus informs us, as if he had not been Emperor; he converſed, walked, and diverted himſelf with them; he invited them to his publick and private feaſts, and went himſelf to viſit them, and whenever they were prevented by any buſineſs from giving him their company at his table or in his journies, he was not at all offended at it, or abated the leaſt of his friendſhip for them, being willing that they ſhould enjoy a full liberty of acting according to their own convenience. He would not ſuffer either his friends or his freedmen, whom he treated with a great deal of ſeverity, to abuſe their intereſt with him; and he never gave them an opportunity to do it, becauſe he did every thing immediately himſelf, and in the view of the world. He gave audience to all who came to propoſe any thing for the publick advantage. He was pleaſed when any good advice was offered him, and did not ſhew the leaſt impatience that his own opinion ſhould be freely oppoſed, and bore, without complaining, the hard imputations which were caſt upon his conduct. He paid the greateſt honour to true Philoſophers, and ſuffered thoſe, who were only in appearance ſuch, without reproaching them with their hypocriſy. He took ſo particular a care of all the people of his Empire, that it was evident he conſidered them all as really belonging to himſelf, and compoſing one great family, of which himſelf was the head (38). He knew exactly the ſtate of the Provinces and the revenues of them. He recommended to the Governors to act with lenity in collecting the taxes, and whenever they appeared faulty, he obliged them to give a ſtrict account of their adminiſtration. He heard very favourably all perſons who came with any complaints to him, and found no manner of pleaſure in enriching himſelf by the oppreſſion of his ſubjects; ſo that all the Provinces flouriſhed under his reign (39). He was a great lover of juſtice, and no conſideration could ever prevent him from giving every perſon his right. He made a great many excellent regulations in the Law, with the advice of ſeveral eminent Civilians, Vinidius or Vindius Verus, Salvius Valens, Voluſianus Metianus or Mæcianus, Ulpius Marcellus, and Jabolenus, who are almoſt all of them famous for the fragments, which are ſtill remaining of their writings. It is ſaid, that it was he who appointed, that no man, who had been acquitted of a crime, ſhould be tried again for it (40). He choſe thoſe for Governors of Provinces, who appeared to him to be lovers of juſtice as well as himſelf; and when they had diſcharged their duty in a proper manner, he rewarded them by peculiar honours and preſents, and did not recall them for ſeveral years, or even till they deſired it, which was the caſe of Orphitus Prefect of Rome. Gavius Maximus, who was a perſon of great exactneſs, was twenty years Prefect of the Prætorium (41). But with regard

(36) See Capitol. in Vitâ Antonini Pii, apud Tillem. p. 510.

(37) Lib. 1. cap. 14.

(38) Capit. 1. ubi ſupra.

(39) Idem, ibid.

(40) Tillemont, p. 512.

(41) Capitol. ubi ſupra.

the management of the publick revenues [E], but was extremely generous in the diſtribution of his own eſtate, upon all proper occaſions [F]. He never put any Senator to death; but having convicted one of parricide, who confeſſed his crime, and the laws of nature not ſuffering ſuch a perſon to live, he ordered him to be baniſhed to a deſolate iſland (e). Attilius Tatianus and Priſcianus were accuſed of having formed conſpiracies againſt him; the latter of whom killed himſelf, and the former was proſcribed by a decree of the Senate, and was the only perſon puniſhed in that manner under Antoninus, who always took a particular care of his ſon, and would not ſuffer any enquiry to be made after thoſe who had been engaged in either of theſe conſpiracies (f). And when the Senate was very urgent with him for that purpoſe, he anſwered, he was not willing it ſhould be ſeen that there were a great many perſons who did not love him (g). He had very few wars during his reign [G], and thoſe he carried on by his Lieutenants. He never engaged in any but upon abſolute neceſſity, having an averſion to the ſhedding even of his enemies blood. He was fond of peace, and even in war preferred the reputation of juſtice to all the advantages which might be gained by victory. He was more intent upon preſerving the bounds of his Empire than extending them (b). And he often (e) Capitol. c. 8.

(f) Idem, c. 7.

(g) Victor. in Vit. Anton. Pii.

(b) Tillemont, p. 520.

regard to thoſe officers, whoſe conduct was exceptionable, he was ſatisfied with only removing them from their employments, without ſhewing any other mark of ſeverity towards them (42).

(42) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 70.

[E] He took prodigious care of the management of the publick revenues.] He employed the income of his great eſtate in liberalities to his friends and ſoldiers; but he took prodigious care of the diſtribution of the publick money; ſo that he leſſened his own private fortune, and left the treaſury extremely rich. He was very careful of the proviſions, and extended his exactneſs to the things of the leaſt importance. He took away the penſions, which Hadrian had given to a great many perſons of no conſequence, and ſaid that it was an unworthy thing, or rather a cruelty, to ſuffer the Commonwealth to be conſumed by thoſe, who were not of the leaſt ſervice to it. He retrenched among other penſions that, which had been given to one Meſomedes a Lyric Poet, who was eſteemed by Hadrian, becauſe he had written Verſes in honour of his favourite Antinous. Caracalla afterwards raiſed a monument to this Poet. We find by Euſebius and Suidas, that he was a Cretan. There are ſome of his verſes ſtill extant (43). Antoninus ſold all the uſeleſs goods, and even the lands belonging to the Crown, being ſatisfied with his own eſtates, when he went into the country. He never would take any long journey, becauſe he thought that the preſence of the Court was always a charge to a Province, whatever care the Emperor might take to retrench the expences of it. This gave him an opportunity of receiving advices from all the ſeveral Provinces of the Empire, as he reſided generally at Rome, which was the center of it.

(43) Tillemont, p. 514.

[F] Generous in the diſtribution of his own eſtate upon all proper occaſions.] His prudent management never expoſed him to the imputation of avarice, becauſe he ſhewed ſufficiently upon all occaſions how little love he had for money. He refuſed the eſtates, which were left him by thoſe, who had children of their own. He reſtored to the children the eſtates, which had been confiſcated on account of their fathers crimes, except in thoſe caſes, wherein it is neceſſary to make ſatisfaction to the Provinces, which had been plundered by them. Confiſcations were much more rare under him than under any other Emperor. He abſolutely removed informers. He was always ready to remit the taxes, whenever there was occaſion. Thoſe perſons, who had obtained for themſelves the right of Roman Citizens, were not always able to procure it for their children, who ſtill continued Greeks, according to Pauſanias's expreſſion (44); and in that caſe the father could not leave them his eſtate, but was obliged to give it to ſtrangers, if he had no relations who were Citizens, or elſe the Treaſury ſeized it. But Antoninus ordered that the children ſhould be intitled to the inheritance, having more regard to the laws of humanity, than to thoſe, which had been ſo favourable to the avarice of the Emperors. His care in retrenching uſeleſs expences, was deſigned chiefly to enable him to ſupply thoſe, which were ſerviceable or neceſſary. He beſtowed privileges and penſions in all the Provinces upon Philoſophers and Teachers of Rhetoric. He gave many noble preſents to the Roman people and the army. He maintained a company of young Ladies in honour of his wife. He ſupplied the Senators and Magiſtrates with money to diſcharge their ſeveral employments. He furniſhed the expence of the publick ſpectacles. It is ſaid, that he gave the right of a Colony to the City of Antioch (45). He was by no means fond of building; however he raiſed ſeveral publick edifices at Rome and in the parts adjacent, particularly the Port of Cajeta, and that of Terracina, which he repaired, and the tomb of Hadrian, which he finiſhed. He built likewiſe ſeveral new edifices at Puteoli. He gave money to ſeveral Cities for the repairing of old buildings, or raiſing of new ones, particularly in Greece, Ionia, Syria, and Carthage. He made the town of Pallantium in Arcadia a free City, and exempted it from tribute, becauſe it was reported, that Evander with a part of the inhabitants of that place had formerly built a city where Rome afterwards ſtood. The misfortunes, which happened under his reign, ſhewed the extent of his liberality, by the care, which he took in repairing the loſſes, which were occaſioned by them. For there was at Rome a famine, an inundation of the Tiber, and a fire, which made great devaſtation. The Cities of Narbonne in Gaul and Antioch in Syria, and the Forum of Carthage were likewiſe burnt; and there raged a peſtilence in Arabia. During the famine he bought a great quantity of corn, wine, and oil, and diſtributed them to the people. at his own charge. The apprehenſion of a famine once excited a tumult among the people againſt him, and they even proceeded ſo far as to caſt ſtones at him. However inſtead of puniſhing this ſedition, he only gave an account of his conduct to the people in order to appeaſe them. The Cities of Cos and Rhodes, with ſeveral others in Lycia and Caria, being overthrown by an earthquake, Antoninus procured them all to be rebuilt, not only by encouraging the inhabitants to uſe their endeavours, but by contributing himſelf very conſiderably for that purpoſe. There was likewiſe in his time a great earthquake in the Helleſpont, which opened a paſſage to the ſea in the midſt of the land, and entirely overthrew the city of Cyzicum with its temple, which was at that time the largeſt and moſt beautiful in the world (46).

(45) Tillemont, p. 514, 515.

(46) Idem, 516, 517.

[G] Very few wars during his reign.] Some writers inform us, that he was engaged in no war during the twenty three years which he reigned; and they make uſe of this inſtance to ſhew, that it is not peace and eaſe, which corrupt men, but the perverſeneſs of their own diſpoſition. It is true, he never commanded in perſon, but there happened ſome wars under his reign. The Moors took up arms in Africa, but he drove them out of their own territories, and obliged them to fly to the furtheſt parts of Libya among the people of Mount Atlas (47), and reduced them to the neceſſity of deſiring peace (48). The Brigantes, a people of Britain, having made an incurſion upon the country ſubject to the Romans, Lollius Urbicus the Governor of that Province ſubdued them; and the principal honour of this victory was aſcribed to our Emperor, though he reſided at Rome all that time. He took away from them the greateſt part of their country, and made a new wall of turf to prevent the Barbarians from incurſions. Hadrian had made one before this; but it is ſaid, that Antoninus's wall was much often made uſe of Scipio's expreſſion, that he choſe rather to ſave one citizen than kill a thouſand enemies (i). By this conduct he made himſelf univerſally revered and eſteemed in that age, and admired by poſterity [H]. In the year 139 he reſolved to marry his daughter Annia Fauſtina to M. Aurelius, who ſucceeded him in the Empire (k), and in 141 his own wife Fauſtina died, whoſe behaviour is repreſented to have been very looſe and irregular. Antoninus obſerved this with great regret, and endeavoured as much as poſſible to conceal it from publick infamy. However he deified her after her death, and erected temples to her, and paid her all the honours that ſuperſtition could direct him to (l). In 147 he gave the Tribunitial and Proconſular Power to M. Aurelius; and we are informed by the Alexandrian Chronicle, that the ſame year he remitted all the publick debts, and burnt all the papers relating to the ſecurity of them, which had been preſerved in the Treaſury. He ſhewed a prodigious regard for M. Aurelius, whereas he acted in a different manner with reſpect to L. Verus, having obſerved the vicious turn of his diſpoſition (m). This great and good Emperor died about the ſeventh of March 161, having lived ſeventy three years, and reigned twenty three years, ſeven months, and ſixteen days after Hadrian's death (n). We ſhall mention ſome of the circumſtances which attended his death [I]. He was univerſally lamented; and the people regretted the loſs of (k) Tillem. p. 525.

(44) Lib. 8.

(47) Pauſan. lib. 8.

(48) Capitol. in Vitâ Anton. Pii.

(i) Capitol. c. 9.

(l) Id. p. 527.

(m) Idem, pag. 532.

(n) Idem, pag. 541.

much larger in extent, and carried on to the middle of Scotland between the Gulfs of Forth and Clyde, which are called by other writers Edinborough and Dombritton. Camden endeavours to prove this by ſeveral inſcriptions. There are ſome medals of Antoninus, in which he has the title of Britannicus; and there are others which mention Britain under his third Conſulſhip, that is after the year 139, and before 145, and in the tenth year of his Tribuneſhip, that is in 147. Father Pagi upon very ſlight grounds places the war in Britain under the year 140 (49). He managed ſeveral wars by his Generals againſt the Germans, Dacians, and many other nations, and ſtopped the incurſions of the Alans, and ſuppreſſed a rebellion of the Jews (50), which was undoubtedly the ſame war which was carried on in Judea at the time that Juſtin Martyr had a conference at Epheſus with Trypho after the year 150 (51). It is ſaid, that Antoninus permitted the Jews to circumciſe their own children, but not thoſe of other nations, under the penalty of being ſubjected to the laws made by Hadrian againſt Eunuchs. The manner in which the Jews ſpeak of him ſhews, that notwithſtanding their rebellion he was very mild and favourable to them. There was at that time at the mouth of the Boryſthenes, or a little above it a Greek city, named Olbia, very famous among the Antients. This city, which was then probably a free and independent Commonwealth, having made war againſt the Tauroſcythians, who are ſuppos'd to have been the Scythians that inhabited the Tauric Cherſoneſus and the adjacent country, Antoninus ſent the Roman troops to their aſſiſtance, who defeated the Tauroſcythians, and obliged them to give hoſtages to the Citizens of Olbia (52).

(49) Tillem. p. 518, 519.

(50) Capitol. ubi ſupra.

(51) Juſtin. Dialog. p. 217, 227. edit. Paris 1636.

(52) See Arrian. de Ponto, Baudrand Diction. Geogr. and Capitol. apud Tillem. p. 520.

[H] Univerſally rever'd and eſteem'd in that age, and admired by poſterity.] He never engaged in any war but upon abſolute neceſſity, and in ſelf-defence (53). He was always fond and deſirous of peace. By this humanity of diſpoſition he was not only beloved by his ſubjects, who conſidered him as their father and protector rather than as their maſter, but likewiſe by all the foreign Princes and nations, who were ſtruck with admiration of his goodneſs and equity. His power and his virtue filled them with the moſt profound veneration for him. And therefore as he never made war from a ſpirit of ambition upon thoſe who continued in peace, ſo the other nations were neither able nor willing to interrupt this tranquillity, which was more honourable to him than the moſt ſhining triumphs in war (54). We are aſſured that no Emperor had ever ſo great an authority among foreign nations as he. An Hiſtorian tells us, without explaining himſelf further, that by his authority alone he induced King Abgarus to leave the Eaſt. Abgarum regem ex orientis partibus ſolâ autoritate deduxit (55). This was the common name of the Princes of Edeſſa (56); and Epiphanius (57) cites a verſe of that time, which repreſents this Abgarus to have been a perſon of great virtue. He ſtopped by his letters alone the King of the Parthians, who had juſt made himſelf maſter of Armenia; and this Prince having deſired, that the regal throne which Trajan had taken, ſhould be ſent back to him, Antoninus abſolutely refuſed it (58). His character for juſtice procured him to be

(53) Pauſan. lib. 8. and Capitol. ubi ſupra.

(54) Eutrop. Dio. lib. 70, and Aurel. Victor, apud Tillemont, pag. 521.

(55) Capitol. c. 9.

(56) Caſaub. in Capitolin.

(57) Apud Tillemont, p. 521.

(58) Capitol. cap. 9.

Judge among the foreign Kings; and ſeveral barbarous nations laid down their arms in order to ſubmit their diſputes to his determination, and to execute his deciſions. He was arbitrator of the conteſt between Rhimethalces and his Tutor, and reſtored the former to the Kingdom of Boſphorus, which the latter had probably deprived him of. He received Embaſſies likewiſe from Hircania, Bactria and India. Pharaſmanes King of Iberia came to viſit him at Rome, and paid greater regard to him than he had done before to Hadrian. The Ladi, a people of Cholcis, received a King from him, whoſe name was Pacorus. He gave Princes likewiſe to the Armenians and Quadi, as we learn from ſome medals which are placed under the year 139. The noble qualifications of this Emperor, and the manner in which he governed the Empire, have occaſioned him, as we obſerve in the text of this article, to be compared by moſt of the Hiſtorians to Numa, whoſe character nearly reſembled his on account of the peace which he generally enjoyed, and the care which he took of religious affairs. Others are of opinion that he ought not to be compared to Numa, or any other Prince, ſince he was ſo much ſuperior to all mankind in virtue. There was nothing but what was commendable in his character, as Capitolinus informs us; and Pauſanias tells us, as we obſerved before, that he deſerved to be ſtiled the Father of Mankind. He was ſo greatly admired by poſterity, that it is ſaid, the people and the army would never conſider any perſon as Emperor, if he had not the name of Antoninus, ſo that his ſucceſſors aſſumed it for near an age after, and the Romans paid a greater veneration to it than even to thoſe of the Gods themſelves. Severus appointed that all the Emperors ſhould aſſume it as well as that of Auguſtus, either becauſe he thought Titus Antoninus to have been the happieſt of all Princes, or becauſe it was he, or rather Marcus Antoninus his ſucceſſor, who firſt preferred him. This name, even after it had been diſhonoured by the infamous Caracalla, was ſo highly eſteemed, that the Emperor Macrinus gave it to his ſon Diadumenus, for fear that thoſe who bore that name ſhould take the advantage of it, and revolt againſt him. Alexander Severus refuſed it out of modeſty, though the Senate, who conſidered it as a mark of the ſupreme power as well as that of Auguſtus, were very importunate with him to accept it. Alexander excuſed himſelf by ſaying, that he was apprehenſive that his conduct would not anſwer the dignity of ſo illuſtrious a name. It is ſaid that the Egyptians had an Æra or Epocha, which they began with the reign of Antoninus, where the Greek Faſti publiſhed by Mr. Dodwel likewiſe begin, which, according to that learned writer, were probably written by Theon, a Philoſopher of great eminence at Alexandria about the end of the fourth Century (59).

(59) Tillem. p. 522, 523.

[I] We ſhall mention ſome of the circumſtances which attended his death.] He fell ſick after having eaten too much cheeſe at ſupper, which occaſioned a vomiting, attended with a fever, that proved fatal to him in a few days. The third day of his ſickneſs he gave all the neceſſary orders that Marcus Aurelius might ſucceed him without any difficulty, and recommended the Empire and his daughter to him. In his of him as much as if he had been cut off in the flower of youth (o). His body was interred with prodigious pomp and magnificence in Hadrian's tomb, and M. Aurelius and L. Verus pronounced a panegyric upon him (p). He was ranked among the Gods by the Senate with the general consent and approbation; and all the honours, which had been before bestowed upon the best Princes, were paid to his memory (q). All people were unanimous in extolling his piety, clemency, genius and integrity. He was almost the only Emperor who ever reigned without any civil or hostile blood being shed on his account. And he was justly compared to Numa, with regard to his good fortune, piety, and religion (r). He had the honour of having the Emperor Gordian for his Historian [K]. Several Orations were published under his name, which were generally thought not to be his; though Marius Maximus the Historian cited by Capitolinus (s) was of the contrary opinion. He is said to have worked several miracles after his death [L]. St. Austin (t) mentions a Rescript of the Emperor Antoninus inserted in the Gregorian Code, in which it was determined, that an husband should not prosecute his wife for adultery, unless he had set her himself an example of conjugal chastity; and that if it was discovered that both of them had been criminal, they should both be punished; it being unjust, as that Prince observes, that an husband should oblige his wife to maintain her fidelity to him, when himself had broken his own to her. Baronius ascribes this (u) to our Emperor; and tells us, that the same thing is to be found in Ulpian.

(o) Capitol. c. 12.
(p) Idem, in Vitâ Anton. Philos. cap. 7.
(q) Idem, in Vitâ Anton. Pii, c. 12.
(r) Idem, ibid.
(s) Cap. 11.
(t) De adult. Conjugiis, tom. 6. edit. Paris 1586. apud Tillemont, p. 543.
(u) Annal. ad ann. 161

delirious fits his whole talk was of the public affairs, and of the King, who had incurr'd his resentments. For Vologeses King of Parthia was then making preparations for the war, which he soon after declar'd against the Romans. A little before he died he gave to the Tribune for the watch-word, Æquanimitas, that is, Tranquillity of Mind, and then turning himself, as if he had sunk into a calm sleep, expired. He left his own private estate to his daughter, and proper legacies to all his friends and domestics (60).

(60) Capitol. in Vit. Titi Anton. Pii, & Anton. Philosoph.

[K] He had the honour of having the Emperor Gordian for his historian.] This Emperor, when he was young, wrote a beautiful poem intitled Antoninias in thirty books, in which he celebrated the lives and wars of Antoninus Pius and Philosophus, with all their publick and private actions. But this work is not now extant. Scripsit præterea quemadmodum Virgilius Æneidos, Statius Achilleidos, & multi alii Iliados, ita etiam ille Antoniniados, hoc est Antoninum Pium & Antoninum Marcum, versibus disertissimis, libris xxx, vitam illorum, & bella & publicè privatimque gesta perscribens. Et hæc quidem puerulus (61).

(61) Idem, in Vit. Gordian. cap. 3.

[L] He is said to have worked several miracles after his death.] Baronius (62) mentions a Greek inscription, supposed to have been taken from the temple of Æsculapius at Rome, which contains divers pretended miraculous cures, which were ascribed to the remedies that had been revealed by this imaginary Deity. The first is said to have happened in the time of the Emperor Antoninus, but the inscription does not mention which of those Emperors particularly. Justin Martyr, who was at that time very eminent in the church, observes, according to Mr. Tillemont (63), that it is not difficult for the Devil, when God is pleased to permit him, to discover remedies for the diseases, which himself had inflicted, in order to procure himself the admiration of the vulgar; and as Baronius remarks (64) that he might oppose false Miracles to the true ones, which were then worked by the Christians.

T.

(62) Ad ann. 139. § 4.
(63) P. 543.
(64) Ubi supra.

ANTONINUS PHILOSOPHUS (MARCUS AURELIUS) the Roman Emperor, was descended from an ancient and noble family, which was traced up as high as Numa (a). His father Annius Verus died during his Pretorship (b). Antoninus was born at Rome the 26th of April in the year of the Christian Æra 121 (c), while his grandfather was the second time Consul (d). We find, that he was called by several names [A] till he was adopted into the Aurelian family, when he assumed that of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. His father dying while he was very young, he was educated by his grandfather, who procured him the best masters in every science, under whom he made a prodigious progress, and shewed the strongest marks of an excellent genius and a virtuous disposition [B]. Dion Cassius informs us (e), that he was related to the Emperor Hadrian, to whom he was very dear from his infancy, and who gave him, when he was but

(a) Capitol. in Vitâ Antonini Pii, c. 1.
(b) Ibid.
(c) Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. tom. 2. Part 2. p. 559. edit. 2. Bruxelles 1711.
(d) Capitol. ubi supra.
(e) Lib. 69.

[A] Called by several names.] When he was adopted by his grandfather by the father's side, he received his name M. Annius Verus; and Hadrian the Emperor instead of Verus used to call him Verissimus, on account of the rectitude and constancy of his mind (1). He has likewise this name given him in the apology of Justin Martyr (2). When he was adopted by Antoninus Pius he assumed the name of M. Ælius Aurelius Verus, because Aurelius was the name of Antoninus's family, and Ælius that of Hadrian's, into which he enter'd (3). When he became Emperor, he left the name of Verus to Lucius Commodus his adopted brother (4), and took that of Antoninus, under which he is generally represented in history. But he is distinguished from his predecessor Titus Antoninus, either by the name of Marcus, or the sirname of Philosophus, which is given him by the general consent of writers; for we do not find that he received it by any publick act, or the authority of the Senate (5).

(1) Dion. Cass. lib. 69. p. 779. edit. Wechel. 1606, apud Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. 4. p. 559.
(2) Apol. 2. p. 53. edit. Paris 1636.
(3) Tillemont, ubi supra.
(4) Capitol. in Vitâ Veri Imperat. c. 4. inter Hist. Augustæ Script. edit. Lugduni Batav. 1661.
(5) Tillemont, ubi supra.

[B] Shewed the strongest marks of an excellent genius and a virtuous disposition.] From his earliest infancy he behaved himself in so good a manner, that all his relations were highly fond of him. He assures us himself (6), that he had never been wanting in his duty to his father and mother, or any of his relations and friends; but he represents this with a great deal of modesty, by observing that they were all of them so good, as never to give him occasion to shew any marks of the ill humour which was natural to him. He had so grave and serene a turn of mind, that it is said neither joy nor grief ever made any alteration in his countenance (7). Annius Verus his grandfather, who adopted him, had him educated at his house by a Lady, whom he kept as his mistress. But Marcus Aurelius thanks the Gods, that he continued but a short time under so bad an education. It is probable that Hadrian would have him at his own palace. He acknowledges, that he owed the preservation of his chastity to the Gods (8); and Aristides the orator observes (9), that many persons indeed commend that virtue, but that he only was thought really to possess it, because he had been always superior to the charms of pleasure, which others are slaves to. While he was still very young he recommended to those who had the care of his estate, that they should act with mildness and humanity (10). He had warm sentiments of religion, which led him into all the mysteries of the pagan superstition. For when he was but eight years old, Hadrian placed him among the Salii or Priests of Mars, where he applied himself very industriously to

(6) De seipso, lib. 1. c. 14. edit. Lond. 1643.
(7) Tillem. pag. 561.
(8) Idem, ibid.
(9) Orat. 9.
(10) Tillem. ubi supra.

but ſix years of age, all the honours which his tender years were capable of. When he was ſixteen years of age he reſigned to his ſiſter Anna Cornificia, whom he had married to Numidius Quadratus, all the eſtate which had been left him by his father; and being adviſed by his mother to reſerve a part of it for himſelf, he told her that he ſhould be willing that ſhe ſhould give all her eſtate to his ſiſter, ſince he had a ſufficient fortune from his grandfather Annius Verus (f). Hadrian upon the death of Cejonius Commodus, whom he had adopted, in order to mitigate the ſenſe of his loſs, and at the ſame time to provide a worthy ſucceſſor for the Roman Empire, turned his eyes upon our Marcus Aurelius. But as he was then not eighteen years of age, and conſequently too young for ſo important a ſtation, he fixed upon Antoninus Pius, whom he adopted upon this condition, that the latter ſhould likewiſe adopt M. Aurelius, and Lucius Commodus, the ſon of Cejonius, who was then but ſeven or eight years old, and Hadrian's grandſon by adoption. Theſe adoptions were very probably executed the 25th of February A. D. 138 (g). Our young Prince was ſo far from being elated by this honour, that he received the account of it with a kind of terror and regret. Being aſked the reaſon of this, he urged the variety of inconveniences and difficulties which neceſſarily attend the poſſeſſion of the Government (h). The year following Hadrian appointed him Queſtor, though he had not yet attained the age preſcribed by the Laws (i). After Hadrian's deceaſe he married Fauſtina the daughter of Antoninus Pius [C], by whom he had ſeveral children [D]. In the year 139 he was inveſted with new honours by the Emperor Pius, amidſt

(f) Idem, pag. 568.

(g) Idem, pag. 568, 569.

(h) Capit. c. 5.

(i) Tillemont, p. 569.

to learn all their ceremonies. This diſpoſition continued in him during the whole courſe of his life; for before he began the war againſt the Marcomanni, he reſtored the worſhip of the Gods with great ſolemnity, and deferred his departure in order to perform all the proper ceremonies. This expoſed him to the ridicule of the Pagans themſelves; and there is a diſtich ſtill extant, in which the white oxen are introduced wiſhing that he might not return victorious, leſt he ſhould deſtroy the whole race of them in ſacrifices (11). However, we find that he condemned ſuperſtition in others, and thought that thoſe perſons ought to be confined to the iſlands, who made uſe of the name of the Deity to raiſe terrors in weak minds. He baniſhed a man, who was accuſed of having foretold a revolt. He prohibited likewiſe the people of Peluſium the worſhip of Serapis on account of the crimes, which were committed in thoſe myſteries. Nay, he profeſſes himſelf to be very incredulous with regard to what is ſaid concerning magic, enchantments, and other pretences of that nature (12). He was inſtructed very early in Learning and Philoſophy under the moſt eminent maſters, whom he always conſidered as perſons to whom he was extremely oblig'd, and whom he rewarded afterwards in a generous manner (13). The moſt diſtinguiſhed of them for eloquence were Herodes Atticus, and M. Cornelius Fronto, whom he raiſed to the Conſulſhip (14). He was very fond of the knowledge of antiquity; and he made collections from the writings of the Ancients to ſerve him in his old age. Aurelius Victor highly prefers him to Antoninus Pius with regard to eloquence. And yet he informs us himſelf (15), that he abandoned very ſoon the ſtudy of Rhetoric, Poetry, and other things of that nature; nay, that he had made little advantage of the time which he had employed in them; and he thanks Heaven, that he had no natural diſpoſition towards thoſe arts, becauſe he might otherwiſe perhaps have attached himſelf to them. He applied himſelf to the law very early under L. Volufius Metianus (16) or Mæcianus (17); which was of great advantage to him, when he had occaſion to adminiſter juſtice after he was Emperor, becauſe he was under no neceſſity of recurring to the Lawyers themſelves (18). Athenagoras in his Apology for the Chriſtian Religion (19), obſerves, that M. Aurelius was perfect in all kinds of learning, eſpecially in the opinions of the Philoſophers. And in reality his chief ſtudy was that of Philoſophy (20). From the twelfth year of his age he took the habit of a Philoſopher, that is the Greek pallium or cloak, and he inur'd himſelf to ſo ſevere a courſe of life, that he lay upon the ground. However, his mother's importunity obliged him at laſt to make uſe of a little bed, which he covered with ſkins (21). He thanks heaven (22), that ſince he was ſo extremely delighted with Philoſophy; he had not fallen into the hands of thoſe, who inſtead of the ſtudy of morality apply themſelves only to eloquence, like the Sophiſts, or to forming Syllogiſms and contemplating the Stars. He ſtudied the Peripatetic Philoſophy under Claudius Severus (23), whom he made Conſul in the year 163 (24); but he applied himſelf with more vigour to that of the Stoics under Apollonius Chalcedonius (25), whom Antoninus Pius had ſent for to Rome for that purpoſe (26), and likewiſe under Sextus Chæronenſis, the nephew of Plutarch, Junius Ruſticus, Claudius Maximus, and Cinna Catullus (27). Euſebius adds (28) to theſe Baſilides of Scythopolis, and as it ſeems Arrian likewiſe, the celebrated diſciple of Epictetus. He remarks himſelf (29) ſeveral important maxims for the conduct of life, which he had learned of Ruſticus, Apollonius, Sextus, Catullus, and Maximus. And he ranks among his maſters (30) Diognetus, who had engaged him in a love for Philoſophy, Bacchius, Tandaſides, and Marcian, Alexander the Platoniſt, and another Alexander the Grammarian, and Fronto, who had taught him eloquence. He always ſhewed the greateſt regard for his tutors, even after he was Emperor (31). He made ſo great a progreſs in Philoſophy, that he wrote Dialogues, while he was very young. But having learned this talent of Diognetus, he was adviſed by Ruſticus to diſcontinue that employment, becauſe there was more oſtentation in it than real advantage to a perſon of his rank (32). He was very aſſiduous in hearing the lectures of theſe Philoſophers, becauſe he was willing to learn ſomething of them; but in other reſpects he was perſuaded that there were very few, who were really Philoſophers, and conform'd themſelves to their own dictates; having found by experience, that moſt of them were not only avaricious and ſelf intereſted perſons, but likewiſe had no other deſign but to diſpute, and were actuated by a ſpirit of vanity, malignity and jealouſy (33).

(11) Idem, pag. 561, 562.

(12) Idem, pag. 562, 563.

(13) Capit. c. 3. and M. Antonin. de ſeipſo, lib. 1. cap. 14.

(14) Vide Caſauboni Not. in Capitol. Vit. Anton. c. 2.

(15) De Seipſo, lib. 1. c. 4. & 14.

(16) Capitol. cap. 3.

(17) Caſaubon. in eundem locum Capitol.

(18) Ariſtid. Orat. 9.

(19) P. 6. edit. Paris 1636.

(20) Capitol. c. 2.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) De Seipſo, lib. 1. c. 14.

(23) Capitol. c. 3.

(24) See Tillemont, p. 565.

(25) Capitol. cap. 2.

(26) Id. in Vit. Anton. Pii, cap. 10.

(27) Id. in Vitâ Anton. Philoſ. cap. 3.

(28) Chronic. ad ann. 146.

(29) De Seipſo, lib. 1. p. 5, 7, 11, 19.

(30) Ibid. p. 5 and 9.

(31) Tillemont, p. 565, 566.

(32) Id. p. 566.

(33) Galen. Prognoſt. tom. 3. p. 460. apud Tillem. ubi ſupra.

[C] Married Fauſtina the daughter of Antoninus Pius.] By the Emperor Hadrian's orders, when he was but fifteen years of age, he had the daughter of L. Cejonius Commodus betrothed to him (34), who is ſuppoſed to be the ſame Lady that is called Fabia in ſome paſſages of the hiſtorians; and on the other hand that Emperor had appointed, that Antoninus Pius ſhould give his daughter Annia Fauſtina to young Lucius (35). But after Hadrian's death, as Lucius was then but an infant, Antoninus Pius propoſed to M. Aurelius that he ſhould marry his daughter. He deſired ſome time to conſider of it, and at laſt reſolved upon it, and married Fauſtina in the year 146 at the furtheſt. But this marriage was far from being happy on account of the diſorderly conduct of Fauſtina and her ſon Commodus. And it appears that Fabia's character was not much more regular (36).

(34) Capitol. cap. 4.

(35) Tillem. p. 569.

(36) Idem, ibid.

[D] By whom he had ſeveral children.] He had a daughter by her in the beginning of the year 147, who probably was Lucilla, married about the year 164 to L. Verus, and afterwards to Pompeianus. He had ſeveral other daughters, three of whom were living in 193. Caracalla put one of them to death in 212, who was then very old, and had been extremely honoured by all the Emperors out of regard to her father's memory (37). He had likewiſe ſeveral ſons.

(37) Id. p. 570.

amidſt which he conducted himſelf in ſuch a manner as endeared him to that Prince and to the whole Empire [E]. Upon the death of Pius in the year 161 he was obliged by the Senate to take upon him the Government, in the management of which he made Lucius Verus his Collegue [F]. This was the firſt time that the Romans ſaw their Empire poſſeſſed by two Princes in conjunction, which was ſo ſurprizing a circumſtance, that ſome perſons fixed upon it as a new Æra (k). The ſame day he took upon him the name of Antoninus, which he gave likewiſe to Verus his Collegue, and betrothed his daughter Lucilla to him (l). The two Emperors went after this to the camp, where they promiſed a conſiderable ſum of money to the ſoldiers, and having performed the funeral of Pius, they pronounced both of them a panegyrick upon him (m). They diſcharged the Government together in a very amicable manner. Marcus Antoninus endeavoured by all proper methods to gain the love of the people, and Lucius Verus acted with the utmoſt modeſty and deference to his judgment and direction; ſo that the former in his Meditations (n) highly commends his brother's friendſhip and affection for him. It is ſaid (o), that ſoon after Antoninus had performed the Apotheoſis of his father Pius, petitions were preſented to him by the Pagan Prieſts, Philoſophers, and Governors of Provinces, in order to excite him to perſecute the Chriſtians, which he rejected with the utmoſt indignation [G]. But the happineſs which the Empire began to enjoy under the two brothers, was interrupted

(k) Id. p. 576.

(l) Capit. c. 7.

(m) Tillemont, p. 777.

(n) Lib. 1. c. 14.

(o) See Dr. Stanhope's Latin Tranſlation of Dacier's Life of M. Antoninus, printed at London in 4to, 1697, p. 7.

Commodus, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, and Antoninus Geminus were twins. They were born the 31ſt of Auguſt 161 in the Palace, their father being then Emperor, who often took Commodus in his arms, and preſented him to the ſoldiers, to recommend him to their protection. The Aſtrologers promiſed the ſame duration of life to theſe two children; but Antoninus died about four years after. He had another ſon in 163 named Severus, or rather Verus, who died in 170. Several medals give him the name of Annius Verus, to which ſome modern authors add that of Sextus upon the authority of Galen. Others believe, that this Sextus was a fourth ſon of M. Aurelius (38). Veriſſimus, whom Herodian (39) repreſents as the only brother of Commodus, becauſe that hiſtorian knew nothing perhaps of the others, who died before in their infancy, is probably Annius Verus, the name of Veriſſimus being likewiſe given him, as it had been to his father. And this agrees with what Herodian adds, that Veriſſimus died very young (40). We find in inſcriptions Titus Aurelius Antoninus, and T. Ælius Aurelius, ſon of M. Aurelius and grandſon of T. Antoninus. They muſt both have been born before the year 161, and before Commodus, as well as Fauſtina their ſiſter. For M. Aurelius is only ſtiled Cæſar in thoſe inſcriptions, tho' his wife Fauſtina has the title of Auguſta. Beſides Antoninus Pius has not the title of Divus given him, which ſhews that he was not then dead. But if theſe inſcriptions are the epitaphs of thoſe Princes, as it is very probable, their death muſt be placed as well as their birth before the month of April 161. This agrees with a letter, which Marcus Aurelius wrote, while he was yet Cæſar, to the city of Smyrna after the year 144, and evidently before 159, in which he thanks them for the compliment, which T. Atilius Maximus the Proconſul had ſent him in their name on the birth of his ſon, tho' the affair, ſays he, has had a different event; which words plainly intimate that the child was then dead (41).

(38) Id. p. 571.

(39) Lib. 1.

(40) Tillemont, p. 571.

(41) Idem, pag. 571, 572.

[E] Conducted himſelf in ſuch a manner as endeared him to that Prince and the whole Empire.] In the midſt of all the honours which he was poſſeſſed of, he ſtill applied himſelf to his ſtudies. But his chief care was to behave with the utmoſt ſubmiſſion to the Emperor Pius, and to regulate all his actions, words, and thoughts, according to his will and example (42). During twenty three years, which Antoninus Pius reigned, he was never but two nights abſent from him (43). He received all perſons with the ſame civility, as if he had been but a private man. He viſited his friends when they were ſick; he was conſtantly preſent at the ſchools of the Profeſſors; and he read perpetually the Greek and Latin Orators and Philoſophers. And unleſs he was with the Emperor, he always appeared in a plain brown habit (44), and without the torch, which it was the cuſtom to carry before the Cæſars and Emperors (45). There were ſome perſons who endeavoured to render him ſuſpected by Pius; but that wiſe Prince rejected their ſuggeſtions with the utmoſt contempt and indignation, ſince the probity and modeſty of M. Aurelius placed him above all the efforts of their malice. And the Emperor had ſo great a confidence in him, that he never beſtowed any poſts of importance without conſulting him (46). Ariſtides, in his ninth Oration, which is an Elogium upon Antoninus Philoſophus, tells us, that before he was raiſed to the Empire, he put a ſtop to ſeveral diſorders which were committed in the Government, in which many points, ſays he, were conducted in ſuch a manner, as was neither prudent nor juſt, but full of haughtineſs, violence and inſolence. And this Sophiſt ſeems afterwards to endeavour to decry the government of Pius, in order to raiſe the character of Philoſophus. But as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (47), in this caſe, he pays a greater regard to the cuſtom of Orators than to Truth; for it appears from the Hiſtorians, that the former was equal to the latter with regard to moderation and the care of the people. We ſhall add one inſtance of the humanity of temper for which both thoſe Emperors were diſtinguiſhed. M. Aurelius, upon the death of his tutor, could not refrain from tears, which expoſing him to the raillery of the Courtiers, Pius commended him for it, and ſaid, that neither Philoſophy, nor the Imperial Power ſhould prevent any perſon from feeling the affections of human nature. Inter argumenta pietatis ejus & hoc habetur, quod quum Marcus mortuum educatorem ſuum fleret, vocareturque ab aulicis miniſtris ab oſtentatione pietatis, ipſe dixerit: permitte (inquit) illi ut homo ſit; neque enim vel Philoſophia vel imperium tollit affectus (48). It is evident from the whole courſe of our Emperor's life, that he derived from the principles of the Stoics that equality of temper, which they aſcribe to their wiſe man under all circumſtances, and not ſuch a ſeverity, as repreſents tenderneſs and compaſſion as a crime.

(46) Capitol. c. 6.

(47) Id. p. 573.

(48) Capitolin. in Vitâ Anton. Pii, c. 10.

[F] He made Lucius Verus his Collegue.] Ariſtides in his ſixteenth Oration expatiates very amply upon this Act of M. Antoninus, which he repreſents as one of the greateſt that was ever done by any Prince, and upon the union of the two Emperors, which did not prevent the unity of the Empire, ſince there was but one will ſituated in two bodies and two ſouls. He tells us, that this was an example which they exhibited to the whole world, in order that mankind might have even Emperors to teach them that unanimity which ought to influence them, and that they might conſider one another as brethren, and remove all conteſts and diviſions, and give way to each other, and in ſhort ceaſe their diſputes about things, which are ſo prodigiouſly below the value of an Empire, and eſpecially the Empire of the Romans. Dion Caſſius (49) ſays, that the reaſon of his chooſing Lucius Verus for his Collegue, was that he might have leiſure to purſue his ſtudies, and on account of the ill ſtate of his health. For Lucius was of a ſtrong and vigorous conſtitution, and conſequently more capable of the fatigues of war.

(49) Lib. 71.

(42) Capitol. in Vit. Anton. Philoſ. c. 5.

(43) Idem, c. 7.

(44) Μυανδύας φαίας.

(45) See Dion. Caſſ. p. 721, 722. edit. Valeſ. Paris 1634.

[G] Which he rejected with the utmoſt indignation.] They had requeſted him to grant them leave to inflict puniſhments upon the Chriſtians, who had been ſecured before by the clemency of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. Our Emperor, whoſe averſion to cruelty was rupted in the year 162 by a dreadful inundation of the river Tiber, which deſtroyed a prodigious number of cattle, and occaſioned a famine at Rome (p). This calamity was followed by the Parthian war, and at the ſame time the Catti ravaged Germany and Rhætia; and an inſurrection was apprehended from the Britons, againſt whom Calphurnius Agricola was ſent, and Aufidius Victorinus againſt the Catti. But it was thought proper that Lucius Verus ſhould go in perſon to oppoſe the Parthians, while Antoninus continued at Rome, where his preſence was neceſſary [H]. During this war with the Parthians about the year 163 or 164 he ſent his daughter Lucilla to Verus, having before promiſed her to him in marriage, and attended her as far as Brunduſium; reſolving to have conducted her to Syria, if it had not been objected to him by ſome perſons, that his deſign of going into the Eaſt was to claim the honour of having finiſhed the Parthian war; upon which he immediately returned to Rome (q). The Romans having gained a victory over the Parthians, who were obliged to abandon Meſopotamia, the two Emperors triumph'd over them at Rome in the year 166, and were honoured with the title of Fathers of their Country (r). But this year was fatal on account of a terrible peſtilence which ſpread itſelf over the whole world [I], and a famine, under which Rome laboured. The Marcomanni, and many other people of Germany, likewiſe took up arms was equal to that of his predeceſſors, and who followed their ſteps in every thing that was commendable, was deaf to their entreaties, and reſolved to interpoſe his authority for the protection of the Chriſtians by writing a letter to the common Aſſembly of Aſia, which was then held at Epheſus. Euſebius has preſerved this letter (50), which is as follows. "I "know, ſays he, that the Gods themſelves take "care that ſuch men do not lie concealed. For it is "much more proper for them to puniſh thoſe who "refuſe to worſhip them, than it is for you; for you "add a greater confirmation to the doctrines of thoſe "againſt whom you are enraged, by accuſing them "as impious perſons; becauſe it is a much greater "gratification to them to be tried and condemned "to death for the ſake of their Deity, than to con"tinue ſecure from danger. By this means they be"come victorious, being reſolved to loſe their lives "rather than ſubmit to do what you command. But "with regard to earthquakes, which either have or "do happen, it is proper to give you ſome advice, "ſince your minds are dejected upon ſuch accidents, "and to urge you to compare your own caſe with theirs. "It is certain, that they place a greater confidence in "their God upon ſuch occaſions. But you are guilty "of great errors in your conduct all the while, and "neglect the Gods, and diſregard the proper ceremo"nies of religion, and the worſhip of the immortal "Being; while you baniſh the Chriſtians, who reverence "him, and perſecute them even to death. Several of the "Governors of the provinces have given my Divine "Father an account of theſe men; and his anſwer to "them was, that they ſhould not be injured in any "manner, unleſs they appeared to attempt any thing "againſt the commonwealth. I have likewiſe re"ceived accounts from many perſons concerning them, "to whom I anſwered agreeably to my father's con"ſtitution in that point. If any man ſhould ſtill con"tinue to diſturb any one of them merely for being "a Chriſtian, let the accuſed perſon be acquitted, "tho' he ſhould really prove to be ſo; and let the "accuſer be puniſhed." Valeſius obſerves upon this paſſage of Euſebius, that this hiſtorian was miſtaken in aſcribing the letter abovementioned to Antoninus Pius, ſince it was evidently written by Marcus Antoninus, as appears by the inſcription of it, in the firſt year of his reign, when he was the third time Conſul. See the Faſti of Onuphrius ad annum Urbis 914. The author of the Alexandrian Chronicle was ſenſible of this miſtake of Euſebius, but he err'd in placing it under the 10th year of M. Antoninus. John Zonaras has adopted Euſebius's error; for he tells us, that Juſtin Martyr preſented his apology for the Chriſtians to Antoninus Pius, who was ſo highly affected by it, that he ſent an edict to the common aſſembly of Aſia, to prevent any Chriſtian from being puniſhed, and that the accuſed ſhould be diſmiſſed, and the accuſer puniſhed. Father Halloix in his notes upon the life of Juſtin Martyr (51), aſſerts, that this letter belongs to Antoninus Pius, but his reaſons ſeem very inconcluſive, as appears from Valeſius (52). Mr. Echard in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (53) has fallen into the ſame error.

(p) Tillemont, p. 579.

(q) Idem, pag. 588, 589.

(r) Id. p. 593.

(50) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. c. 13.

(51) Cap. 5.

(52) In Annot. ad lib. 4. c. 13. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Euſeb.

(53) Vol. 2. B. 3. c. 12. pag. 475. edit. 2. in 8vo 1710.

[H] Continued at Rome, where his preſence was neceſſary.] He ſhewed there many inſtances of his goodneſs and wiſdom, being wholly employed in promoting the advantage of mankind; in rewarding merit, and drawing over ill men by generoſity and forgiveneſs. He paid greater honour to the Senate than any of his predeceſſors, and treated the people in the ſame manner, as they had been, while they enjoyed their liberty. He frequently referred to the Senate thoſe cauſes, which uſed to be determined by the Emperors. And to do greater honour to it in its members, he commiſſioned thoſe, who had been in poſts, to decide affairs. He appointed Senators to be patrons of cities. He raiſed ſuch of them to conſiderable employments, as were neceſſitous, and at the ſame time men of character. When any accuſation was preferred againſt them, he examined it privately before it became publick, and would not permit the Knights to be preſent at ſuch trials. He came regularly to the Senate like an ordinary Senator. He applied himſelf vigorouſly to the adminiſtration of juſtice, making great uſe of the advice of his Prefects and Lawyers, and eſpecially of that of Scævola (54). When he heard any cauſes (which he conſtantly did even in the midſt of the wars, if he had any leiſure,) he granted the advocates a conſiderable time, and he was very exact in interrogating the parties, and examining them, ſo that he was ſometimes ten or twelve whole days upon one cauſe (55). Ariſtides tells us (56), that even thoſe, who were condemned by him, were obliged to own that his ſentences were juſt. He generally abated ſomething of the puniſhments preſcribed by the laws. But in great crimes he was abſolutely inexorable. He puniſhed faults without hating thoſe who were guilty of them, having no other view than to correct either the delinquents themſelves, or others by their example (57). A Pretor having executed his office in a very exceptionable manner, he would not deprive him of it, but ſuſpended him from the exerciſe of it (58). Notwithſtanding this mildneſs, we find that he obliged the people of Nice to ſend every year to Rome a certain quantity of corn, by way of Mulct upon them for having beaten to death one of their fellow citizens, whoſe name was Hipparchus, a man of an extraordinary genius. This fine continued to the time of Conſtantine, who remitted it (59).

(54) Capitol. c. 10, 11, 12.

(55) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 71.

(56) Orat. 9.

(57) Idem, ibid.

(58) Capitol. cap. 12.

(59) Tillem. p. 587.

[I] This year was fatal on account of a terrible peſtilence, which ſpread itſelf over the whole world.] It was brought from the Eaſt by the Roman army; and it was ſaid to have been a judgment inflicted upon them for their treachery towards the city of Seleucia, which had admitted them as friends, and yet they burnt it to the ground, and deſtroyed a prodigious multitude of men (60). As the ſoldiers were plundering a temple of Apollo in Seleucia, according to Ammianus Marcellinus (61), or in the country of Babylon, in which Seleucia was ſituated, according to Capitolinus (62), they found a little coffer of gold, conſecrated by magical ceremonies; which being opened, there iſſued forth ſuch a peſtilential vapour, as infected all Parthia, and afterwards the whole world. However, thoſe who wrote at that time, before this plague had paſſed from Parthia to the Roman Empire, tell us (63), that it began in Ethiopia, from whence it ſpread thro' Egypt into the greateſt part of Parthia,

(60) Id. p. 594.

(61) Lib. 23.

(62) In Vitâ Veri, c. 8.

(63) Lucian. Hiſt. p. 355. apud Tillemont, ubi ſupra.

arms againſt the Romans, to oppoſe whom the two Emperors marched in perſon, and reduced the Barbarians to deſire peace [K]. However they renewed the war the year following, which obliged the two Emperors to march againſt them; but Lucius Verus was ſeized with an apoplectic fit and died at Altinum. In the year 170 Antoninus made vaſt preparations againſt the Germans [L], and proſecuted the war with prodigious vigour. While he reſided at Sirmium in Pannonia he ſhewed an inſtance of great generoſity to Herodes Atticus [M]. In 174 a very extraordinary circumſtance happened, for during his war with the Germans his army was unfortunately encloſed by the Quadi in a very diſadvantageous place, where there was no poſſibility of procuring water. The Romans were involved in the moſt dreadful exigence imaginable; they were diſpirited with their fatigue and wounds, oppreſſed with heat and thirſt, and incapable of retiring or engaging the enemy; when in an inſtant the ſky was covered with clouds, and there fell a prodigious quantity of rain. The Roman army immediately applied themſelves to quench their thirſt, when the Barbarians came upon them with ſuch fury, that they would undoubtedly have been defeated, if they had not been relieved by a violent ſhower of hail, and a ſtorm of lightning, which fell upon the enemy, without the leaſt annoyance to the Romans, who by this means gained the victory. In this manner Dion Caſſius relates thia, and eſpecially at Niſibis. This plague ſeemed to follow Verus from province to province, and in proportion as he marched towards Rome, it advanc'd likewiſe (64). It reached even Gaul and as far as the Rhine. In ſhort, it diſperſed itſelf over the whole world, and made a prodigious ravage among mankind for ſeveral years. It deſtroyed armies, and depopulated provinces, eſpecially Italy, according to Oroſius, who deſcribes it more amply than the other writers (65). Galen, who began then to diſtinguiſh himſelf in the practice of phyſick, mentions it in divers paſſages of his writings. It cut off ſeveral perſons of eminence. The bodies of the poor were carried out in carts, and the Emperor ordered them to be buried at the publick charge (66). Alexander, who pretended to be the prophet of Æſculapius in Paphlagonia, had given out a verſe, which intimated that Apollo would remove this peſtilence; and many perſons wrote this verſe over their doors, imagining that Apollo would prevent the plague from entering their houſes. But Lucian aſſures us (67), that in thoſe houſes there died the greateſt number of people their abſurd confidence in Apollo very probably inducing them to neglect the neceſſary precautions. There was likewiſe another impoſtor, who declared publickly at Rome, that the end of the world was near, and that fire would fall from Heaven as ſoon as he had thrown himſelf off a tree in the Campus Martius, and was turned into a ſtork; and accordingly he caſt himſelf down, and let a ſtork fly out of his boſom. This fraud was managed by him in concert with ſome others, who had reſolved to ſet fire to the city and plunder it. He confeſſed the whole ſcheme when he was brought before the Emperor, who had the generoſity to pardon him. Plano cuidam, qui diripiendæ urbis occaſionem cum quibuſdam conſciis requirens, de caprifico arbore in campo Martio concionabundus, ignem de cœlo lapſurum, finemque Mundi affore diceret, ſi ipſe lapſus ex arbore in ciconiam verteretur; quum ſtatuto tempore diciciſſet, atque ex ſinu ciconiam emiſiſſet, perducto ad ſe atque confeſſo veniam daret (68).

(64) Capitol. ubi ſupra.

(65) Lib. 7. cap. 15.

(66) Capitol. in Vit. Anton. Philoſ. c. 13.

(67) Pſeudomantis, p. 488, 489. edit. Paris 1615.

(68) Capitol. ubi ſupra.

[K] Reduc'd the Barbarians to deſire peace.] The war, in which he was engaged againſt them, is repreſented by the hiſtorians as the moſt formidable, which was ever heard of, and they compare it to the Punic wars. All the barbarous nations from Gaul to the extremity of Illyricum towards the Eaſt united againſt the Romans. They took and plunder'd divers cities and provinces, and defeated ſeveral armies (69). The approach of the two Emperors ſtruck ſome terror upon thoſe who were in arms. When they were come to Aquileia, moſt of their Kings retired beyond the Danube with their forces, and even killed thoſe who had engaged them in the war. The Quadi, who had loſt their King, promiſed not to crown him, whom they had choſen in the room of the former, till they had gained the conſent of the Emperors. Thus all things were diſpoſed towards a peace, and moſt of the Barbarians ſent Embaſſadors either to the Emperors or the Roman Generals to deſire pardon for their revolt. Verus, who had quitted the pleaſures of Rome with great reluctance, was impatient to return immediately upon this. But Antoninus, who was perſuaded, that the Barbarians pretended only to be inclined towards peace, out of apprehenſion of the Roman armaments, thought it was neceſſary to march nearer them; and having continued ſome time at Aquileia to give the proper orders, while Lucius was only employed in his diverſions, he paſſed over the Alps with him, and ſettled whatever was expedient for the ſecurity of Illyricum and Italy, and then returned to Rome (70).

(69) Tillemont, p. 597.

(70) Id. p. 600, 601.

[L] Made vaſt preparations againſt the Germans.] The importance of this war made this very neceſſary. The peſtilence which ſtill continued having conſiderably leſſened the number of his forces, he inliſted the ſlaves, (as had been done in the time of Hannibal,) the gladiators, and even the banditti of Dalmatia and Dardania. He found likewiſe ſome Germans, who for pay would conſent to fight againſt their own nation. But the treaſury being exhauſted by ſuch vaſt expences, and he being unwilling to load the people with new taxes, expoſed to ſale for two months together all the rich furniture of the crown, the ſtatues and pictures of value, and even the ſilk cloaths of his Empreſs, and a great number of pearls, of which Hadrian had made a private collection. By this means he raiſed money ſufficient to give the people an extraordinary largeſs that year, to ſupport the war againſt the Marcomanni for five years, and to purchaſe again afterwards part of what he had ſold then (71).

(71) Idem, pag. 607; and Capitolin. c. 17.

[M] Shewed an inſtance of generoſity to Herodes Atticus.] There happened a prodigious conteſt between this Herodes and the city of Athens, which was ſupported then by the two Quintilii, who were extreamly beloved by the Emperor, and governed Greece at that time. It was imagined likewiſe that Antoninus had ſome reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Herodes; and he was generally inclined to favour the people. He received Demonſtratus, who was deputed from the Athenians, with great civility, and took particular care that he ſhould have every thing neceſſary granted him. The Empreſs Fauſtina likewiſe eſpouſed their cauſe, and a little daughter of three years of age, which ſhe then had with her, amidſt her fondneſſes and careſſes of her father, threw herſelf at his knees, and begged him with her liſping voice to preſerve the city of Athens. Beſides this, a thunderbolt had fallen upon the place where Herodes lodged, and killed two young daughters of Alcimedon his freedman, whom he had brought up, and was extremely fond of. All theſe circumſtances threw Herodes into ſuch a fury, that when the day came, in which the affair was to be heard before the Emperor, he was incapable of ſaying any thing, which might have been expected from the moſt eloquent man of all Greece, but began a violent declamation againſt the Emperor himſelf without any manner of diſguiſe, ſo far as to reproach him for having abandoned him to a woman and an infant of three years old. And when Baſſeus the Prefect of the Pretorium told him, that ſuch a manner of acting might endanger his life, he replied, that a man of his age had nothing to fear, and then went away immediately. Antoninus heard all this without ſhewing by the leaſt geſture, that he was at all affected by it. And when Herodes was gone, he only told the advocates of the Athenians, that they might alledge their reaſons, without troubling themſelves whether lates the ſtory (s). This wonderful event is aſcribed to the prayers of the Chriſtians [N]. In 175 Antoninus made a treaty with ſeveral nations of Germany, and acted with great mildneſs even towards thoſe whom he had ſubdued (t). Soon after this Avidius Caſſius Governor of Syria revolted from the Emperor, who concealed the news of it for ſome time, till at laſt he was obliged to declare it to his ſoldiers, in a ſpeech full of moderation, wherein he only reproached Caſſius for making ſo ill a return for the friendſhip he had ſhewn him, and ſhould continue to do, as he hoped to prove to the world by his manner of treating him, when he had reduced him. But this war was concluded by the death of Caſſius, who was killed by a Centurion named Anthony (u). The Emperor ſhewed the utmoſt ther he agreed to it or not. He heard them without ſaying any thing himſelf, and ſhed tears when they came to ſpeak of the methods, by which they pretended that Herodes and his freedmen had oppreſſed the people. However it is ſaid, that he did not paſs any ſentence againſt him, but only againſt his ſervants, upon whom he inflicted a very ſlight puniſhment, and even exempted Alcimedon from it, imagining him to have ſufficiently ſuffered by the death of his two children. After this Herodes having written to him to complain, that he did not receive letters from him any longer, whereas before this he had frequently done him that honour; the Emperor wrote to him a long anſwer, full of proteſtations of friendſhip, and even made him excuſes, that he was oblig'd to condemn thoſe perſons, who were his dependents (72).

(s) Lib. 71.

(t) Tillemont, p. 628, 629, 630.

(u) Dio. lib. 71.

(72) Philoſtrat. de Vit. Sophiſt. 27. p. 558. edit. Paris 1608. apud Tillem. p. 615, 616.

[N] This wonderful event is aſcribed to the prayers of the Chriſtians.] It is particularly celebrated by Tertullian (73), Euſebius (74), Julius Capitolinus (75), Themiſtius in a diſcourſe to Theodoſius (76), St. Jerom (77), St. Gregory Nyſſen (78), Claudian (79), and the Alexandrian Chronicle, which copies Euſebius. Baronius mentions an image, which he tells us is to be found at Rome in the famous pillar of Antoninus, among the other great actions, which that Emperor performed in the war againſt the Marcomanni (80); and Themiſtius (81) ſpeaks of another, which he had ſeen relating to that ſurprizing event. The Pagans and the Chriſtians, as Mr. Tillemont informs us (82), have equally acknowledged the truth of this prodigy; but the former have diſſented from the latter with regard to the cauſe of it. Dion Caſſius refers it (83) to the power of an Egyptian Magician named Arnuphis, who was in the Emperor's retinue; and other writers, as Suidas, aſcribe it to one Julian, who was originally deſcended from Chaldea, and was likewiſe a Magician, and is ſaid to have been the author of ſeveral books, as well as his father Julian; and ſeveral other writers (84) place one Julian among the celebrated Magicians. Capitolinus, Themiſtius, and Claudian, in the paſſages abovecited, aſcribe it to the Emperor himſelf. In Antoninus's pillar the Glory of it is aſcribed to Jupiter the God of rain and thunder (85), as Tertullian tells us (86) the Pagans always uſed to do, whenever the ſervants of the true God had obtained rain from Heaven by their prayers and faſtings. But the Chriſtians, as appears from Euſebius (87), affirmed that God granted this favour at the prayer of the Chriſtian ſoldiers, who were in the Roman army, who deſired this upon their knees, agreeably to their manner of praying, ſays that hiſtorian, and as St. Gregory obſerves (88), after they had ſeparated themſelves from the reſt of the army. The firſt authority which Euſebius alledges in proof of this, is that of Apollinarius Biſhop of Hierapolis, who was contemporary with this miracle. But as Mr. Tillemont remarks (89), it were to be wiſhed, that the hiſtorian had cited Apollinarius's own words. However, we ſhall ſtate the arguments in favour of this miracle, as they are repreſented in the abovementioned Mr. Tillemont, who tells us, that the Chriſtians, whoſe prayers ſaved the Roman army in this exigence, belonged to the legion called Melitene, or, as Xiphilin tells us (90), the legion, which was raiſed or ſtationed at Melitene, a city in leſſer Armenia upon the banks of the river Euphrates; which is very probable, for the legions generally took their names from the provinces, in which they were quartered (91). And St. Gregory Nyſſen aſſures us (92), that the legion, which obtained this victory, had been ſtation'd in a city near Cappadocia. He adds, that they had received the Chriſtian faith by means of a viſion; which, as Mr. Tillemont ſays, makes probable what Xiphilin obſerves, that this legion was entirely compoſed of Chriſtians. It was probably the twelfth legion, which Titus had fixed in the city of Melitene in the year 70 (93), and which was plac'd about the year 130 in Cappadocia (94), under which the leſſer Armenia might then be included. And the Notitia of the Empire a long time after fixes the twelfth legion at Melitene. It was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Thundering Legion (95); and Apollinarius tells us, according to Euſebius (96), that the legion of Melitene received that title from the Emperor as a reward for this miracle. Xiphilin aſſerts the ſame (97); and Onuphrius in his Faſti (98) confirms it, and affirms that till Antoninus's time there was never any mention of the Thundering Legion. But we find by an inſcription, that the twelfth legion had that title under Trajan (99). Euſebius remarks as a very extraordinary thing, that this legion ſubſiſted in his time (100); and it produced then the forty martyrs of Sebaſte, who were ſo celebrated in the church (101). But the moſt conſiderable evidence of the truth of this miracle, is the letter, which the Emperor himſelf wrote, according to Tertullian (102), and which is ſaid to be the ſame, which Dion Caſſius tells us (103) he ſent to the Senate upon his victory. Tertullian aſſures us, that in this letter he aſcribed this prodigy to the prayers of the Chriſtians, tho' he ſpoke with ſome kind of doubt, (Chriſtianorum forte militum precationibus impetrato imbre) not venturing to ſpeak more poſitively, that he might not deſtroy the Pagan ſuperſtition. Mr. Tillemont obſerves, that by the manner, in which Tertullian ſpeaks of this letter, and urges it againſt the Pagans, there is no reaſon to doubt but that he had ſeen it, and that conſequently whatever he relates is ſufficiently authentic. Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory cites this from Tertullian; but in his Chronicle mentions it only as a thing, which was reported, and ſays, that every one may determine upon this as he thinks proper: Ἀλλὰ ταῦτα μὲν ὅπῃ τις ἐθέλῃ τιθέσθω. But St. Jerom in tranſlating this paſſage, ſays poſitively that it was then extant. Oroſius (104) and Xiphilin (105) only tell us, that it was believed to be extant in their time, without mentioning that they had ſeen it. We have indeed at preſent a letter aſcribed to Antoninus Philoſophus concerning the victory, which he had gained by means of the Chriſtians. It is publiſhed in Greek at the end of the apologies of Juſtin Martyr, and in Latin in Onuphrius's Faſti (106) and Baronius (107), tranſlated, according to their accounts, from the Greek text, which was a tranſlation before from the original Latin. They received them both as authentic; tho', as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (108), it is very difficult to follow their opinion. For not to inſiſt upon the barbarous and almoſt unintelligible ſtyle of this letter, eſpecially in the Greek, it informs us, that this miracle happened when the Germans were three or four leagues diſtant from the Romans; that the army conſiſted but of four legions, which are named there, without any mention of the twelfth, which is ſtiled the Thundering Legion, or the legion of Melitene; that the Chriſtians, who were in the army, were averſe to the uſe of arms: and it commands, that the Chriſtians who were proſecuted, ſhould be acquitted, even tho' they perſiſted in their religion, and their accuſers be burnt alive. Scaliger in his Notes upon Euſebius's Chronicon (109) obſerves ſeveral other marks of forgery in it, which would be too long to mention, and from which he makes no difficulty to conclude, that this piece is abſolutely ſpurious, and was not written even till after the time of Juſtinian. He has been followed in this by other writers; and Mr. Tillemont acknowledges (110), that it is not eaſy to anſwer the reaſons, which he alledges, or the others, which might be added to them. Mr. Echard in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (111) inſiſts very ſtrongly upon the authority of the letter of Antoninus,

(73) Ad Scap. c. 4.
(74) Eccleſ. Hiſt. l. 5. c. 5.
(75) In Vit. Anton. Philoſ. c. 24.
(76) P. 191. b. edit. Harduin. Paris 1684.
(77) Chron.
(78) De Quadr. Martyr. Orat. 2. tom. 3. edit. Paris 1638.
(79) De ſexto Honorii Conſulat.
(80) Baron. Annal. ad ann. 176. § 24. edit. Ant. 1612.
(81) Orat. 15. p. 191. b. apud Tillem. p. 620.
(82) Pag. 621. Art. 16.
(83) Lib. 71.
(84) Porphyr. Vit. p. 80. apud Tillem. ubi ſupra.
(85) Baron. ubi ſupra. § 24, 25.
(86) Ad Scap. c. 4.
(87) Ubi ſupra.
(88) Ubi ſupra.
(89) Pag. 622.
(90) Epit. Dion. lib. 71.
(91) Rom. Ill. p. 57. edit. Amſtelod. 1657.
(92) Ubi ſupra.

(93) Joſeph. de Bello Jud. lib. 7. cap. 4.
(94) Dion. l. 55.
(95) Idem, ibid.
(96) Ubi ſupra.
(97) Epit. Dion. lib. 71.
(98) P. 233. c. edit. Heidelberg. 1588.
(99) Baron. ad ann. 176. § 19. Scaliger. Not. in Euſeb. Chron. p. 233. edit. Lugduni Batav. 1658. apud Tillem. p. 623.
(100) Eccl. Hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 5.
(101) Gregor. Nyſſen. ubi ſupra.
(102) Apol. c. 5.
(103) Lib. 71.
(104) Hiſt. l. 7. c. 17.
(105) Ubi ſupra.
(106) Pag. 234.
(107) Ad ann. 176. § 22.
(108) Notes ſur les Empereurs M. Aurele & L. Verus, Not. 15. tom. 2. Part 3. p. 982.
(109) P. 223. See Pagi's Critica in Annales Baronii, ad ann. 174. § 2.
(110) Ubi ſupra, p. 983.
(111) B. 3. cap. 13. ad ann. 174.

utmoſt lenity towards thoſe who had been engaged in his party [O]. Tertullian obſerves, that no Chriſtian was found involved in that, or any other attempt againſt the perſon or authority of Antoninus (w). The Emperor immediately after this conferred the Conſulſhip upon Pompeianus, who had married his daughter Lucilla, the widow of Lucius Verus, and made his own ſon Commodus Tribune, at the requeſt of the Senate (x). He carried him along with him into the Eaſt, together with his wife Fauſtina, who died ſuddenly at the foot of Mount Taurus, in a town called Halala, which he afterwards made a Colony, and built a temple to her there (y). We ſhall not enter into the character of that Lady here; but only obſerve, that ſhe was unworthy of being the daughter and wife to two ſuch great men as Antoninus Pius and Antoninus Philoſophus, the latter of whom, notwithſtanding her ill conduct, paid the greateſt honours to her memory. Antoninus in the year 176 viſited Syria and Egypt, and though the inhabitants of Alexandria had complimented Caſſius in the higheſt manner, yet he treated them with the utmoſt humanity, and lived in Egypt only as a Citizen and a Philoſopher. All the Eaſtern Nations received inſtances of his moderation and wiſdom (z). The Kings of thoſe countries, and even Embaſſadors from Parthia came to viſit him, and he renewed the peace with them (aa). He ſtaid ſeveral days at Smyrna [P], and after he had ſettled the affairs of the Eaſt, he went to Athens, where he was initiated into the myſteries of Ceres, and entered alone into

(w) Tertullian, ad Scapul. c. 2. p. 85, 86. apud Tillemont, pag. 642, 643.

(x) Tillemont, p. 644.

(y) Capitol. cap. 26.

(z) Tillemont, p. 649.

(aa) Idem, ibid.

toninus, cited by Tertullian, within twenty ſix years after, as he obſerves, and in a ſolemn apology in behalf of Chriſtianity, which he durſt not have done, had not the thing been paſt diſpute. The miſtake, continues he, about the Thundering Legion, the ſpurious letter now remaining, and the additions made to this ſtory in after ages, can do no real prejudice to the truth of the hiſtory itſelf. Mr. Wotton, in his notes at the end of his life of this Emperor, has likewiſe examined this point, and determines in favour of the miracle. But this queſtion has been debated with great accuracy between the learned Mr. Moyle and Mr. K. in a courſe of letters publiſhed in the ſecond volume of Mr. Moyle's works, in which that Gentleman endeavours to explode the ſtory of the Thundering Legion; which occaſioned Mr. Whiſton to publiſh an anſwer in 1726, entitled, Of the Thundering Legion; or of the miraculous Deliverance of Marcus Antoninus and his army upon the prayers of the Chriſtians.

[O] Shewed the utmoſt lenity towards thoſe, who had been engaged in his party.] He would not put to death nor impriſon, nor even ſit in judgment himſelf upon any of the Senators, who had been involv'd in Caſſius's revolt; but he referred them to the Senate, fixing a day for their appearance, as if it had been a mere civil affair (112). Tiberius indeed would have ſent them to the Senate, that they might have been condemned with greater rigour, than he durſt have uſed himſelf; but ſuch cruel hypocriſy was far from the diſpoſition of Antoninus (113). For he wrote to the Senate to deſire them to act with indulgence rather than ſeverity; not to ſhed the blood of any Senator or perſon of quality, or of any other perſon whatſoever; but to allow this honour to his reign, that even under the misfortune of a rebellion none had loſt their lives, except in the firſt heat of the tumult. "And I wiſh, ſaid he, that I could even reſtore to "life many of thoſe who have been killed; for it "is never thought well of, that a Prince ſhould re"venge his own injuries. And though he does no"thing but what is juſt, yet he is conſidered at leaſt "as too ſevere." Utinam poſſem multos etiam ab inferis excitare. Non enim unquam placet in imperatore Vindicta ſui doloris; quæ etſi juſtior fuerit acrior videtur (114). He deſired then that they would pardon Caſſius's wife, and ſon-in-law, and children, or rather treat them as innocent perſons, ſince they had done nothing which could render them criminal; and that they would leave them what he had given them, that is, above half of their father's and mother's eſtate, with all the moveable goods, and the liberty of going whither they thought proper, in order that they might be living examples of the mildneſs of the Senate (115). He deſired likewiſe in general, that all the Roman Senators and Knights, who were privy to the revolt, ſhould be exempted from death, proſcription, and infamy, and in ſhort from all preſent and future penalties, and even from the diſgrace of their crime. He extended this favour to thoſe, who had already been puniſhed; moving that thoſe, who were baniſhed, ſhould be recalled, and thoſe, who had been proſcribed, ſhould have their eſtates reſtored. Themiſtius in his ſeventh oration propoſes the behaviour and moderation of the Emperor upon this occaſion, as a model for

(112) Dion. Caſſ. edit. Val. p. 717.

(113) Tillem. Hiſt. des Emp. tom. 2. Part 2. p. 637, 638.

(114) Vulcat. Gallican. in Vit. Avidii Caſſii, inter Hiſt. Aug. Scriptores, c. 12.

(115) Idem, ibid. and Capitol. in Vit. Anton. Philoſ. c. 26.

Princes. And this rebellion of Caſſius ſerved to raiſe his character for lenity, and to ſhew that nothing was capable of ſurmounting it; neither the greatneſs of their crime, who had taken arms againſt his own and his ſon's life, nor the apprehenſion, that the pardon, which he extended, would induce others to the ſame attempts. He was far from inventing falſe conſpiracies, that he might have a pretence to puniſh the innocent, ſince he pardoned an inexcuſable crime in ſo many men of the higheſt rank, and ſo many foreign Princes, without taking any revenge either by himſelf or the Senate, or under the pretext of any other faults (116). Nay it is ſaid, that he did great ſervices to many of thoſe who had attempted againſt his life (117). Ariſtides the Sophiſt in his ninth Oration has not omitted this virtue of the Emperor, and makes uſe of it to ſhew, that he was not only exempt from all violence of temper, but likewiſe through an extraordinary greatneſs and generoſity of ſoul was ſuperior to envy, which cannot ſuffer any thing great in others, and to that timidity and meanneſs of ſpirit, which leads men to take exceſſive precautions againſt evils, which may be apprehended. What fortified him particularly againſt ſuch baſe fears, which occaſion real misfortunes to prevent imaginary ones, was, that he was perſuaded that the Univerſe being governed by the juſtice and wiſdom of the Deity, a Prince never falls under the power of his enemies without his own demerit. This he proved to have been the caſe of all the former Emperors. And with regard to Galba, who ſeemed to have been the moſt innocent of thoſe, who had been killed, he appeared to be extremely avaritious; "which, ſaid "he, is an enormous vice in an Emperor." Nam de Pertinace (118) & Galba paria ſentiebat, quum diceret in imperatore avaritiam eſſe acerbiſſimum malum (119). In ſhort, he obſerv'd, that neither Auguſtus, nor Trajan, nor Hadrian, nor his father Antoninus Pius could be deſtroyed by the attacks of the rebels, tho' they were very numerous, and were never puniſhed but againſt the conſent or knowledge of thoſe Emperors (120).

(116) Dion. Excerpt. p. 718, 721. ed. Valeſ.
(117) Id. Hiſt. lib. 71.

(118) This muſt be an error in the Hiſtorian, or the manuſcript copies of his hiſtory; for Pertinax ſucceeded Commodus the ſon of Antoninus.
(119) Vulcat. Gallican. in Vit. Avid. Caſſii, c. 8.
(120) Idem, ibid.

[P] He ſtaid ſeveral days at Smyrna.] While he continued at Smyrna, he was viſited by all the perſons of diſtinction there. But Ariſtides the Sophiſt, many of whoſe orations are ſtill extant, and who was very eminent for his eloquence, was three days without paying his compliments to the Emperor. At laſt he was introduced to him by the two Quintilii, and told him, that the reaſon of his not waiting upon him before, was, becauſe he was engaged in the compoſition of a piece. Antoninus was pleaſed with the frankneſs of his declaration, and deſired to hear it read to him; which Ariſtides agreed to on condition, that his ſcholars ſhould be admitted, and have the liberty of clapping their hands by way of applauſe. The Emperor ſmiling granted the favour immediately, and entertained a very great regard for the Sophiſt from that time (121). We have a panegyric of his upon Antoninus, written after the revolt of Caſſius, and the conqueſt of the Germans, when the Empire, which had been before agitated by ſo many commotions, enjoyed a perfect tranquillity (122). This coincides with the preſent year; but it does not appear, that the oration was pronounced before the Emperor.

(121) Philoſt. de Vitis Sophiſtar. 35. p. 579. d. edit. Paris 1608, apud Tillemont, p. 649, 650.
(122) Ariſtid. Orat. 9.

into the moſt ſecret place (bb). He conferred divers honours upon that city, and appointed publick Profeſſors there [Q]. From thence he returned to Rome with his ſon Commodus, whom he choſe Conſul for the year following, though he was then but in the ſixteenth year of his age, having obtained a diſpenſation for that purpoſe. On the 27th of November the ſame year he gave him the title of Imperator; and on the 23d of December he entered Rome in triumph with Commodus, on account of the victories gained over the Germans (cc). Dion Caſſius tells us (dd), that he remitted all the debts which were due to himſelf and to the publick treaſury during forty ſix years, from the time that Hadrian had granted the ſame favour, and burnt openly all the writings which related to thoſe debts. He made very noble preſents to ſeveral cities, and particularly to that of Smyrna, which had been overthrown by an earthquake after his departure from it (ee). He applied himſelf likewiſe to correct many enormities, and introduced ſeveral excellent regulations [R]. In the year 171 he left Rome [S] with his ſon Commodus, in order to go in perſon againſt the Marcomanni and other barbarous nations, and the year following

(bb) Idem, pag. 650.

(cc) Id. pag. 652, 653.

(dd) Lib. 71.

(ee) Tillem. p. 654.

[Q] Conferred divers honours upon that city, and appointed publick Profeſſors there.] Dion Caſſius tells us (123), that he ſettled conſiderable ſtipends upon the Profeſſors in every one of the Sciences. We find by other authors that there were Profeſſors there in every Sect of Philoſophy, particularly that of the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Platoniſts, and Epicureans; and when one of theſe Profeſſors died another was elected in his room by perſons of the greateſt judgment and learning, with the Emperor's conſent. But it ſeems that this eſtabliſhment was made before the Athenians preferred their complaints againſt Herodes Atticus in the year 175, becauſe the Emperor had left to him at firſt the choice of the Profeſſors in Philoſophy. However he thought proper to chooſe himſelf Theodorus the Sophiſt to teach Rhetoric there, with a noble ſtipend, which he ſettled upon him (124). Adrian of Tyre held the ſame Chair, when Antoninus came to Athens, and it was this Emperor who had given it to him on account of the reputation which he had for eloquence. He had the curioſity to hear him declaim, and being highly ſatisfied with his performance, made him ſeveral conſiderable preſents, and beſtowed peculiar immunities and privileges upon him and his family (125). It was probably on account of this eſtabliſhment of Profeſſors at Athens, that Ariſtides in his ninth Oration tells us, that Antoninus had raiſed by new honours Greece and the Sciences of Greece, which before had been extremely deſpiſed and neglected, and had loſt the prerogatives and privileges which were annexed to them.

(123) Lib. 71.

(124) Tillemont, p. 650, 651.

(125) Idem, pag. 651.

[R] To correct many enormities, and introduced ſeveral excellent regulations.] He moderated the expences, which were laid out upon Gladiators (126); and he would not ſuffer them to fight but with ſwords which were blunted, like foils, ſo that their ſkill might be ſhewn without any danger of their lives (127). It appeared how averſe he was from ſhedding blood from a particular inſtance, that when a ſlave had taught a lyon to devour men with extraordinary fury, he would by no means view that ſpectacle, the cruelty of which was ſo highly entertaining to others. And when the people were very importunate that the maſter of the lyon ſhould be made free, he proclaimed by an Herald that he had not deſerved his liberty. He cleared up the obſcurities of the laws, and mitigated by new decrees the rigour of the old laws. We find in the pandects and other books of the Law ſeveral traces or remains of a great number of decrees, which he made, with a deſign rather to reſtore the ſtudy of the antient Law, than to introduce a new ſcheme (128). He was the firſt, according to Capitolinus (129), who appointed, that the names of all the children, who were born of Roman Citizens, ſhould be regiſter'd within thirty days after their birth; and this gave him occaſion to eſtabliſh publick regiſters in the Provinces. He renewed the conſtitution firſt made by Nerva, that no ſuit ſhould be carried on againſt the dead, but within five years after their deceaſe. He made a decree, that all the Senators ſhould have at leaſt a fourth part of their eſtate in Italy. Aurelius Victor tells us, that he gave to all indifferently the right of being citizens of Rome. The Civilians follow this author; and from the manner in which Caſaubon ſpeaks, it ſeems that he made an expreſs conſtitution for granting that right to all the ſubjects of the Empire. But this conſtitution, which is only juſt mentioned by Ulpian in the Digeſt, was made by Antoninus Caracalla, as may be concluded both from Ulpian's ordinary manner of expreſſion, and the direct authority of Dion Caſſius (130). And we learn from the Hiſtory of the Martyrs at Lyons related by Euſebius (131), that in the year 177, which was but two or three years before Antoninus's death, the Roman Citizens were ſtill diſtinguiſhed from others. He would not ſuffer, that the ſame baths ſhould be common to both ſexes; and he made ſeveral regulations, in order to reform the luxury of the Ladies, and to remove the diſorders of the young perſons of quality. Lavacra mixta ſubmovit. Mores matronarum compoſuit diffluentes, & juvenum nobilium (132). His example was likewiſe a ſtronger inducement than all the Laws to reduce many perſons from their debaucheries, and irregular purſuits of pleaſure, and violent paſſion for riches (133). What is moſt admirable is, that he knew how to regulate the ſoldiers themſelves, who were accuſtomed to receive a great deal, and to demand ſtill more, and were inſolent enough to render themſelves formidable to every perſon, who refuſed to gratify their avarice. He fixed abſolutely what they were to receive, even in a leſs proportion than what was granted them before, and he accuſtomed them not to hope for any thing more, except upon extraordinary occaſions. He reduced them to ſuch a ſtrict and laborious manner of life, as is proper for ſoldiers, and obliged them to employ themſelves ſo conſtantly in the exerciſe of their arms, that they had no leiſure for any thing elſe. This ſeverity was a prodigious relief to the treaſury and the people, and of great advantage to the army itſelf (134). And yet notwithſtanding this ſtrictneſs of diſcipline, which he maintained, they had an extraordinary regard and affection for him. It was with a particular view to correct the irregularities and debauchery of the ſoldiers in Syria, that he gave the command of them to Avidius Caſſius, being perſuaded, as he wrote at that time, that they could not be governed except by the antient diſcipline, and that it was neceſſary to reſtore the primitive manners of the Romans, in order to ſupport the Empire (135). We find in Capitolinus an account of ſeveral regulations eſtabliſhed by him. Papirius Juſtus made formerly a collection of the decrees of Antoninus and L. Verus, which is ſometimes cited in the Digeſt among the antient Civilians (136).

(126) Capitol. in Vitâ Anton. Philoſ. c. 27.

(127) Dion. Excerpt. p. 718. ed. Valeſii.

(128) Tillemont, p. 671.

(129) Ubi ſupra, cap. 9.

(130) Tillem. p. 671, 672.

(131) Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 5. c. 1.

(132) Capitol. in Vit. Anton. Phil. c. 23.

(133) Ariſtides, Orat. 9.

(134) Idem, ibid.

(135) See Tillem. p. 673; and Capit. in Vit. Anton. & Vulcat. Gallic. in Vit. Avid. Caſſi.

(136) Gothofredi, Prolegomena in Codic. Theod. p. 183. ed. Lugduni 1665.

[S] In the year 178 he left Rome.] Before he departed he took a ſolemn oath in the capitol, that ſince he had been raiſed to the Empire, no Senator had been put to death by his order, or even with his knowledge: and that he would have pardoned the rebels, if they had not been killed before he heard of it. Ante tempus ſanè mortis priuſquam ad bellum Marcomannicum rediret, in Capitolio juravit, nullum Senatorem ſe ſciente occiſum; quum etiam rebelles dixerit ſe ſervaturum fuiſſe, ſi ſciſſet (137). He would not make uſe of the publick treaſure in order to ſupply himſelf with the money neceſſary for the war, till he had asked leave of the Senate, telling them that a Roman Emperor had no property of his own, but that all belonged to the Senate and people (138). It was obſerved, that as he was going to this war, from which it was feared that he would not return, the Philoſophers, who were with him, deſired him to explain to them the moſt difficult and obſcure parts of the

(137) Capitol. ubi ſupra, c. 29.

(138) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 71.

lowing gained a considerable victory over them (f); so that he would have absolutely subdued them in a very short time, if he had not been seized with a disease [T] which put an end to his life the 17th of March, A. D. 180, after he had reigned nineteen years and ten or eleven days after the death of Pius, and lived fifty eight years, ten months and twenty two days (gg). The whole Empire regretted the loss of so valuable a Prince, and paid the greatest honours to his memory. He was ranked among the Gods, and every person had a statue of him in their houses. His Meditations have been extremely admired by all good judges (U). His character is perhaps the most perfect of any of the (ff) Idem, pag. 659.

(gg) Idem, pag. 660. Capitolinus, c. 18, says, he died in the 18th year of his reign, and the 61st of his age.

the different schemes of Philosophy, as if they were apprehensive, that the solution of those difficulties would be absolutely lost to the world by his death. He immediately agreed to their request, and discoursed with them upon these subjects for three days together (139).

(139) Tillemont, p. 638.

[T] Seized with a disease.] Dion Cassius pretends (140), that he knew it for certain, that the physicians hastened his death to gratify Commodus; and that Antoninus, tho' he discovered it himself, yet concealed his knowledge of it to the last, except when the Tribune came the last time to desire him to give the word, and he said to him; Go at sun-rise; for my own part, I am going to lie down. He lay sick several days; and it seems to have been a contagious distemper, which then raged in the army, so that, according to Capitolinus (141), he had some difficulty to prevent his son and his friends from abandoning him; which induced him, as that author tells us, to abstain from food, and by that means he increased his disease. Two days before his death, he assured his friends, that he did not desire to live, because the ill conduct of his son had render'd life uneasy to him (142). However, he recommended him to the soldiers (143); and we have an excellent discourse of his in Herodian (144), in which he desired his friends to assist him with their advice, and directed his son in what manner he ought to govern. He lived but a day and a night after this speech (145). He charged his friends to make him sensible, that not all the riches and honours in the universe were sufficient to satisfy the luxury and ambition of tyrants; nor their strongest guards and armies able to defend them from the hatred and insults of their subjects. That no tyrannical Princes ever enjoy long and peaceable reigns, but only such as by their clemency gain the hearts of their people. That it was not they, who served out of constraint, but such as obeyed voluntarily, that would continue faithful in all trials, and free from either flattery or treachery. And lastly, that it was exceedingly difficult, and yet highly necessary for those Princes to set bounds to their passions, who had none to their power. The seventh day of his sickness, he sent for his son again alone, and dismissed him very soon, for fear that he should be seized with the distemper; and then having covered his head as if he were going to sleep, he expired the night following (146). Tertullian tells us (147), that he died at Sirmium, but the two Victors say at Vienna in Austria. The father abovementioned rallies the High Priest of Cybele, who prayed the 24th of March for Antoninus's preservation, because his Demon had not discover'd to him that he died before on the 17th of that month.

(140) Lib. 71.

(141) Cap. 28.

(142) Ibid.

(143) Dion. Cass. lib. 71.

(144) Lib. 1. cap. 8.

(145) Ibid.

(146) Capitol. ubi supra.

(147) Apol. cap. 25. apud Tillem. p. 661.

[U] His meditations have been extremely admired by all good judges.] The style of this work is simple and negligent; and yet, as Mr. Tillemont observes (148), persons of the best sense and judgment admire the natural and unaffected beauty of it, and think it comparable to the most excellent performances in all Heathen antiquity. Nicephorus Callistus likewise mentions it with great commendation, and intimates that he composed it for the use of his son Commodus; but this does not appear from the book itself. Some writers, and particularly Vossius (149), have doubted, whether we have the work intire, or only some particular extracts from it, because the sentences are almost every where independent of each other, without any apparent order; and the construction sometimes is not compleat. But the best Criticks are generally of opinion, that Antoninus left them in this imperfect manner, because they were only observations written for his own use, without any design of being published. It is probable, that he composed the first book in the midst of the wars, in the country of the Quadi, while he was incamped upon the river Gran, if the passage, where he seems to intimate this, be not a mark

(148) P. 674.

(149) De Hist. Græc. lib. 2. cap. 24.

added to signify something else (150). He finished the second book at Carnutum, where Eutropius tells us, that he kept his court for three years, during his first war against the Marcomanni. And it appears, that he wrote this work before the death of Faustina, whom he represents as then alive, and ready to lie in (151), that is, before the year 175 (152). This book of Antoninus must not be confounded with another, which was published under his name, and translated into several languages, under the title of Horologium Principum: for the latter was written originally in Spanish by Anthony Guevara, a Spanish Bishop, and Counsellor to the Emperor Charles V (153). Suidas says, with regard to Antoninus's meditations, that he having deserved in all things the commendations of a perfect Philosopher, &c. wrote concerning the course of his own life twelve books. There have been several editions of this book in Greek and Latin, two of which were printed before the year 1635, when the learned Meric Casaubon, then Batchelor of Divinity, and Prebendary of Canterbury, published a second edition of his translation of that work into English, dedicated to Dr. W. Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. This translation is esteemed very accurate and judicious, and was particularly valued by the late Lord Shaftsbury, the author of the Characteristics. The preface of Casaubon is full of excellent sense and knowledge of the ancient Philosophy; and will furnish us with some extracts, which will not prove unentertaining to the reader. He observes there, that with regard to Christianity, it has been the opinion of many persons, that, Matters of faith and the sacraments only excepted, there is nothing in the whole Gospel, which is not juris naturalis, and most agreeable to human reason. For my part, continues he (154), as I would not take upon me to maintain their opinion precisely true in all points and circumstances; so I must needs say, if we esteem that natural, which natural men of best account by the meer strength of human reason have taught and taken upon them to maintain as just and reasonable, I know not any evangelical precept or duty belonging to a Christian's practice, (even the harshest, and those that seem to ordinary men most contrary to flesh and blood, not excepted,) but upon due search and examination, will prove of that nature. The author proceeds afterwards in this manner (155). " Of " all books in this kind that ever have been writ- " ten by any Heathen, I know not any which either " in regard of itself (for the bulk thereof;) or in re- " gard of the author, deserves more respect than " this of Marcus Antoninus.... The chiefest sub- " ject of the book is the vanity of the world and " all worldly things, as wealth and honour, life, &c. " and the end and scope of it to teach a man how " to submit himself wholly to God's Providence, and " to live content and thankful in what estate or cal- " ling soever..... In the author of it two main " things I conceive very considerable.... first, that " he was a very great man, one that had good ex- " perience of what he spake; and secondly, that he " was a very good man, one that lived as he did " write, and exactly (as far as was possible to a na- " tural man) performed what he exhorted others to. " For the first, I have always thought that it was not " without God's especial Providence, that of all them, " that once were the peculiar people of God, he was " chosen to write against the vain pleasures and " delights of this world, who of all the rest had had " most knowledge and experience of those things, " that he did write of.... How much more should " that confession of Antoninus move us! dilated here " by him, and inlarged into twelve books, and " briefly expressed and summed up in these words of " his eighth book: πεπείρασαι πρὶ πόσα πλανηθείς, εὑδα- " μῶν ὄψει τὸ εὖ ζῆν· ὐκ ἐν συλλογισμοῖς, ὐκ ἐν πλούτῳ, " οὐκ

(150) M. Antonin. De Scipso, l. 1. c. 14. apud Tillem. pag. 675.

(151) Ibid. l. 9. c. 3.

(152) Tillem. p. 675.

(153) Voss. ubi supra.

(154) Preface, p. 3.

(155) Ibid. p. 52 & seq.

the Heathen Emperors in all the branches of it [W]. And yet he could not escape the attacks of envy; for it was said that his Philosophy had rendered him too grave and serious,

" οὐκ ἐν δόξῃ, οὐκ ἐν ἀπολαύσει, σὺ μενεῖ. Thou haſt " already had ſufficient experience, that of theſe many " things about which thou haſt hitherto wandred, thou " couldſt not find happineſs in any of them; not in " ſyllogiſms and logical ſubtilties; not in wealth; not " in honour and reputation; not in pleaſure; in none " of all theſe. Of Antoninus, I ſay, a mere Heathen, led by human reaſon only; Antoninus, a man " for worldly wealth and greatneſs ſo far greater " than Solomon, as Lord and maſter I dare ſay of " more great Kingdoms, than Solomon was of great " towns in all his Kingdom; Antoninus a man for " his goodneſs and wiſdom, by all men during his " life, had in that honour and reputation as never " man either before him was, or (that we know of) " ever after him." But his goodneſs was the ſecond conſideration. It hath ever been the complaint of all ages; there hath ever been ſtore enough of men that could ſpeak well, and give good inſtructions: but great want of them, that either could, or ſo much as endeavoured, to do as they ſpake, and taught others to do. And what is the good, that ſuch can do? The only good I can conceive, it, that they perſuade men as much as in them lies (and they go very effectually about it,) " that τὸ εὐσεβὲς τοῦτο καὶ ὅσιον παρὰ τοῖς πολλοῖς ἀνθρώποις " καλέσαιτον, καταψευσαμένῳ ἴδιον ἀλαζόνων ἀνθρώπων ἢ σοφιστῶν, ἢ τὸ ὅλον τερατευτῶν εἰς φόβον καὶ ἐπίσχεσιν τῶν ἀδικεῖν. That all this that we call virtue and godlineſs, ſo much ſpoken of amongſt men, are but words and empty ſounds; that there is no ſuch thing really exiſtent indeed as piety and juſtice, but that it is a meer figment of ſome cunning jugglers and impoſtors, or at the beſt a pretty device of law-makers and founders of commonwealths, to keep ſilly people in awe and fear. Can any man think otherwiſe (if otherwiſe he be not better grounded) that ſhall hear them ſpeak, and then look upon their actions? Such therefore in my judgment might deſerve far more thanks, if they did forbear, and would rather loſe the commendations of either a ſmooth tongue or a ready pen, than to incur both the juſt ſuſpicion of being Atheiſts themſelves, and the certain guilt and crime of having made many others ſo.

" Be it therefore ſpoken to the immortal praiſe and " commendation of the famous Antoninus, that as " he did write, ſo he did live. Never did writers ſo conſpire to give all poſſible teſtimony of " goodneſs, uprightneſs, innocency, and whatſoever " could among Heathens be moſt commendable, as " they have done to commend this one. They commend him, not as the beſt Prince only, but abſolutely as the beſt man and beſt Philoſopher that " ever was. And it is his proper commendation, " that being ſo commended, he is commended without exception. If any thing hath ever been talked againſt him, the hiſtorians mention it but as a " talk; not credited by them nor by any, that ever " were of any credit.... His meditations were his " actions. His deeds (ſo ſtill you remember him a " man and a Heathen) did agree with his ſentences; " Ὅτι οὐ προσποιητὸς ἀλλ' ἐξ ἕξεως πάντα ἔπραττε πρόδηλον, &c. And again, ὡς ἀληθῶς ἀγαθὸς ἀνὴρ ἦν, καὶ οὐδὲν προσποιητὸν εἶχε &c. That he did not only as he ſpoke, but what he did, he did it out of mere love to virtue. That it was a clear caſe, which no man doubted of, that he was in very deed a good man; ſo incapable was he of any diſſimulation. So " Dio of him, and ſo others." Caſaubon ſhews afterwards (156) the erroneouſneſs of Xylander's verſion; and obſerves (157), with regard to the obſcurity in ſome parts of Antoninus, that the chiefeſt ground of it is, that he having been all his life time an indefatigable ſtudent, and ſo read a world of writers of all ſorts, his manner is in theſe his books, as he read any thing that made for his preſent purpoſe, cloſely and briefly to allude unto it by ſome ſhort meditation upon it; ſometimes barely to excerpt ſome words, which either he had an eſpecial liking unto, or afterward intended further to meditate upon, without any mention of the place or author, from whence they are taken.

" Now many of theſe authors being quite periſhed, " many of his alluſions ſo cloſe and obſcure, that " though the authors be yet extant, yet it is not eaſy " to find from whence, or of whom, nor to what intent or purpoſe; it muſt not be wondered, if not " only many places ſeem obſcure, but ſome alſo of little " worth and uſe, becauſe it doth not appear, what " further uſe Antoninus had of them in his mind. " However to them that are any thing verſed in the " writings of antient Philoſophers, Stoics eſpecially, " there will not occur many ſuch places. If a man " take but Arrianus and Seneca, and compare them diligently with Antoninus, he will find a marvellous " conſent, and many obſcure ſhort places of Antoninus, illuſtrated and explained by their larger diſcourſe.... And as for ſuch places, which may " give offence as repugnant to our Chriſtian faith, " and impious, as when he ſeemeth to ſpeak doubtfully of God, and his Providence, and to aſcribe " all things to fatal neceſſity, and the like.... the " reader muſt further be intreated not to judge of " his opinions by one or two ſhort paſſages here and " there occurrent, which whether they be his or no " (as we have already ſaid) is hard to determine; " but to have reſpect to other more large and peremptory paſſages concerning the ſame purpoſe elſewhere to be found. As for example, concerning " God and his Providence, to B. 2. Num. 8; B. 6. " Num. 39; and concerning fatal neceſſity not only " to the ſame B. 2. Num. 8, but alſo to divers other " places, as B. 8. Num. 6. 27. 30. 32. 46. &c. by " which places as it doth plainly appear, that he " doth exclude all manner of neceſſity from human " wills and actions; ſo doth it appear by other " paſſages, as B. 8. Num. 33. that he did not altogether " exclude from all Divine Providence not even thoſe " actions of men, that are moſt contrary to the " will of God: from which place moreover may " appear what it is that he often calls εἱμαρμένην, " Fate, or Deſtiny; which to his meaning is no " other than God's Sovereign Power and Providence " in ordering the matters of the world, not ſubject " either to oppoſition or mutability; as by Hierocles " in his De Providentiâ, by Plotinus, by Alexander " Aphrodiſæus, and generally by all Ariſtotle his Greek " Interpreters, as Simplicius, Themiſtius, Philoponus, " and many others it is interpreted. To which purpoſe he doth alſo expound the word Fortune, B. 1. " N. 17. by which other places, which otherwiſe perchance might be miſtaken, (as B. 1. N. 14. laſt " words) muſt be expounded. And herein you muſt " know that Antoninus takes no more liberty to himſelf in uſing this word in the ſenſe he doth, than " Plato did, who although he diſputes at large in his " tenth book de Legibus, that even the leaſt things happen by Providence, and thinks it great impiety for " a man to doubt of it, yet where he ſpeaks of the " uncertainty and inſtability of all worldly affairs, " even of thoſe, that are ſettled with the beſt wiſdom and diſcretion of men, he uſeth theſe and " the like expreſſions: ὄντων μὲν μηδὲν τοιοῦτον μηδὲν, τύχας δ' εἶναι κυρίας ἅπαντα τὰ ἀνθρώπινα πράγματα; that good laws oftentimes avail but little, for that in very deed it is chance and fortune, which for the moſt part is all in all in worldly affairs, &c. " that is, in regard of us men, and of the ſecondary " cauſes, not in regard of God. In which ſenſe the " uſe of the word even unto us Chriſtians is allowed " by the beſt ſchoolmen (158)." Caſaubon obſerves then, that Antoninus recommends prayers as very powerful and effectual to virtue in his 9*th Book Num.* 40.

In the year 1697, Dr. Stanhope, afterwards Dean of Canterbury, publiſhed in 4to an Edition of this Emperor's Meditations, with a new Latin tranſlation, and the various readings and parallel places added to the margin, and with a Commentary by Gataker, and the ſelect Annotations of Dacier and Antoninus's Life tranſlated from the French into Latin; which edition was dedicated to John Lord Somers then Lord High Chancellor of England.

[W] His character is perhaps the moſt perfect of any of the Heathen Emperors in all the branches of it.] He was very careful of the management of the publick money, retrenching all unneceſſary expences, being unwilling to load the people. He leſſened the charges which were laid out upon Gladiators

(156) Ibid. pag. 15, & ſeq.

(157) Ibid. p. 21.

(158) Aquin. 1. qu. 22. art. 3, &c.

ous, and he was even accuſed of pride, and want of familiarity among his friends. Nay it was urged that he was leſs open and ſincere than Antoninus Pius, though he affected the contrary; in ſhort, that his virtues were rather feigned and forced than natural (bb). But Dion Caſſius (ii) defends him with regard to the laſt objection, by ſhewing that his whole behaviour was uniformly and invariably good under all circumſtances. The only defect which could reaſonably be objected to him, was perhaps an exceſs of goodneſs towards thoſe who deſerved a more ſevere treatment [X]. The Emperor Julian in his Cæſars (kk), which is a Satyr upon the Roman Emperors, gives him the nobleſt character, and places him above Trajan, Auguſtus, Cæſar, and Alexander; and repreſents this as his maxim, that it is the chief duty of a man and a Prince to imitate the

(bb) Capitol. c. 29.
(ii) Lib. 71.

Gladiators and Actors. But he was always ready to contribute every thing proper upon all ordinary or extraordinary occaſions. He aſſiſted perſons of real merit and character in their neceſſities, and ſupported ſeveral cities, which were involved in any misfortune, or in danger of being ruined. We obſerved in the text of this article, that he advanced a very large ſum to the city of Smyrna; and he did the ſame with regard to Carthage, which had ſuffered by a fire, to Nicomedia, which had been demoliſhed by an earthquake, Epheſus, and ſeveral other cities. He took particular care of the proviſions, and the reparation of the ſtreets of Rome, and of the great roads of the Empire. He furniſhed the Romans with thoſe publick ſpectacles, which they were ſo extremely fond of, to prevent any imputation upon him, that he deſigned to deprive them of their diverſions, and reduce them to a philoſophical manner of life. He remitted ſeveral taxes, when he thought there was occaſion for it. While he was Emperor he refuſed ſeveral eſtates which were left him by will. In the adminiſtration of juſtice, he never favoured the intereſts of the Treaſury. He rejected all the advices which were given him to enrich the Exchequer; and he ordered the Prefect of Rome and other officers to puniſh the receivers of taxes, who demanded the leaſt above what was due by Law. He was above all things averſe to the imputation of avarice, and he vindicated himſelf from it in a great many of his Letters. Nay he juſtified himſelf from it either in perſon or in writing, whenever he found that any of his actions were diſapproved of. For he was extremely jealous of his reputation, and took prodigious pains to inform himſelf of what was ſaid of him, not with a deſign to proſecute others, as many of his predeceſſors had done, (for on the contrary he gave every one a full liberty of thinking and ſpeaking what they thought proper;) but in order to correct what he found there was reaſon to except againſt in his conduct (159). As the moſt inconſiderable circumſtances may greatly injure the reputation of a Prince, he never did any thing without ſufficient precaution and deliberation. He never acted in a negligent and precipitate manner, but conſidered well whatever he ſaid or wrote, and ſometimes ſpent whole days upon matters, which did not ſeem to require ſo ſtrict an attention (160). Julian therefore in his Cæſars repreſents him as a perſon of prodigious gravity, of a compoſed countenance, who ſpoke little, and knew when it was proper to ſpeak as well as to be ſilent. He was not haſty in believing the advantageous things which were told him of perſons, when they were recommended to poſts and employments, and did not think that the truth was to be obtained without a very long and particular enquiry. Suffragatoribus non cito credidit; ſed ſemper diu quæſivit quod erat verum (161). The Imperial dignity did not produce in him the leaſt haughtineſs or arrogance. He treated all ſorts of people as his equals; and he permitted perſons of quality to be ſerved in the ſame manner as himſelf, and to have the ſame officers. He received all, who applied to him, with the utmoſt civility, and would not ſuffer his guards to hinder any perſon from having acceſs to him (162). For he did not place his grandeur in converſing with but a few people, under pretence of drawing the greater reſpect to himſelf, but in imitating the Deity, and making the whole world ſenſible of the effects of his benevolence and paternal care of them. So that there was no occaſion for a Maſter of the Ceremonies to introduce a perſon to him; it was ſufficient to have merit, or to ſtand in need of his favour (163). Though he had all the advantages of ſtudy and experience, yet he never undertook any thing either in war or the adminiſtration of the Empire, without conſulting with perſons of rank who attended him; and frequently ſaid, that it was more juſt that he ſhould follow the advice of ſo many perſons of merit, who had a regard for him, than that they ſhould all of them be obliged to ſubmit to his will alone. Semper ſanè cum optimatibus, non ſolum bellicas res, ſed etiam civiles, priuſquam faceret aliquid, contulit. Denique ſententia illius præcipua ſemper hæc fuit; Æquius eſt, ut ego tot & talium amicorum conſilium ſequar, quam ut tot & tales amici meam unius voluntatem ſequantur (164). In his own writings he acknowledges, that he had learned ſomething of every perſon (165).

(159) Tillem. p. 668, 669.
(160) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 71.
(161) Capitol. cap. 29.
(162) Tillem. p. 670, and Herodian l. 1. c. 3.
(163) Ariſtid. Orat. 9.
(164) Capitolin. cap. 22.
(165) M. Anton. De Seipſo, lib. 1. cap. 1, 2, 11.

[X] An exceſs of goodneſs towards thoſe who deſerved a more ſevere treatment.] It was ſaid, that his deſire to appear mild and generous degenerated even into ſoftneſs, ſo that he ſhewed more indulgence than was proper to thoſe whoſe ill conduct he condemned (166). He thought that it was ſufficient for him to be exempt from any fault; and indeed if we credit Dion Caſſius (167), he never committed any. But he imagined, that he ought to ſuffer thoſe of others to paſs with impunity. He ſaid, that as it was impoſſible to make men ſuch as one would wiſh they were, it was neceſſary to take them as they are, and make the beſt uſe of them that is poſſible. For this reaſon he eſteemed, commended, and employed thoſe of the beſt character; but Avidius Caſſius ſaid of him (168), that while he acted the Philoſopher, and diſcourſed about clemency, juſtice, and other points of ſpeculation, he ſuffered the Provinces to be plundered by thoſe whom he had made Governors, for fear of being thought ſevere. Caſſius particularly mentions a Prefect of the Pretorium, who was very poor when he obtained that poſt, and yet became of a ſudden enormouſly rich. Marcus Antoninus philoſophatur, & quærit de clementia, & de animis, & de honeſto, & juſto, nec ſentit pro republicâ.... An ego Proconſules, an ego Præſides putem, qui ob hoc ſibi a ſenatu & ab Antonino Provincias datas credunt, ut luxurientur, ut divites fiant? Audiſti Præfectum Prætorii noſtri Philoſophi, ante triduum quam fieret, mendicum & pauperem, ſed ſubitò divitem factum. Undè, quæſo, niſi de viſceribus reip. provincialiumque fortunis? His weakneſs in this reſpect appeared particularly with regard to his relations, whom he certainly loved to exceſs, without conſidering that a Prince owes the chief regard to his people in general. He was too indulgent to his wife Fauſtina, whoſe ſcandalous behaviour reflected ſome diſgrace even upon himſelf. Nay he was rallied before his face in the open Theatre for raiſing to conſiderable poſts thoſe perſons who had injured the honour of his family, after he had indiſputable proofs of the charge againſt them (169). Beſides he was in ſome meaſure blameable for his fondneſs to his ſon Commodus, whoſe crimes were ſo execrable, that Capitolinus ſays (170), that this Emperor would have been happy, if he had not had ſuch a ſon. He took indeed great care of his education and inſtruction (171); and furniſhed him with all the proper rules of conduct, and placed him under the beſt maſters he could procure from all parts by the nobleſt rewards (172). But Commodus, notwithſtanding all this care, could not bear with any perſons about him, who oppoſed his vicious inclinations, and was extremely obſtinate, ſo that he even fell ſick, in requiring that thoſe, whom his father had removed, becauſe they encouraged him in his irregularities, ſhould be brought back to him. Antoninus complied with this unreaſonable demand, and by that means Commodus made his father's court a ſcene of all kinds of debauchery (173).

(166) Vul. Gall. in Vitâ Avid. Caſſii. cap. 14.
(167) Lib. 71.
(168) Vulcat. Gallic. ubi ſupra.
(169) Capitol. cap. 29.
(170) Cap. 18.
(171) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 71.
(172) Lamprid. in Vitâ Commodi, c. 1.
(173) Tillemont, T. p. 665.

the Deity, by putting himſelf into ſuch a ſtate as to want but a few things himſelf, and to ſerve others to the utmoſt of his power (kk).

(k) P. 13, 14, 22, 23, 41, 49, 52, 53. ex edit. Petavii, Paris 1630.

ANTONINUS, Biſhop of Epheſus, was contemporary with St. Chryſoſtom, and lived in the latter end of the fourth Century. Several Biſhops being aſſembled at Conſtantinople with St. Chryſoſtom, Antoninus was accuſed before them of divers crimes [A], and eſpecially of Simony. His accuſer was one Euſebius Biſhop of Valentinopolis. St. Chryſoſtom endeavoured at firſt to ſtop the proſecution. He repreſented to him, that when a perſon was ſwayed by anger or envy, it was eaſy for him to accuſe, but not always to prove the charge; he therefore earneſtly beſought Euſebius to withdraw his accuſation; but finding him obſtinate in his deſign, he deſired Paul Biſhop of Heraclea, who ſeemed to favour Antoninus, to compromiſe the matter between the two parties, and endeavour to make them friends. In the mean time he went to church with the other Biſhops, for this happened on a Sunday; Euſebius followed them, and in preſence of all the people he preſented Chryſoſtom with a paper, in which was written his charge againſt Antoninus, and entreated the Biſhops not to let the matter paſs unexamined. St. Chryſoſtom ſeeing the accuſer's importunity, and fearing an inſurrection of the people, received the paper, and after divine ſervice he called Euſebius before him, and the other Biſhops, and again deſired him to drop the proſecution [B]; but Euſebius refuſing to comply with his deſire, the accuſation was read; whereupon the Biſhops were of opinion, that in order to diſpatch this affair, it was proper to begin with enquiring into the truth of the moſt heinous charge, that of Simony, becauſe if Antoninus was found guilty of that crime, there would be little room to doubt of all the reſt, ſince the love of money is the root of all evil (a). Antoninus was accuſed, that he made it his conſtant practice to receive from thoſe whom he ordained, more or leſs money, according to the greater or leſs income of the church to which they were preferred. This then was to be the ſubject of the enquiry: Antoninus was firſt examined, but he ſtrongly denied the fact; next to him were examined thoſe, from whom he was accuſed of having received money; but none of them would own they had given him any; which indeed is not ſurpriſing, ſince if they had owned it, they would have been their own accuſers; for if it be Simony to receive money for the holy things, it is no leſs Simony to give money for them. The Biſhops finding that they could not bring Antoninus, nor any of his accomplices, to a confeſſion of their crime, called for the witneſſes, before whom it was ſaid that the money had been given; but they being in Aſia, as it was pretended, could not appear; whereupon Chryſoſtom offered to go himſelf into Aſia to enquire thoroughly into that affair. But Antoninus, whoſe guilty conſcience made him diſlike ſo upright and impartial a judge, did by his ſecret intrigues at court prevent the Prelate's journey [C], and promiſed that he would himſelf ſend for the witneſſes, being in hopes that this would give him time either to bribe or frighten them, ſo that they would not appear againſt him. Chryſoſtom having got the hint of this, reſolved with the other Biſhops that ſome of them ſhould be ſent into Aſia, to examine the witneſſes. Accordingly three Biſhops were choſen, namely Syncletius Biſhop of Trajanopolis, Heſychius of Parium (b), and Palladius (c) of Helenopolis. It was ordered, that if the parties did not come to Hypæpa (d) within two months to proſecute their cauſe, they ſhould be excommunicated; this city being thought the moſt conveniently ſituated, as well for the parties as for the Judges. Syncletius

(a) 1 Tim. vi. 10.

(b) An ancient city in Myſia.

(c) The ſame who wrote St. Chryſoſtom's life, and from whom we have taken this account.

(d) A city in Lydia, near the borders of Ionia; it is now called Ipepa, in Natolia.

[A] Antoninus was accuſed of divers crimes.] Theſe crimes were, 1. That he had melted down the holy veſſels. 2. That he had taken a marble ſtone, which ſtood in the entry of the Baptiſtery (1), and had placed it in his own baths. 3. That he had cauſed the pillars, which had a long time belonged to the church, to be carried into his dining-place (2). 4. That his boy having committed a murder, he ſtill kept him in his ſervice, without having ever puniſhed him. 5. That he had ſold for his own uſe the lands, which Baſilina the Emperor Julian's mother had given to the church. 6. That having left his wife, he returned to cohabit with her, and had ſome children by her (3). The ſeventh crime, with which he was charged, was that of Simony, as we have obſerved in the text of this article.

(1) That part of the church, in which they baptized.

(2) This I take to be the ſenſe of the Greek word Τρίκλινος.

(3) Palladius, Dial. de Vita Chryſoſt. p. 126.

[B] Chryſoſtom deſired him to drop the proſecution.] He very zealouſly repreſented to him, how dangerous it was to accuſe a perſon, when we are in a paſſion; that then it is eaſy to act without due conſideration; and to write or ſpeak a great many things, which it is afterwards impoſſible to prove. "If then, ſaid "Chryſoſtom to Euſebius, you know perfectly the "truth of thoſe things, which you now lay to Anto- "ninus's charge, we don't refuſe to hear you; but if "you are not able to prove thoſe crimes, we won't "preſs you to carry on your proſecution. It is ſtill "time for you to chuſe which part you will act; "but when your libel ſhall have been read; when "your accuſation ſhall be publickly known; "when it ſhall appear upon the church regiſter; it "will be too late for you to withdraw your charge, "and being a Biſhop you will not be permitted to ask "pardon for your raſh accuſation (4)." The Greek words of this laſt ſentence are; οὐκ ἔτι σοὶ ἔξεσται, ἐπισκόπῳ ὄντι, ζητεῖν ἀδειλητίονα: The word ἀδειλήτιον is in the Latin abolitio, which ſignifies pardon, or amneſty. But perhaps the ſenſe here is, that Euſebius having once begun a proſecution, could not hope to have it ſtopped, and all the proceedings annulled, if he could not prove his charge; but that in ſuch a caſe he muſt be acknowledged a ſlanderer, and ſuffer the penalties decreed by the Canons againſt ſuch as calumniate their brethren.

(4) Idem, pag. 128, 129.

[C] Antoninus did by his ſecret intrigues at court prevent the Prelate's journey.] He went to one of the Emperor's miniſters, whoſe lands he took care of in Aſia (5), and begged of him to hinder Chryſoſtom's journey, promiſing to produce himſelf the witneſſes, that were wanted againſt him. The miniſter granted his requeſt, and ſent Chryſoſtom an order to ſtay at Conſtantinople; repreſenting to him, that it was not proper, that he who was their Biſhop and the Paſtor of their ſouls, ſhould leave the city at a time when they were in great danger of tumults and troubles (6). Theſe tumults and troubles they feared from Gaina's revolt, who being born a Goth, had taken the part of the Romans, and was by degrees promoted to the poſt of General of the horſe; and wanted to raiſe himſelf ſtill higher. We ſhall give an account of him in its proper place.

(5) By which it appears, that our Biſhop minded ſome other things beſides his flock.

(6) Palladius, ubi ſupra, p. 131.

Syncletius then and Palladius went immediately to Smyrna; but Heſychius, who was Antoninus's particular friend, feigned to be indiſpoſed, that he might be excuſed from accompanying his collegues. As ſoon as they arrived at Smyrna, they gave notice of it to the parties; but Antoninus and Euſebius had already been reconciled together [D] before the Biſhops were arrived in Aſia; however they went to Hypæpa, and to amuſe their judges, they pretended that the witneſſes had been obliged to go on different journies for their own private affairs. The Judges then aſked Euſebius how much time he wanted before he could produce his witneſſes, promiſing they would wait for them. Euſebius thinking the Biſhops would ſoon be tired with the heat of the country, (for it was then the middle of the Summer,) ſaid, that he wanted forty days, and that within that time he would bring his witneſſes, or ſubmit to the penalties of the Canons. Thereupon he was diſmiſſed, in order to bring his witneſſes; but inſtead of going after them, he went privately to Conſtantinople, where he kept himſelf concealed, whilſt the Biſhops were waiting for him. The forty days being paſſed, and no witneſſes appearing, the Prelates wrote to all the Biſhops of Aſia, that Euſebius was excommunicated, either for calumny, or for having deſerted the cauſe he had undertaken, and having waited thirty days more, they returned to Conſtantinople, where meeting Euſebius, they ſharply upbraided him for what he had done. Euſebius ſaid he was ſick, and again promiſed, that he would produce the witneſſes in a ſhort time; but he ſtill delayed, till at laſt Antoninus died, which put an end to this whole affair (e). However it appeared afterwards that Antoninus had not been unjuſtly accuſed, as we ſhall ſhew in a remark [E].

(e) Palladius, Dialog. de Vitâ S. Joh. Chryſoſt. cap. 13, 14. pag. 126—133.

[D] Antoninus and Euſebius had already been reconciled together.] This is not much to Euſebius's honour, eſpecially ſince he ſtill feigned to carry on the proſecution. But what Palladius tells us, is ſtill more diſhonourable both for Euſebius and for his adverſary; he ſays, that, "having perſuaded one another, the one by "gold, the other by an oath, they were become friends." Οἱ δὲ πείσαντες ἀλλήλους, ὁ μὲν χρυσίῳ, ὁ δὲ ὅρκῳ, φίλοι γεγόνασι (7), which words may ſignify, that one gave money, and the other made an oath; that is, Antoninus bribed Euſebius with preſents, who in return promiſed upon oath that he would not proſecute his charge. This I take to be the ſenſe of the Greek words, but the tranſlation in Emericus Bigotius's Edition of Palladius, is very obſcure and equivocal; Illi autem cum ſe mutuo corrupiſſent, partim auro, partim jurejurando, amici facti ſunt.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 132.

[E] It appeared afterwards, that Antoninus had not been unjuſtly accuſed.] Not long after his death, the clergy of Epheſus, and ſeveral Biſhops of Aſia ſent a letter or decree (8) to St. Chryſoſtom, in which they declared upon oath, that they had for ſome time been governed very irregularly, and that their law had been neglected; therefore they earneſtly deſired him to come to them, to reſtore their churches, which had been long afflicted, partly by the followers of Arius, and partly by thoſe, who, tho' they boaſted to be Catholicks, yet were entirely ſwayed by avarice, and an unbounded luſt of power; ſeveral of them having bought the Epiſcopal See with money. Chryſoſtom being willing to aſſiſt them, went to Epheſus, where he aſſembled ſeventy Biſhops out of Aſia, Caria, and Lydia. Euſebius came before them, and begged to be again admitted to the communion of the church. Some Biſhops were of opinion, that he being a calumniator, his requeſt muſt not be granted. To which he replied, that the determination of Antoninus's cauſe had been delayed only by the abſence of the witneſſes, but that he could now produce them; and tho' Antoninus was dead, yet thoſe were ſtill alive, who had given money for their ordination. Upon this the Synod thought it juſt to enquire further into this affair. Six Biſhops were accuſed by Euſebius of having given Antoninus money to be ordained by him. They at firſt denied the charge, but ſeveral witneſſes being called in, ſome of them Laymen, ſome Clergymen, and ſome Women, who ſpecified what money had been given, by whom, and at what time and place, the accuſed Biſhops were obliged to confeſs themſelves guilty. The only excuſe they could plead for themſelves was, that they thought this a common practice, and authoriſed by cuſtom, and that they could not therefore be accuſed before the Emperor's Court. They prayed that they might keep their churches, or that the money they had given might be reſtored to them; for, ſaid they, ſome of us have even ſold our wives ornaments and cloaths. Chryſoſtom anſwered that he would ſpeak to the Emperor in their behalf, and the Synod ordered that the money they had given to Antoninus, ſhould be repaid them by his heirs, and that they ſhould not take the Sacrament with the other Prieſts, for they were no longer to be conſidered as Prieſts (9). We may conclude from a circumſtance in this account, that Clergymen were at that time to be tried before ſecular Judges, at leaſt for ſome crimes, as particularly that of Simony; ſince theſe Biſhops wanted Chryſoſtom's interceſſion with the Emperor, and were afraid of the Βαλεντήσιον, which was a Temporal Court.

(8) The Greek word is Ψήφισμα, which ſignifies properly a decree.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 133—137.

P.

ANTONIA, a Roman family, which, according to an antient tradition, is ſaid to have deſcended from Anton the ſon of Hercules (a), produced two branches, one a Patrician, with the ſirname of Merenda, and the other a Plebeian, with ſcarce any ſirname. We do not find that the Patrician branch continued long, or produced any perſons mentioned in hiſtory, but T. Antonius Merenda, and Q. Antonius Merenda. The former was one of the Decemviri, who were diſſolved on account of the tyrannical and cruel behaviour of Appius Claudius, in the year 304 of Rome, and one of thoſe who baniſhed themſelves voluntarily, and whoſe eſtates were confiſcated, after the trial of Appius Claudius and Sp. Oppius (b). The latter was military Tribune in the year 333 of Rome (c). But the Plebeian branch continued a long time, and flouriſhed in very great luſtre and reputation [A]; for beſides the honour of having twice received the poſt of General of the Horſe, ſix times the Conſulſhip, once the Cenſorſhip, and three times the glory of a Triumph (d), that family appeared in the perſon of Mark Antony the Triumvir Miſtreſs

(a) Plutarch. in Marc. Antonio, p. 917.

(b) Livius, l. 3. p. 28.

(c) Idem, lib. 4. p. 88.

(d) See Glandorpii, Onomaſtic. p. 66.

[A] The Plebeian branch continued a long time, and flouriſhed in very great luſtre and reputation.] We muſt remember that Marcus Antonius the Orator, who died in the year 667, was the firſt, who brought into this family the honour of the Conſulſhip, and thoſe of a Triumph and Cenſorſhip.

Miſtreſs of one half of the Empire. We ſhall give particular articles of the chief perſons of this antient family [B].

[B] It was an ancient family.] Thoſe, who are men of the greateſt reading, and have the largeſt collections, and materials deſigned for the preſs, ſometimes fall into the ſtrangeſt miſtakes of memory imaginable. Father Vavaſſor is an inſtance of this, in his excellent Diſcourſe of the burleſque ſtyle, where he cenſures Photius for having ſuppoſed that Antonius Diogenes, Author of a Romance, lived very near the time of Alexander the Great: Οὐ λίαν πόρρω τῶν χρόνων τοῦ Βασιλέως Ἀλεξάνδρου (1). He alledges ſeveral reaſons againſt this, of which he thinks this the ſtrongeſt, that the family Antonia was not then ſubſiſting in the world, nor the name of it either made or known: Neque, quod graviſſimum eſt, tum nata gens Antonia, aut facta vox, aut audita temporibus illis (2). Nothing is more falſe than this. We have produced upon the authority of Livy one Titus Antoninus, one of the Decemviri, in the year 304 of Rome, and one Quintus Antonius a military Tribune about thirty years after. We find in the ſame hiſtorian one Marcus Antoninus, made General of the Horſe by the Dictator Cornelius Rufinus, in the year 421. Now it is certain, that Alexander died in the year 430. I do not alledge the tradition mentioned by Plutarch; becauſe it may be very juſtly replied to me, that it is as improbable, Anton, the ſon of Hercules, was the original of the family Antonia in Italy, as Cocceius Nerva was that of the family of Coſſé in France.

(1) Phot. Bibliotb. num. 167. p. 364.

(2) Vavaſſ. de ludicra Dictione p. 148.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS) the Orator, was the greateſt ornament of his family. At his firſt entrance into the ſervice of the commonwealth, he gave a noble proof of his merit, which deſerves to be mentioned. He had obtained the Queſtorſhip of the Province of Aſia, and was gone as far as Brunduſium to embark, in order to take upon him his office, when his friends ſent him word that he was accuſed of inceſt, and that Caſſius the Pretor, who was the ſevereſt Judge in the world, ſo that his Tribunal was ſtiled the Rock of the Accuſed, had got that cauſe before him. Marcus Antonius might have taken advantage of the Law, which forbids any accuſations to be admitted againſt thoſe who were abſent in the ſervice of the Commonwealth, but he choſe rather to juſtify himſelf in form; and for that purpoſe he returned to Rome, and proſecuted his cauſe, which he gained with prodigious honour (a). Sicily fell to his lot while he was Pretor, and he cleared the Seas of the pirates which infeſted that coaſt. He was made Conſul with A. Poſthumius Albinus in the year of Rome 653, and he ſtopped all the turbulent deſigns of Sextus Titus, the Tribune of the People, with great reſolution and ſucceſs. Some time after he was made Governor of Cilicia, under the title of Proconſul, where he performed ſuch noble exploits, that he received the honour of a triumph. I ſhall not omit to obſerve, that in order to improve his prodigious talent of eloquence, he became in ſome meaſure a ſcholar to the greateſt men at Athens and Rhodes, in his voyage to Cilicia, and his return to Rome. He performed after this the office of Cenſor with a great deal of glory, having carried his cauſe before the people againſt Marcus Duronius, who had preferred an accuſation of bribery againſt him, in revenge for Marcus Antonius's having eraſed his name out of the liſt of the Senators, which that wiſe Cenſor had done, becauſe Duronius, while he was Tribune of the People, had abrogated a Law, which reſtrained immoderate expences in feaſts (b). He was one of the greateſt Orators that ever appeared at Rome, and the occaſion, according to the teſtimony of Cicero, who was an excellent judge in theſe points, that Italy might juſtly boaſt herſelf to rival even Greece itſelf in the art of eloquence. He defended among other perſons Marcus Aquilius, and moved the judges in ſo ſenſible a manner by the tears he ſhed (c), and the ſcars he ſhewed upon the breaſt of his client, that he gained his cauſe. We may ſee very fully the character of his eloquence, and of his action, in the book which I quote (d). He never would publiſh any of his pleadings [A], that he might not, as he ſaid, be proved to have urged in one cauſe what was contrary to that which he had ſaid in another. The morality of the bar did not at that time conſider it as any ſhame for a man to contradict his own arguments in favour of his client,

(a) Valer. Maximus, lib. 3. cap. 7. num. 9. He mentions in lib. 6. cap. 8. the conſtancy of a ſlave of this Mark Anthony, in denying that his maſter was guilty.

(b) Glandorp. Onomaſtic. pag. 68. ex Epitome Livii, Cicerone, &c.

(c) Cicero de Orat. lib. 2. cap. 47. & in Verrem V. initio.

(d) Idem in Bruto cap. 37, & de Oratore.

[A] He would never publiſh any of his pleadings.] This fact, and the reaſon of it are two things ſo remarkable as to deſerve that I ſhould give the proofs of them. Cicero and Valerius Maximus are my authorities. Cicero ſays thus: Hominem ingenioſum M. Antonium aiunt ſolitum eſſe dicere, idcirco ſe nullam unquam orationem ſcripſiſſe, ut ſiquid aliquando non opus eſſet ab ſe eſſe dictum, poſſet ſe negare dixiſſe (1): That is, "It "is reported, that the excellent orator M. Antonius "uſed to ſay, that he never publiſhed any oration upon "this account, that whenever any thing had been "better not ſaid, he might deny that he ſaid it. Let us now hear Valerius Maximus: Jam M. Antonio tenuitatem conſilium eſt, qui idcirco ſe aiebat nullam orationem ſcripſiſſe, ut ſiquid ſuperiore judicio actum, ei quem poſtea defenſurus eſſet, nociturum foret, non dictum à ſe affirmare poſſet: qui facti vix pudentis tolerabilem cauſam habuit, pro periclitantium enim capite non ſolum eloquentiâ ſuâ uti, ſed etiam verecundiâ abuti erat paratus (2): That is, "We muſt pardon Mar"cus Antonius, who uſed to ſay, that he publiſhed "none of his orations for this reaſon, that if any "thing ſaid in any former cauſe might be injurious "to any perſon, whom he ſhould afterwards undertake to defend, he might then ſafely affirm, that "he never ſaid ſo. Tho' ſuch an action was ſcarce "juſtifiable, yet he had ſome excuſe for it; for he "thought it was neceſſary to abuſe not only his elo"quence but even his modeſty when the life of a perſon "in danger called for it." I imagine no body will be ſo unreaſonable as to object againſt my tranſlation of the word ſcribere. Every intelligent reader will underſtand that Marcus Antonius does not mean, that he pleaded extempore, and never wrote any thing of what he ſpoke before the Judges; for if that had been his meaning, he would have given a very impertinent reaſon of his conduct, ſince his only deſign was to prevent his own arms from being turned againſt him. He might prevent this as effectually, whether he wrote his pleadings or not, ſo that he did not publiſh them. A manuſcript hid in a cheſt can never be alledged againſt a man at the bar, as a proof that he once maintained an opinion quite oppoſite to what he advanced then. Such a perſon would deny it with the ſame aſſurance, as if he had pleaded only extempore, and have no manner of apprehenſion, that they would oblige him to produce the original of his pleading. He would have ſeveral infallible methods of

(1) Cicero in Oratione pro Cluentio, cap. 50.

(2) Val. Max. lib. 7. cap. 3. num. 5.

client. The precaution of this Advocate is neceſſary to perſons of his profeſſion [B], and yet it is not always capable of ſaving their honour [C]. He affected to be thought no of ſecuring himſelf. We may conclude therefore, that the point in queſtion is not about the writing and not writing a ſpeech, which is pronounced, but about the publiſhing, or not publiſhing it. If there was any need of proofs in ſo clear a point, I could produce two very ſtrong ones. The firſt ſhall be taken from a paſſage in Cicero, where Brutus complains, that M. Anthony had publiſhed nothing but a very ſmall piece: Vellem aliquid Antonio præter illum de ratione dicendi ſanè exilem libellum.... libuiſſet ſcribere (3). He uſes here the word ſcribere. I ſhall take my ſecond proof from the ſame oration of Cicero, in which the fact mentioned above is found; for Cicero intending to ſhew, that Marcus Antonius had not taken ſo much precaution, as he imagined, argues not that there was any poſſibility of obliging an advocate to produce the original of his pleading, but that there were ſome hearers, who remember'd a long while, what they heard an advocate ſay: Perinde quaſi quid a nobis dictum aut actum ſit, id niſi literis mandaverimus hominum memoriâ non comprehendatur (4).

(3) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 44.

(4) Cicero Orat. pro Cluent. Capit. 50, & ſeq.

[B] The precaution of this advocate is neceſſary to thoſe of his profeſſion.] I remember a letter publiſhed in 1685, in which the cauſes of the contradictions of authors are examined into (5). The advocates are rallied there in the following manner: "We have "ſometimes the pleaſure of hearing in the ſame week "an advocate pleading for a husband againſt his "wife, and for a wife againſt her husband. If he "has a very warm imagination, in his former plead- "ing he ſpeaks of nothing but the power of huſ- "bands; he founds it upon nature, reaſon, the word "of God, and cuſtom. He quotes the Scriptures, "the Fathers, Lawyers, and Travellers. He declaims "againſt women, and reaſons only from general pro- "poſitions. But two days after, we have no more "of this. He eſpouſes quite different maxims; he "treats the authority of the husband as an uſurpation; "he runs over the Scriptures, the Code, Natural "Philoſophy, Hiſtory, and Morality, in favour of "women, ſtill reaſoning upon general propoſitions; "for a man of ſtrong genius thinks that he proves "nothing, if he does not affirm or deny without ex- "ception; and conſequently if he engages in main- "taining oppoſite intereſts, he cannot avoid contra- "dicting himſelf." We muſt confeſs that an advocate, who ſhould publiſh a pleading upon the privileges of the women, full of the fire of his imagination, would be very eaſy to be confuted, if he ſhould likewiſe undertake to defend the privileges of husbands. There would be no occaſion but to refer to his own book. Our orator Marcus Antonius took care to avoid this grand inconvenience, and to reſerve to himſelf the liberty of contradicting his own arguments, by maintaining one thing one day, and the reverſe of it the next, according to the intereſts of his clients. It would be eaſy to ſhew, that the advocates are not the only perſons who uſe this method; the controverſial Divines follow their example, as they have to deal with different people (6). Bellarmin, when he writes againſt the Enthuſiaſts, maintains that the ſcriptures are full of the characters of Divinity; but againſt the Proteſtants, he argues that they are obſcure, and want the authority of the church (7). A Miniſter, whom I ſhall not name, maintains againſt the Romiſh Church, that the characters of Divinity ſhine throughout the Scriptures; but when he writes againſt Mr. Pajon, he talks another language (8). This privilege ought to be left entirely to the Poets and Orators. "They very frequently ſay things which "are contradictory to each other in different places, "according as they ſuit their purpoſe. Nos Poëtarum more, uti ſe res dederit, ita vel populi vel eruditorum hominum ſententiam noſtro quodam jure ſequimur, atque alias, ſi ſit, opus, aliter de eadem dicimus, That is, "We like the Poets, have a peculiar pri- "vilege of following the opinions of the vulgar or "of the learned, as the ſubject requires, and of ſpeak- "ing differently upon the ſame point, whenever there "is occaſion; ſays the excellent Signior Della Caſa, "Archbiſhop of Benevento in one of his letters to

(5) It is the 2d of the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg. A REFLECTION upon the contradictions of Authors.

(6) See the remark [M] of the Article (JOHN) ADAM.

(7) See the attempt of the Jeſuit Mulhuſinus in his Auctarium primum Speculi miſeriarum Patei, to ſolve this contradiction. See likewiſe the remark [D] of the article BELLARMIN.

(8) See the Supplement to the Commentaire Philoſophique, and p. 207 and 216 of Mr. Saurin's Anſwer to that Commentary.

"Victorius: and Euſtathius in his comment upon "verſe 181 of the ſecond Book of the Odyſſey, and "upon the 243d verſe of the twelfth Book of the "Iliad, obſerves that Homer ſays in thoſe paſſages "things with relation to Auguries, which were con- "trary to what he had ſaid in other places; and "this he calls τὸ ἀμφοτερόγλωσσον. I have ſaid there- "fore in theſe firſt paſſages of my Poems, which I "have quoted, that an old Poet was a very ſcanda- "lous character, becauſe that was proper for my ſub- "ject. But this does not hinder me from aſſerting "the contrary in other places, where there is occa- "ſion (9)." I love ſuch ſincerity as this; and ſhould be glad to find the ſame in Bellarmin and the Miniſter, whom I ſpoke of; but this is a thing not to be expected. We ſhall preſently ſee what Cicero ſays upon the right of advocates, with reſpect to the liberty of contradicting themſelves. See the remarks [H] and [I] of the article of BALDUS.

(9) It is Mr. Menage who ſpeaks this in his Anti-Baillet, tom. 2. p. 174, 175.

[C] The precaution, which he made uſe of, is not always capable of ſaving the honour of Advocates.] We have ſeen (10) Cicero's obſervation, that the memory of the hearers is very much to be apprehended by advocates, who contradict themſelves (11). If he had given us inſtances of this, he would have much more ſtrongly convinced us, that the precaution of Marcus Antonius was to no purpoſe. But it muſt be confeſſed, that what he adds is very proper to juſtify the conduct of this orator. It is as follows. Marcus Brutus, who accuſed L. Plancius, when the latter was defended by L. Craſſus, brought in two perſons that read aloud ſeveral paſſages, which he had ſelected from two orations of L. Craſſus, in one of which he had raiſed the authority of the Senate to a prodigious height, and in the other as much depreſſed it. This gave the orator ſome uneaſineſs, and obliged him to prepare excuſes for it from the difference of the times and occaſions, which had required of him theſe two ſorts of principles (12). Ego vero, ſays Cicero (13), in iſto genere libentius cum multorum tum hominis eloquentiſſimi & ſapientiſſimi L. Craſſi autoritatem ſequor, qui cum L. Plancium defenderet, accuſante M. Bruto, homine in dicendo vehementi & callido, quum Brutus duobus recitatoribus conſtitutis ex duabus ejus orationibus capita alterna inter ſe contraria recitanda curâſſet, quod in diſſuaſione rogationis ejus quæ contra Coloniam Narbonenſem ferebatur quantum poteſt de autoritate Senatus detrahit; in ſuaſione legis Serviliæ ſummis ornat Senatum laudibus, & multa in Equites Romanos quum in eâ oratione aſperius dicta recitâſſet, quo animi illorum judicum in Craſſum incenderentur, aliquantum eſſe commotus dicitur. Itaque in reſpondendo primum expoſuit utriuſque rationem temporis, ut oratio ex re & causâ habita videretur. Cicero was far from diſapproving the part which L. Craſſus fixed upon on this occaſion; for he found himſelf in the ſame circumſtances; for they having repeated a paſſage out of one of his orations, which was very contrary to an argument which he had in hand, he anſwered, that the oration, of which they recited part, did not contain the expreſſions of his real ſentiments; and that what a man ſays in the character of an advocate is not to be conſidered as if he had aſſerted it as a witneſs; in ſhort, that it is the language of the cauſe, and not of the orator. This is intelligible enough: we are to ſpeak according to the intereſt of the cauſe, and the preſent conjuncture, and not according to our own private opinions, Ego ſi quid ejuſmodi dixi, neque cognitum commemoravi, neque pro teſtimonio dixi: & illa oratio potius temporis mei quam judicii & auctoritatis fuit... Errat vehementer ſi quis in orationibus noſtris, quas in judiciis habuimus, autoritates noſtras conſignatas ſe habere arbitratur. Omnes enim ille orationes cauſarum & temporum ſunt, non hominum ipſorum aut patronorum. Nam ſi cauſæ ipſæ pro ſe loqui poſſent, nemo adhiberet oratorem: nunc adhibemur ut ea dicamus, non quæ noſtrâ autoritate conſtituantur ſed quæ ex re ipſâ cauſâque dicantur (14). Add to this theſe words, which Cicero puts into the mouth of Marcus Antonius the orator: Oratoris omnis actio opinionibus non ſcientiâ continetur; nam & apud eos dicimus qui neſciunt, & ea dicimus, quæ neſcimus ipſi: ita & illi alias aliud

(10) Above in quotation (4).

(11) It is equally to be feared by preachers, when they are ſo far from contradicting themſelves, that from time to time they repeat almoſt word for word the ſame Sermons.

(12) See Cicero's Orat. pro Cluent, cap. L. & ſeq. and again more plainly de Oratore cap. LV. how he revenged himſelf upon Brutus, by bringing three readers.

(13) Cicero, Orat. pro Cluentio, cap. LI.

(14) Idem, ibid. cap. 50.

iiſdem

no ſcholar [D]. His modeſty, and his other qualifications, as a man of virtue, rendered him no leſs dear to a great number of illuſtrious perſons, who were his friends, than his eloquence made him the admiration of the whole world. He was unfortunately killed during thoſe bloody confuſions which was raiſed by Marius and Cinna at Rome. He was diſcovered in the place where he had hid himſelf, and ſoldiers were ſent immediately to diſpatch him. His manner of addreſſing them had ſuch an effect upon them, that no body, but he who commanded them, had the cruelty to kill him, not having heard his diſcourſe, but being juſt entered into the chamber, and enraged that his ſoldiers had not executed his orders (e). His head was expoſed pro Roſtris, i. e. before the Roſtrum, a place which he had adorned with his triumphal ſpoils (f.) This happened in the year of Rome 667. He left two ſons, whom I am going to mention.

(e) Plutarch. in Mario, p. 431. Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 9.

(f) Cicero de Oratore, lib. 3. cap. 3.

iiſdem de rebus & ſentiunt & judicant, & nos contrarias ſæpe cauſas dicimus, non modo ut Craſſus contra me dicat aliquando, aut ego contra Craſſum, quum alterutri neceſſe ſit falſum dicere, ſed etiam ut uterque noſtrûm eadem de re alias aliud defendat, quum plus uno verum eſſe non poſſit. Ut igitur in ejuſmodi re, quæ mendacio nixa ſit, quæ ad ſcientiam non ſæpe perveniat, quæ opiniones hominum & ſæpe errores aucupetur, ita dicam (15). I aſſure my ſelf, that the greateſt part of my readers will be ſo well pleaſed to ſee, that theſe two great orators had the ſame principles, and know ſo exactly the weak ſide of their profeſſion, that I ſhall be excuſed for whatever may ſeem too great a digreſſion in this remark. We may obſerve that theſe principles are ſtill ſubſiſting. Compare the pleadings of Mr. Erard againſt the Dutcheſs of Mazarine, with the anſwer to the Factum of that Lady. And read in particular theſe words of the anſwer: Mr. Erard ſpoke to the Dutcheſs of Mazarine of the events of that time after the manner in which ſhe ought then to have conſidered them. Afterwards the different times and events have changed our ſentiments and expreſſions.

(15) Cicer. de Orat. iib. 2. c. 7.

[D] Our Marcus Antonius affected to be thought no ſcholar.] If I am not miſtaken, this was not ſo much out of modeſty as policy. He ſaw himſelf eſtabliſhed in the glorious reputation of a great orator; and might not he then imagine, that the world would admire him more, if they thought this eloquence of his was owing entirely to the ſtrength of his genius, than if they ſuppoſed it to be the fruit of a long application to the ſtudy of Greek authors? He had another reaſon; he believed the people would be more touch'd by orations, if they conſidered them as the production of nature only, and not of art. They are apt to ſuſpect thoſe, who are acquainted with all the ſubtilties of their profeſſion. With regard to the Judges, he thought nothing more proper to produce a good effect, than to make them believe, that he pleaded without any preparation, and to conceal from them carefully all the artifice of Rhetoric, which he made uſe of in order to ſerve his cauſe. But after all he was learned, and not unacquainted with the beſt Grecian authors. We may prove this from ſeveral paſſages of Cicero. Magna nobis pueris, Quinte frater, ſi memoria tenes, opinio fuit L. Craſſum non plus attigiſſe doctrinæ, quam quantum prima illa puerili inſtitutione potuiſſet, M. autem Antonium omnino omnis eruditionis expertem atque ignarum fuiſſe..... Quum nos . . . ea diſceremus quæ Craſſo placerent, & ab his doctoribus, quibus ille uteretur, erudiremur, etiam illud ſæpe intelleximus . . . . illum & Græcè ſic loqui nullam ut noſſe aliam linguam videretur, & doctoribus noſtris ea ponere in percontando, eaque ipſum omni in ſermone tractare, ut nihil eſſe ei novum, nihil inauditum videretur. De Antonio verò quanquam ſæpe ex humaniſſimo viro patruo noſtro acceperamus, quemadmodum ille vel Athenis vel Rhodi ſe doctiſſimorum hominum ſermonibus dediſſet, tamen ipſe adoleſcentulus, quantum illius ineuntis ætatis meæ patiebatur pudor, multa ex eo ſæpe quæſivi. Non erit profectò tibi quod ſcribo hoc novum, (nam jam tum ex me audiebas) mihi illum ex multis variiſque ſermonibus nullius rei, quæ quidem eſſet in his artibus, de quibus aliquid exiſtimare poſſem, rudem aut ignarum eſſe viſum. Sed fuit hoc in utroque eorum ut Craſſus non tam exiſtimari vellet non didiciſſe quam illa diſpicere, & noſtrorum hominum in omni genere prudentiam Græcis anteferre. Antonius autem probabiliorem hoc populo orationem fore cenſebat ſuam, ſi omnino didiciſſe nunquam putaretur. Atque ita uterque ſe graviorem fore ſi alter contemnere, alter ne noſſe quidem Græcos videretur. This is the exordium to his ſecond Book de oratore. Add to this what he ſays there of himſelf (16), that he never read the Greek authors, but for diverſion; and that he underſtood not a word in their books of Philoſophy, Verbum profitis nullum intelligo, ita ſunt anguſtis & conciſis diſputationibus illigati: that he never meddled with the Poets, whoſe language was far from human, but confined himſelf to the hiſtorians and orators, who had adapted themſelves to thoſe, who were half learned: Videantur voluiſſe eſſe nobis, qui non ſumus eruditiſſimi, familiares. In the ſequel of that Book it is no longer Cicero, who ſpeaks, and we find Marcus Antonius amongſt other things ſpeaking as follows: Ego iſta ſtudia non improbo, moderata modo ſint: opinionem iſtorum ſtudiorum & ſuſpicionem artificii apud eos, qui res judicent, oratori adverſariam eſſe arbitror; imminuit enim & oratoris autoritatem, & orationis fidem (17). That is, "I do not diſapprove of thoſe ſtudies, ſo "they be but moderately purſued; I imagine, that "the reputation of them, and the ſuſpicion of arti"fice, do ſome injury to the orator in the opinion "of the Judges; for they leſſen his authority, and "the credit of his oration." This was the foundation of the conduct, which Cicero attributes to him: Erat memoria ſumma, nulla meditationis ſuſpicio; imparatus ſemper aggredi ad dicendum videbatur, ſed ita erat paratus, ut judices illo dicente nonnunquam viderentur non ſatis parati ad dicendum fuiſſe (18): That is, "He had a prodigious memory, and no "ſuſpicion of any previous meditation; he always "ſeemed to begin to ſpeak without preparation, and "yet he was ſo well prepared, that the Judges ſome"times, when he was ſpeaking, ſeem'd not ſuffici"ently prepared to anſwer." I remember to this purpoſe a remark of Mr. Daillè upon the difference, between acting the orator, and being an orator (19). This remark is excellent.

(16) Idem, ibid. cap. 14. See likewiſe cap. 19.

(17) De Oratore, lib. 2. cap. 37.

(18) Idem, in Bruto cap. 37.

(19) Daille, Reponſe au P. Adam, 3d Part. p. 156.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS), eldeſt ſon to the preceding, had the ſirname of Creticus (a). He never raiſed himſelf beyond the Pretorſhip, but executed that office with ſuch an extent of authority as was very uncommon, for having the commiſſion for importing of corn, this gave him the whole command of the Seas (b). This was a privilege which he obtained by the intereſt of the Conſul (c) Cotta, and of the faction of Cethegus (d); but this occaſioned no murmuring among the people, as it would have done if he had been a perſon of greater merit [A]. It is ſaid that he ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by bad counſels,

(a) Plut. in M. Antonio, pag. 915.
(b) Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 31.

(c) I ſhall examine in the article of CETHEGUS whether Cotta was Conſul, when Mark Antony received this commiſſion.
(d) Aſcon. Pedian. in Orat. Ciceron. contra Verrem, p. 113.

[A] The people would have murmur'd to ſee him have the whole command of the ſeas, if he had been a perſon of greater merit.] Velleius Paterculus has ſuggeſted this thought to me. It is in a paſſage, where he relates that Pompey obtained a commiſſion two years after, which made him almoſt abſolute maſter of the whole earth. This was not granted him without oppoſition, whereas there was nothing ſaid againſt the decree, which had put the ſame kind of power into the hands of Marcus Antonius. The reaſon counſels, in committing extortion in the Provinces. He was guilty of a great deal of injuſtice that way (e). His extortions in Sicily are repreſented in a few words by Cicero (f). The war of Crete, the ſucceſs of which he imagined would be ſo eaſy, that he carried fewer arms in his Fleet, than chains for the conquered (g), proved ſo unfortunate to him, that he fell ſick at the diſappointment and died. He had no power to reſiſt the mortifying reflections which tormented his mind, when he ſaw, that the enemies having taken ſeveral of his ſhips had hung up the Roman ſoldiers upon the maſts, and rowing about with this ſpectacle, triumphed with the greateſt inſolence over the Commonwealth in a thouſand different places. By Julia his ſecond wife [B] he had three ſons, Marcus Antonius, Caius Antonius, and Lucius Antonius (h), whom I ſhall give an account of hereafter.

(e) Idem, ibid. p. 113. See likewiſe p. 37.

(f) Cicero Orat. 3. in Verrem, cap. 91. See likewiſe Orat. in Verr. 2. cap. 3.

(g) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 7.

(h) Glandorp. Onomaſtic. p. 73.

I ſhall have ſeveral errors to take notice of [C], and perhaps the Elogium, which Plutarch has given to our Antonius [D] may be conſidered as one.

ANTONIUS

reaſon of this was, that they thought him a perſon, who could never make himſelf formidable; but in Pompey they found ſo much merit and ſuch abilities, as made him formidable to the publick liberty. Idem hoc ante biennium in M. Antonii prætura decretum erat; ſed interdum perſona, ut exemplo nocet, ita invidiam auget aut levat. In Antonio homines æquo animo paſſi erant; raro enim invidetur eorum honoribus, quorum vis non timetur; contra in iis homines extraordinaria reformidant, qui ea ſuo arbitrio aut depoſituri aut retenturi videntur, & modum in voluntate habent (1). This is a fine text for the writers of political commentaries. I ſhall leave it to them almoſt entire; and only content myſelf with this ſhort obſervation. It is complain'd, that the ſame things, which ought to raiſe a man to conſiderable poſts, prevent his obtaining them. Eſtamos à tiempo, ſays George de Monte Mayor, qui me mererer la Coſa, es principal parte para no alcançarla: That is, as the Preſident du Vayer expreſſes it, "In this age, nothing ſo much hinders "men of virtue from gaining eſtates and honours, "as to merit them (2)." This complaint is too often well founded; but there are ſome circumſtances when it has no force in it. For to merit a poſt, it is not ſufficient to have the qualifications neceſſary to fill it in a proper manner; beſides this it is requiſite, that theſe qualifications ſhould not have certain defects joined to them, which may lead a man to make an ill uſe of the reputation, which he has acquired by diſcharging his poſt with all the ability and ſucceſs imaginable. The mixture of thoſe defects may properly ſpeaking, render thoſe unfit for a poſt of importance, who are otherwiſe the beſt qualified for it. It is not therefore always injuſtice to refuſe ſome men the poſts, of which they are very capable; it is only a neceſſary precaution and prudence, eſpecially in commonwealths. Eminent abilities inſpire a ſpirit of ambition. If you ſuffer thoſe, who poſſeſs them, to do conſiderable ſervices to their country, you raiſe this fire of ambition more and more: the reputation which they gain by diſcharging a great poſt in a proper manner, inſpires them with a deſign to make an ill uſe of their credit, and ſhews them, that it will be eaſy to raiſe themſelves higher. They try their fortune; they aſpire ſometimes to ſovereignty; and whether they ſucceed or not, they occaſion a thouſand diſorders, which would have been avoided by giving thoſe poſts to men of a moderate degree of merit.

(1) Vell. Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 31.

(2) See Pierre Matthieu at the end of his Preface to the Hiſtoire de la Paix.

[B] Julia, his ſecond wife.] She was daughter to Julius Cæſar who was Conſul in the year of Rome 664, and ſiſter to another Julius Cæſar who was Conſul in 690. Her virtue and merit equalled her with the moſt illuſtrious Ladies of her time: Ταῖς ἀρίσαις τότε & σωφρονεσάταις ἰσάμιλλος; That is, "She was com-"parable to the moſt excellent and virtuous Ladies of that age (3). She was not very happy in her husbands; for after the death of Marcus Antonius Creticus, ſhe married Publius Cornelius Lentulus, who was one of the accomplices of Catiline's conſpiracy, and puniſhed with death for that crime. What ſhe did to ſave Lucius Cæſar her brother, deſerves admiration (4). He was proſcribed during the Triumvirate, and concealed himſelf at her houſe. The ſoldiers went to ſearch for him, in order to kill him; but ſhe placed herſelf at the door, and declared they ſhould not enter till they had killed her, who was mother to that Marcus Antonius, whoſe orders they wanted to execute. This made them retire (5). The

(3) Plutarch. in M. Antonio, init. pag. 916.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 924.

firſt wife of our Antonius was named Numitoria; ſhe was daughter to Quintus Numitorius Pullus. She is called the daughter of a traytor in the Philippics of Cicero (6).

(6) Taken from Glandorp. p. 74, 75.

[C] I have ſome errors to take notice of.] Thyſius, Profeſſor of Eloquence in the Univerſity of Leyden, has a Note, which may give us but a mean opinion of his learning. This Note is upon the following words of Lactantius. De Neptuni ſorte manifeſtum eſt, cujus Regnum tale fuiſſe dicimus, quale M. Antonii fuit infinitum illud imperium, cui totius oræ maritimæ poteſtatem Senatus decreverat, ut prædones perſequeretur, ac mare omne pacaret (7). That is, "It is very plain "concerning Neptune's Lot, whoſe Empire we ſay "was ſuch an one as that infinite Empire of M. "Antonius, who had the command of all the ſea-"coaſt given him by the decree of the Senate, that "he might deſtroy the pirates, and clear all the "ſeas of them." Thyſius pretends, that inſtead of Antonii, we ought to read Pompeii, which reading is in ſeveral good manuſcripts; and upon this occaſion he tells us, that Pompey was called Neptune, and ſeveral of his ſtatues adorned with the Enſigns of that Deity. He is miſtaken in this point; for there is no queſtion but that Lactantius, who was a perfect maſter of Cicero, had in his eye the following paſſage in his oration againſt Verres, where he ſays, Poſtquam Marci Antonii infinitum illud imperium ſenſerant (8), That is, "When they were ſenſible of that in-"finite power of Marcus Antonius;" or theſe words in the next oration, Ita ſe in iſto infinito Imperio Marcum Antonium geſſiſſe, ut &c. That is, "Mar-"cus Antonius behaved himſelf ſo in that infinite "power of his, that, &c." One of Voſſius's ſons might have prevented this falſe note of the Leyden Profeſſor; for he obſerves in a Book printed thirteen years before Thyſius's Lactantius, that Thomaſius was very much miſtaken in putting Pompeii inſtead of Antonii in his Edition of that Father: and he proves this by the authority of Cicero and that of Paterculus (10). I ſhall add, that he ſuppoſes Florus ſpeaks of the ſame Antonius, where he ſays, Quum ille (Pompeius) res in Aſia gerens eo quoque præfectum miſiſſet Antonium in alienâ Provinciâ inclitus fuit (11): That is, "While he (Pompey) commanded in Aſia, he ſent "thither the Prefect Antonius, and ſo had a great in-"fluence in another man's Province." He ſhews that Florus has confounded this Antonius with Octavius, who according to Plutarch (12) and Dion (13) was ſent to the iſland of Crete by Pompey, when Metellus commanded there. There is more reaſon for this, than to ſay, that we ought to correct in Plutarch the ſirname of Criticus given to this Marcus Antonius, and to read it Creticus. I cannot tell what Edition of Plutarch he made uſe of; but I find Κρητικὸς in the Francfort Edition of 1620, and that of Paris in 1624. I wiſh he had taken the pains to examine an error in Chronology, which ſeems to be in Paterculus. That hiſtorian tells us that there were but two years between the commiſſion given to Marcus Antonius, and that to Pompey; and yet Aſconius Pedianus relates, that Marcus Antonius obtained it by the intereſt of a Conſul named Cotta. I ſhall touch upon this difficulty in the Article of CETHEGUS.

(7) Lactant. lib. 1. cap. 11. pag. 34.

(8) Cicero Orat. 2. in Verr. cap. 3

(9) Idem, Orat. 3. in Verr. cap. 91.

(10) Gerardus Voſſius Not. in Vell. Paterc. pag. 55. edit. 1639. He quotes Cicero Verrinâ 1. inſtead of Verrina 2. and 3. dd. ll.

(11) Flor. lib. 3. cap. 7, and not cap. 8, as Gerard Voſſius quotes it.

(12) Plutarch. in Pompeio.

(13) Dio. l. 36.

[D] Perhaps the elogium, which Plutarch has given to our Antonius may be conſidered as an error.] "Mar-"cus Antonius, ſays he (14), was a man of virtue "and ſincerity, and very liberal. But as he was "not rich, his wife prevented him from indulging the "generoſity

(14) Plut. in M. Antonio, init. p. 915, 916.

ANTONIUS (CAIUS) brother to the preceding, was a man of ſuch irregular conduct, that he and his eldeſt brother were more worthy to be the uncle and father of Antonius the Triumvir, than to be the ſons of the great man who gave them life. This Caius Antonius bore arms under Sylla in the war againſt Mithridates, and raiſed ſuch diſturbances in Achaia, that upon the account of this, and ſeveral other crimes which were alledged againſt him, he was afterwards expelled the Senate by the Cenſors. However he was raiſed to the Conſulſhip in preference to Catiline, who was one of his competitors; but he gained this poſt with much leſs honour than Cicero did, who in ſpite of all the contrivances of Caius Antonius and Catiline to exclude him, was declared Conſul with the unanimous conſent of the people, whereas Antonius had but a few voices more than Catiline (a). It was during his Conſulſhip that the conſpiracy of Catiline broke out, which was oppoſed by Cicero with great warmth and reſolution. His Collegue had the command of the army which was ſent againſt Catiline, and obtained a complete victory by means of his Lieutenant General Petreius; for with regard to his own ſhare in it, he was prevented by a real or pretended ſickneſs from being preſent at the battle. Dion Caſſius ſays it was only a pretended one, and that he being apprehenſive leſt Catiline ſhould diſcover ſome very important ſecrets concerning him, would not appear againſt him in perſon (b). After the victory he conducted his troops into Macedonia, and was defeated by the Dardanians. He governed that Province for three years with ſo much violence and extortion, that the Senate, offended at his conduct, ſent a ſucceſſor in his room. At his return to Rome he was accuſed by Marcus Cælius, and though Cicero undertook his defence, yet he was convicted and baniſhed. Some are of opinion that he lived fifteen years in the Iſland of Cephalonia, and that Marcus Antonius, his nephew who became very powerful at Rome, when the aſſaſſins of Julius Cæſar were obliged to leave it, recalled him from his baniſhment [A]. He died ſome time after, broken with age and troubles, and left only one daughter, whom he ſaw divorced from her huſband Marcus Antonius the Triumvir, a little after their marriage, upon pretence of her gallantry with Dolabella (c).

(a) Aſconius Pedianus in Orationem Ciceronis in togâ candidâ contra Anton. & Catilin. in fine, pag. 153.

(b) Dio, lib. 37, ad annum Romæ 692.

(c) See the remark [G] of the article FULVIA, and Glandorpii Onomaſtic. p. 75, 76.

" generoſity of his temper. He had no money in " his houſe one day, when a friend came to borrow " of him; however, he thought of an expedient to " help him. He order'd water to be brought him " in a ſilver goblet, under pretence of ſhaving himſelf. " He lather'd his beard with it, and then ſending " away his ſervant, gave the goblet to his friend. " The whole family was in diſorder, and ſearching " for the goblet that was miſſing; his wife was in a " prodigious paſſion, and juſt going to put all the " ſlaves to the rack, when he prevented her, by con- " feſſing what he had done, and begged her par- " don." Ὡμολόγησε συγγνώμην ἔχειν δεηθείς (15). Plutarch is not right in repreſenting the character of this man; he makes him liberal, whereas he ſhould have ſtiled him prodigal. Salluſt has been juſt in his character of him. M. Antonius perdundæ pæcuniæ genitus; vacuuſque curis niſi inſtantibus (16); That is, " Marcus Antonius was a man formed for " laviſhing away of money, and never troubled him- " ſelf with any cares, till they came upon him." I ſhall not conceal, that Cicero denies, what the common opinion aſcribes to this M. Antonius. It is ſaid, that he kept no account of his income or expences. Audimus aliquem tabulas nunquam confeciſſe; quæ eſt opinio hominum de M. Antonio falſa, nam fecit diligentiſſimè (17). That is, " We have heard of " ſome, who never kept any account; which is the " common opinion concerning M. Antonius, but en- " tirely falſe, for he kept a very exact one.

(15) Idem, ibid. p. 916. A.

(16) Salluſt. in Fragm. Hiſtor. lib. 3. p. 446.

(17) Cicero Orat. 1, in Verrem, cap. 23.

[A] Marcus Antonius his nephew. . . recalled him from baniſhment.] There are ſome difficulties relating to the time when he was recalled, which ſhall be examined in the Remark [H] of the Article FULVIA.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS) one of the Triumvirate, was grandſon to Marcus Antonius the Orator, and ſon to Marcus Antonius Creticus. Moreri has ſpoken ſo fully of him, that I ſhall excuſe myſelf from enlarging upon him. The errors, which I have collected upon this head will be taken notice of either in the article of FULVIA, or ſome other place.

The only thing which I ſhall add concerning him is, that he publiſhed a treatiſe concerning his Drunkenneſs [A].

[A] He publiſhed a treatiſe concerning his drunkenneſs.] This is a fact, which the modern writers make no mention of; and yet it is a very remarkable one, and to be found in Pliny (1): Tergilla Ciceroni M. F. binos congios ſimul haurire ſolitum ipſi objicit: Marcoq; Agrippæ à temulento ſcyphum impactum. Etenim hæc ſunt ebrietatis opera. Sed nimirum hanc gloriam auferre Cicero voluit interfectori patris ſui M. Antonio. Is enim ante eum avidiſſime apprehenderat hanc palmam, edito etiam volumine de ſuâ ebrietate, quo patrocinari ſibi auſus, approbavit planè (ut quidem arbitror) quanta mala per temulentiam terrarum orbi intuliſſet. Exiguo tempore ante prælium Actiacum id volumen evomuit; quo facilè intelligatur ebrius jam ſanguine civium, & tanto magis eum ſitiens: That is, " Tergilla " reproached Cicero the ſon of the orator, with be- " ing uſed to drink two gallons at once, and that " he threw a cup at Marcus Agrippa, when he was " drunk. For theſe are the effects of drunkenneſs. " But Cicero ſeem'd deſirous to take away the glory " in this reſpect from Marcus Antonius, who ſlew his " father; and had been ambitious of this honour " before him, having publiſhed a book concerning " his drunkenneſs; in which endeavouring to vin- " dicate himſelf, he plainly approved in my opinion " all the evils which he had brought upon the world by " his exceſs. A little time before the battle at Ac- " tium he vomited out (EVOMUIT) this book, by " which it appears he was drunk with the blood of " his fellow citizens, and yet ſtill thirſted after more." I am ſurpriz'd that Plutarch has ſaid nothing of ſuch an extraordinary particular, and that Suetonius has omitted the mention of it.

(1) Plinius, lib. 14. ſub. fin. cap. ult.

☞ ANTONIUS (MARCUS) the Triumvir. Mr. Bayle having given an account of his family, we proceed to give one of his perſon and actions. Antonius was very handſome in his youth, for which reaſon he was very much beloved by Curio, a Senator, but a man who indulged himſelf in all manner of vice. To attach Antonius more and more more to him, he admitted him to all his diverſions, and by feaſting, drinking, and all ſorts of debauchery, he made him contract ſuch heavy debts, that his own father forbad him his houſe. However Curio was ſo generous as to bail Antonius for two hundred and fifty talents, that is, according to the moſt moderate computation (a), forty ſix thouſand eight hundred and twelve pounds, ten ſhillings of our money. Antonius became afterwards familiarly acquainted with Clodius, but growing ſoon diſguſted with him, he went into Greece, where he exerciſed his body in military labour, and his mind in the ſtudy of eloquence, in which he followed the Aſiatic ſtile and manner, which was then in vogue, and admirably ſuited to his elevated genius and unbounded ambition. The Proconſul Gabinius going into Syria, invited Antonius to ſerve under him; but Antonius, though ſtill very young, ſcorned to follow him as a private ſoldier, whereupon Gabinius gave him the command of the cavalry, and ſent him againſt Ariſtobulus, who was then endeavouring to raiſe a rebellion among the Jews, in order to ſhake off the yoke of the Romans (b). Antonius acted with great prudence and courage on this occaſion; he gained a complete victory over the Jews, and took Ariſtobulus himſelf priſoner (c). Some time after, Gabinius being reſolved to reſtore Ptolomy, ſurnamed Auletes (the Piper) to the throne of Egypt [A], Antonius went before him with the cavalry, and in a ſhort time made himſelf maſter of Peluſium. The taking of this city not only gave the army a free paſſage into Egypt, but alſo afforded to Ptolomy great hopes of ſucceſs. Antonius ſhewed on this occaſion, that he had a tender and compaſſionate diſpoſition; for Ptolomy being enraged againſt the inhabitants of Peluſium, on account of their revolt, ordered that they ſhould be all put to death, but Antonius interceded for them, and ſaved their lives. Plutarch is the author who relates this particular (d); and the Abbot de S. Real very juſtly obſerves (e), that this inſtance of Antonius's temper and moderation ought not to have been diſguiſed and miſrepreſented; however we muſt add, that Plutarch aſcribes this to Antonius's love of fame. He performed afterwards ſeveral glorious actions, which gained him the reputation of a great General. When the civil war broke out, Curio took Cæſar's party, and prevailed with his friend Antonius to do the ſame, for which the latter was made a Tribune of the People, in which employment he did Cæſar a very great ſervice [B]. But finding the Senators very much exaſperated againſt that General, who was then in Gaul, and being himſelf driven out of the Senate by the Conſul Lentulus, he went ſecretly with Q. Caſſius, both diſguiſed in a ſlave's habit, to Cæſar's camp. As ſoon as they arrived, they cried, that nothing was now done right at Rome; that the Tribunes of the People were no more permitted to ſpeak freely, but that whoever dared to appear in favour of juſtice and equity was perſecuted, and in danger of his life. Cæſar hearing this, marched immediately into Italy; and this, according to Plutarch, is the reaſon why Cicero ſays (f), that as Helen had been the cauſe of the Trojan war, ſo Antonius had been the promoter of the civil war among the Romans (g). As Plutarch cenſures Tully for this, we ſhall examine his reaſoning in a remark [C]. Cæſar having made

(a) That of Mr. Brerewood, in Dr. Prideaux's Preface to his Connexion.

(b) Plutarchus in Anton. Oper. tom. 1. p. 916. ed. Paris 1624.

(c) Joſeph. Antiq. Jud. lib. 14. cap. 11.

(d) Ubi ſupra, p. 917.

(e) Conſiderations ſur M. Antoine: Dans ſes Oeuvres, tom. 1. p. 400. ed. de la Haye, 1726.

(f) In Secunda Philippica.

(g) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

[A] Gabinius intended to reſtore Ptolomy to the throne of Egypt.] Gabinius having plundered Syria, of which Province he was Proconſul, reſolved to go into Media. He had already paſſed the river Euphrates, when Ptolomy came to him with a letter from Pompey their common friend and Protector, who had been lately choſen Conſul for the following year (1). Pompey in his letter deſired Gabinius to hearken to the propoſals which Ptolomy was to make him, in order to be reſtored to his Kingdom. Ptolomy offered Gabinius for him and his army ten thouſand talents, that is, about one million eight hundred ſeventy two thouſand and five hundred pounds ſterling money. Tho' ſo large a ſum made a very great impreſſion upon Gabinius, yet he at firſt ſcrupled to comply with the King's requeſt, becauſe moſt of the Officers of the army were againſt it. But Antonius greatly delighted with glorious enterpriſes, and being deſirous to pleaſe Ptolomy, prevailed with Gabinius to undertake the expedition (2). This was nevertheleſs contrary to the laws and the religion of the Romans; for by the laws no Governor was permitted to go out of the limits of his Province, nor to undertake any war of his own accord (3); and in the book of Sibyls were found the following words. "If a King of Egypt comes to you for help, "you may grant him your friendſhip, but you ſhall not "aſſiſt him with any troops (4)." But Gabinius thought, that the more the thing was unlawful, the more money he ſhould receive for it (5).

(1) Viz. for the year of Rome 702, 51 before Chriſt.

(2) Plutarch. in Anton. Op. tom. 1. p. 916.

(3) Dion. Caſſ. lib. 39. p. 130. edit. Steph. 1592. Fol.

(4) Ibid. p. 109.

(5) Ibid. p. 131.

[B] In which poſt he did Cæſar a very great ſervice.] Curio received a letter from Cæſar to the Senate, in which Cæſar gave an account of what he had done for the Commonwealth, and juſtified himſelf from all the crimes that were laid to his charge, promiſing alſo to disband his army, and to lay down his poſt, provided Pompey would do the ſame, becauſe it would be unjuſt, that he be forced to unarm, whilſt Pompey continued at the head of his troops. This letter he received the very day that L. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Claudius Marullus entered upon their Conſulſhip (6); upon which he reſolved not to deliver it to them before they were come into the Senate, becauſe he feared that they would not communicate it if they received it privately. Yet the Conſuls deferred a long while the reading of that letter, till at length they were compelled to it by Q. Caſſius Longinus and M. Antonius, both Tribunes of the people. The letter being read, none of the Senators were of opinion that Pompey ſhould disband his army; which is not ſurpriſing, ſince he was then with it near the gates of Rome. With regard to Cæſar, they all except Curio, and one Cæcilius, voted that he ſhould be obliged to diſmiſs his ſoldiers. However the Tribunes found means to prevent the Senate from making a decree about this affair, that day and the following. But at laſt the decree was made, Cæcilius and Curio were eraſed out of the liſt of the Senators, and went with Antonius and Caſſius to the camp of Cæſar (7). Plutarch relates this particular in a different manner. He tells us (8), that the queſtion was put in the Senate, whether Cæſar or Pompey ſhould disband his army; that the majority being for Cæſar's diſmiſſing his ſoldiers, Antonius propoſed, that they both ſhould be obliged to it; to which all the Senators unanimouſly conſented, greatly praiſing Antonius for this hint; but the Conſuls would not agree to this, and Antonius having made ſome other propoſals in behalf of Cæſar, was driven out of the Senate by the Conſul Lentulus.

(6) The firſt day of the year 705 ſince the building of Rome; 48 before the Chriſtian Æra.

(7) Dion Caſſius lib. 41. p. 171, 172.

(8) Ubi ſupra, p. 918.

[C] Whether Antonius has been the promoter of the civil war as Tully aſſerts.] Here follows Cicero's words, Tu, tu, inquam, M. Antoni, princeps C. Cæſari omnia perturbare cupienti, cauſam belli contra patriam inferendi dediſti. Quid enim aliud ille dicebat? Quam cauſam

made himſelf maſter of Rome, appointed Lepidus Prætor of the city, and gave Antonius the government of Italy, with the command over the legions there, in which poſt he ſoon gained the love of the whole army [D]; but what was ſtill more to his honour, and to Cæſar's advantage, was, that Antonius aſſiſted him powerfully on ſeveral occaſions, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that twice, when Cæſar's army had been put to flight, he rallied the ſcattered legions, led them again againſt the enemy, and gained the victory. This raiſed his reputation ſo high, that he was reckoned the beſt General next to Cæſar, who confided ſo much in him, that in the battle at Pharſalia, which was to determine Cæſar's fate, he gave the command of the left wing of his army to Antonius, whilſt he himſelf led the right (b). Cæſar having gained a complete victory over Pompey was ſoon made Dictator, when to acknowledge the ſervices he had received from Antonius, he made him General of the Horſe [E], though he had not yet been Prætor. Cæſar keeping the Dictatorſhip a whole year, Antonius was alſo during that time maintained in his poſt of General of the Horſe, which made the Augurs murmur very much; for they ſaid, that no perſon was allowed to keep that poſt above ſix months; but they were ridiculed for complaining of this little grievance at a time when they themſelves had granted the Sovereign Power to Cæſar for a year (i). Antonius being General of the Horſe, exerted his power with the utmoſt violence. For though he aſſembled the Senate, and thereby maintained a ſhadow of liberty, yet by the ſword he wore, by the multitude of ſoldiers that always attended him, and by all his actions he ſufficiently ſhewed, that the Sovereign Power was now lodged in one perſon only (k). He gave a remarkable inſtance of his tyrannical ſpirit in the tumults which were occaſioned at Rome by L. Trebellius and P. Cornelius Dolabella, both Tribunes of the People. The latter a young man, who was reſolved to make himſelf famous by diſtreſſing the State, had endeavoured to publiſh a certain law for the relief of poor debtors, intending thereby to engage the peoples favour. Trebellius, the other Tribune, who was of the Nobles's party, oppoſed this Law as much as lay in his power. This diſpute often occaſioned great bloodſhed, notwithſtanding a decree of the Senate, by which all perſons were forbidden to bear arms (l). Dolabella deſired Antonius, who had always been his friend, to aſſiſt him in his deſign; and he had ſo much the more reaſon to hope he would grant his requeſt, that Antonius himſelf had always affected a great popularity, and that the Law propoſed by Dolabella, was

(b) Idem, ibid. p. 919.

(i) Dion Caſſius, lib. 42. p. 219.

(k) Idem, ibid. p. 222.

(l) Idem, ibid. p. 223.

cauſam dementiſſimi ſui conſilii & facti afferebat, niſi, quod interceſſio neglecta, jus Tribunitium ſublatum, circumſcriptus eſſet Antonius?——Ut igitur in ſeminibus eſt cauſa arborum, ſic hujus luctuoſiſſimi belli ſemen tu fuiſti. Doletis treis exercitus populi Romani interfectos terfecit Antonius: deſideratis clariſſimos civeis; eos quoque eripuit vobis Antonius: auctoritas hujus ordinis afflicta eſt afflixit Antonius: Omnia denique quæ poſtea vidimus, (quod autem mali non vidimus) ſi recte ratiocinabimur, uni accepta referemus Antonio. Ut Helena Trojanis, ſic iſte huic reip. cauſa belli, cauſa peſtis atque exitii fuit (9). That is, "Thou, thou, I ſay, "Marcus Antonius, art the firſt, who gave Cæſar "cauſe to make war againſt his country, at a time, "that he was already deſirous of embroiling the "ſtate. For what did he ſay himſelf? What did "he alledge as the cauſe of the deſperate council "he took? Why; the contempt which was ſhewn "for the oppoſition of the Tribunes; the aboliſhing "of the Tribunitian right; the hindring M. Antonius from performing his office.——As then the "origin of a tree is in its ſeed, ſo thou haſt been "the ſeed of the deplorable war. Ye mourn, O "Romans, for the loſs of three of your armies; "'tis Antonius has murthered them: you miſs the "moſt eminent of your citizens; 'tis Antonius depriv'd "you of them: the dignity of this order is deſtroyed, "'tis Antonius deſtroyed it. In a word, whatever "we have ſuffered, (and what evils have we not ſuffered?) muſt, if we reaſon right, be laid to the "charge of Antonius. As Helen was the cauſe of the "Trojan war, ſo was this man the cauſe of our misfortunes and our ruin." Thus far Cicero; let us hear, what Plutarch anſwers. He tells us, that if Cæſar had not been already determined to make war upon his country, he would not have been eaſily induc'd to it, merely by ſeeing Antonius and Caſſius come to him in the habit of ſlaves, and flying to him for ſhelter in an hackney carriage; but that this might have given him a pretence to begin the war, to which he was urged by his own unbounded ambition (10). But it is plain that this is not anſwering Tully's charge againſt Antonius. He does not ſpeak of their diſguiſe as ſlaves, nor of a hackney carriage, but aſſerts, that Cæſar pretended he made war againſt Rome, becauſe the Tribunitian dignity had been violated in the perſon of Antonius, who was denied the liberty of exerciſing the power of his office. Now by Plutarch's own account, given in the foregoing remark, it appears, that Antonius thought he had reaſon to complain on this account, which he really did; and Tully, ſuppoſing this complaint might be well grounded, (tho' he is far from granting it,) yet ſays, that it could not juſtify Antonius, ſince no one can juſtly take up arms againſt his own country. Cum omnino nulla, ſays he, juſta cauſa cuiquam eſſe poſſit contra patriam arma capiendi. Now if Antonius had furniſhed Cæſar with a ſpecious pretence for beginning the war, as it is plain he did, why could not Tully ſay, that he was the cauſe, (though not the only cauſe) of his country's ruin? Plutarch therefore had no reaſon for cenſuring Cicero on this account, and for aſſerting downright, as he does, that he told a falſity, περιφανῶς ψευδόμενος (11).

(9) Cicero, in Philip. 2.

(10) Plutarch. vide infra.

(11) Idem, ibid.

[D] Antonius ſoon gained the love of the whole army.] This is not ſurprizing, ſince he uſed to exerciſe and take his meals with the ſoldiers, and make them preſents, as often as his circumſtances would permit him (12). This is an infallible method to gain the ſoldiers love. But what Plutarch adds, ſhews that this love was not ſo general, as he at firſt inſinuates; for he tells us (13), that Antonius was hated by ſome, becauſe out of ſloth and negligence he did not take care to have juſtice done to thoſe that had been wronged; and always received with anger and paſſion thoſe who addreſſed him; and laſtly becauſe he had a very ill character on account of his adulteries.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Ibid.

[E] Cæſar made Antonius General of the Horſe.] This is what Dion Caſſius (14), and the Abbreviator of Livy (15) expreſly tells us. But Plutarch ſays he made him a Tribune of the people, Δήμαρχον, and ſent him to Rome. And to ſhew that this cannot be an error of the tranſcriber, it muſt be obſerved, that Plutarch explains at the ſame time the prerogatives of a Tribune; for he tells us that this Magiſtrate is the next under the Dictator, and in his abſence the firſt and almoſt only Magiſtrate; that the power of the Tribune ſtill ſubſiſts under a Dictator, tho' that of all other Magiſtrates be then abrogated; and therefore Plutarch muſt be miſtaken, ſince it would not have been a great honour and reward for Antonius to be only made a Tribune, which poſt he had already filled before.

(14) Lib. 42. p. 219.

(15) L. Flori, Breviar. l. 113.

was very much to the people's advantage. Trebellius on the other ſide endeavoured to diſſuade Antonius from it. But perhaps he would not have ſucceeded, if Antonius at that very time had not been told, that there were ſtrong reaſons to ſuſpect that his wife was too familiar with Dolabella. This exaſperated him extremely againſt his friend; he was divorced from his wife, who was the daughter of C. Antonius his uncle, and reſolved to oppoſe Dolabella (m). He gave Trebellius leave to ſend for a party of ſoldiers, and Dolabella being alſo aſſiſted by his friends, Rome became the Theatre of a very bloody war. All this happened in the year 707 from the building of Rome (n), and 146 before Chriſt. This tyrannical behaviour of Antonius, together with his diſſolute life [F], was, according to Plutarch (o), the reaſon why the next year Cæſar did not admit him his Collegue in the Conſulſhip, but choſe Æmilius Lepidus. However two years after (p) he was made Conſul, when Cæſar enjoyed that honour for the fifth time. This was the laſt year of that Uſurper's life, who was killed the fifth of March. It was thought his death was haſtened by an imprudent, or perhaps invidious action of Antonius; for when Cæſar was celebrating the Lupercalia (q), cloathed in his triumphal garments, ſitting in the publick place to ſee the races, Antonius ran up to him, and placed a crown on his head, as tho' he offered him the Kingdom. Cæſar feigning to reject it, Antonius inſiſted upon it for ſome time, but at laſt he deſiſted, ſeeing the people were pleaſed with Cæſar's refuſal [G]. This crown was afterwards put upon one of Cæſar's ſtatues, but was taken away by ſome Tribunes, with great acclamations of the people, for which reaſon Cæſar depoſed thoſe Magiſtrates. This confirmed Caſſius and Brutus in the reſolution they had taken to kill the Tyrant. They aſſembled their moſt particular friends, with whom they adviſed whether it was proper to admit Antonius into their conſpiracy. Moſt of them were of opinion to admit him; but Trebonius repreſented to them, that it was not probable Antonius would come into their meaſures; "For, ſaid he, when we went to meet "Cæſar on his return from Spain, Antonius and I lodged together; I took that op- "portunity to hint ſomething to him of this deſign, in order to know his thoughts; "he underſtood me very well, though he did not make it appear; however he kept "the ſecret faithfully, without diſcovering to Cæſar any thing of what I had hinted to "him (r)." This ſhewed that Antonius was not diſpoſed to enter into a conſpiracy againſt his benefactor, though he was alſo unwilling to betray his friend. It was afterwards propoſed to kill Antonius himſelf, as well as Lepidus; but Brutus oppoſed it, by repreſenting that an action performed for the publick good ſhould be free from all imputation of ſelf-intereſt; that if Antonius and Lepidus were killed, the Romans would be apt to believe that the conſpirators had wreſted the power out of Cæſar's hands only to take it into their own, and not to reſtore the publick liberty (s). This conſideration ſaved Antonius's life. When he heard that Cæſar was killed he was ſeized with a terrible apprehenſion, and putting on the diſguiſe of a ſlave he hid himſelf during the night; but hearing the next day that the conſpirators were retired into the Capitol, and that Lepidus was in the Market-place, he aſſembled the Senate in the Temple of Veſta, to deliberate upon the preſent ſituation of the Commonwealth. Several different opinions being propoſed in the Senate, Cicero, in an elaborate Oration, perſuaded them to bury in an eternal oblivion all that had paſſed; and a decree was made accordingly, to which Antonius himſelf conſented out of policy (t) [H]. He alſo ſeemingly reconciled himſelf with Brutus and

(m) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, p. 919.

(n) Dion Caſſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 224.

(o) Ubi ſupra, p. 920.

(p) A. U. 710, 43 before Chriſt.

(q) A feaſt inſtituted to the honour of PAN.

(r) Idem, ibid. p. 921.

(s) Idem, ibid. and Dion. Caſſ. lib. 44. p. 282.

(t) Dion, ibid. p. 281--291.

[F] His diſſolute life.] Plutarch gives us (16) ſeveral inſtances of this. He tells us, that Antonius was deteſted by all good and ſober men, for his luxury, and extravagance; and for his drunkenneſs, and debaucheries; that he uſed to go to the weddings of Pantomimes, and the moſt profligate fellows: that having once paſſed the night in drinking and rioting at the wedding of one Hippias, he appeared the next morning before the people in a very unbecoming condition (17): that one Sergius, a Pantomime, was in great favour with him, as well as Cytharis, a woman of the ſame rank, with whom he was in love, and whom he uſed to carry with him in his litter, attended with a multitude of people. In ſhort, it was thought inſufferable, that whilſt Cæſar was expoſed to all the hardſhips and dangers of war, Antonius ſhould thus ſecurely wallow in all manner of pleaſures and luxurioufneſs. This diſſolute life of the General of the Horſe, had a fatal influence upon the ſoldiers, who thought they might follow his example, indulge themſelves in all ſorts of crimes, and freely rob and plunder whatever came in their way.

(16) Ubi ſupra, p. 919, 920.

(17) See alſo Tully's Second Philippic.

[G] The people were pleaſed with Cæſar's refuſal.] Plutarch makes on this occaſion the following reflection: "It is to be wondered, ſays he (18) that "thoſe, who tamely ſubmitted to the Kingly power, "ſhould be afraid of the name of a King, as being "deſtructive of their liberty." And indeed Cæſar wanted nothing but the name of a King. But mere names ſtrongly affect the multitude, who flatter themſelves, that as long as names ſubſiſt, the things ſignified by them alſo ſubſiſt. They had Conſuls, Tribunes, and a Senate; this was enough to perſuade them that the commonwealth was ſtill in being: but if Cæſar had took the name as well as the power of a King, they would immediately have found, that their liberty was deſtroyed. Cæſar therefore acted very wiſely, when he refuſed the title of King. We may add, that tho' this notion of the people may be abſurd in itſelf, yet it would be of great uſe to thoſe, who were willing and ſhould have it in their power to reſtore the commonwealth. As long as the ancient names were ſtill in uſe, as long as there were Conſuls, Tribunes of the people, and a Senate, ſome hopes were left that one time or other the nation would recover its liberty. But if once theſe names were out of date, if once the Kingly government had been ſettled, the very notion of liberty would have been loſt, and it would have become almoſt impoſſible to deſtroy tyranny. Therefore thoſe Patriots, who did not yet deſpair of the commonwealth, were in the right to oppoſe the name of a King, tho' they very well knew the thing ſignified by it, was already eſtabliſhed.

(18) Ubi ſupra, p. 921.

[H] Antonius himſelf conſented out of policy.] He was jealous of Lepidus, who having an army at command, and being very much beloved by his ſoldiers, began to ſhew that he was reſolved to revenge Cæſar's death. Antonius who had no army, was afraid, leſt and Caſſius, and gave them his ſons for pledge of his ſincerity. Caſſius went that ſame day to ſup at Antonius's houſe, who during ſupper aſked him, whether he ſtill wore a dagger under his gown; yes, replied Caſſius, and a very large one, in caſe you ſhould attempt to invade the Sovereign Power. Every thing was now very quiet; the conſpirators received of the people the honourable name of Tyrannicides, (the killers of the Tyrant), and ſeemed to be free from all danger. But the reading of Cæſar's will ſoon occaſioned new troubles. He had adopted Octavius for his ſon, and left legacies not only to Antonius, but even to D. Brutus, and to ſeveral others of thoſe who had been concerned in the conſpiracy againſt him. He alſo left his gardens on the Tyber for the uſe of the people, and ordered that every one of them ſhould receive thirty drachms, (that is, about nineteen ſhillings of our money) according to what Octavius himſelf ſaid; or according to others, ſeventy five drachms, (that is, about forty ſeven ſhillings.) The people began to be moved at the gratifications Cæſar made them, and Antonius did not let this opportunity ſlip; he ſoon improved it to his own advantage; he ordered Cæſar's murthered body, together with his bloody garments, to be carried into the publick Forum, and there he harangued the people [I] with ſo much ſtrength, and with ſuch an affected grief and concern, that he ſoon raiſed their fury to ſuch a height, that they immediately went in queſt of the conſpirators, being reſolved to kill them; and even complained of the Senators for not having puniſhed the murtherers. This ſudden change of the people altered entirely the ſituation of the State; Antonius in a moment became powerful, and now flattered himſelf that he ſhould eaſily get into the place which Cæſar had filled. But his haughty behaviour towards Octavius made him ſoon loſe all the advantage which his concern for Cæſar had procured him. For as ſoon as Octavius had heard that Cæſar was killed he haſtened to Rome, and went immediately to wait upon Antonius, as having been a particular friend of his father; but Antonius received him in a very proud manner, not that he deſpiſed him, but becauſe he feared him, ſays Velleius Paterculus (u); and when Octavius ſpoke to him of Cæſar's will, he anſwered him, that he was mad, and that thoſe were not his friends who adviſed him, young as he was, to take upon him the heavy taſk of executing Cæſar's laſt will. But Octavius ſtill inſiſting upon it, did exaſperate Antonius to ſuch a degree, that he did him all the diſſervice that lay in his power, oppoſed him in the proſecution of the Tribuneſhip (w), and even charged him with having made an attempt upon his life (x). This created ſuch a miſunderſtanding between them, that though they were at firſt ſeemingly reconciled, yet they only kept their hatred ſecret, till an opportunity ſhould offer to diſcover it openly. Antonius indeed appeared to leſt Lepidus, by the ſpecious pretence of puniſhing Cæſar's murtherers, ſhould make himſelf maſter of the people, and arrive at the ſame power which Cæſar had; therefore he prevailed upon him to ſubmit to the Senate's decree (19). But it is ſurprizing that Lepidus ſhould be ſo eaſily perſuaded. However, Dion himſelf hints the reaſon of it. He tells us, that the conſpirators promiſed the ſoldiers, that they ſhould be permitted to keep all the money Cæſar had granted to them, which was alſo confirmed by the Senate's decree; the ſoldiers hearing this, were not ſo much attached to Lepidus, as they were before; ſo that he might fear, that if he undertook any thing, he ſhould not be well ſupported by his army; and this perhaps was the reaſon, why he was ſo eaſily prevailed upon by Antonius.

(u) Hiſt. Rom. lib. 2. cap. 60. edit. Mattaire, Lond. 1718.

(w) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, p. 922.

(x) Vel. Paterc. ibid.

(19) Idem, pag. 291.

[I] He harangued the people.] Dion has given us (20) Antonius's oration, or perhaps made one for him, after his own manner, according to the cuſtom of the ancient hiſtorians. However that be, this oration contains ſeveral things, which deſerve to be taken notice of. He firſt ſpeaks of Cæſar's Anceſtors, of his education, his ſtrength of mind, his behaviour towards his friends and his enemies; he then expatiates upon what Cæſar had done for the commonwealth; his actions in Spain, and in Gaul. After this he comes to a more delicate point, Cæſar's war againſt Pompey, and gives it as favourable a turn as was poſſible; avoiding to hint at Cæſar's ambition, he endeavours to lay all the blame of the civil war on Cæſar's adverſary. "When he perceived, ſays he, that Pompey, having left his native ſoil, was raiſing a "Kingdom for himſelf in Macedonia; when he ſaw, "that this man was reſolved to carry there your "riches; when he knew that he was arming your "own ſubjects againſt you; and was ready to employ the Roman money againſt the Romans themſelves, he firſt endeavoured to diſſuade him from "his undertaking, and promiſed him moſt ſolemnly, "that he would again live with him as he had "done before. But when nothing could prevail upon "Pompey; when he had broken thro' all ties, even "thoſe of alliance and affinity; when he had begun "a war againſt yourſelves, it was time for Cæſar to "reſiſt him, and thus the civil war broke out." Thus Antonius knew how to varniſh over Cæſar's ambition; he was however ſenſible, that this was too odious a ſubject to enlarge upon. "But "let us leave this matter, ſays he, Cæſar himſelf did "not glory in this, and hated the neceſſity which had "obliged him to undertake ſuch a war." He then expatiates on Cæſar's clemency, for having pardoned all thoſe, who had born arms againſt him. He comes afterwards to the honours conferred upon Cæſar by the Senate's decree; and adds, the people themſelves had given him the glorious title of Father of their Country. But being ſenſible that all this would not make a very ſtrong impreſſion upon his hearers, who did but too well know by what motive Cæſar had acted, he makes at laſt a tragical deſcription of his death, being perſuaded that this would engage the unthinking multitude. "This Father of his Country, "ſays he, this High-Prieſt, this Sacred Perſon, this "Hero, this God has ſuffer'd death! He died, alas, "not decayed by ſickneſs, or old age; not by wounds "received in battle; not by any ſudden accident; "but here, within the walls of the city, this man "has been betrayed, who could ſafely conduct our "armies into Britain: he has been treacherouſly killed, "in this very city, which he had inlarged; in the "Senate Houſe, when he himſelf had built another "for the Fathers; this famous warrior has been killed "unarm'd; he, who had often been a Judge, has "been murthered before the Judges Tribunal, by "Magiſtrates, when he himſelf was a Magiſtrate; "by his own citizens, tho' when he happen'd to fall "into the ſea, none of his enemies dared to attack him. "What availed thee, O Cæſar, thy clemency, thy "ſacred power, and the wholeſome laws thou haſt "made? Unhappy man! the dogs are polluted by "thy blood; and here, here is thy tainted garment, "which ſeems to have been made only, that thou "ſhouldſt be murthered in it." It is not difficult to gueſs how ſuch a diſcourſe muſt have affected the wavering multitude, which eaſily paſſes from the utmoſt indignation and hatred, to the greateſt pity and compaſſion.

(20) Ibid. p. 292, &c.

to have the greateſt power, becauſe he was ſtill Conſul; but Octavius had the favour of the people, partly becauſe he had promiſed to perform Cæſar's will, and partly becauſe the people were offended at Octavius's unbounded power, and bore it very impatiently, whereas they thought it was prudently done to aſſiſt the weaker againſt the ſtronger; for they loved neither of them, but intended to deſtroy Antonius by the means of Octavius, being in hopes that it would afterwards be eaſy to cruſh him alſo (y). It is not ſurpriſing therefore if a civil war ſoon broke out between Octavius and Antonius. The latter left Rome and went into Gaul (z) with as many troops as he could aſſemble; whereupon the Senate met, and Cicero ſpoke in the ſtrongeſt manner againſt Antonius, who was very wittily defended by Q. Fufius Calenus [K]. Theſe debates having laſted a long time, the Senate could not come to any reſolution that day, but on the next, Octavius's faction prevailing, the Senate decreed, among other things, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Antonius, commanding him to leave Gaul, to diſband his army, and to retire into Macedonia. Antonius anſwered, that he was ready to comply with the Senate's requeſt, provided his ſoldiers received the ſame gift, that was allowed to thoſe of Octavius, and Caſſius and Brutus were made Conſuls [L]. The Senate, far from accepting theſe conditions, declared Antonius an enemy of his country (aa). Thus, according to Dion Caſſius, the Senators themſelves became the occaſion of the war, as we ſhall ſhew in a remark [M]. Antonius had been in hopes that D. Brutus would yield to him the Province of Gaul, but finding himſelf diſappointed, he undertook the ſiege of Mutina (bb), whither D. Brutus was retired. Octavius being apprehenſive leſt Antonius ſhould make himſelf maſter of that city, (y) Dion. lib. 45. p. 312, 313.

(z) He did not paſs the Alps, but ſtaid in that part of Italy, which was called Gallia Cis-Alpina.

(aa) Dion. ibid. p. 317—357.

(bb) A city in Gallia Cis-Alpina, now called Modena.

[K] Antonius was wittily defended by Q. Fufius Calenus.] This advocate begins the defence of his client, with obſerving, that if Antonius had committed any crime, the Senate being then aſſembled only that every one might give his opinion, and not to harangue; this was not a proper time to accuſe him, but this, ſaid he, ſhewed, that Cicero was only prompted by his malice and hatred againſt Antonius. He then enters into a bitter invective againſt the accuſer. Afterwards he comes more directly to the point in queſtion, and asks Cicero, "if Antonius had committed ſo many crimes when a Tribune of the "people, when a General of the horſe, when a Conſul, why didſt thou not accuſe him before this "time? for if thou didſt then think thoſe actions "criminal, and yet connived at them, where was "thy love for thy country? And if thou didſt not "think them criminal, why doſt thou now cavil at "them?" This reaſoning might indeed affect thoſe who do not reflect; but Cicero could eaſily have anſwer'd, that it was not ſafe then to accuſe Antonius, ſupported as he was by Cæſar: that ſuch an occaſion would then not only have been unſucceſsful with regard to the State, but even pernicious to thoſe, who ſhould have undertook it: That a true Patriot will expoſe himſelf to danger, when he may hope to ſerve his country ſucceſsfully, tho' he ſhould periſh in the attempt; but when there is no probability of ſucceſs, he muſt prudently wait for a more favourable opportunity.—Cicero had charged Antonius with having treſpaſſed againſt the laws, by keeping the dignity of General of the horſe a whole year. To which Calenus replies, that this had been decreed by the Senate, with the people's conſent; and that if the circumſtances of the State were then ſuch, that it was neceſſary to deviate a little from the common practice, this could not be objected as a crime to Antonius. But, ſaid Cicero, he has made an ill uſe of his power. "Why? He bought Pompey's eſtate. But how ma-"ny perſons are there, that buy other people's eſtates? "Why are they confiſcated? Why are they put up "by auction, if it be a crime to buy them?" He then pretends to ſhew, that Antonius was in a manner a check upon Cæſar's ambition, and hindred him from putting himſelf the crown upon his head, as he intended to do. But how does this agree with what is related above of Antonius, and what Calenus himſelf ſays, that Antonius put a crown upon Cæſar's head? Let us ſee in what manner he juſtifies this action. "When Antonius perceived, ſays he, that Cæſar "would make himſelf maſter of the Commonwealth, "he prevented him from effectuating his deſign, by "offering him that very ſame thing, which he ſo "earneſtly deſir'd. For when men have a mind to "execute a bad deſign, they are never more effectu-"ally diſſuaded from it, than when thoſe, who have "reaſon to fear it, pretend they are pleaſed with "it. For tho' theſe men in their conſcience cannot "believe that others ſpeak ſincerely, yet thinking "that their ill views are diſcovered, ſhame and fear "prevents their proſecuting them. Antonius was per-"fectly appriſed of this. Therefore he choſe a day "of publick rejoicing, that he might have more li-"berty to rally Cæſar's ambition, under pretence of "mirth and diverſion: He alſo choſe the Fo-"rum, the very place where the people's liberty "appeared in its greateſt luſtre; that this might fill "Cæſar with ſhame and confuſion. He pretended to "act by the people's command, that Cæſar might "reflect, that there was no decree, no acclamation of "the people; that therefore it was not likely, the "people would accept a King (21)." Thus Calenus pleads Antonius's cauſe; and it muſt be owned that the turn he gives to the crowning of Cæſar, has ſomething very ingenious and ſubtle in it. Antonius knew that Cæſar would gladly have received the title of King, and to diſſuade him from purſuing that deſign he crowns him publickly, and by this action diſcovers to him the ſenſe of the people, which he durſt not openly declare. But how does it appear, that theſe were Antonius's views? Is it not more reaſonable to think, either that he had a mind to try what the people would ſay or do; or that being himſelf very ambitious, and deſirous to ſucceed Cæſar, he was reſolved to render him odious to the people, in caſe he had accepted the Crown?

(21) Ibid. pag. 235, &c.

[L] That Caſſius and Brutus were made Conſuls.] He had two things in view, when he made this demand; firſt to ingratiate himſelf, with theſe two aſſerters of the publick liberty, and prevent their joining with Octavius. Secondly, to render Octavius himſelf odious to the people; for he knew very well, that he would not make thoſe Conſuls who had kill'd his father (22), (for thus Octavius called Cæſar, by whom he had been adopted.) Now this would give Antonius a ſpecious pretence, to repreſent Octavius as a man, who aimed at the ſovereign power, and was reſolved to enſlave his country, ſince he refuſed to admit thoſe to the higheſt poſts in the Commonwealth, who had delivered it from ſlavery.

(22) Ibid. p. 354.

[M] The Senators themſelves became the occaſion of the war.] They ought, ſays Dion Caſſius (23), to have placed at the head of the Commonwealth a man, who had well deſerved of the publick, and to have ſupported him with all their power. Inſtead of that they armed ſome men to oppreſs others; and afterwards intended to oppreſs the former alſo; by which conduct none were their friends, and they made them all their enemies: for men eaſily forget the good offices, but never the injuries they receive. They think it a diſgrace if they ſhould acknowledge that they want the ſupport of others; and as to injuries, they look upon it as a weakneſs not to revenge themſelves. This was the reaſon, why the Roman Senate, favouring at one time one perſon, then another, ſupporting a man, and then declaring him an enemy of the State, was expoſed to ſo many misfortunes, which they might have avoided, had they been city, came with the Conſul A. Hirtius to force Antonius to raiſe the ſiege. Antonius finding it would be very difficult for him to take Mutina, left his brother L. Antonius before the city, and march'd directly againſt Octavius. During ſome days there happen'd only ſome ſkirmiſhes between them, in which neither could boaſt of having any great advantage over the other; but at laſt Octavius's German cavalry turning againſt him, Antonius gained a complete victory; and hearing that C. Panſa the other Conſul was coming againſt him, he reſolved to prevent him, and ſetting out in the night he ſurprized him near Bologna, wounded him, killed ſome of his ſoldiers, and obliged the reſt to retire within the walls of the city. But this happineſs did not laſt long, for he was ſoon after vanquiſhed in his turn, tho' both the Conſuls who fought againſt him, periſhed on that occaſion (cc). Antonius fled in great confuſion, wanting even the neceſſaries of life; and that man, who not long before wallowed in riches, and abounded in every thing that was luxurious and delicate, was now obliged to content himſelf with wild roots and weeds for his ſuſtenance, and had for his drink nothing but muddy water. Theſe hardſhips he ſuffered with great courage and conſtancy of mind; his only hopes were now in Lepidus, whom he had always reckoned among his friends, having been very ſerviceable to him in the time of Cæſar. He reſolved therefore to go to the army which Lepidus commanded, and gathering together the few troops he had left, he went and pitched his camp near that of Lepidus; but finding that he was not ſo kindly received as he expected, he reſolved to run all hazards, and advancing near Lepidus's camp, dreſſed in a mourning habit, and ſhewing all poſſible marks of the utmoſt affliction, he began to harangue the ſoldiers; but Lepidus, fearing the effect of his perſuaſive eloquence, order'd the trumpets to be ſounded. But this ſerved only more and more to move the ſoldiers compaſſion for Antonius; they ſent Lælius and Clodius to him, and encouraged him to attack Lepidus's camp, promiſing him that a great many of them would aſſiſt him, and even kill Lepidus, if he deſired it. Antonius rejected this laſt propoſal, but accepted the firſt, and accordingly he went to Lepidus's camp, was received by the ſoldiers, and in a moment became maſter of the whole army. Though he had reaſons to complain of Lepidus, yet he did not ſhew him any reſentment, but called him his father [N], and left him the honour and title of General, though he had himſelf all the power and authority. By this unexpected ſucceſs he alſo gained the favour of Plancus, who was not far off with a powerful army, and declared for Antonius, who, having left ſix legions under the command of Varius in Gaul, marched directly into Italy with ſeventeen entire legions and ten thouſand horſe. This ſudden change of Antonius's fortune obliged Octavius to enter into a confederacy with him and Lepidus [O] (dd); and thus the famous Triumvirate was formed [P]. The conditions of it were terrible, and are a dreadful inſtance of the many crimes into which an unbounded ambition will draw thoſe that are entirely ſwayed by it. Octavius conſented to the murther of Cicero, to whom he was obliged in the ſtrongeſt manner, and owed all his power. Antonius gave up Lucius Cæſar his uncle to Octavius, and Lepidus did not ſcruple to ſacrifice Paulus his own brother. It is true neither L. Cæſar, nor been conſtant to the intereſt of one perſon only. This is a very juſt reflection, but the queſtion is, whether it was in the power of the Roman Senate to act in that manner; for it is certain, they were obliged to yield to thoſe who had the army on their ſide, and were not at liberty to promote the true intereſt of the Commonwealth.

(23) Ibid. p. 156.

(cc) Dion, l. 46. p. 357—560.

(dd) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 923, 924.

[N] Called him his father.] Antonius had already before this time experienced how much he ſtood in need of Lepidus's favour and ſupport. For not long after Cæſar's death, when Antonius himſelf was maſter of Rome, he dreaded Lepidus's power; and to engage him in his intereſt, he married his daughter to Lepidus's ſon, and procured to Lepidus himſelf the poſt of High-Prieſt; and the better to compaſs that deſign, he deprived the people of the power they had of making High-Prieſts, and lodged it in the college of the Prieſts themſelves, and by them had Lepidus inſtalled in his office, in which inſtallation he neglected moſt of the ceremonies, which were anciently obſerved (24).

(24) Dion, lib. 45. p. 305.

[O] The ſudden change of Antonius's fortune obliged Octavius to enter into a confederacy with him and with Lepidus.] This is what Plutarch intimates; but Dion Caſſius relates this affair in a very different manner. He tells us (25), that Antonius after his defeat went to Lepidus, who not only refuſed to have any converſation with him, but wrote a letter to the Senate filled with accuſations againſt Antonius; that though indeed he did not endeavour to drive him away, yet he did not entertain him; and if he permitted him to incamp in his neighbourhood, and to converſe with his ſoldiers, yet he did not ſpeak to him himſelf, till hearing that Octavius had made an agreement with him he reſolved to enter into the ſame confederacy with both. But Velleius Paterculus agrees perfectly with Plutarch in this particular, and adds, that Juventius Laterenſis, a man whoſe death anſwered to the manner in which he had lived, earneſtly entreated Lepidus not to join himſelf with Antonius, who had been declared an enemy of the Commonwealth; but that not being able to perſuade Lepidus, he drew his ſword, and killed himſelf (26). He ſays afterwards (27), that Lepidus was alſo declared an enemy of the Commonwealth; which intimates that he was united with Antonius, before Octavius came to any agreement with him.

(25) Lib. 46. p. 368, 369.

(26) Vell. Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 63.

(27) Ibid. cap. 64.

[P] Thus the famous Triumvirate was formed.] Dion Caſſius gives us a very particular and exact account of it. Antonius and Lepidus having made an agreement by letters with Octavius, whilſt he was at Rome, and they ſtill in Gaul, they ſet out for Italy, with the beſt part of their army; for they did not much truſt in Octavius's faith, and were not willing to owe their ſecurity to his kindneſs, but rather to their own ſtrength. They alſo hoped, that Octavius and the Romans being awed by their army, would accept all the conditions, they ſhould propoſe. Octavius met them near Bologna, as well attended as they were, for he no more truſted them, than they did him. But none of them had occaſion to employ their ſoldiers; for tho' they hated one another mortally, yet having almoſt the ſame number of troops, and being reſolved to make uſe of one another to revenge themſelves of their reſpective enemies, they concluded a feigned peace between them three. For that purpoſe, they went upon an iſland ſituated in the river which flows near Bologna, attended each with an equal number of ſoldiers, whom they left at a diſtance, and coming up to one another, before they entered into nor Lepidus's brother were murthered, no body daring to touch them, becauſe they were ſo nearly related to the Triumvirs; but this does not excuſe thoſe who had conſented to their death. Their cruelty went ſo far, that Rome became the theatre of the moſt horrid cruelties imaginable, and there was no end to the proſcriptions. Antonius was charged with moſt of the murthers that were committed at that time: but, ſays the Abbot de S. Real (ee), Fulvia his wife was rather to be accuſed of them than he, for, prompted by avarice, cruelty, or revenge, ſhe committed a thouſand enormities, of which her huſband was accuſed, though he often was ignorant of them; inſomuch, that once his ſoldiers having brought him the head of a man, who was one of thoſe that had been proſcribed, and whom they had killed, as they thought, by his orders, alas! poor man, ſaid he, I did not know him, nor did I ever ſee him. When the Triumvirs found their power ſufficiently ſettled at Rome, they reſolved to cruſh the party of Brutus and Caſſius, which ſtill ſubſiſted, and daily increaſed. Octavius and Antonius went into Macedonia, and there they ſoon came to a battle near the city called Philippi. Octavius commanded that part of the army which fought againſt the wing in which Brutus was, and Antonius engaged againſt Caſſius. Brutus routed Octavius's army, took his camp, and purſued him ſo cloſely, that he narrowly eſcaped being taken. But Antonius got a complete victory over Caſſius, who thinking Brutus had alſo been vanquiſhed, ordered his ſlave to kill him. Plutarch adds (ff), that ſome affirm'd Antonius was not preſent during the battle, but only came when his army was purſuing the enemy; but other authors aſcribe the honour of the victory to his conduct and courage. A few days after this battle Brutus reſolved to try his fortune again; he engaged againſt Antonius, who gained a complete victory over him, and had alone the glory of it; for Octavius being then ſick, could not be preſent in the engagement. Brutus deſpairing now of ever reſtoring the publick liberty, killed himſelf [2]. Thus ended the party of Brutus and Caſſius, the remains of Pompey's faction. But this did not reſtore the publick tranquillity, nor was the civil war by this means ſuppreſſed. The Sovereign Power does not admit of any partnerſhip. The Triumvirs were too ambitious, and hated one another too much to be long united. After the battle of Philippi, Antonius went into Aſia, in order to raiſe money for his ſoldiers, to whom he had promiſed very large ſums. During his abſence Fulvia his wife quarrelled with Octavius, Fulvia pretending that the lands which had been granted to Antonius's veteran ſoldiers had not been given to them; and Octavius complaining that Fulvia and Lucius Antonius detained the legions that were to be yielded to him (gg). But the real cauſe of this war was, that Octavius had deſpiſed her addreſſes to him (hh). However this war did not laſt long; Fulvia and L. Antonius were obliged to leave Italy. Antonius was at that time in Aſia, where he indulged himſelf in all the luxury and pleaſures, which the country afforded in abundance, whilſt Octavius was fighting againſt Fulvia's party. Antonius had the moſt ſplendid court that ever was ſeen [R]. The Kings and Princes of Aſia, the Ambaſſadors of the nations allied or tributary to the Romans, came to his levee, and acknowledged no other Sovereign but him in the Eaſt. Queens and Princeſſes ſtrove who ſhould win his heart, and (ff) Ubi ſupra, p. 925.

(ee) Ubi ſupra, p. 416. Dion, lib. 47. p. 378.

(gg) Dion, lib. 48. p. 410.

(hh) See the article FULVIA.

any diſcourſe; they ſhook one another's cloaths, for fear there ſhould be ſome dagger hid among them; ſo ſtrong were their mutual diſtruſt and ſuſpicion. Then they enter'd upon the ſubject, for which they met. They agreed, that they ſhould all three have the government of the State, not during life, but for five years only; that they ſhould manage every thing according to their own will and pleaſure, that they ſhould have the power to confer all places and honours on whom they pleaſed, without being obliged to wait for the conſent of the Senate or the People: That Octavius ſhould have the government of Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily; Lepidus that of Spain, and Gallia Narbonenſis; and Antonius all the reſt of Gaul; that is, Gallia Cis-Alpina, and Trans-Alpina, (part of Italy and France;) Laſtly, they conſented to put their reſpective enemies to death. When this agreement was made, the ſoldiers of Antonius, probably at his inſtigation, demanded that Octavius, tho' he had already a wife, ſhould yet marry the daughter of Fulvia, Antonius's wife, whom ſhe had by Clodius her firſt husband; to which Octavius conſented, being perſuaded, that this would be no obſtacle to the deſign, he had already formed againſt Antonius; for he had before him the example of Julius Cæſar, who did not ſcruple to make war againſt Pompey, notwithſtanding the latter had married his daughter. Before this meeting, when Antonius endeavoured by letters to draw Octavius to his ſide, he uſed to repreſent to him how much he was hated by the party of Pompey, which was ſtill ſubſiſting, notwithſtanding Pompey's death. He made him conſider how ſtrong that party was grown, and how Brutus and Caſſius were ſupported by Cicero's zeal and intereſt; and threatned him that if he refuſed to agree with him, he would join his troops with thoſe of Brutus and Caſſius, who commanded already ſeventeen legions. Laſtly, to raiſe Octavius's emulation, he added theſe words, You are more obliged to revenge the death of a Father, than I that of a Friend only (28).

(28) Vell. Paterc. ubi ſupra, cap. 65.

[2] Brutus killed himſelf.] As ſoon as Antonius heard it he went to the place where Brutus lay, and gently reproached him with the death of C. Antonius his brother, who was put to death by Brutus's order, to revenge the murther of Cicero. However, Antonius acknowledged, that Hortenſius rather than Brutus was to be charg'd with his brother's death; and therefore order'd Hortenſius to be killed upon Brutus's tomb: and ſeeing that the corps of this great man had been ſtripped quite naked by the ſoldiers, he threw his own rich coat of armour over it, and appointed a ſtately funeral for it (29). The Abbot of S. Real adds, that Antonius had ſome obligation to Brutus, who ſaved his life, when the other conſpirators were of opinion that he ſhould be killed with Cæſar. This indeed is true; but when Brutus oppoſed the killing of Antonius, it was not out of any kindneſs or eſteem for him, but only out of a view to his own glory, that the publick might not think it was the love of power, and not the deſire of reſtoring the liberty of Rome, that prompted him to kill the tyrant (30).

(29) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 225.

(30) Dion, l. 44. p. 282.

[R] The moſt ſplendid court that ever was ſeen.] We ſhall tranſlate here the deſcription, which the Abbot de S. Real gives of it, with ſome remarks on his reflections. "There, ſays he (31), we ſee "Antonius paſs his ſentence without appeal and in "a ſovereign manner, concerning the ſtates and the "lives of Kings. He depoſes ſome, eſtabliſhes others, "and no perſon on earth dares to controul him; "even the Senate, to preſerve a ſhadow of authority, "confirms and by the moſt coſtly preſents endeavoured to get a favourable look from him; but the famous Cleopatra had at laſt the honour to inſpire him with the moſt violent paſſion. The occaſion of his ſeeing her was this. Antonius preparing himſelf to make war againſt the Parthians, ſent orders to Cleopatra to meet him in Cicilia, in order to give an account of her conduct, for ſhe was accuſed of having aſſiſted Caſſius againſt him. Cleopatra obeyed [S], and when ſhe arrived, Antonius ſent her word to come and meet him; but ſhe anſwered, that it was more proper for him to come to her. He complied with her requeſt, being willing to ſhew her ſome civility and kindneſs. As ſoon as he ſaw her, it was not in his power to reſiſt her charms; ſhe entertained him in the moſt magnificent manner, and he in his turn endeavoured to ſurpaſs her in ſplendor (ii). What Hiſtorians relate of their profuſion is ſcarce credible. Who would not be aſtoniſhed at their extravagance, when Cleopatra diſſolved a pearl of an immenſe bigneſs and an exorbitant price, having laid a wager with Antonius, which of them ſhould give the other the moſt coſtly entertainment? And who would not wonder at Antonius's folly, who made a preſent of a city to his cook, becauſe he had dreſſed a diſh to his liking (kk). Plutarch relates another inſtance, which ſhews ſtill more how laviſh Antonius was of his treaſures [T]. Whilſt Antonius was indulging his paſſion with his dear Cleopatra, the war which Fulvia his wife had began againſt Octavius ſtill went on, though ſhe had been obliged to retire out of Italy. Antonius hearing this was awaked out of his lethargy; he went into Greece, where he met his mother and his wife, and finding Octavius was become publickly his enemy, he entered into a confederacy with Sextus Pompeius (ll), who was ſtill maſter of Sicily. He then went into Italy, in order to fight Octavius, who was then in Gaul; and hearing of Antonius's arrival haſtened to him. Servilius one of Octavius's Generals had at firſt ſome advantage over Antonius, having ſlain in a battle a great number of his ſoldiers. But Fulvia, who had been the author and promoter of this war, dying about this time, Octavius and Antonius, whoſe forces were almoſt equal, ſoon came to an agreement. Octavius had for his ſhare Sardinia, Dalmatia, Spain and Gaul; and Antonius had all the Provinces ſituated beyond the Ionian Sea. One of the conditions of this new peace was, that Antonius and Octavius ſhould together attack Pompey, though the former had but lately made an alliance with him, and promiſed upon oath that he would aſſiſt

(31) Ubi ſupra, p. 412, &c.

(ii) Plutarch, ubi ſupra, p. 928.

(kk) S. Real, ubi ſupra, p. 420.

(ll) The ſon of Pompey the Great.

" confirms thoſe Kings, whom he is pleaſed to eſta-
" bliſh; ſuch as Darius in Pontus, Pharnaces in Idu-
" mea, Herod in Judea, Amyntas in Piſidia, Polemon
" in Cilicia &c. Antonius commanded Antigonus,
" King of the Jews, to be publickly beheaded; a
" puniſhment unheard of before with regard to Kings,
" but which is a glaring inſtance of that exorbitant
" power, which Antonius exerciſed. How ſplendid
" does that court appear to me! With how much " majeſty was he always ſurrounded. Above all, I " am delighted when I think that the antichamber of " Marcus Antonius, a citizen of Rome, was conſtanly
" filled with a multitude of Kings and Sovereigns,
" who wait for the moment in which they may ad-
" dreſs and make their court to him. We may ſafe-
" ly ſay, that the moſt exalted notion we can form of " his grandeur, is ſtill far remote from the truth.
" Julius Cæſar himſelf, who was the only Sovereign,
" did never enjoy the ſupreme power in ſuch a de" gree of perfection; and Octavius who govern'd in
" the weſt with the ſame power, was neither ſo ab-
" ſolute at Rome, becauſe he was obliged to have
" ſome regard for the Senate and for the people;
" nor lived in ſo ſplendid a manner, being un" der a neceſſity to ſpare the treaſury in a city,
" where the people were uſed ſeverely to cenſure
" thoſe who embezzled the publick money, tho' they " were never ſo powerful. Whereas Antonius com" manded a large army in one of the richeſt coun" tries of the world, and which had long been uſed
" to ſlavery, and to ſuffer oppreſſions from their " governors. What added ſtill more luſtre to Antonius's
" glory was, that his Lieutenants fought every where
" under him with a conſtant ſucceſs." Thus far that ingenious author. And it muſt be owned that he has much reaſon to be pleaſed with the glory that ſurrounded Antonius, if true glory conſiſts only in a boundleſs power, attended with all the outward pomp and magnificence, which ſtrikes and awes an unthinking multitude: Thus the greateſt tyrant may arrive at the greateſt glory. But if true glory conſiſts in doing good to mankind, in maintaining and reſtoring public peace and liberty, we muſt confeſs, that Antonius would have acted in a much more glorious manner, if he had employed his wealth and power to reſtore his native country to its ancient liberty. But ſome men born under a deſpotic authority have no notion of liberty, and conſequently of true glory; and this was the caſe of the Abbot of S. Real.

[S] Cleopatra obeyed.] As ſoon as Dellius, whom Antonius had ſent to her, ſaw her, and heard her talk, he concluded from her beauty, and from her artful diſcourſes, that it would be impoſſible for Antonius to condemn her; but that ſhe would ſoon have an entire influence over him. He therefore began to make his court to her, and adviſed her to adorn herſelf in the moſt elegant and beautiful manner, aſſuring her, that ſhe had nothing to apprehend from Antonius, who was, ſaid he, the moſt tender and good natur'd man in the world. Cleopatra knowing by experience, how powerful her charms had been, when though a girl, ſhe made Cæſar and Pompey her ſlaves, was perſuaded that being now much better skilled in the art of managing men, it would be an eaſy matter for her, to gain Antonius's heart. She took with her the moſt ſplendid ornaments, and the richeſt preſents, and went to meet the Triumvir. She embarked in a galley adorned with purple ſails, and ſilver oars; the ſtern covered with gold brocade; her maidens dreſſed like Cupids, herſelf lying in a golden bed, in the manner in which Venus aſleep is painted. All this was attended with Symphony, which, the weather being calm, was eaſily heard; whilſt the moſt fragrant perfumes ſpread a delicious fragrance on the ſhore. All the people ran to ſee that glorious ſight, and Antonius was left alone on his tribunal, where he was ſeated to determine the cauſes of Kings and Princes. The whole army raviſhed with admiration, cried out, that Venus was come to meet Bacchus, and Antonius was not diſpleaſed with the compariſon (32).

[T] Another inſtance which ſhews how laviſh Antonius was of his treaſures.] Plutarch tells us (33), that a certain Phyſician, called Philotas, being at Alexandria on his ſtudies, made an acquaintance with one of Antonius's cooks, and deſired to ſee the preparations that were making for one meal only. Being admitted into the kitchen, he ſaw among a variety of other things, eight entire wild boars, which were on the ſpit; which made him wonder at the vaſt number of perſons Antonius muſt have invited. At this the Cook ſmiled and ſaid, he expected only about a dozen gueſts; but that Antonius would be ſerved at a moment's warning; and ſometimes delayed his ſupper, and ſometimes haſtened it; ſo that the Cook muſt have a ſupper ready for almoſt every hour in the day.

(32) Plutarch, ubi ſupra, pag. 926, 927.

(33) Ubi ſupra, p. 928.

assist him against Octavius; but his unbounded ambition did not permit him to be true to the most sacred engagements. Antonius then married Octavia, Octavius's sister, as a pledge of the friendship that was now renewed between them [U]. Antonius returned soon after to his beloved Cleopatra, and again lived with her at Alexandria, where he indulged himself in the same luxury and pleasures as he had done before. This was shewing the utmost contempt for the wife he had but lately married, and even for Octavius himself, who took hold of this pretence to inveigh bitterly against Antonius, and to begin the war again. Octavia knowing the danger in which her husband was, resolved to go and meet him; she embark'd for Alexandria, but Antonius commanded her to wait for him at Athens, where he went to her. She did all that lay in her power to reclaim him [W], but to no purpose; the pleasures of Egypt had a greater influence over his corrupted heart, than all the reasons and tender entreaties of his loving wife. He sent her back to Rome, and was determined, at all events, to stay with his royal mistress (mm), and thus the war between him and Octavius became unavoidable. They did not want a shew of reason to cast the odium of the war upon one another, but it must be owned, that Antonius's behaviour gave Octavius a fair pretence to attack him [X]. Before they came to a decisive engagement, several things passed among the people, in the Senate, and between the contending parties, which it would be too long to mention particularly. At last they engaged in a fight at Actium, in which Antonius, if he had not been blinded by his passion, would have found, that all Cleopatra's pretended fondness and love for him was nothing but craft and policy. That Princess had fitted out a fleet of sixty ships to assist Antonius, as he thought, but when his ships were engaged in battle against those of Octavius, all of a sudden Cleopatra's ships advanced between the two fleets, and sailed away towards the Peloponnesus. Antonius surprized at this, and thinking this happened contrary to Cleopatra's intention, left his fleet, and pursued the ship which carried Cleopatra with as much speed, as though it had been that of Octavius himself. By his flight he gave Octavius an opportunity to gain a complete victory. When Cleopatra knew Antonius was coming after her, she gave orders that he should be received in her ship, and so he was accordingly, but for some days they did not see one another; at last by the intercession of Cleopatra's women, Antonius consented to speak to her, then to dine with her, and at last to enter into the same familiarity as before (nn). They went together to Alexandria. Antonius, ashamed of his last defeat, resolved to try his fortune again; he and Cleopatra made great warlike preparations, as though they intended to attack Octavius by sea and land. But in the mean time they took such measures, that if they were vanquished, they might take a refuge in Spain; and to amuse Octavius, they sent Embassadors to him to propose articles of peace, but at the same time to bribe his army if possible.

(mm) Plutarch, ubi supra, p. 940. Dion, lib. 49. p. 470.

(nn) Plutarch, ubi supra, pag. 946. Dion, lib. 50. p. 503, &c.

[U] A pledge of the friendship that was now renewed between them.] This was at least what the Romans hoped; they thought that a woman, adorned with so many perfections as Octavia was, would at last settle Antonius's inconstant mind, and thus remove all causes of division between him and Octavius. But those, who were more clear sighted, were persuaded, that Antonius would still continue to lead the same life as he had begun, and that the most delicate pleasures, would soon cloy a man of his temper, as soon as they became lawful and necessary. And tho' he had lived at Rome in the most strict union with his wife, yet Octavius and he would never have wanted pretences to renew their disputes; since the Empire of the universe could not satisfy the ambition of two men, who governed it together. It was necessary that one of them should yield to the other; and indeed their union lasted only till Octavius had taken proper measures to renew the war (34).

(34) S. Real, ubi supra, pag. 427, 428.

[W] She did all that lay in her power to reclaim him.] She represented to him, in the most tender and affectionate terms, his own interest, that of his children, and of the whole Empire. She described to him the formidable power of Octavius, who only wanted a fair pretence to declare openly against him, and who employed all sorts of artifice to alienate from him the hearts of his old friends. She earnestly entreated him for his own sake to leave Cleopatra, that his enemies might no more have this pretence, to inveigh against him. All this was said, with such a gentle and charming air, that Antonius began to be moved. He was not so blind but he could see his own faults, and knew the dangers to which he exposed himself; but he followed his unhappy fate, and the tender entreaties of the most faithful and beautiful wife, were not powerful enough to make him avoid the abyss into which he was running headlong. Octavia's arrival made a terrible impression upon Cleopatra. She had heard her commended as the most accomplished woman in the Empire; she feared her beauty, and the reasons of her voyage, which were very strong, and likely to prevail upon Antonius; When she was told, that this dangerous rival had had a private conference with Antonius, she spoke as a mad person, and in the violence of her passion, either real or feigned, she offered to kill herself. And when she saw Antonius wavering and in suspence, the different parts she acted are inconceivable; she dispersed immense sums of money, either in making presents to Antonius's friends, and to those who had some influence over him, or to spies, that they might endeavour to discover his real sentiments, and most secret transactions, and acquaint her with them (35). She was served according to her wishes; and Antonius resolved to stay with her.

(35) Idem, ibid. p. 429, 430.

[X] They did not want a shew of reason to cast the odium of the war upon one another, but Antonius's behaviour gave Octavius a fair pretence to attack him.] Antonius said, that Octavius had deprived Lepidus of the Magistracy, and had kept for himself alone the Provinces and Armies, which had belonged to Lepidus, of which Antonius pretended he should have his share. Octavius on the contrary complained, that Antonius kept to himself the government of Egypt, tho' he had not obtained it by lot, as was the custom; that he had killed Sextus Pompeius; that he had taken King Artavasdes by treachery, and put him in chains to the great dishonour of the Roman name; that he had bestowed great Kingdoms on Cleopatra, and on the children whom he had by her. But what most exasperated the people against Antonius, was the will he had made, which falling into the hands of Octavius, he read it publickly, to render his enemy more odious. By his will he made exorbitant gifts to the children whom he had by Cleopatra; and order'd that after his death, his corps should be buried at Alexandria with that of Cleopatra. This raised the people's indignation to a terrible height, and made them believe whatever was said against Antonius, and especially, that if he were victorious, he would give Rome to Cleopatra, and transfer the Empire into Egypt (36).

(36) Dion, lib. 50, p. 479, 481.

poſſible. Whilſt they ſeemed to act thus in concert, Cleopatra, without Antonius's knowledge, ſent Octavius a preſent of a golden ſcepter and crown, and royal chair, thereby intimating that ſhe preſented him with the Kingdom; this ſhe did out of policy, that if Octavius would not be reconciled to Antonius, he might at leaſt treat her in a gentle manner. Octavius having received thoſe preſents ſent no anſwer to Antonius, and publickly threatened Cleopatra, and commanded her to lay down her arms, and to leave her Kingdom; but he let her know ſecretly that he would pardon her, and leave her her Kingdom, if ſhe would put Antonius to death [Y]. Cleopatra did not ſtay long before ſhe reſolved to betray again her too fond and blind lover. She delivered up Peluſium to Octavius, though it ſeemed as if he took it by force. Antonius hearing that his enemy was maſter of Peluſium, reſolved to meet him whilſt he was marching towards Alexandria. Accordingly he fell upon his cavalry, which being tired was ſoon vanquiſhed: this raiſed his hopes again, he attacked Octavius with his infantry, and was routed in his turn; thereupon he haſtened to his fleet, either to run the riſque of a ſea fight, or to retire into Spain. But Cleopatra hearing this obliged the fleet to retire before Antonius arrived, and went herſelf into a ſepulchre (oo), as though ſhe had been afraid to fall into Octavius's hands; but her real intention was to entice Antonius to come into the ſame place, that ſo he might be eaſily taken by Octavius's army. Antonius, though he ſuſpected the treaſon, yet his love was ſtill ſo great that he could not be perſuaded, and almoſt pitied Cleopatra's condition more than his own. This obliged Cleopatra to make Antonius believe ſhe was dead; ſhe ſent one of her attendants to tell him ſhe had killed herſelf, being perſuaded that this would engage him to do the ſame. She was not diſappointed in her expectation; for as ſoon as Antonius heard ſhe was dead, he deſired one of his ſlaves, whoſe name was Eros, to kill him [Z], as he had promiſed to do, if ever Antonius's affairs were in a deſperate condition. Eros drawing his ſword killed himſelf inſtead of his maſter, who thereupon took up the ſword and run it through his body. The wound did not kill him upon the ſpot, but left him time enough to hear that Cleopatra was ſtill living; whereupon, though he had loſt a great deal of blood, yet he would be carried to the place where Cleopatra was; and as he could not get by the door, which was made in ſuch a manner, that being once ſhut it could not be opened again, he was lifted up to the top by the ſame ropes, by which the workmen uſed to draw the ſtones that ſerv'd for this building, which was ſtill open at the top, being not yet finiſhed. Cleopatra herſelf helped with two of her attendants to draw Antonius up, and took him in [AA], and in a few moments he died in her arms (pp). Thus ended that famous man, of whom it is ſaid, that it was not eaſy to determine, whether his good or his bad qualities rendered him more conſpicuous (qq). The Abbot of S. Real ſeems to have undertaken his defence; but with how much reaſon or truth will eaſily be determined by thoſe, who examine carefully the whole courſe of his life. However, we ſhall conſider in a remark a particular paſſage of that celebrated writer [BB].

(oo) The ſepulchres in Egypt were very large buildings; as for inſtance, the Pyramids.

(pp) Dion, lib. 50. p. 511—515. Plutarch, ubi ſupra, p. 950, 951.

(qq) S. Real, ubi ſupra, p. 414.

ANTONIUS

[Y] He promiſed to leave her her Kingdom if ſhe would put Antonius to death.] He did more ſtill, for Antonius and Cleopatra having ſent him ambaſſadors a ſecond and a third time, he ſent at laſt one of his freedmen to Cleopatra, who ſpoke to her in his name very graciouſly, and even inſinuated to her, that he was in love with her; hoping that this would prevail upon a woman, who wanted to be beloved by all men. Nor was he diſappointed in his hopes (37), as will appear by the text of this article.

(37) Idem, lib. 51. p. 513.

[Z] He deſired one of his ſlaves to kill him.] "It "is now time, ſaid he, my dear Eros, for you to "perform the promiſe, you made me formerly; I "expect from your faithful hand a happy ſtroke, which "will put an end to this life, and to the torments "I endure." And ſeeing, that Eros had killed himſelf. "Is it poſſible, cried Antonius, that I ſhould "ſtill learn what is my duty, from a woman (38), "and from a ſlave (39).

(38) Cleopatra, whom he thought had killed herſelf.

(39) S. Real, ubi ſupra, p. 436.

[AA] Cleopatra took him in.] As ſoon ſhe ſaw him, ſhe could not forbear ſhedding tears; "Don't cry, "Madam, ſaid Antonius; my life has not been ſuch, "that I ought to bluſh, for any thing I have done. I "dye, having been the firſt of the Romans; I have "been vanquiſhed, becauſe I have been faithful in the "love I had for you. I have been vanquiſhed, I thank "the Gods, it is a Roman who vanquiſhed me; no "baſe action can be imputed to me, and there is no-"thing in my defeat that can diſgrace me. I die "loaded with honours, triumphs, and victories, in "the arms of the moſt accompliſhed Princeſs in the "world, the only perſon I adore (40)." Thus he gloried in that very thing which had been the cauſe of his ruin: and this the Abbot de S. Real admires as a great and heroic ſentiment.

(40) Ibid. p. 437.

[BB] We ſhall conſider a particular paſſage of that celebrated writer (de S. Real)] Marcus Antonius the "Triumvir, ſays he (41), knew his firſt wife's cri-"minal converſation with Dolabella; and nevertheleſs "he always continued his particular friend." How does this agree with what Plutarch relates? He tells us (42), that when Cæſar had been made Conſul for the fifth time, he was reſolved to abdicate the Conſulſhip in favour of Dolabella, and communicated his deſign to the Senate, but that Antonius oppoſed it with the utmoſt vigour, and even ſaid a great many ill things of Dolabella. The occaſion upon which Plutarch ſays this directly contradicts the Abbot de S. Real's aſſertion; for it is immediately after he had told us, that Antonius ſuſpected Dolabella of having a criminal converſation with his wife. But that ingenious Abbot fond of paradoxes, had undertaken Antonius's defence; but there is reaſon to doubt, whether he was ſerious in it. For after having ſpoken of the murther of Cicero, he adds (43), "All the other murthers, which Antonius "committed during the whole courſe of his life, were "not owing to a cruel and ſanguinary diſpoſition; "neceſſity only prompted him to thoſe violent actions. "Such was the death of Amantias, who ſuſtained "with a few rebels the party of Marius at Rome after "the death of Cæſar. Antonius put this Amantias to "death, by the authority he had as a Conſul, in order "to gain the favour of the Senate, which he wanted in "the circumſtances he was then in." But if neceſſity, and ſuch a neceſſity as ariſes from a man's unbounded ambition, is ſufficient to excuſe the moſt cruel action, there is no tyrant, whoſe apology may not eaſily be made. When a man puts himſelf willingly in ſuch circumſtances, that he cannot ſupport himſelf but by acts of cruelty, he is juſtly accountable for them all, and neceſſity will never excuſe him before an impartial judge. And this was the caſe of Antonius, of Octavius, and of all tyrants in general.

(41) De l'Infidelité des Femmes; in tom. 1. p. 470.

(42) Ubi ſupra, p. 921.

(43) Pag. 417.

P.

ANTONIUS (CAIUS) brother to the preceding, ſerved under Julius Cæſar in the war againſt Pompey, and was obliged for want of proviſions to ſurrender himſelf to the enemy with the troops which he commanded in Illyricum (a). After the death of Cæſar, and while himſelf was Prætor, and Marcus Antonius his brother Conſul, he was ſent into Macedonia with the decree of the Senate, which gave the government of that Province to Marcus Antonius. But with all his care and expedition he was prevented by Brutus and taken priſoner (b). At firſt Brutus treated him with great reſpect, and left him the enſigns of his Prætorſhip; but when he found that Caius Antonius had attempted to draw off the army to his party, he placed him under a ſtrong guard, and afterwards put him to death, when he had heard of the proſcriptions of the Triumvirate, the murder of D. Brutus, and that of Cicero, &c. Marcus Antonius, after the battle at Philippi, having got Hortenſius into his power, ſacrificed him in revenge for his brother's death. Cicero ſpeaks ſometimes of C. Antonius in his Philippics, but always to his diſadvantage (c).

(a) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 80, ex Cæſare, Lucano Pharſal. lib. 4. Eutropio.

(b) He was taken by Hortenſius, who delivered him up to Brutus.

(c) Glandorp. Onomaſt. ex Plutarcho in M. Antonio, &c.

ANTONIUS (LUCIUS) brother to the preceding, had all the vices of his brother the Triumvir, without any of his virtues. However he did not want courage. He was Tribune of the People the ſame year that Cæſar died, while his brother Marcus was Conſul, and his other brother Caius Prætor. He was Conſul in the year of Rome 713, and triumphed the firſt day of his Conſulſhip on occaſion of a victory which he pretended he had gained over ſome of the inhabitants of the Alps, though he had performed nothing worthy of a triumph, and never had executed any poſt in their country. But Fulvia wife to Marcus Antonius, and mother-in-law to Octavius Cæſar, who had an abſolute power at Rome then, procured him that honour by her intereſt alone. This haughty Lady, being impatient to revenge herſelf upon Octavius, who had divorced her daughter, induced Lucius Antonius to take up arms againſt him, under pretence of protecting the inhabitants of the country, whoſe lands had been aſſigned to the ſoldiers. Having brought the troops which he had raiſed into Rome by night, he obliged Lepidus one of the Triumvirate to retire, made a ſpeech to the people, and declared to them, that he was reſolved, according to his brother's intention, to aboliſh the Triumvirate. This promiſe of his filled the whole city with joy. Upon this he was declared Imperator, and marched againſt Octavius Cæſar; but not daring to keep the field, he ſhut himſelf up in Peruſium, where he defended himſelf, till he was obliged by want of proviſions to ſurrender. Octavius afterwards gave him his liberty, but we have no further account of him from that time (a).

(a) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 81, ex Dione, &c.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS JULIUS) ſon to the Triumvir by Fulvia, was taken into ſuch high favour by Auguſtus, after the conqueſt of Egypt, that he was raiſed from one poſt to another, till he came to the Conſulſhip in the year of Rome 744. He married Marcella, daughter to Octavia, and by this means being ſon-in-law to the ſiſter of Auguſtus, for whom that Emperor had a prodigious regard, he gained the firſt place in his favour next to Agrippa, ſon-in-law to Auguſtus, and the ſons of the Empreſs. But he proved very ungrateful to his benefactor, for he was one of the firſt who debauched his daughter Julia, which, added to ſome ſuſpicions of his having engaged in a conſpiracy, was the occaſion of his being condemned to death. There are ſome Hiſtorians who write that he killed himſelf, to prevent the infamy of his ſentence (a). He had ſtudied under the Grammarian L. Craſſitius (b), and wrote a Poem of twelve books in heroick verſe (c), with ſeveral treatiſes in proſe. It is to him that Horace addreſſes the 2d Ode of his 4th Book. He left one ſon, who was then very young, named Julius Antonius. The Emperor ſent away this youth to Marſeilles, under the ſpecious pretence of his ſtudies. The funeral honours which he paid him were very extraordinary; for he procured a decree of the Senate, that his bones ſhould be placed in the tomb of Octavius (d). This ſeems to be the end of the antient and conſiderable family Antonia, which Tacitus obſerves was an illuſtrious one, but unfortunate, Multa claritudine generis, ſed improſperâ (e). I ſhall now give a collection of Moreri's errors concerning this family [A].

(a) Vell. Paterculus lib. 2. cap. 100.

(b) Sueton. de Illuſtrib. Grammat. cap. 18.

(c) Intitled Diomedea. Vetus Interpres Horat. in Od. 2. lib. 4.

(d) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 44.

(e) Idem, ibid. Tacitus ſays this on occaſion of the death of L. Julius Antonius, which happened in the year of Rome 778.

ANTONIA

[A] I ſhall now give a collection of Moreri's errors concerning this family.] 1. This family ſhould not have been mentioned under the letter M on occaſion of Marcus Antonius; both he and his family ought to have been placed under the letter A. 2. It is wrong to ſay, that the family of Antonia was famous among the nobility of Rome, for it is plain that ſuch a manner of expreſſion intimates, that they were diſtinct from the Plebeian families; which is falſe. The Tribuneſhip of the people, which Marcus Antonius was poſſeſſed of at the beginning of the war between Cæſar and Pompey is alone ſufficient to prove beyond contradiction, that the family Antonia was Plebeian; for he was made Tribune of the people, without having procured himſelf to be adopted by a Plebeian; he was not obliged to uſe the ſame expedient as Clodius, who wanting to be choſen Tribune of the people had recourſe to ſuch adoption (1). I confeſs that the Antonius's were at firſt Patricians: this appears from the offices of Decemviri and military Tribunes, which were conferred upon them at a time, when the Plebeian families had not obtained an admiſſion to the firſt poſts of honour in the commonwealth. But whether the Antonius's, who appeared with ſuch luſtre in the ſeventh age of Rome, were not deſcended from the ſame ſtock as thoſe, who bore the ſirname of Merenda; or whether they paſſed in a manner which we know nothing of, from the rank of Patricians to that of Plebeians, as it happened to ſome other families; it is certain that their family was Plebeian in the time of Marcus Antonius the orator, who firſt raiſed it. 3. It is groſs ignorance to ſay, that this family was divided into two branches the Merenda's and the Marcus's. The word Marcus is a Prænomen. Now Prænomina are only to diſtinguiſh perſons: that, which diſtinguiſhes the branches is called cognomen, and fills the third place, as Cæſar, Scipio, &c. (2). IV. It is not certain, that Q. Antonius Merenda, a military Tribune about the year 322 of Rome, was ſon to T. Antonius Merenda, Decemvir

(1) Cicero, Orat. pro Domo ſuâ ad Pontific. cap. 13.

(2) Caius Julius Cæſar, Publius Cornelius Scipio, &c.

ANTONIA, eldeſt daughter of Marcus Antonius [A] by Octavia (a), was a Lady whoſe virtue and beauty made her prodigiouſly admired (b). She married Druſus ſon to Livia and brother to Tiberius, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children (c); but there were only three who ſurvived Druſus, namely, Germanicus, Claudius, who was afterwards Emperor, and Livilla, who was wife to Tiberius's ſon. Antonia, who was left a young and beautiful widow, received the addreſſes of the greateſt perſons; but ſhe rejected them all, and was an example of Continence [B] ſo much the more glorious, as ſhe lived in a court extremely debauched. Tiberius, though he was a man of a very ſtern and cruel temper, had a great reſpect for this Lady; which ſhews, that ſhe knew how to join to her cenvir in the 303. V. It is falſe that Titus Livius makes mention of M. Antonius Merenda, General of the horſe to P. Cornelius the Dictator. He calls him ſimply M. Antonius. VI. Marcus Aurelius Creticus was not killed in the battle. Aſconius Pedianus leaves no room for doubt upon this point. Indicto Cretenſibus bello, ſays he (3), male re geſta ibidem periit. That is, "Having made war upon the Cretans, and failing of "ſucceſs he died there." VII. Inſtead of ſaying that Marcus Antonius the Orator never wrote any of his Orations, he ſhould have ſaid that he never publiſhed any (4). VIII. His anſwer to thoſe, who aſked him the Reaſon of his conduct in that point, is miſrepreſented; for he did not reply, that he was unwilling to furniſh arms to thoſe, who might convict him of ſpeaking badly. He had no apprehenſion with regard to his words or phraſes; I mean, leſt he ſhould be reproached with barbariſms, or falſe grammar; and yet this is what Moreri imputes to him, as every one muſt confeſs, who can underſtand the ſenſe of an author; but Marcus Antonius was jealous of this, that ſome perſon might prove from his own writings, that he was inconſiſtent with himſelf, and had refuted four years before the pleading, which he was then upon. See the remarks [B] and [C] of the article MARCUS ANTONIUS the Orator, where I have ſpoken fully of the occaſion of Advocates contradicting themſelves, and maintaining one thing one day, and at another time the reverſe, according to the different intereſts of their Clients. IX. Beſides, Moreri puts a very abſurd anſwer into the mouth of Marcus Antonius; for one may write a pleading without furniſhing arms to the criticks, if it be but kept in one's cabinet. X. M. Aquilius was not already condemned, when Antonius undertook his cauſe. XI. The Judge did not confeſs, that he, who had ſo often expoſed his life for the ſafety of the Commonwealth, ought not to have loſt it with ſo much diſhonour. If Moreri had known, that Aquilius would have been condemned but to baniſhment at moſt (5), he would not have ſuch a rhetorical aggravation to his Style. XIII. What a confuſion there is in ſaying, that Marcus Antonius was Conſul, Cenſor in the year 626 of Rome with A. Poſthumius, and in 657 with L. Valerius, &c. There is worſe than confuſion in it: there are ſeveral falſities likewiſe. Marcus Antonius was Conſul with Poſthumius Albinus in 655, and Cenſor with L. Valerius Flaccus in 657 (6).

(a) She was ſiſter to Auguſtus.

(b) Σωφροσύνη καὶ κάλλει διαφέρουσα. Plutarch. in Anton. p. 955, E.

(c) Sueton. in Claud. cap. 1.

(3) Aſc. Pedian. in Cicer. Divinat. p. 37. edit. Lugdun. in 12°. He ſays in Verrem de Præt. Urb. pag. 87. Cretæ mortuus, that is, he died in Crete.

(4) See above remark [A] of the article ANTONIUS the Orator.

(5) Quum mihi M. Aquilius in civitate retinendus eſſet. It is Marcus Antonius who ſays this in the 2d book of Cicero de Oratore, cap. 45.

(6) Plinius, l. 8. cap. 7. Sigonius and Calvinus place this Conſulſhip in the year 634, and the Cenſorſhip two years after.

[A] Eldeſt Daughter of Marcus Antonius.] Suetonius and Plutarch contradict this aſſertion of mine: the former in expreſs terms (1); the latter after an implicit manner; for he ſays nothing with regard to this point, but only mentions the marriage of one of the two Antonia's with Domitius, before that of the other with Druſus (2). Now as Suetonius wrote after Tacitus, and he ſeems to refute him ſometimes, is it not more proper to give him the preference, and to ſuppoſe, that he took the contrary ſide of the queſtion, only becauſe he had rectified the error of Tacitus? Beſides are the words of Plutarch of no Weight? Let every one determine as he pleaſes. I have followed Tacitus, without pretending to diſpute with thoſe, who chooſe to follow Suetonius. There are two paſſages in Tacitus, one in the XLIV chapter of the IV book of his Annals, the other in the LXIV of his XII book of the ſame Annals, where the wife of Domitius is named Minor Antonia, i. e. the younger Antonia. I find that Lipſius determines neither way (3), and Glandorp prefers the Opinion of Tacitus to that of Suetonius (4). There is a reaſon in favour of Tacitus, but it is not concluſive. It may be ſaid, that Druſus, who being ſon to a powerful Empreſs was one of the higheſt Rank in Rome, had the eldeſt of the two ſiſters; but it may be anſwered that Antonia was given to him as ſhe was the moſt beautiful. Now this is a right of ſeniority much more agreeable to the taſte of a young Prince, (and there is no occaſion to be a young Prince to have ſuch a taſte,) than that which is founded upon the greater number of years. Druſus, as he was ſuperiour in quality, had probably the choice, and without doubt he choſe the moſt beautiful of the two ſiſters, whether ſhe was the eldeſt or not.

[B] Antonia, who was left a young and beautiful widow . . . . was an example of continence.] What is ſaid of her huſband is ſtill more ſurprizing; that he kept his conjugal faith in the ſtricteſt manner. Druſum etiam Germanicum, eximiam Claudiæ familiæ gloriam, patriæque rarum ornamentum, & quod ſuper omnia eſt, operum ſuorum pro habita ætatis magnitudine, vitrico pariter ac fratri Auguſtis, duobus Reipublicæ divinis oculis, mirificè reſpondentem, conſtitit uſum Veneris intra conjugis (5) charitatem clauſum tenuiſſe (6). That is, "It is certain, that Druſus Germanicus, the glory of "the Claudian family, and the ornament of his "country, and what is ſuperior to every thing elſe, "equal in his great Actions, in proportion to his age, "to the Auguſtus's, his father-in-law and his brother, "who were the two divine lights of the Common-"wealth; it is certain, I ſay, that he confined all his "deſires and affection to his own Lady." That in ſuch a court as Auguſtus's the ſon-in-law to the Emperor ſhould content himſelf with his own wife like a mere citizen, is certainly a very extraordinary caſe; and it is to no purpoſe to ſay, that Antonia was ſo young and fine a lady, that Druſus could not have found a more beautiful object. For how many Princes, and noblemen, and others of lower quality are there, with regard to whom this reaſon is abſolutely falſe? But to return to Antonia. Valerius Maximus thus continues his diſcourſe. Antonia quoque fœmina laudibus virilem familiæ ſuæ claritatem ſupergreſſa amorem mariti egregia fide penſavit; quæ poſt ejus exceſſum forma & ætate florens cubiculum ſocrus pro conjugio habuit, in eodemque toro alterius adoleſcentiæ vigor extinctus eſt, alterius viduitatis experientia conſenuit. That is, "And "his wife Antonia, a Lady who ſurpaſſed the fame of "the great men of her family, returned this affection "of her huſband with the ſtricteſt fidelity; for after "his deceaſe, tho' ſhe was then in the flower of her "age and beauty, ſhe conſidered the chamber of her "mother-in-law as a marriage, and in the ſame bed "the vigour of his youth was extinguiſhed, and her "widowhood grew old." The chaſtity of Antonia found panegyriſts even in Judea. Joſephus deſerves particularly to be quoted; who tells us, that Auguſtus ſolicited this Lady to marry again, but ſhe perſiſted in her refuſal, and preſerved her reputation entire in her widowhood. This is a very uncommon inſtance; for we find ladies of quality enough, who live ſeparate from their huſbands, or never marry again, tho' they are courted; but do they live free from ſcandal? are not their gallantries every where talked of? That is the point: hoc opus, hic labor eſt; "Here is the dif-"ficulty." There are people ill-natured enough to ſay, that there are ſome, who practiſe what Luther is accuſed of having given leave to huſbands to do: Si nolit uxor, ſaid he, veniat ancilla; that is, "If your wife "refuſes, call the maid." They take the reverſe of it: Si nolit, ſi deſit maritus, veniat famulus; that is, "If "your huſband refuſes, or you have none, take your "ſervant." They have miſunderſtood the words of Luther. The words of Joſephus relating to Antonia are as follow. Τιμᾶσθαι δ' ἦν Ἀντωνίαν Τιβερίῳ ὡς τὰ πάντα συγγενείᾳ τε αἵματος; Δρούσου γὰρ ἦν ἀδελφοῦ τῷ αὐτῷ γυνὴ, καὶ ἅμα τοῦ σεμνοτάτου, νέα γὰρ χηρεύειν παρῃτήσατο γάμῳ τὸ ἀνῆκον τῷ πρὸς ἕτερον, καίπερ τοῦ σεβασμοῦ καλουσαντος τὴν γαμετὴν, καὶ λειπόντων ἀσυλλογίστως διετέλεσε αὐτῇ τὸν βίον (7). That is, "Antonia was in great eſteem with "Tiberius, p. 632, C.

(1) Germanicus C. Cæſaris pater Druſi, & minoris Antoniæ filius. Suet. in Calig. cap. 1. See likewiſe the ſame author in Claud. cap. 1. Ex Antonia majore patrem Neronis procreavit (Domitius.) Suet. in Nerone cap. 5.

(2) Plut. in Marc. Anton. p. 955.

(3) Lipſius in Tacit. Annal. lib. 12.

(4) Glandorp. Onomaſt. p. 67.

(5) See the verſes in remark [G].

(6) Val. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 3.

(7) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 8.

her chaſtity another virtue, which was not ſo well underſtood by the chaſte Agrippina her daughter-in-law, I mean prudence and ſweetneſs of temper. It was this Antonia who diſcovered to Tiberius the deſigns of Sejanus [C]. The Emperor was not ungrateful after ſo important a piece of ſervice done to him (d). Pliny tells us a very remarkable particular concerning this Antonia, that ſhe never ſpit (e). He tells us likewiſe that ſhe was very fond of a fiſh, and put her ear-rings upon it; upon which account there was a great reſort to her country-ſeat to ſee this curioſity (f). This Lady was unfortunate in her family. It is certain her ſon Germanicus had all the compleat qualifications which might be wiſhed for in a preſumptive heir of the Empire, and he was the delight of the people of Rome; but even this aggravated the affliction of Antonia, when he was taken off by an unexpected death. She was not in a condition to walk as a mourner when the funeral rites of Germanicus were performed [D]. Her other ſon was ſo diſagreeable to her, and appear'd ſo ſtupid, that ſhe treated him as a monſter [E], and an unfiniſhed lump of a man, and uſed him as a compariſon, when ſhe had a mind to repreſent any one as a blockhead. Her daughter was another ſort of monſter; ſhe attempted the honour and life of her huſband, and carried her attempts ſo far, that ſhe was convicted of adultery, and of having poiſoned her huſband. The miniſter of vengeance to whom ſhe was delivered was her own mother, who ſhut her up in a chamber, where ſhe let her die of hunger [F]. The children of Germanicus, which were brought up by Antonia, gave her no ſmall uneaſineſs. She had a particular care over their conduct; but her care ſerved to no purpoſe but to make her an eye-witneſs of their enormous diſorders. She ſurprized Caligula one day in the act of inceſt with his ſiſter (g): this wretch had not then left off his youth's habit, and yet he had already polluted it with the moſt capital crime. When he came to the Empire, he decreed at once all thoſe honours to his grandmother Antonia, which the Senate had decreed for Livia (b); but this was only through a ſudden ſtart of humour, for he afterwards neglected Antonia, and refuſed her a private audience. Theſe affronts threw her into ſuch a fit of grief that ſhe died; it is ſaid that he uſed poiſon, in order to haſten the effects of her grief [G]. He paid no honour to the deceaſed, and was not even preſent

(d) Joſeph. Ant. lib. 18. cap. 8. p. 632. C.

(e) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 19.

(f) In eadem villâ (apud Baulos in parte Baianâ) Antonia Druſi murænæ, quam diligebat, inaures addidit; cujus propter famam nonnulli Baulos videre concupiverunt. Plin. lib. 9. cap. 55.

(g) Exhibit (Sororibus) Druſillam vitiâſſe virginem prætextatus adhuc creditur: atque etiam in concubitu ejus quondam deprehenſus ab aviâ Antoniâ, apud quam ſimul educabantur. Sueton. in Calig. cap. 24.

(b) Idem, ibid. cap. 15. See likewiſe Dion, lib. 59.

(8) Joſeph. Ant. lib. 18. cap. 8. p. 632. C.

" Tiberius, either upon account of her affinity to him, " as ſhe had been wife to his brother Druſus, or be- " cauſe of her continence, ſince tho' ſhe was then a wi- " dow in the flower of her age, ſhe refuſed a ſecond mar- " riage even at the deſire of Auguſtus, and in that " ſtate of widowhood ſhe preſerved her character free " from any imputation."

[C] It was this Antonia, who diſcovered to Tiberius the deſigns of Sejanus.] There is a great deal of probability, that Tacitus had given a particular account of this fact; but unfortunately that part of his Annals is loſt. Joſephus, if I am not miſtaken, is the only Hiſtorian, who acquaints us with the ſhare, which Antonia had in the diſcovery of this conſpiracy. We may credit him in this point, becauſe the intimacy, which Berenice and her ſon Agrippa had with this lady, and the ſervices, which ſhe did to Agrippa, made her well-known in Judea, and conſequently obliged the Jewiſh Hiſtorian to inform himſelf exactly with what related to her. We may therefore aſſure ourſelves upon his authority, that as ſoon as Antonia had intelligence of Sejanus's plot, ſhe wrote the circumſtances of it exactly to Tiberius, who was then in the Iſland of Capreæ, whither ſhe diſpatched one of her ſervants, whom ſhe could moſt confide in, with a letter. The regard, which that Emperor always had for this lady was very much encreaſed by this important ſervice, which ſhe did him. Ὁ δὲ μαθὼν τότε Σηϊανὸν κτείνει καὶ τοὺς συνεστῶτας τότε Ἀντωνίαν καὶ πρὸ ἀξιολόγως ἄγαν τιμωτέραν τε ὑπελάμβανε καὶ τοῖς πᾶσι πιθανήν (8). That is, " He (Ti- " berius) being acquainted with theſe things, gave " orders to put Sejanus and his aſſociates to death, and " whereas he had before greatly eſteemed Antonia, " his regard for her in every reſpect was encreaſed " by this means." I ſhall take notice in another place, that Xiphilin has occaſionally obſerved that Antonia wrote ſeveral things to Tiberius with relation to Sejanus.

[D] She was not in a condition to walk as a mourner at the funeral of Germanicus.] Let us ſee how Tacitus tells the ſtory, with his reflections upon it. Tiberius atque Auguſta publico abſtinuere, inferius Majeſtate ſuâ rati ſi palam lamentarentur, an ne omnium oculis vultum eorum ſcrutantibus falſi intelligerentur. Matrem Antoniam non apud auctores rerum, non diurna actorum ſcriptura reperio ullo inſigni officio functam, cum ſuper Agrippinam, & Druſum, & Claudium, ceteri quoque conſanguinei nominatim perſcripti ſint, ſeu valitudine præpediebatur, ſeu victus luctu animus magnitudinem mali perferre viſu non toleravit. Facilius credierim Tiberio & Auguſta, qui domo non excedebant, cohibitam, ut par maror & matris exemplo avia quoque & patruus attineri viderentur (10). i. e. " Ti- " berius and Auguſta avoided appearing in publick, " thinking it beneath their Majeſty to be ſeen as " mourners, or elſe that their hypocriſy might not " be obſerved by every perſon, who would undoubted- " ly examine their countenances. I do not find a- " mong any of the writers or the diaries of thoſe " times, that Antonia his mother appeared in any " publick manner, tho' all the reſt of his relations " beſides Agrippina, and Druſus, and Claudius are " particularly named: whether ſhe was prevented by " ſickneſs, or her mind being oppreſſed with grief " could not bear to ſee her great misfortune. I ra- " ther incline to think, that ſhe was reſtrained by Ti- " berius and Auguſta, who kept themſelves in private, " that their ſorrow might ſeem equal, and his " grandmother and uncle might appear to have been " detained by his mother's example."

(10) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 3. ad ann. 773. It was the year 20 of the Chriſtian Æra.

[E] She treated her ſecond ſon as a monſter.] It is Suetonius, who relates this. Mater Antoniæ portentum eum hominis dictitabat, nec abſolutum à naturâ, ſed tantum inchoatum; ac ſi quem ſocordiæ argueret, ſtultiorem ajebat filio ſuo Claudio (11). This ſhews that ſhe was a Lady of ſenſe and wit; for a woman of the common ſtamp never is ſenſible, that her children are fools; or if ſhe be ſenſible of it, ſhe never is overforward to own it, in order to acquit herſelf, and to treat them as changelings and productions, which were neglected before they were half finiſhed.

(11) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 3.

[F] She ſhut up her daughter in a room, where ſhe let her die with hunger.] This ſhews again, that ſhe was a Lady of ſuperior qualifications, who lov'd her children no further than as they were an honour to her, and who preferred her regards to the grandeur of Rome to the inſtincts of nature. There were two traditions concerning the death of Livilla, one that Tiberius put her to death; the other, that he pardoned her crime, out of reſpect to Antonia, but that the latter ſtarved her to death (12).

(12) Dio, lib. 58.

[G] Caligula occaſioned her to die of grief; and it is ſaid that ſhe uſed poiſon to haſten the effects of her grief.] Suetonius and Dion agree in the firſt point: per iſtiuſmodi indignitates & tædia cauſa extitit mortis; dato tamen, ut quidam putant, & veneno (13). Dion does not ſpeak of the poiſoning her: He only ſays, that this cruel Emperor, not able to bear any longer the reproofs of his grandmother, obliged her to sent at her funeral (i). The temple of Antonia, which is mentioned only by Pliny, owed its name very probably to this Princeſs [H]. She did not ſee the misfortunes of her grand-daughter Antonia, whom Moreri has ſaid nothing of without falling into great errors [I].

(13) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 23.

(i) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 23.

(14) Dio, lib. 59. See likewiſe Suetonius in Caligulâ cap. 29.

to put an end to her days (14). I cannot find in what year this illuſtrious Lady died; but ſince it was under the reign of Caligula, I think we may place her death in the year 792 of Rome. That of her husband happened in the year 744. We may know pretty exactly at what age ſhe was left a widow, and how long ſhe lived; for ſhe was born in the year 714 of Rome, ſince her mother Octavia, who married Marcus Antonius in the year 713 (15), was brought to bed of a daughter, when he returned from Greece the year following (16). The Poem intitled Conſolatio ad Liviam Auguſtam de Morte Druſi Neronis (17), repreſents Antonia as extremely diſconſolate, and gives her prodigious commendations. We find there, as likewiſe in Valerius Maximus, that Druſius never indulged himſelf in any purſuits of Gallantry. We are alſo told there, that his laſt words were for his dear wife.

(15) Calviſ. ad annum mundi 3910.

(16) Plut. in Antonio, p. 930. See likewiſe, pag. 931, D.

(17) Conſol. ad Liviam, ver. 299, ſeqq. It is printed with the works of Ovid, and ſeveral think it to be Ovid's writing.

Quid referam de te, digniſſima conjuge Druſo,
Atque eadem Druſi digna parente nurus?
Par bene compoſitum, juvenum fortiſſimus alter,
Altera tam forti mutua cura viro.
Fœmina tu princeps, tu filia Cæſaris: illi
Nec minor es magni conjuge viſa Jovis.
Tu conceſſus amor, tu ſolus & ultimus illi;
Tu requies ſeſſo grata laboris eras.
Te moriens per verba noviſſima queſtus abeſſe,
Et mota in nomen frigida lingua tuum.

[H] The Temple of Antonia, which is mentioned only by Pliny, owed its name very probably to this Princeſs.] He mentions it in his catalogue of the paintings of Apelles; Ejuſdem arbitrantur, ſays he, manu eſſe & in Antoniæ templo Herculem averſum: ut quod eſt difficillimum, faciem ejus oſtendat verius pictura, quàm promittat (18): That is, "It is imagined that from "the ſame hand we have an Hercules with his "back to us, in the temple of Antonia; which is "drawn in ſuch a manner, tho' that is extremely "difficult, that it ſhews his face much better than "ſuch a poſition would ſeem to promiſe." A very learned commentator (19) obſerves upon this paſſage, that he cannot tell whether this belonged to the elder or to the younger Antonia, nor in what part of the city it was built: Cujus illud Antoniæ fuerit, majoris, minoriſve, quove urbis ſitu conditum fuerit, incompertum. Utraque Antonii Triumviri filia, major Germanici & Claudii Cæſaris parens; Neronis Avia. Thus he prefers the opinion of Tacitus, to that of Suetonius (20); and gives the eldeſt of them to Druſus. However, theſe words Neronis Avia, i. e. the Grandmother of Nero, ſeem very difficult to me: I imagine that the Printer omitted minor, i. e. the younger, at leaſt; for by ſubſtituting this word, we ſhall perceive that Father Hardouin mentioned ſomething of both the Antonia's; of the eldeſt, that ſhe was mother to Germanicus and the Emperor Claudius; and of the younger, that ſhe was grandmother to Nero. If we do not inſert ſomething of this kind, we ſhall find a miſtake in the paſſage ſince the mother of Germanicus was not grandmother to Nero. To have recourſe to the adoption of Nero by Claudius, would be a weak ſubterfuge. In another paſſage (21), this commentator prefers the opinion of Suetonius, to that of Tacitus.

(18) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. 213.

(19) Father Hardouin.

(20) See above the remark [A].

(21) In Plin. lib. 7. cap. 19. tom. 2. p. 38.

[I] Moreri has ſaid nothing of Antonia her grand-daughter without falling into great errors.] She was daughter to the Emperor Claudius and Ælia Petina; but born before he was Emperor. She was married at firſt to Cneius Pompeius Magnus (22), and afterwards to Fauſtus Sylla. She loſt both her husbands by violent deaths. The firſt was put to death by the order of the Emperor Claudius (23): The ſecond was killed at Marſeilles by thoſe, who were ſent by Nero for that purpoſe (24). She refuſed the addreſſes of that Prince, who would have married her after the death of Pompey (25). Nero put her to death under pretence that ſhe was engaged in a conſpiracy. I preſume it was that of Piſo. An hiſtorian tells us, that Piſo was to have brought with him Antonia into the camp of the Pretorian guards (26). Tacitus relates this, without ſeeing any great probability in it (27). He cannot incline to think, that Antonia would have expoſed herſelf to ſo great a danger, without ſome hopes of being the wife of Piſo. Now ſuch an expectation was groundleſs; for Piſo was known thro' the whole city to be extremely fond of his wife. Tacitus did not ſtop at this; he joins a reſtriction to it after his uſual manner; if, ſays he, the paſſion of governing is not the moſt violent of all others. By this reflection he gives again to Pliny's account the probability, which he had taken from it. Antonia might imagine that Piſo would divorce his favourite wife, in order to clear his way to the Throne, by marrying the daughter of the Emperor Claudius. Interim Piſo apud ædem Cereris opperiretur, unde eum præfectus Fenius & cæteri accitum ferrent in caſtra, comitante Antonia Claudii Cæſaris filiâ ad eliciendum vulgi favorem, quod C. Plinius memorat. Nobis quoquo modo traditum non occultare in animo fuit, quamvis abſurdum videretur, aut inani ſpei Antoniam nomen & periculum commodaviſſe, aut Piſonem notum amore uxoris alii matrimonio ſe obſtrinxiſſe; niſi ſi cupido dominandi cunctis affectibus flagrantior eſt (28). The errors of Moreri are theſe; 1. That Tacitus calls Antonia's ſecond husband Cornelius Salvus, whereas he calls him Cornelius Sulla (29). 2. That Antonia continued a long time a widow. Her husband Sylla was killed in the year 815; and Piſo's conſpiracy broke out in 818: Poppea died the ſame year. It is very probable that Antonia was courted ſoon after, and that her refuſal obliged Nero to renew the proſecution againſt her in particular. However, her widowhood could not be very long, ſince Nero, who put her to death, died in the year 821. 3. The authors quoted by Moreri do not mention, that Nero forc'd Antonia to kill herſelf.

(22) He reſtored to him this ſirname, which Caligula had taken from him. Dio, lib. 60.

(23) Sueton. in Claud. cap. 27.

(24) Tacit. Annal. lib. 14. cap. 57.

(25) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. 35.

(26) Plinius apud Tacitum, Annal. lib. 15. cap. 53.

(27) Tacit. Ann. lib. 20. cap. 53.

(28) Tacit. Ann. lib. 15. cap. 53.

(29) Ib. l. 13. cap. 23, (and not in cap. 5, as it is in Moreri) and 47. Moreri has miſquoted lib. 14. cap. 16; it ſhould have been lib. 14. cap. 57. He has not quoted all the paſſages which he ſhould have done.

ANTONIA, the younger ſiſter of the preceding, both on the father's and mother's ſide, can furniſh us with but a ſhort article. I find nothing relating to her, but that ſhe was wife to Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus, and that by this marriage ſhe had a ſon and two daughters; the ſon named Cneus Domitius was father to the Emperor Nero. We ſhall ſpeak of the daughters under the word DOMITIA, and ſhew that Moreri was miſtaken in ſaying that one of them was married to Galba.

☞ ANTONIUS PRIMUS (MARCUS) was born at Toulouſe (a) in Gallia Narbonenſis ſome years after Chriſt. Under the reign of Nero he was convicted of a great fraud, having been concerned in the forging of a will, for which he was condemned to the penalty of the Cornelian Law (b), which was baniſhment. He was a man of a daring ſpirit, prompt and enterpriſing, ſo that he ſoon recovered his rank as a Senator. Being by Galba preferred to the command of a legion, he was believed to have made frequent application to Otho by letters, offering to ſerve him in the capacity of a General; but being neglected by Otho, he remained without any part in that war. When the fortune of Vitellius appeared to decline, he betook himſelf to that of Veſpaſian, and to his cauſe proved an addition mighty and momentous, brave as he was in perſon, a prompt ſpeaker,

(a) Martial. lib. 9. ep. 101. That city is in Languedoc, a Province of France.

(b) Tacit. Annal. 14. p. 377 of Mr. Gordon's tranſlation, vol. 1.

Speaker, a rare Artiſt in bringing under hate and diſguſt, a powerful man in popular tumults and uproar, rapacious, profuſe, one during peace altogether wicked and corrupt, in war too conſiderable to be ſlighted (c). He ſoon gave Veſpaſian unqueſtionable proofs of his prudence and courage. He adviſed him to march out of Pannonia into Italy [A], in order to attack Vitellius's party, and with great diſpatch he conducted a body of Vexillaries taken from the Cohorts, and part of the horſe, to invade Italy, accompanied by Arrius Varus, an Officer ſignal for bravery in war. They ſoon took poſſeſſion of Aquileia, after which they were admitted into all the neighbouring towns. Having alſo taken Padua and Ateſte (d), they there learnt, that three Cohorts of Vitellius, with the Squadron of horſe, called Seriboniana, had erected a bridge at Forum Allienum (e), and were poſted there. They were glad of the opportunity, which offered, to aſſault them, whilſt they were void of circumſpection. Accordingly at the dawn of the day they ſuddenly encounter'd and ſubdued them, moſt of them unarmed. Previous orders had been given to the aſſailants to content themſelves with the ſlaughter of a few, and by terror to conſtrain the reſt to exchange their allegiance. There were indeed ſome, who inſtantly ſurrendred; and the greateſt part by flying and breaking the bridge eſcaped the violence of the foe. Antonius accompliſhed a thing, which having been long wiſh'd, was by popular conſtruction heightened into an act of high glory. He cauſed the ſtatues of Galba, which by the violence and viciſſitude of the times had been thrown down, to be reſtored to their wonted place and reverence in all the municipal cities: For he judged that by appearing to approve the reign of Galba, and to countenance the revival of his party, he ſhould derive credit upon his own (f). He ſhewed ſome time after a very great courage and preſence of mind by appeaſing a ſedition which was raiſed by the ſoldiers againſt T. Ampius Flavianus [B]. By this ſedition and another which happened about the ſame time, the Leaders of conſular name having been obliged (c) Gordon's Tacitus, vol. 2. book 2. p. 141.

(d) Now called Eſte, in the Paduana belonging to the Venetians.

(e) Ferrara, ſituated on an arm of the Po, in the ſtate of the church.

(f) Idem, book 3. p. 153—161.

[A] He adviſed him to march out of Pannonia into Italy.] Veſpaſian's Generals met at Petovio (1), and thoſe deliberated, whether to content themſelves with only guarding the paſſes of the Pannonian Alps, till their forces from all quarters behind them had advanced in a body to join them; or by a reſolution more daring, march forward and venture a ſtruggle for Italy. They, who held it adviſable to await the arrival of ſuccours and to protract the war, magnified the might and renown of the German legions. Beſides, there had ſince arrived with Vitellius the chief ſtrength of the army in Britain; with themſelves they had a ſmaller number of legions; theſe legions were lately routed, and tho' in words they were undaunted and terrible, yet ſtill in men vanquiſhed leſs bravery was found. But by ſecuring the Alps, they would have leiſure to expect Mucianus advancing with the bands of the Eaſt. To Veſpaſian there would ſtill remain the command of the ſea, of fleets, and of the Provinces, all affectionate to his cauſe; a ſource whence he might raiſe materials ample enough as it were for another and freſh war. Thus by a prudent and ſalutary delay new forces would certainly accrue, and of the former none would be loſt. In anſwer to theſe reaſonings, Antonius, who in truth from the beginning, with infinite ardour incited the war, argued, "That to themſelves diſpatch was "altogether advantagious, and to Vitellius only pernicious. A greater ſhare of ſloth and indolence had "poſſeſſed the conquerors, than of valour and ferocity; as men no longer inured to the regularity of a "camp, and prepared for feats of war, but ſeparated "over all the great towns of Italy, reſigned to idleneſs "and eaſe, and dreadful to none but their hoſts. Nay "the more furious and ſtern they formerly had been, "with the more greedineſs they ſwallowed pleaſures ſo "raviſhing and new. Moreover by haunting the "Theatres and the Circus, and by following the delightful paſtimes at Rome, they were utterly ſoftened and "debauched or by diſeaſes utterly waſted. But, were "time allowed them, their antient vigour would ſtill "return, by their application to the cares and purſuits "of war. Not far from them lay Germany, from "whence a ſure recruit of forces; beyond the channel, "Britain, juſt by France; as alſo both Spains; from "all a ready ſupply of men, and horſes, and contributions; Italy too itſelf in their poſſeſſion, with the "immenſe treaſures of Rome. And ſhould they reſolve, for prevention, to recur to offenſive arms, "they were furniſhed with two fleets, and the Illyrian Sea was open. What would then avail the "Streights and defence of the mountains? What the "protracting of the war till another Summer? Where, "in the interval, the money to be had? Where the "proviſions? Doubtleſs, much better it were to improve the occaſion preſented by the ſoldiery; for "that the Pannonian legions, who had been deceived "rather than vanquiſhed, were impatient to ſignalize "their vengeance; and the armies of Mœſia had "brought forces with them, by no rout diminiſhed. "If upon the number of men ſtreſs were to be laid, "rather than upon the number of legions, in this "hoſt was to be found ſuperiour ſtrength, nothing diſſolute, and, from a ſenſe of diſgrace, diſcipline "amended. The horſe, in truth, were not then defeated, but tho' the iſſue proved unfortunate, had "routed the cavalry of Vitellius. Yes, two ſquadrons from Pannonia and Mœſia, in that fight pierced quite through the ranks of the enemy. At preſent were united the banners of ſixteen ſquadrons; "a body who with the ſhock and thunder of the onſet, "nay, with the very cloud raiſed by them, will not "fail to overwhelm and cover yonder troops of horſemen and their horſes, both become unacquainted "with feats of war. The ſame meaſures, which I "adviſe, if I am not reſtrained, I will purſue; you, "who are yet free to follow fortune on either ſide, ſtay "and with you detain the legions, to me a few cohorts, "lightly equipped, will be ſufficient. Anon you "will hear that I have opened my way into Italy, "and ſhaken the power of Vitellius. You will then "be glad to follow, and travel in the tract of one who "had conquered for you." Theſe and the like ſtrains he uttered with eyes darting fire, with a voice fierce and vehement, and with ſuch effect, that he moved and influenced even ſuch as were moſt cautious and provident. They all loaded him with praiſes, and ſcorning the reſolutions of the other Generals as cold and fruitleſs, extolled him as the only brave man, the only vigorous Leader. This renown he firſt acquired in a late military aſſembly, where letters from Veſpaſian were publickly recited. For there he reaſoned not, like moſt others, in a ſtile equivocal and obſcure, with intent to wreſt the interpretation hither and thither, as intereſt ſhould require: he appeared to have fallen into the ſubject of debate with openneſs of expreſſion, free from all diſguiſe, and hence became more acceptable to the ſoldiers, ſince he thus offered himſelf as a ſharer in their lots, whether of guilt or of glory (2).

(1) Now called Pettaw in lower Stiria, in the Archbiſhoprick of Saltſburgh.

(2) Gordon's Tacit. vol. 1. p. 153--156.

[B] He ſhewed a very great courage and preſence of mind by appeaſing a ſedition which was raiſed againſt T. Ampius Flavianus] This man both by nature and old age ſlow and irreſolute, provoked the ſuſpicion of the ſoldiers, as if he too well remembred his affinity with Vitellius; as likewiſe for that having upon the firſt uproar of the legions betaken himſelf to flight, and then of his own mere motion returned, he was believed to watch an occaſion for executing ſome traiterous purpoſe (3). The ſoldiers having ſeen ſome

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 156.

obliged to withdraw, Antonius alone remained in poſſeſſion of the power and ſway over the army, by the conceſſion of his equals, the other Commanders of Legions, and by the bent and partiality of the ſoldiers. Neither were there wanting thoſe, who believed both theſe ſeditions to have been moved by the intrigues and contrivance of Antonius himſelf, that upon him alone might devolve the glory and emoluments of the war (g). By his conduct he ſhewed, that he was not unworthy to command the Roman Legions. Hearing that there were great diviſions in the army of Vitellius, he reſolved forthwith to attack them thus involved in animoſities, and divided in their forces and affections, e'er the Leaders had recovered authority, the ſoldiers their diſcipline and obedience, or the Legions ſpirit and boldneſs by uniting. With his whole army therefore he marched from Verona, and the next evening encamped at Bedriacum (b). A few days after he engaged in battle againſt Vitellius's army, and routed it, tho' with much difficulty; for which reaſon he did not urge his victory; for he was mindful of the condition of his men and horſes, waſted with heavy fatigue, and afflicted with many wounds, in a battle, which, however ſucceſsful in the iſſue, had proved doubtful and perillous. In the cloſe of the evening arrived the whole power of Veſpaſian's army, who having marched over hills of ſlain, and thro' the monuments and traces of a recent carnage, concluded the war to be compleatly finiſhed, and inſiſted to be led directly to Cremona, either to bring the vanquiſhed forces to ſurrender, or to force the place [C]. This the ſoldiers demanded with ſuch an audaciouſneſs, that they now utterly ſlighted the authority of their Tribunes and Centurions; and to drown the voice of any one, who offered to reaſon with them, they thundered with their arms, ready to renounce all command, unleſs they were forthwith led on. Antonius having conveyed himſelf into the crowd, after he had by his preſence and authority procured ſilence, repreſented to them in an elegant ſpeech, the danger of the enterprize [D]. But all his eloquence could not aſſwage the fury of the raving multitude, and an inſurrection was juſt beginning, when ſome horſemen, who had advanced cloſe to the walls of Cremona, there ſeized certain ſtragglers, by whom a diſcovery was made, that ſix Legions of Vitellius, and the whole hoſt, which had quartered at Hoſtilia (i), having learnt the defeat of their fellows, had that ſame day marched thirty miles, and were juſt approaching arrayed for battle. The minds of the men, otherwiſe ſtubborn and ungovernable, upon this terrible alarm, became pliant and open to the counſel of their Commander. Antonius immediately gave all the neceſſary

(g) Idem, ibid. p. 161, 162.

(b) A ſmall city on the river Oglio, between Mantua and Cremona; it is now called Canito.

(i) Now called Oſtiglia, a ſmall but ancient town, ſituated in the Dutchy of Mantua.

ſome horſes of their own, miſtook them at a diſtance for the enemy; and filled with panic fear, they at an inſtant graſped their arms againſt Flavianus, now charged as a traitor, tho' from no proof or indication of guilt; but as they had long ſince born him mortal rancour, his bloody doom was demanded with uproar, like that of a tempeſt. In vehement and repeated clamours they accuſed him, as the kinſman of Vitellius, a traitor to Otho, and guilty of appropriating to himſelf the donative intended for them. Liberty of defence there was none, tho' in the poſture of a ſupplicant he implored it, with his hands humbly extended, his body for the moſt part proſtrate upon the earth, his garments rent, his face and boſom convulſed with the emotion of anguiſh. To men enflam'd with bitterneſs and rage, even this his diſtreſs proved a freſh incentive, as if by dread ſo exceſſive he bewrayed his guilt. Aponius, as he attempted to ſpeak, was ſilenced by the cries of the ſoldiers; in clamours too and fierce noiſe they refuſed to hear the reſt. To Antonius only their ears were found open; for, beſides the talent of eloquence, and his art in ſoothing a multitude, he was withal of great weight and eſtimation. He when the ſedition was growing extreme and tragical, and from bitter words and revilings they proceeded to deeds of violence and the ſword, ordered Flavianus to be caſt into irons. The ſoldiers perceived the evaſion, and forcing away ſuch as guarded the tribunal, were about to perpetrate the murther. Antonius oppoſed them with his ſword drawn, with proteſtations, that he himſelf would firſt periſh by their hands or his own; and wherever he eſpied any particular known to him, or diſtinguiſhed by the ornament of their ſtation in the army, he called all ſuch by name to aſſiſt him. Then turning towards the Enſigns and Deities military, he beſought them, "That upon the armies of their "enemies they would rather pour that blind fury, and "that ſpirit of diſſention." By this means the ſedition came to ſubſide, and the day now cloſing, they all dropt off to their ſeveral tents. That very night Flavianus departed, and on his way to Veſpaſian met letters from him, ſuch as left him no longer any cauſe of fear (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 160, 161.

[C] Either to bring the vanquiſhed forces to ſurrender or to force the place.] This was the plauſible language, which openly they uſed, but privately every particular perſon reaſoned with himſelf in the terms following; "That the city, as it was ſituated in a plain, "might be taken by ſtorm; in forcing an entrance in "the dark, they ſhould be prompted with the ſame re"ſolution, and have greater latitude for ſpoiling. "Now if they awaited the return of day, preſently "ſupplications would be offered, preſently peace would "be accepted; and for their toils and wounds they "ſhould only reap renown and the praiſe of cle"mency, gratifications barren and vain. But to the "commanders of legions and principal officers would "accrue the wealth of Cremona; ſince to the ſoldiers "belonged the plunder of a town taken by the ſword, "as to the leaders, when gained by ſurrender (5)."

(5) Ibid. p. 167, 168.

[D] He repreſented to them the danger of the enterprize.] He declared to them, "That of no part of "their glory, of no part of their recompence, "ſought he to deprive men ſo well deſerving; "but between an army and its leaders, the duties "were ſhared and diſtinct. To the ſoldiers it ap"pertained to dare danger, to long for the combat; "the Generals ſhewed their excellence in providing "againſt exigencies, in concerting judicious meaſures; "nay, oftener by patience and procraſtination, than "by haſte and hazard, their ſucceſs was obtained. "As he had, at the peril of his life, and by the "dint of his ſword, promoted the late victory with "all his might, he was ready to contribute the aſſi"ſtance of his counſels and opinion; parts eſſential "to a General. In truth, the difficulties to be en"counter'd, admitted no queſtion or doubt; namely, "the night, the unknown ſituation of the city, the "enemy maſters of it, on all hands opportunities "for circumvention and ambuſh. Enter they ought "not, even tho' the gates were thrown open, even "though it were full day, till after ſure ſearch and "intelligence. Would they indeed begin the aſſault, "while yet bereft of light to diſcover where lay "the moſt eaſy and acceſſible places or what was "the height of the walls? Or before it was deter"mined whether the city were to be attacked by "miſſive engines and flights of darts, or by works "and machines for battery." Then turning round to particulars, he enquired of each, "If with him "he had brought a hatchet, a pick-axe, and other neceſſary orders, and diſpoſed his army in ſuch a manner, that if the enemy reſolved to attack him, he might be in a condition to repel them with advantage. He was not deceived in his expectation; for the army of Vitellius, who in all diſcretion ought to have reſted at Cremona, and, having by meat and ſleep recovered their vigour, fiercely beſet the enemy next day, and puſhed them to an overthrow, while ſpent and diſabled with cold and faſting; yet, wanting a Ruler, and deſtitute of counſel, about the third hour of the night, ruſhed precipitately upon the forces of Veſpaſian already prepared and even embattled. Then enſued a moſt bloody battle; the ſoldiers fighting in the dark could not diſtinguiſh the friend from the foe. Antonius performed the part of a moſt ſkilful General, as much as it was poſſible in ſuch a confuſion. But fortune was yet leaning to neither ſide, when the night being very nigh ſpent, the Moon riſing preſented the contending armies to ſight, but deceived the eye. More favourable however ſhe proved to that of Veſpaſian, as ſhe ſhone upon their backs; for againſt the ſhadows of the men and horſes, thus magnified, as againſt their real bodies, the darts and arrows of the enemy were deceitfully directed, and fell e'er they reached their aim. But the bands of Vitellius, who from the reflection in front ſtood in clear view, were expoſed, quite defenceleſs and ſurprized, to be galled by men, who thus annoyed them as it were from a hiding place. Antonius, therefore, now that he could diſtinguiſh his own men, and be by them diſtinguiſhed, ſet himſelf to animate them ſeverally by different inſtigations, ſome by ſhame and reproof, many by applauſe and exhortation, all by hopes and promiſes. His endeavours proved ſucceſsful; the ſoldiers fought with the utmoſt courage and intrepidity, and won the victory. But this did not yet make them maſters of Cremona; that city was ſo ſtrong, that Antonius heſitated, and was unreſolved what directions to give [E]; however finding his ſoldiers were full of courage, and determined to aſſault the city, he yielded to their humour, and began the ſiege, and ordered fire to be immediately ſet to all the moſt ſumptuous and beautiful buildings in the neighbourhood of the city, in hopes that the people of Cremona, by ſeeing their poſſeſſions deſtroyed, might be induced to acknowledge Veſpaſian for Emperor. The ſiege was carried on with uncommon briſkneſs; and the city at laſt was taken. The inhabitants were in the utmoſt fear, being threatened with a preſent maſſacre, till by the entreaties of the Leaders, the raging ſoldiers became a little aſſuaged, but this did not entirely baniſh the apprehenſions of the vanquiſhed [F], for in a ſpeech, which Antonius made, tho' full of gentleneſs towards them, yet his expreſſions were ſuch, that they boded neither mercy nor wrath to Cremona; and beſides a word, which dropped from him, whilſt he was bathing himſelf, was quickly remark'd and divulged. As he complained the water was not very warm, he added, that it would ſuddenly prove abundantly hot; a ſaying which tho' uttered only to his ſlaves, turned the whole odium and indignation of the publick upon him, as if by this he had given the watch-word, for ſetting fire to Cremona. And indeed the city was barbarouſly plundered, pillaged, and burnt during four days, and was entirely deſtroyed. Antonius, ſtruck with ſhame for the barbarity committed, which was continually drawing freſh abhorrence upon him, iſſued a publick order, that no one ſhould preſume to hold captive any Citizen of Cremona. Such a prey had already been rendered vain and unprofitable to the ſoldiers, by the unanimous combination of Italy, to refuſe the purchaſe of ſuch for their ſlaves; which together with Antonius's orders, obliged the ſoldiers to murther thoſe whom they had in their power. When this inhumanity became known, the kindred and relations of thoſe, who had been taken, made haſte

" utenſils for beſiging towns." As they owned that they had not, he cried, " With ſwords and ſpears " alone can any hands poſſibly break thro' and over- " throw city walls? Should we be conſtrained to " throw up a rampart; ſhould it prove neceſſary to " ſhelter ourſelves under pent-houſes of boards, and " ſheds of hurdles; muſt we not in ſuch diſtreſs, " remain like the vulgar herd, ever thoughtleſs and " improvident, impotently ſtaring at the lofty towers " and ſtrong bulwarks of our enemies? Better it is " to delay for one night, and when our warlike " engines and machines are brought, carry with us " power and victory (6)."

(6) Ibid. p. 168.

[E] Cremona—was ſo ſtrong, that Antonius—was unreſolved what directions to give.] In the war againſt Otho, the ſoldiers from Germany had pitched their camp quite round the walls, and quite round their camp had drawn a great trench, and to this too had ſince added freſh bulwarks. At the ſight of all theſe the conquerors were checked. To proceed to the aſſault with an army already waſted and weary with the continued toils of a day and a night, were an enterpriſe full of difficulty; and, as no ſuccour or refuge was nigh, it were full of danger. If to Bedriacum they ſhould return, intolerable were the fatigue from a journey ſo long, and vain and abortive would then prove their victory gained. Should they here ſtay and encamp, this too was a courſe to be dreaded ſo near the enemy; for that by a ſudden ſally he might attack and diſtreſs the men, when diſperſed and employed in their works. Above all their apprehenſions was that, adminiſtred by their own ſoldiers, men apter to tempt perils, than to bear delays. To them all meaſures that were ſafe were diſtateful; in feats of temerity they placed their hopes; ſo that for all the ſlaughter which they ſuffered, for all their gorings, and the blood ſpilt, they found full compenſation in the luſt and fruition of ſpoil (7).

(7) Ibid. p. 173.

[F] This did not entirely baniſh the apprehenſions of the vanquiſhed.] For the army, beſides their inherent luſt of plunder, were ſtimulated by an old rancour, to ſeek the overthrow of that colony. The inhabitants were believed, even in the war againſt Otho to have ſupported the cauſe of Vitellius. Soon after, when the thirteenth legion had been left to rear an amphitheatre there, as the lower citizens every where have ſpirits pert and ſcornful, they of Cremona had, with biting and petulant jeſts conſtantly provoked and derided the ſoldiers. To heighten this ill humour and deſpight there concurred, that the ſame place had been now twice the ſeat of war, that it had furniſhed the army of Vitellius with proviſions, that even ſome of the women were ſlain in the fight, being carried thither by their paſſionate zeal for the cauſe. Moreover, by means of the fair, the city, though in itſelf very rich, was filled with a diſplay of wealth, ſtill more abundant (8).

(8) Ibid. p. 177.

haſte to redeem them (k). Antonius till this time appeared adorned with all the virtues of a great General, without diſcovering any of thoſe vices in which men in that ſtation too often indulge themſelves; but after his ſucceſs at Cremona he did by no means proceed in the ſame meaſure of innocence. As he judged that what war could do, he had amply done, and whatever was to follow would be eaſily accompliſhed; or whether it were, that, in a ſpirit like his, a flow of felicity only laid open the avarice, pride, and other vices, hitherto ſmothered and lurking in it, he oppreſſed Italy as a country by conqueſt doomed to ſpoil; he ſoothed and courted the Legions as his own; in all his ſayings, and in all his doings, he ſought to fortify himſelf, and to lay a mighty foundation of power; and that he might inure the ſoldiers to wantonneſs and wild freedom, he frankly committed to the diſcretion of the Legions, the choice of Centurions in the room of ſuch as were ſlain. By theſe popular ſuffrages, every the moſt factious and turbulent ſpirit came to be choſen; nor were the ſoldiers any longer under the controulment of their Leaders, but the Leaders forced headlong by the fury of the ſoldiers. Proceedings theſe apparently ſeditious, and contrived to debauch the army. He did alſo abandon himſelf entirely to plunder and rapine (l); and became ſo haughty and aſſuming, that he ſoon loſt the love and eſteem of the other Officers and of the whole army. Mucianus particularly, a great General, ſtung with envy at Antonius's victories, endeavoured to obſcure his glory, inſomuch that Antonius was obliged to write himſelf to Veſpaſian in his own defence [G], not without malicious inſinuations againſt Mucianus; hence aroſe deadly enmities between them, in which Antonius acted with an openneſs unguarded, Mucianus with cloſeneſs and craft, and conſequently with a more implacable rancour (m). All this time Vitellius was not yet vanquiſhed; his party ſtill ſubſiſted at Rome. Antonius at the head of Veſpaſian's army marched towards that city. But on the road, he that had appeared ſo briſk and forward in puſhing on the war, appeared now ſlow and remiſs, for which he was ſuſpected to have been bribed by Vitellius [H]; but by his conduct he ſoon ſhewed how ill-grounded this ſuſpicion was; for hearing that the capitol was beſieged (u), he advanced with all ſpeed towards Rome, in order to affiſt Sabinus

(k) Gordon's Tacitus, ibid. p. 165—179.

(l) Ibid. p. 189.

(m) Ibid. p. 192, 193.

(n) See the remark [G].

[G] He was obliged to write to Veſpaſian in his own defence.] The occaſion of it was as follows. Antonius and the other leaders of his party had agreed, to ſend forwards the horſe, in order to make a ſpecial ſearch through all Umbria for a tolerable paſſage over the ridges of the Apennine, to bring up the banners and eagles, and all the ſoldiers left at Verona, and to have abundant proviſions brought by ſea and by the Po. There were ſome amongſt the leaders, who ſtudied to frame obſtacles and delays; for beginning now to hate Antonius, becauſe of his haughty behaviour, they hoped to receive a treatment more equal and friendly from Mucianus. The truth is, Mucianus fretted at ſo quick a victory, and judged, that if he were not preſent at the entry into Rome, he ſhould be deprived of all ſhare in the war, and in the glory of it. For this reaſon he ſent frequent letters to Antonius and to Varus full of doublings and uncertainty, now urging them to purſue their deſigns with vigour, anon recommending the advantages of procraſtination and coolneſs, in a ſtile ſo contrived, that conformably to the iſſue, whatever it were, he might eaſily diſown all miſcarriages, or eaſily challenge all ſucceſs. He alſo wrote to ſeveral other officers, but in a manner more open and free, diſcovering his aim and intention to them. They returned anſwers ſuch as cenſured the overhaſty motions of Antonius and Varus, and complimented Mucianus, who by conveying their letters to Veſpaſian, had effectually cauſed all the proceedings and counſels of Antonius to be prized far beneath his hopes. This Antonius could not bear with patience; he caſt all the blame upon Mucianus, as one by whoſe calumnies all his actions and perils were rendered of no eſtimation. Nor ſpared he bitter words in his ſpeech ever violent, and a ſtranger to ſubmiſſion. To Veſpaſian he wrote letters in a ſtrain more pompous and aſſuming, than was allowable towards an Emperor, and not without ſevere reproaches tacitly aimed at Mucianus. He ſaid, "It "was he himſelf who had urged the Pannonian le- "gions to action and arms; by his inſtigation and "addreſs, the leaders in Mœſia had been influenced "and roused; by his vigour and perſeverance the "mighty Alps had been attempted and paſſed, Italy "poſſeſſed, all ſuccours from Retia and Germany "precluded. That the legions of Vitellius, when "found to be at variance, and even disjoined, had "been broken by a furious onſet from the horſe, "then utterly diſcomfited by the infantry continuing "the conflict and ſlaughter for a whole day and "night (9), was an action of conſummate luſtre, "and an action by himſelf accompliſhed. To the "fortune of war only muſt be aſcribed the ruin of "Cremona; but indeed, our civil diſſentions have of "old been carried on with much greater publick da- "mage, nay, to the deſtruction of many noble cities. "He was not one, who fought for his Emperor with "letters and meſſengers (10), but for him expoſed "his perſon and weiled his arms. Yet he meant "not to leſſen the glory of ſuch, as had attended "the while to the eſtabliſhment of Aſia; the tran- "quillity of Mœſia had been their ſtudy; it had "been his, to preſerve and ſecure Italy. The Pro- "vinces of Gaul and Spain, the moſt powerful quar- "ters of the Roman world, had by his perſuaſions "been brought to eſpouſe the cauſe of Veſpaſian. "But all his efforts and fatigues had been vainly "beſtowed, if the recompences of ſo many perils "were to be reaped by ſuch only as had risked "none (11)."

(9) This relates to the victory which preceded the taking of Cremona.

(10) This is levelled againſt Mucianus.

(11) Ibid. pag. 191, 192.

[H] He was ſuſpected of having been bribed by Vitellius.] Some charged him, as if through treachery he thus lingered, in conſequence of the letters ſecretly ſent him from Vitellius, with offers of the Conſulſhip, and of his daughter then marriageable, and with her a mighty fortune as the reward of his revolting from Veſpaſian. Others alledged, that all this charge was no more than a fiction, framed only to court Mucianus. Several argued, that it was a reſolution concerted amongſt all the leaders, rather to preſent the city with a terrible diſplay of war, than really to carry the war thither; ſince the chief ſtrength of the Prætorian bands had already deſerted Vitellius, who was likewiſe precluded from any reinforcement on every hand: ſo that it was preſumed he would quietly yield up the Empire; but that all was marred and diſconcerted, firſt by the raſhneſs, then by the puſillanimity of Sabinus, who having inconſiderately taken up arms, had not been able to maintain the invincible fort of the Capitol againſt three Cohorts, a place ſtrong enough to defy the aſſaults of mighty armies. The truth is, one cannot eaſily upbraid any particular commander with a fault committed by all: For beſides that, Mucianus, by his dark and equivocal letters, retarded the motion of the conquering army. Antonius too incurred great guilt by his overlate and pernicious complaiſance, tho' perhaps he thence ſtudied to transfer upon the other all publick reſentment and hate. For the reſt of the chiefs; by judging the war to be compleated, they rendei'd the end of it more ſignal and glaring (12).

(12) Ibid. p. 213, 214.

Sabinus, who defended the capitol; but the aid which he intended came too late; he met, on his arrival, in the neighbourhood of Rome, with many tidings, all very mournful; Sabinus murthered, the capitol reduced to aſhes, the city under a dreadful conſternation, nay, the populace and ſlaves all under arms for Vitellius. The Senate however ſent Embaſſadors to the armies to exhort them to peace and union [I], but to no purpoſe. Antonius's army attacked that of Vitellius without the gates of Rome, purſued them into the city, where the battle was renewed, and continued for ſome time in three different parts of the city (o) with the utmoſt fury and cruelty, till at laſt Vitellius's army was vanquiſhed, and Antonius remained maſter of Rome. Then he gave glaring inſtances of his avarice, being continually plundering from the Prince's houſe, treaſures, moveables, and domeſtick ſlaves, as though he were ſtill ſeizing the ſpoil of Cremona (p). Thus he put an end to the civil war, and fixed the Imperial crown on Veſpaſian's head. For this ſervice the conſular ornaments were preſented to him (q), though it does not appear that he ever really was a Conſul (r), except perhaps ſubrogated. Antonius's power and credit at Rome did not laſt long; for upon Mucianus's arrival, which was not long after Vitellius had been vanquiſhed, it in a moment dwindled away, and was quite ſunk. Mucianus acted with great prudence and policy to keep to himſelf the power which Antonius once enjoyed; making him fair promiſes, when at the ſame time he ſent into different and diſtant quarters thoſe legions which were the moſt affected to Antonius; ſuch was the jealouſy Mucianus felt from the love which the ſoldiers bore to his competitor, as well as from the haughtineſs of the man, who was ſo far from bearing an equal, that even a ſuperior he could not bear. Antonius bereft of all his authority retired from Rome, and went to Veſpaſian, where he was received, if not ſuitably to his own hopes, yet without any ill countenance or ſourneſs from the Emperor (s) [K]. From that time we do not hear what became of Antonius, at leaſt Tacitus does not mention him any more. But we may conclude from an Epigram in Martial (t), that Antonius retired to Toulouſe where he was born, there to lead a peaceable and quiet life. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of polite learning, and exerciſed himſelf in compoſing verſes (u). He lived at leaſt ſixty or ſeventy five years, for Martial addreſſes to him an Epigram (w), in which he ſays, that Antonius had paſſed the fifteenth Olympiad. Now if with Chronologers we reckon four years for an Olympiad, Antonius was then ſixty years old; but if with the Poets we take an Olympiad for a Luſtre, that is for five years, he was ſeventy five years old. He was a great friend and patron of Martial, who gives him a very noble character [L], in which he is not very conſiſtent with Tacitus.

(o) Joſeph. De Bell. Jud. lib. 4. cap. 41.

(p) Gordon's Tacit. B. 3. pag. 215--220. B. 4. p. 223.

(q) Ibid. p. 225.

(r) See Faſtor. Continuat. poſt Sigonium; in Sigonius's works publiſhed by Mr. Argelati at Milan, 1732. vol. 1.

(s) Tacit. ubi ſupra, p. 230, 294.

(t) Lib. 9. ep. 101.

(u) Mart. lib. 1. ep. 6.

(w) Idem, lib. 10. ep. 13. Ibique Notas Farnabii.

ANTONIO

[I] The Senate ſent Embaſſadors to the Armies.] The different fate of theſe Embaſſadors ſhews, that moſt of the diſorders committed by the ſoldiers, are owing to the General's incapacity. The Embaſſadors, who went to Petilius Cerialis, who commanded one part of Veſpaſian's army, encounter'd perils almoſt fatal, as the ſoldiers ſternly rejected all terms of peace. Nay, the Prætor Arulenus Ruſticus was wounded; a barbarity, which beſides the violation of a character altogether ſacred, that of an Embaſſador, and of a Prætor, derived freſh abhorrence from the dignity and eſtimation of the man. His followers diſperſed and fled; his principal Lictor was ſlain, for daring to open a paſſage through the crowd; and had it not been for the protection of a guard, appointed by the chief officer; ſuch was the brutal rage, inſpired by the civil diſſentions, that the law and privilege of Embaſſadors, eſteemed inviolable even amongſt foreign and barbarous nations, had been profaned, nay, to the maſſacring of their perſons, in the midſt of their native country, and under the very walls of Rome. With more temper were the Embaſſadors received, who had gone to Antonius; not that the ſoldiers had greater moderation, but the General greater authority (13).

(13) Ibid. pag. 215.

[K] He was received, if not ſuitably to his own hopes, yet, &c.] The mind of Veſpaſian was under a Conflict; on one ſide ſwayed by the great ſervices of Antonius, by whoſe military conduct the Weſt was unqueſtionably gained, on the other, by letters from Mucianus (14). For it had alſo been reported, that Antonius had perſuaded Scribonianus Craſſus, who was deſcended from anceſtors very glorious in the State, to aſſume the Sovereignty (15). This was no doubt a ſtrong reaſon to Veſpaſian not to treat Antonius very kindly. To which muſt be added that all the officers combined to diſgrace him, they charged him with a peſtilent ſpirit, ſwoln with pride, and overbearing, and to heighten the charge, added the the enormities of his former life: neither failed he to raiſe enemies by his contumelious carriage; for he was wont to recount his own exploits and deſerts with an exceſſive oſtentation. The other commanders he treated with the utmoſt deſpight; hence by degrees he ſunk in his character and eſtimation, yet from the Emperor ſtill retained the face and appearance of friendſhip (16).

(14) Ibid. p. 294.

(15) Ibid. p. 255.

(16) Ibid. pag. 294, 295.

[L] Martial gives him a very noble character.] He tells us, that Antonius might call to his memory all the days and years he had paſſed, and yet not be afraid of death. That he had ſpent every day of his life in ſuch a manner, that there was not one day, which he might not remember with pleaſure. The reader will perhaps be pleaſed to find the Poet's own words here, without being obliged to recur to another volume.

Jam numerat placido felix Antonius ævo
Quindecies actas Primus Olympiadas:
Præteritos dies, & totos reſpicit annos,
Nec metuit Lethes jam propioris aquas.
Nulla recordanti lux eſt ingrata, graviſque,
Nulla fuit, cujus non meminiſſe velit.
Ampliat ætatis ſpatium ſibi vir bonus: hoc eſt,
Vivere vis, vita poſſe priore frui (17).

(17) Lib. 10. Ep. 23.

It is certainly a very great encomium, to ſay of a perſon that he lived in ſuch a manner, as to be pleaſed with the remembrance of every day of his life; but, in Martial's opinion, this was not ſufficient; he ſets his friend above all mankind. He does this in an epigram written upon Antonius's picture; there he tells us, that if his friend's mind could be deſcribed, it would be the fineſt picture in the world.

Hæc mihi, quæ colitur violis pictura roſiſque,
Quos referat Vultus, Cæciliane, rogas?
Talis erat Marcus mediis Antonius annis,
Primus in hoc juvenem ſe videt ore ſenex.
Ars utinam mores, animumque effingere poſſet!
Pulchrior in terris nulla tabella foret (18).

(18) Ibid. Ep. 32.

Every one knows how little ſtreſs muſt be laid upon praiſes beſtowed by a Poet on a Friend, to whom he has the ſtrongeſt obligation. P.

ANTONIO (NICHOLAS) Knight of the Order of St. James, and Canon of Seville, did a great honour to the Spaniſh nation by his Bibliotheca of Spaniſh Writers, which he printed at Rome in two volumes in folio in the year 1672. It is an excellent book of the kind [A], and no perſon has perhaps ſucceeded better than Don Nicholas Antonio in ſuch collections as theſe. He was born at Seville in the year 1617, and was ſon to a Gentleman, whom King Philip IV made Preſident of the Admiralty eſtabliſhed in that city in 1626. Having followed his Humanity Studies with Philoſophy and Divinity in his own country, he went to ſtudy Law at Salamanca, and applied himſelf chiefly to the Lectures of Franciſco Ramos del Manzano, who was afterwards Counſellor to the King, and Preceptor to Charles II. We have no better method to judge of the progreſs which he made, than from the deſigns which he conceived with regard to books, and from the manner in which he executed part of his ſchemes, notwithſtanding the variety of affairs which were unavoidable in the poſt he filled at Rome. He was there under the character of Agent-General of the King his maſter, and he had beſides particular commiſſions both from the Inquiſition in Spain, and the Viceroys of Naples and Sicily, and the Governor of Milan, to negotiate their affairs at the court of Rome. The deſign of the Bibliotheca of Spaniſh Writers contains two parts. The former relates to all the authors of this nation who lived before the end of the fifteenth Century; the other regards thoſe who lived ſince the end of that Century. This latter part, which was much more forward than the former, was publiſhed before the other. It was printed at Rome, as I obſerved above, in two volumes in folio in the year 1672. I cannot tell whether the author had all the leiſure that was neceſſary to finiſh the other part, and likewiſe another deſign, which was not leſs laborious than this. He was engaged in a work intitled, Trophæum Hiſtarico-Eccleſiaſticum Deo Veritati erectum ex manubiis Pſeudo-Hiſtoricorum, qui Flavii Lucii Dextri, M. Maximi, Helecæ, Braulionis, Luitprandi, & Juliani nomine circumferuntur; hoc eſt, Vindiciæ veræ atque dudum notæ Hiſpanarum rerum Hiſtoriæ, Germanarum noſtræ gentis laudum non ex Germano-Fuldenſibus Chronicis emendicatarum in libertatem & puritatem plena aſſertio. He had reaſon to ſay, that this is a work, not only of vaſt labour and criticiſm, but even of dangerous conſequence (a); for where are the people who can bear to be ſet right in thoſe fabulous ſtories which have long flattered the vanity of a nation? What riſque do they run who venture to oppoſe the torrent of a tradition which is for their honour, though at the ſame time chimerical and imaginary (b)? Every body knows the noiſe which the Provincial raiſed againſt Mr. de Launoi, who attempted to rectify their errors with regard to Magdalen and Lazarus. Perhaps Don Nicholas Antonio had no intention to touch upon certain pious fables [B], knowing too well the obſtinacy of his country in that reſpect, and the untractable diſpoſition of the Inquiſition. He intimates, that he had ſeveral other works in his thoughts. But we muſt not omit that which he publiſhed at Antwerp in 1659, De exilio, ſive de pœna exilii exulumque conditione & juribus, in folio (c).

(a) Immenſæ molis, ac forſan invidiæ Opus.

(b) See remark [D] at the end.

(c) Biblioth. Hiſpanica, tom. 2. p. 118, 119.

This is what I publiſhed concerning Don Nicholas Antonio in my firſt edition. Since that I have been informed, that upon his return to Seville, after he had ſtudied the Law at Salamanca, he ſhut himſelf up in the Royal Monaſtery of Benedictins, and laboured there for ſeveral years at his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, and made uſe for that purpoſe of the books of Bennet de la Serna, who was then Abbot of that Monaſtery, and Dean of the Faculty of Divinity at Salamanca. That in the year 1659 he was ſent to Rome by King Philip IV, to manage the affairs of that Kingdom under the character of Agent-General.... (d). That the Cardinal of Arragon, Ambaſſador at Rome, procured him from Pope Alexander VII a Canonſhip in the Church of Seville, the revenues of which he employed in charity and purchaſing

(d) Journal des Savans of the 10th of June 1697, p. 420 of the Holland edition.

[A] His Bibliotheca of the Spaniſh Writers is an excellent book of the kind (1).] I have quoted Mr. Baillet, who ſhews the value of it particularly. He had good reaſon for recommending even the Indexes, for they are very well formed and uſeful. The Author has added a ſhort Preface to them, which ſhews his excellent taſte and judgment; he has quoted there the thought of a Spaniſh Writer, Indicem Libri ab Autore, Librum ipſum à quovis alio conficiendum eſſe; that is, "An Author ought to make the Index to his book, "whereas the book itſelf may be written by any "perſon elſe." The contrary method is generally taken; Authors refer to others the pains of making alphabetical Indexes; and it muſt be owned, that thoſe Gentlemen, who are not patient of labour, and whoſe talent conſiſts only in the fire and vivacity of imagination, had much better let others make the Index to their works; but a man of judgment and application will ſucceed incomparably better in compoſing the Tables to his own writings, than a ſtranger can. There might be a variety of good directions given for the compoſition of theſe Tables; which may be juſtly called the Soul of books.

(1) See the noble character which Mr. Baillet gives of it tome 2 of the Jugemens des Savans, num. 128. The Journal des Savans of the ſixth of July 1676 gives a wretched article upon this excellent work.

A THOUGHT upon the indexes of books.

[B] He had no intention to touch.... upon certain fables.] I may perhaps may be deceived; for Mr. Bailllet ſpeaks thus: His critical talent is very judicious and ſolid in many places, eſpecially where he treats of the fabulous traditions of the firſt Catechiſts, who planted the Faith in Spain, and of thoſe falſe Hiſtorians, which have been forged to deceive the Spaniards, and upon whom our learned Author promiſed a particular diſquiſition (2). This would have abſolutely determined me, if I had not found at the end of theſe expreſſions of Mr. Baillet this other remark: Yet notwithſtanding he may be ſuſpected to have been too favourable to ſeveral common and vulgar opinions, which have been rejected by Criticks of a more exact judgment. However that be, we cannot call in queſtion his deſign to explode the authority of all thoſe ſuppoſititious writers mentioned in his title (3). He would not have been the firſt, who wrote in that manner; for I have read what follows in ſome ſheets of the Abbot de la Roque: Within a Century they have ventured to forge here (he ſpeaks of Spain) and publiſh ſpurious Chronicles, to impoſe upon the credulity of the learned or ignorant. This was ſo far from leſſening, that it raiſed the reputation of the Marquiſs of Agropoli, who intirely exploded Dexter, which is one of the moſt ancient of thoſe falſe Chronicles, in his Diſſertationes Eccleſiaſticas, por el honor de los antiquos tutelares, contra las fictiones modernas, printed at Saragoſſa in 1671 (4).

(2) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 2. p. 154.

(3) See the remark [D] at the end.

(4) Journal des Savans of the 13th of January 1687. p. 11. See remark [D] at the end.

chaſing of books; that he had above thirty thouſand volumes in his Library, ſo that it was inferior to none but that of the Vatican; that with the aſſiſtance of this, joined to a continual labour and indefatigable application, he finiſhed his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica in four volumes in folio .... (e). That after he had publiſhed the two firſt volumes he was recalled to Madrid by King Charles II, to take upon him the office of Counſellor to the Cruſade, which he executed with the greateſt integrity till his death, which happened in 1684 .... That he left nothing at his death but his vaſt Library, which he had brought from Rome to Madrid; on the contrary his executorſhip was charged with ſo many debts, that his two brothers, who are Canons of Salamanca, and his nephews, were not able to publiſh his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, and ſent it to the Cardinal d'Aguirre, who was ſo generous as to pay the charge of the impreſſion [C], and committed the care of it to Monſieur Marti his Library-keeper, who added notes to it under the name of his Eminence. I have juſt ſeen a little piece, which tells us that the Jeſuits complain of this work of Don Nicholas Antonio [D].

(e) Ibid. p. 421, 422.

[C] The Cardinal of Aguirra .... was ſo generous as to pay the charges of the impreſſion of the two volumes of his Bibliotheca of Spaniſh Writers.] He was an old friend of the Author's, and Fellow-ſtudent with him in the Univerſity of Salamanca. The Commonwealth of Learning is extremely obliged to him for the charge he was at in printing ſuch a book, which contains two volumes in folio. They were printed at Rome, and publiſhed in 1696. You will find accurate extracts from it in the Journal des Savans (5), and that of Leipſic (6). The title of it is as follows: Bibliotheca Hiſpana vetus, ſive Hiſpanorum, qui uſquam unquamve ſcripto aliquid conſignaverunt, Notitia, complectens ſcriptores omnes, qui ab Octaviani Auguſti imperio uſque ad annum MD floruerunt: Auctore Nicolao Antonio Hiſpalenſi, Juriſconſulto, Ordinis S. Jacobi Equite, Patriæ Eccleſiæ Canonico, Regiorum negotiorum in urbe & Romanâ curiâ Procuratore generali, demum Matritii Conſiliario Regio, opus poſthumum. Nunc primum prodit juſſu & expenſis Eminentiſſimi & Reverendiſſimi Domini D. Joſephi Saenz Cardinalis de Aguirre.

(5) For the months of June and July 1697.
(6) Acta Eruditor. Lipſienſ. for June and July 1697.

[D] The Jeſuits complain of the Bibliotheca Hiſpana of Don Nicholas Antonio.] A Pamphlet (7), intitled, Calumnia convicta, ſeu Epiſtola familiaris Cleandri ad clariſſimum & eruditiſſimum virum Evariſtum, per Memoriali nuper porrecto, Hiſpano idiomate ad Regem Catholicum à Patre Joanne de Palazol Societatis Jeſu, nomine & juſſu Thyrſi Gonzales ejuſdem So. Generalis præpoſiti, and dated from Dilingen the 25th of June 1698 informs me, that the Jeſuits have repreſented to the King of Spain, that one of the five propoſitions of Janſenius has been commended as a Catholick doctrine in the work of Don Nich. Antonio. They pretend to have no deſign to attack the Cardinal of Aguirre, who paid the charge of the impreſſion of that book; but it is eaſy to perceive, that they fall upon him indirectly. They ſuppoſe that a Janſeniſt has perverted the text of Antonio in that paſſage. The real ſtate of this affair is thus: This Author acknowledges for Catholick this propoſition of Prudentius, Biſhop of Troyes, that the Blood of Jeſus Chriſt was ſhed for all believers, but not for thoſe who never have believed, nor do believe, nor ever will believe: Quod ſanguis Chriſti effuſus ſit pro omnibus credentibus, ſed non pro iis, qui nunquam crediderunt, nec credunt, nec credituri ſint. The Author of the Pamphlet ſhews, that this propoſition might be conſidered as Catholick; and conſequently there was no reaſon to caſt any ſuſpicion upon the faith of Don Nicholas Antonio, or the Cardinal of Aguirre. Obſerve that his Eminence had declared very ſtrongly againſt the looſe Caſuiſts (8), and it is ſuppoſed this was the cauſe of the ill will, which the Jeſuits ſhewed him.

(7) Of 27 pages in 12mo.

It is probable theſe will not be the only complaints, which will be made to the tribunals againſt theſe two Volumes of the Bibliotheca Hiſpanica. I have not ſeen them yet, and I doubt whether there is any copy of them in the United-Provinces (9); but I know however, that the author has declared with his utmoſt force againſt the pretended Luitprand, and Higuera who publiſhed him; and that he has exploded Aubert de Seville, the Chronicles of Dexter, Maximus, Julian, &c. A Spaniſh Jeſuit (11) obſerves this in a work, which he publiſhed in favour of his brethren of Antwerp, the compilers of the Acta Sanctorum. It is there that I have ſeen ſome paſſages of Don Nicholas Antonio upon this ſubject. But as the Marquiſs Agropoli, a Grandee of Spain by a double title, could not attack theſe fabulous Hiſtorians without expoſing himſelf to the trouble of being brought before the Inquiſition as a traitor to his country (11), I cannot ſee how the Monks of that country could ſuffer the memory of our author to be at reſt.

(8) See upon this point ſeveral extracts from his books in the Memorial of a Janſeniſt, which I ſhall quote in the article of BELLARMIN, remark [H].
(9) I write this the 8th of February 1699.
(10) Antonius Xaramilius in Apologiâ pro Veritate, p. 160, 161. This work being tranſlated from the Spaniſh into Latin by the Jeſuit Peter Cant, was printed at Antwerp in 1698.
(11) See the article VESPASIAN, remark [D].

ANVARI or ANVERI, one of the greateſt Poets among the Perſians, was born at a village belonging to the city of Abiûrd in Khoraſân. This village was called Bedeneh, and ſituated in a country called Deſhr Khaverân, which is ſaid to have given birth to four great men, among whom Anvâri was the moſt eminent. He had the title of Sôltan al Khoraſân, or King of Khoraſân, given him on account of the excellence of his Poetry. He performed his ſtudies in the city of Thoûs in the college called Manſuriâh, where he lived as a poor ſcholar. It is ſaid, that his original name was Naveri, which ſignifies one that has no property of his own, or one that brings nothing; and that his maſter prevailed upon him to change it into that of Anveri, which is the anagram of it, and ſignifies illuſtrious and ſhining. It happened very fortunately for him, that Sôltan Sangiâr, Monarch of the Selgiucides, in his journey to Radekân, ordered his equipage to paſs by the College, where Anvâri ſtudied; who ſitting at the gate, and ſeeing a man elegantly dreſs'd and well mounted riding by, enquired who he was; and being informed that he was one of the Poets belonging to the Sôltan, he reflected with himſelf, that the art of Poetry muſt certainly be highly eſteemed at the Court of that Prince, ſince one of his Poets travelled with ſo noble an equipage. He concluded therefore, that it would be of great advantage to him to apply himſelf to that art; and this thought made ſo deep an impreſſion upon his mind, that he wrote the ſame night a Poem in honour of Sangiâr, which he preſented to him the day following. The Sôltan, who was an excellent judge of Poetry, was ſo highly pleaſed with it, and found ſo noble a genius in the Author, that he asked him, whether he choſe to attend his Court, or only receive a reward for his performance. Anvâri immediately returned him a compliment in verſe, in which he told him, that he had no greater ambition than to engage in the ſervice of ſo great a Prince. The Sôltan upon this removed him from the College to his Court, and honoured him with with a conſiderable ſhare in his favour. Anvâri was very well ſkilled in Aſtronomy, and wrote ſeveral treatiſes upon that ſcience. But it was this ſtudy, that occaſioned him to loſe almoſt all the advantages, which he had gained by Poetry, having failed in a prediction, which he had publiſhed upon a grand conjunction of the Planets [A]. This expoſed him to the reproaches of the Sôltan, and to the ridicule of thoſe, who envied him; upon which he quitted the city of Merû, the royal ſeat of the Selgiucides, and retired to that of Balkhe, another royal city of the Province of Khoraſân. But he met with no better fortune at Merû; for though he had not offended the inhabitants in any manner, yet they reproached him perpetually on account of the falſity of his prediction, and upbraided him with ignorance. They would likewiſe have expelled him that city, if Hamide'ddin, who was the principal Judge there, had not taken him under his protection. It was then that he wrote a Poem, in which he inſerted a publick and ſolemn proteſtation, that he would never more trouble himſelf with Aſtrology or Predictions. He died at laſt in peace in that city in the year of the Hegira 597, and of the Chriſtian Æra 1201. He is conſidered as the firſt writer who corrected the Perſian Poetry, by retrenching in his works whatever ſeemed too looſe and free. Raſhidi has highly commended him upon that account, though in other reſpects he ſhewed himſelf a great enemy to him; for theſe two Poets were engaged for ſome time in different parties; and Anvâri was in the camp of Sôltan Sangiâr, when he beſieged Atſiz, who was then Governor and afterwards Sôltan of the Khuarezmians, with whom Raſhidi had ſhut himſelf up in the ſtrong caſtle of Hezâr-Eſb. Theſe two rival Poets carried on the war with each other in their own particular way, by conveying to each other verſes tied to the ends of their arrows, while the two Sôltans were employed in aſſaulting and defending the caſtle. Toguſhe or Tagaſhe, Sôltan of the Khuarezmians, a Prince of diſtinguiſhed genius and learning, gave the preference to Anvâri and Zehîr over all the other Perſian Poets (a).

(a) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. in the article ANVARI.

[A] Having failed in a prediction, which he had publiſhed upon a grand conjunction of the Planets.] It happened in the year 581 of the Hegira, and 1185 of the Chriſtian Æra, which was the tenth of the reign of Togrûl Ebn Arſlân, Soltan of the family of the Selgiucides, that the ſeven Planets were found together in the third degree of the conſtellation Libra, which the Aſtronomers call the Grand Conjunction. Our aſtronomical Tables, which we ſtile the Alphonſine Tables, place this conjunction in the year 582 of the Hegira, which anſwers to the Jewiſh year 4946, and to that of Chriſt 1186. The Aſtronomers of that time, among whom was our Anvâri, foretold, that there would be that year a prodigious ſtorm of wind, which would tear up the trees by their roots, overthrow the ſtrongeſt buildings, and even ſhake the mountains themſelves. This prediction, which was to have happened upon the day of this grand Conjunction in the month of September, occaſioned many perſons to prepare themſelves ſubterraneous vaults in order to retire to, that they might eſcape the fury of the tempeſt. But this apprehenſion of theirs was as vain as the prediction of the Aſtrologers; for even the lamps, which were lighted upon the tops of the Moſques, were not extinguiſhed; and a great quantity of corn continued in the ſheaf in the Granaries till the year following, becauſe it could not be threſhed for want of wind. The enemies of our Poet did not fail to take this opportunity of expoſing him to ridicule, and weakening his intereſt at court. The Sôltan likewiſe reproved him in very ſevere terms for having fallen into ſo groſs an error. Anvâri could not give him any other anſwer, but that theſe grand Conjunctions of the Planets never happened without producing ſome extraordinary event; and that the peculiar effect, which this laſt had occaſioned, was that there had been a perfect calm without any motion of wind all that year. Ferid Khâteb, who was one of thoſe that bore the greateſt enmity to our Poet, wrote verſes in Perſian upon this occaſion; the ſenſe of which was, that Anvâri had threatned the world with ſuch a dreadful ſtorm of wind, as would make a horrid devaſtation in it; and yet there was not a breath of wind followed his prediction. This is a ſufficient proof to us, ſays he afterwards, addreſſing himſelf to God, that it is you that command the winds, and not Anvâri. But if the Aſtrologers were found to have been miſtaken with regard to the winds, it is certain, as Mr. D'Herbelot obſerves (1), that there happened the ſame year one of the greateſt ſtorms that ever fell upon the Eaſt; which was the irruption of Jenghiskhan into thoſe Provinces of Aſia, which lie on this ſide the river Oxus; for he made ſuch a terrible devaſtation in them, as will for ever be remember'd there in that part of the world.

T.

(1) Biblioth. Oriental. in the article ANVARI.

APAFI (MICHAEL) Prince of Tranſilvania, was promoted to this principality in the year 1661, without his knowing beforehand any thing of the affair. Ali Baſſa, who had forced Kimin Janos to abandon Tranſilvania, was apprehenſive that he could not prevent him from returning, and making his party ſuperior by the acceſſion of the Imperial troops. He reſolved therefore to ſet up againſt him a Prince elected by the States of the Country, under the protection of the Port. For that purpoſe he demanded of the Deputies of the Cities of Tranſilvania, whether there was not in the Countries, which had ſubmitted to his arms, ſome great Tranſilvanian Lord, who was worthy of the principality (a). They told him of Michael Apafi, who kept himſelf retired in his caſtle of Ebeſtfalve, and was ſtill ſenſible of the long diſtreſſes, which he had ſuffered amongſt the Tartars, which at laſt he was delivered from by means of a very conſiderable ranſom. Ali ſent for him without mentioning his deſign to him. Apafi imagined he was to be put to death. [A], and yet durſt not refuſe to follow the guard, which was ſent to (a) Joannes Betlenius, Rerum Tranſylvaniæ, lib. 3. p. 246.

(1) See his titles before his Hiſtory of Tranſilvania, printed at Amſterdam in 1664 in 12°, are as follows: Joannes Betlenius, Comes Comitatus Albenſis, Regni Tranſylvaniæ Conſiliarius, ac ſedis Siculicalis Udvarhely Capitaneus ſupremus, &c.

[A] Apafi being ſent for by Ali Baſſa, imagined he was to be put to death.] I give more credit to this, than to thoſe, who ſay he was an ambitious man. I have quoted an author, who was well informed of this; he lived at that time, and had ſeveral poſts in Tranſilvania, which gave him all the opportunities of knowing the bottom of affairs (1). Now he tells us in a manner, which ſeems very frank and ingenuous, that Apafi was made Prince of Tranſilvania, without having contributed the leaſt to it himſelf; and he aſſures us, that he was a man of no ambition. However it is a very excuſable miſtake to ſay, that Apafi . . . had certainly the qualifications, which rendered him worthy a principality; and that with theſe to him. His wife, then ready to lie in, was in a dreadful apprehenſion, ſuppoſing him abſolutely loſt. He underſtood, before he left his own Territories, that ſhe was ſafely brought to bed of a ſon; but he did not know whether he ought to rejoice or be ſorry at the news of it: however the Turks, who convoyed him, and without doubt were much better acquainted with the intention of Ali Baſſa than he, told him, that this was a preſage of a noble principality to him. Ali received him with great reſpect, and a few days after had him elected Prince of Tranſilvania. And that his election might appear lawful, he ſent for into his army all the Gentlemen of Tranſilvania, whom he could procure, and aſſured them, that he wiſhed, that in conjunction with the Deputies of the Cities they would chooſe one of them to be their Prince, and promiſed to confer in the Sultan's name the Enſigns of Principality upon him, whom they ſhould chooſe (b). In this manner Michael Apafi became Prince of Tranſilvania, without any ſollicitation or expectation of it [B]. He was a man of noble birth [C] indeed; but of an eaſy diſpoſition, and much depreſſed by his long impriſonment in Crim-Tartary. Kimin Janos, who expected prodigious things from his conjunction with the Imperial Troops commanded by Count Montecuculi, was extremely deceived; for as ſoon as the ſtate of the Ottoman Forces was known, Montecuculi thought it more proper to return to Hungary, than to hazard a battle. This retreat gave an opportunity to the Turks to commit a thouſand depredations; and they won a battle in Tranſilvania, in which Kimin Janos was killed in the month of January 1662 [D]. His ſon attempted to ſupport his pretenſions; but without ſucceſs. Apafi was obliged to join his Forces to thoſe of the Turks in order to recover thoſe places, which the Emperor had taken in Tranſilvania. The Imperial Garriſon of Clauſembourg defended itſelf a long time, ſo that the Turks and Michael Apafi raiſed the ſiege with great diſhonour (c). Negotiations were carried on to no purpoſe for the evacuation of theſe places; ſo that they were obliged to come to open

(b) Ibid. p. 248, 249.

(c) The Governor's name was David Rettani. He was a Venetian, an excellent Engineer. Vianoli, Hiſt. Venet. tom. 2. p. 669.

he had an AMBITION proportionable to his GREAT ſpirit (2); for commonly thoſe, who are raiſed to elective principalities in the midſt of all the tumults, which are excited by the ſeveral pretenders, have a very ambitious mind. A French Author, who has publiſhed an Hiſtory of the troubles of Hungary, does not repreſent Michael Apafi as a Prince, who ſought to aggrandize himſelf; for when he ſpeaks of the reſolution, which was taken by the Hungarian Proteſtants to enter into a league with thoſe of Tranſilvania, to defend liberty of conſcience ſword in hand, he adds this; The Princeſs, a woman of a turbulent ſpirit, and extremely devoted to the errors of Calvin, ſollicited this union very powerfully, while her husband who was of a more calm diſpoſition, was engaged in nothing but hunting and converſing with men of learning (3).

(2) Ricaut, Hiſt. de Mahomet IV, p. 292.

(3) Hiſtoire des Troubles de Hongrie, liv. 2. a l'an. 1668. pag. 75. edit. Amſterd. in 1686.

[B] He became Prince of Tranſilvania without any ſollicitation or expectation of it.] This is what I ſpoke of in the preceding remark. I have only now to mention ſome Authors, who ſeem not to have been well informed of the manner, in which he was elected. In the beginning of the year 1663, ſays one of them (4), Kimin Janos was defeated and loſt his life. . . . . The Turks meeting with nothing to oppoſe them, made themſelves maſters of all Tranſilvania, except thoſe places, of which the Imperialiſts had taken poſſeſſion. Michael Apafi, who had been elected in the room of Kimid Janos, deſired peace of the Turks; and for that purpoſe Hali Baſſa entered into a negotiation with the Baron de Grez. This account plainly intimates, I, that Apafi was at war with the Turks, while he was Prince of Tranſilvania; II, that he was not elected till after the death of Kimin Janos, and conſequently till the year 1663. All this is falſe. He was elected during the life of Kimin Janos in 1661, upon the recommendation of Ali Baſſa. Beſides Kimin Janos was killed in January 1662. The Author of the Life of Count Tekeli (5) tells us upon an hear-ſay, that Michael Apafi was raiſed by the Turks to the principality of Tranſilvania, on account of his promiſe to pay them a larger tribute. We may place this promiſe in the ſame claſs with the account of thoſe other competitors, which he had, and who addreſſed themſelves to the Grand Seignor, as Moreri tells us without any grounds.

(4) Ibid. liv. 1. p. 41.

(5) Page 18 of the edition printed in 1694.

[C] He was a man of noble birth.] Let us hear the Author, whom I have already quoted more than once. Hic (Michael Apafi) erat, ſays he (6), ex antiquiſſimâ Magnatum familiâ ortus, pius, ſed tam naturâ, quam propter diuturnas carceris Crimenſis moleſtias, plus juſto demiſſus ac lenis, ut adepto etiam principatu nimiæ à pleriſque lenitatis inſimularetur. Theſe words, ex antiquiſſimâ Magnatum familiâ, that is, "of an "ancient and noble family," fully confute Moreri, who tells us, that Michael Apafi was ſon to a Magiſtrate of the city of Harmanſtad, the Capital of Tranſilvania. It is without doubt upon the credit of this Dictionary, that the Author of the Mercure Hiſtorique aſſures us of the ſame fact (7).

(6) Bethlenius, Rer. Tranſylvaniæ, p. 247.

(7) Mercure Hiſt. of March 1690, p. 490.

[D] Kimin Janos was killed in January 1662.] I have already confuted the Author, who ſays it was in the beginning of the year 1663. Here is another reply to his aſſertion. Mr. Ricaut tells us, that Kimin Janos having been defeated near Clauſembourg, reſolved ſome time after to try his fortune a ſecond time; that he fought the Turks at ſome diſtance from Presbourg; that the ſucceſs was a long while doubtful; but that he was obliged to give way to numbers; and that Kimin Janos in his flight was thrown from his horſe by his own men, who trod him under foot. This Hiſtorian obſerves, that the Turks killed or took priſoners fifty thouſand Chriſtians at the battle of Clauſembourg; and that a little before they avoided the combat, becauſe the troops of the Emperor, and thoſe of Kimin Janos were ſuperior to theirs (8). I find nothing of this in the Tranſilvanian Author abovementioned. He tells us, on the contrary, that Montecuculi and Kimon Janos having advanced beyond Clauſembourg, were informed, that the army of Ali Baſſa was four times ſtronger than theirs; ſo that Montecuculi declared to Kimin Janos, that conſidering the bad condition which the Foot was in, for want of proviſion, he was reſolved not to riſque the troops of his Imperial Majeſty (9). Kimin Janos thrown into deſpair, and ſcarce refraining from tears upon this declaration (10), was obliged to return to Hungary with Montecuculi. He fought no other battles than that, in which he was ſlain; and this was not in Hungary, near Presbourg, but in Tranſilvania, near a village called Hetur, the 23d of January 1662 (11). The Hiſtorian obſerves, that hunger and ſickneſs had deſtroyed about five thouſand ſoldiers of Montecuculi's army (12). This circumſtance joined to what is mentioned above, weakens the credit of what Mr. Ricaut tells us, "that "the forces of the Emperor, and thoſe of Prince Kemini "united formed ſo fine and numerous an army, that it "is ſaid they marched with a deſign not only to defend "the frontiers of Chriſtendom, but even to contend with "the Turks for the Empire of the whole world (13)." How could this be, ſince the Ottoman army was four times ſtronger than they? But how is it poſſible to ſuppoſe ſuch a victory of the Turks near Clauſembourg, which coſt the Chriſtians fifty thouſand men, when we have not a word mentioned of it in the Tranſilvanian Hiſtorian? Have the Turks at Conſtantinople a ſett of Gazetteers, who, in imitation of the Chriſtians, write ſtories of imaginary victories?

(8) Ricaut, Hiſt. de Mahomet IV, p. 292, 293, under the year 1661.

(9) Bethlenius, p. 251.

(10) Idem, pag. 252.

(11) Idem, pag. 284, 285.

(12) Idem, pag. 254.

(13) Ricaut, Hiſtoire de Mahomet IV, pag. 291.

open war (d). This proved fortunate to the Turks in 1663; but the year following they loſt the famous battle of St. Gothard; upon which the Grand Viſir conſented to a truce for twenty years. Apafi treated in 1664 with the Imperial Garriſons of Clauſembourg and Zatmar, who delivered up thoſe two cities to him (e). He lived under the protection of the Ottoman Port entirely independent of the Court of Vienna, during the truce between the two Empires. He favoured at firſt the male-contents of Hungary, without breaking with the Emperor; but at laſt he undertook an open war in defence of them, and publiſhed his reaſons in a Latin Manifeſto, which he addreſſed to all Chriſtian Princes [E]. The Turks broke with the Emperor in 1683, and entered Hungary with ſo formidable an army, that they penetrated as far as Vienna with the utmoſt facility. Theſe ſucceſsful beginnings were followed by a dreadful reverſe of fortune. The Grand Viſir raiſed the ſiege of Vienna; and from that time there was nothing but loſſes upon loſſes, and misfortunes upon misfortunes on the Ottoman ſide. Tranſilvania fell a prey to the Imperial Troops, and ſtill continues ſo; and ſo far was Apafi from endeavouring to defend the liberty of Hungary, that on the contrary he was the cauſe of that Kingdom's loſing even the ſhadow of it, which it enjoyed till then [F]; for it has loſt its right of being elective now; it was conſidered as a conquered country, and upon that foot was erected into an hereditary Kingdom. Apafi died at Weiſſembourg about the end of April 1690 [G]. The Turks endeavoured to fix Count Tekeli in his place; but he had not the good fortune to ſucceed in the irruption, which was made into the country (f). The preſence of Prince Lewis of Baden diſſipated this, as the Sun diſſolves a cloud; and from that time to this, in which I am writing (g), he has never diſturbed the new titular Prince of Tranſilvania; who is the ſon of Michael Apafi.

d) Betlen. Hiſt. Rerum Tranſylvan.

(e) Bunonis notæ in Phil. Cluverii Introduct. Geograph. p. 281.

(f) During the campaign in 1690.

(g) In February 1699.

[E] He publiſhed his reaſons in a Latin Manifeſto, which he addreſſed to all Chriſtian Princes.] I have a copy of it printed in 1682 from that publiſhed in Tranſilvania. But as there is no date to the Manifeſto of Michael Apafi, and my edition does not mention when that of Tranſilvania was publiſhed, I cannot certainly affirm, that this Prince proclaimed the war in 1682; for I find in the Life of Count Tekeli (14), that in 1681, Abaffi came to join him with an army of Tranſilvanians, and that in conjunction with him he undertook the ſiege of Zathmar. The Author of the Hiſtory of the Troubles of Hungary mentions this ſiege under the ſame year (15), and tells us, that Michael Apafi made himſelf maſter of the city (16); but not being able to reduce the citadel, he retired, and loſt all his baggage in the retreat (17); that no perſon could penetrate into the true cauſe of this misfortune (18), which ſome aſcribed to the miſunderſtanding, which happened between Count Tekeli, and Tekeli who commanded the troops of Tranſilvania at this ſiege; that the latter was accuſed of having uſed bad gun-powder, which did no execution; that others were of opinion, Prince Apaffi refuſed to take the city, upon the advice, which he received, that the Grand Seignior pretended, that he ſhould put that place into his hands; that it is certain however, that the Baſſa, who commanded the Turks at this ſiege, ſent to Conſtantinople a large Memorial againſt this Prince, which obliged him to return to his own country, leſt ſome change ſhould happen during his abſence. Thus the Hiſtorian relates the ſpeculations of people upon this ſubject. The Mercure hiſtorique & politique has copied them very exactly (19).

(14) Pag. 104.

(15) In the Amſterdam edition 1686 at the top of the pages is marked the year 1680. This error might deceive thoſe who do not obſerve it near.

(16) Liv. 8. pag. 30.

(17) Pag. 39.

(18) Pag. 32.

(19) For May 1690, p. 492; but that author places the ſiege of Zathmar in 1680.

[F] He was the cauſe of the Kingdom of Hungary's loſing even the ſhadow of liberty, which it enjoyed till then.] It would be unjuſt upon this to accuſe him of imprudence; for there never were more reaſons to promiſe ſucceſs. The forces of the malecontents alone had till then kept the Imperial troops in awe. What might not then be reaſonably expected from the extraordinary preparations of the Grand Seignior, who had promiſed great things to Tekeli? By one of thoſe fatal conjunctures, which the Providence of God is pleaſed to produce from time to time, to confound the beſt-grounded hopes of mortals, it happened that Apafi not only was able to do nothing for Hungary, but likewiſe brought ſlavery upon his own country. Sic erat in Fatis: i. e. "Such was the determination "of Fate." It happened, that inſtead of weakening the Houſe of Auſtria, it was recovered from a very low condition, and gained the ſuperiority; it gained the whole Kingdom of Hungary; and the Dominions of the Turks proved an inexhauſtible ſource of good news to the league, which was formed againſt France, during the courſe of the war. But is Apafi upon this to be repreſented as an imprudent and raſh Prince (20)? By no means, at leaſt unleſs all thoſe are to be called ſo, who cannot foreſee events, which are contrary to all probability. Would not the beſt Politicians have maintained, that France would puſh at the wheel on one ſide, while the Turks would preſs them on the other? Who would have believed, that this Nation would have continued unactive for ſix years together, as it did, amongſt a thouſand opportunities the moſt favourable that ever any people had to aggrandize themſelves? Apafi, Tekeli, and their party, are very excuſable for not being able to foreſee, that they would chooſe rather to make war upon the Edict of Nantes, than the Houſe of Auſtria.

(20) See the remark [G] of the article KOTTERUS.

What I have ſaid of the good news, which are brought us from Turky (21), is well known to every body. Our Gazetteers and other News-writers ſcarce ever tell us of any thing from that country, but what is agreeable. The murmurs of the people, their miſery, their wiſhes for peace, the diſagreement in the Divan, a Prime-Viſir ſtrangled, formidable factions, plagues, and fires at Conſtantinople, inſurrections in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, and an hundred other things of this Kind, which are brought by the Couriers of Germany, ſometimes the one, ſometimes the other, are not theſe good news? How many real victories, how many cities taken, how many bodies of men defeated, how many ſucceſsful incurſions into the enemy's country, have we not had reaſon to publiſh in the ſummer, and what hopes of peace have not been given us during the winter? Even the raiſing of the ſiege of Belgrade in 1693 has been repreſented as a lucky event; ſince conſidering all the circumſtances together, the Imperial Troops executed their principal deſign, which was to prevent the Ottomans from making an irruption upon Tranſilvania. Some body ſaid after the reduction of Ireland, that it would have been right to have protracted the war for a long time, that we might have a ſure fund of good news both in the Eaſt and in the Weſt.

(21) I wrote this in 1694; I have made no alteration in the ſecond edition.

[G] Apafi died at Weiſſembourg about the end of April 1690.] The News-writers have contradicted each other upon the circumſtances of his death. Some have publiſhed, that he died ſuddenly in the Aſſembly of the States of Tranſilvania (22); others, that he died after a long ſickneſs (23). All of them agree, that he died at Weiſſembourg (24).

(22) Gazette de Paris, of the 20th of May 1690.

(23) Mercure Hiſtorique, for May 1690, pag. 490. Vie de Comte Tekeli, p. 263.

(24) The Vie du Comte Tekeli ſays it was at Alba Julia, which is the ſame city as Wiſſembourg.

APELLES, one of the moſt illuſtrious Painters of antiquity, was born in the Iſle of Cos [A], and

[A] He was born in the iſle of Cos.] I have found but two authors, who aſſert this; beſides we muſt ſuppoſe that one of them did not write what we have in moſt of the editions, but inſtead of theſe words, Apelles and flouriſhed in the time of Alexander the Great [B]. He was ſo highly eſteemed by that Prince, that he was the only perſon who obtained his permiſſion to draw his picture (a). He received likewiſe another mark of his particular regard for him, which was that Alexander having employed him to draw the picture of one of his miſtreſſes, and finding him in love with her, reſigned her to him [C]. It is very improbable, that Apelles ſhould make ſo free with the good-nature of that great Monarch, as he is ſaid to have done [D]; he was certainly too good a Courtier not to know that a ſpeech ſo diſreſpectful as that, which is aſcribed to him, muſt prove very diſpleaſing to the King. The anſwer which

(a) See the remarks of the article LYSIPPUS.

Apelles eo uſque Olympiade 112 provectus, ut plura ſolus prope quam cæteri omnes contulerit, he wrote as follows, Apelles Cous Olympiade 112 picturæ plura ſolus prope quam cæteri omnes contulit (1). Turnebus conjectured that we ought to read Apelles Cous and not Apelles eo uſque. His conjecture was confirmed by the Vatican manuſcript (2), and thoſe in the King's and Mr. Colbert's Library (3). The other authority is Ovid, who writes thus;

Ut Venus artificis labor eſt & gloria Coi,
Æquoreo madidas quæ præmit imbre comas (4).
That is,

" As Venus riſing from the Ocean's wave,
" Is the chief work of the great Coan artiſt.

(1) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 10.

(2) See Carlo Dati, Poſtille ſopra la Vita d' Apelle, p. 104.

(3) See Father Hardouin upon Pliny, tom. 5. p. 264.

(4) Ovid, de Ponto, lib. 4. eleg. 1. ver. 29.

I ſhall ſpeak in the remark (I) of another paſſage in this Poet, where ſome read Cois, and others Cous. The great number of authors, who give another country to Apelles, obliged Mazzoni to defend the cauſe of Ovid, but inſtead of Co, he aſſerted that the Poet wrote Chio (5). Three conſiderable authors repreſent Apelles as born at Epheſus (6). Suidas makes him a native of Colophon, and adds that he was adopted by the city of Epheſus.

(5) Difeſa di Dante, lib. 3. cap. 16, in Carlo Dati, Poſtille ſopra la Vita d' Apelle, p. 103.

(6) Strabo, lib. 14. Lucian. de Calumn. Ælian. Hiſtor. Animal. lib. 4. cap. 50. See likewiſe Tzetzes, Chil. 8. Hiſt. 197. ver. 193.

[B] He flouriſhed in the time of Alexander the Great.] It is undeniable, that he was at the height of his reputation, when that Prince began his conqueſt of Aſia, that is, in the 111th Olympiad. The adventure of Apelles at the court of Egypt ſhews that he ſurvived Alexander. It is an error therefore to ſay as Majoragius does, that he was a ſcholar of Zeuxis; the diſtance of above 120 years, between the 84 Olympiad, when Zeuxis flouriſhed (7), and the reign of Ptolomy the firſt, ſhews the impoſſibility of it. It is Carlo Dati, who corrects this miſtake of Majoragius: Non ſo, ſays he (8), con qual fondamento Marcantonio Majoraggio nel comento ſopra l'Orat. di Cior. a 11 diceſſe, che Apelle foſſe ſcolare di Zeuſi, quando tra l'uno e l'altre corſe l'eta d'un uomo. The ſtory of his adventure at the court of Egypt is as follows. Apelles had not the good fortune to be in favour with Ptolomy at the court of Alexander. A ſtorm forced him to take ſhelter at Alexandria during the reign of Ptolomy. A knaviſh fellow, in order to do him a diskindneſs, went to him, and invited him in the King's name to dinner. Apelles came, and ſeeing the King in a prodigious paſſion, to excuſe himſelf ſaid that he ſhould not have come but at his orders. He was commanded to ſhew the man, who had invited him; this was impoſſible; for the impoſtor was not then in the room. Apelles upon this drew a sketch of his picture upon the wall, with a coal; the firſt lines of which diſcovered him immediately to Ptolomy. Non fuerat ei gratia in comitatu Alexandri cum Ptolomæo, quo regnante Alexandriam vi tempeſtatis expulſus, ſubornato fraude æmulorum plano regio invitatus, ad Regis cænam venit, indignantique Ptolomæo, & vocatores ſuos oſtendenti ut diceret a quo eorum invitatus eſſet, arrepto carbone exſtincto è foculo imaginem in pariete delineavit, agnoſcente vultum plani rege ex inchoato protinus (9).

(7) See the remark [A] of the article ZEUXIS.

(8) Carlo Dati, Poſtille ſopra la Vita d' Apelle, p. 105.

(9) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10.

[C] Alexander .... finding him in love with one of his miſtreſſes, ... he reſigned her to him.] Pliny tells the ſtory in this manner. Alexander ei honorem clariſſimo præbuit exemplo, namque cum dilectam ſibi è pallacis ſuis præcipuè, nomine Campaſpen, nudam pingi ob admirationem formæ ab Apelle juſſiſſet, eumque tum pari captum amore ſenſiſſet, dono eam dedit. Magnus animo, major imperio ſui: nec minor hoc facto, quam victoriâ aliquâ; quippe ſe vicit, nec torum tantum ſuum, ſed etiam affectum donavit artifici; ne dilectæ quidem reſpectu motus, ut quæ modo Regis fuiſſet, nunc pictoris eſſet. Sunt qui Venerem Anadyomenen illo pictam exemplari putant (10). That is, " Alexander gave an eminent inſtance of his regard for " Apelles; for when he had employed him to draw " the picture of Campaſpe, one of his miſtreſſes, whom " he was moſt fond of, naked, on account of her " admirable beauty, and found him ſeized with an " equal affection for her, he gave her to him. In " this inſtance he ſhewed himſelf great in mind, " greater in the command of himſelf, and no leſs " glorious in ſuch an action, than in any conqueſt; for he " conquer'd himſelf, and not only reſigned his miſtreſs, " but even his love to a Painter; and was not in the " leaſt moved with any reſpect for her, who was before " miſtreſs to a King, and now muſt be ſo to a Painter. " Some writers are of opinion, that the Venus Anady- " omene was painted from her." Ælian mentions this ſtory; but he gives the name of Pancaſte to the Lady (11). The article of that Prince will contain a remark upon this ſubject (12): I ſhall ſhew, that a man, who ſuffers the moſt beautiful of his miſtreſſes to be drawn naked, does not deſerve the character of being continent and chaſte; which has been given him.

(10) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 10.

(11) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 34.

(12) See the remarks [H] and [I] of the article MACEDON.

[D] It is very improbable, that he ſhould make ſo free with the good nature of Alexander, as he is ſaid to have done.] Let Pliny ſay what he pleaſes, that Apelles had made himſelf agreeable to that Prince by his polite behaviour and complaiſance; he will ſcarce perſuade any one, who knows Alexander's character, that a Painter could ſay to him with impunity, Hold your tongue; for the boys, who mix the colours, laugh at you. Fuit & comitas illi, propter quam gratior Alexandro magno erat frequenter in officinam ventitanti... Sed & in officinâ imperitè multa differenti ſilentium comiter ſuadebat, rideri eum dicens à pueris, qui colores tererent. Tantum erat auctoritati juris in regem alioqui iracundum (13). It is incredible, that Apelles ſhould imagine ſuch an expreſſion as that, however uſed, would be taken in good part; and it is equally improbable, that Alexander, who had ſo good an education, and ſo fine a genius, would talk ſo impertinently upon painting, as to expoſe himſelf to the laughter of the youngeſt apprentices of the profeſſion. This is the opinion of the learned Freinſhemius. Non crediderim in officinâ imperite multa differentem ab Apelle mordaci dicterio repreſſum fuiſſe. Nam id neque majeſtati tanti Regis, neque modeſtiæ pictoris, hominis non ſtupidi nec indocti conveniſſet, & Alexander liberalibus ſtudiis ab extremâ ætate imbutus, etiam de artibus, quas non calleret, haud ineptè judicare didicerat (14). As for Megabyzus, Prieſt of Diana (15), it would not be ſo ſurprizing that Apelles gave him ſuch advice. It was he, if we believe Plutarch, who was rallied in this manner by Apelles: Do not you perceive, ſays he, that the boys, who beat the Oker, and who, as long as you kept ſilence, had the utmoſt reverence for you on account of your gold and purple garments, had no ſooner heard you diſcourſe upon a paint, which you knew nothing of, but they began to laugh at you (16)? Another tells us, that it was Zeuxis, who ſaid this to Megabyzus (17). I can be perſuaded more eaſily of the liberty, which it is ſaid Apelles took with Alexander upon another occaſion. Alexander having viewed his own picture drawn by Apelles, did not commend it ſo much as it deſerv'd. A little after an horſe was brought, which neighed at ſight of the horſe, which was painted in the ſame picture, as if it had been a real horſe. Upon this ſays Apelles to Alexander, Sir, it is plain, this horſe underſtands painting better than your Majeſty (18). But to ſpeak freely my ſentiments, I think all this is too rude, and unmannerly, and brutal to be aſcribed to a Painter, who is repreſented in other places to be a man of an eaſy, complaiſant and polite behaviour. He muſt either have been a kind of Court-Buffoon, or a perſon of ſuch an odd capricious humour, as we often meet with in the moſt eminent artiſts; I ſay, we muſt have recourſe to one or other of theſe two ſuppoſitions, to give credit to what is related of Apelles, not only with regard to Alexander, but alſo to Megabyzus, who

(13) Plin. l. 35. cap. 10.

(14) Frienſhem. Supplem. in Curtium, lib. 2. c. 6.

(15) Several learned men are of opinion, that Megabyzus was a name that properly belonged to the Prieſt of Diana. Others underſtand here by Megabyzus, a Nobleman of Perſia.

(16) Plutarch. de Diſcrim. Adulat. & Amici, p. 58. & de Tranquill. Animi, p. 471, 472.

(17) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. c. 2. Freinſh. Suppl. in Curt. lib. 2. cap. 6. quotes him as aſcribing this to Apelles.

(18) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. c. 3.

which he made concerning Lais, is no compliment to his morals [E]. His picture of calumny has been ſpoken of; but ſcarce any perſon has perceived the miſtakes which are in the account of the fact, which gave occaſion to that picture [F]. The diſcourſe in which Lucian ſpeaks of it is an excellent piece (b). The maſter piece of Apelles was the picture was venerable on account of his gold and purple ornaments.

The diſcourſe of Apelles to Alexander on occaſion of the neighing of the horſe, is much more genteel and polite in the tranſlations of ſome learned men, than it is in the original; but this polite turn, which they have added to it, is no compliment to them, ſince it is founded upon a great miſtake and ignorance. The Greek is thus: Ἀλέξανδρος θεασάμενος τὴν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἰδίαν ἐκτυπωθεῖσαν ὑπὸ Ἀπελλοῦ γραφεῖσαν οὐκ ἐπῄνεσε κατὰ τὸν ἀξίαν ἐργάσατο· ἐπιχειρήσαντος δὲ ἵππου ἐπὶ τῇ πόᾳ πρὸς τὸν ἵππον τὸν ἐν τῇ πόᾳ ὡς πρὸς ἀληθινὸν ἐκτείναντος, ὦ Βασιλεῦ (φησὶν ὁ Ἀπελλῆς) ἀλλ' ὅγε ἵππος ἐστὶ σου γραφικώτερος εἶναι καὶ πολύ (19). Eraſmus relates the fact in this manner. Apud Epheſum, quum Alexander conſpectam effigiem ſui corporis ad vivum magna arte expreſſam admiraretur, atque interim forte equus inductus picto in eadem tabula equo adhinniret, deceptus imitatione, Apelles, equus, inquit, ô Rex, multo melius expreſſus eſt quam tu (20). That is, "While "Alexander was viewing with admiration at Epheſus "a picture of himſelf drawn with prodigious skill, "an horſe being brought in by accident neighed at "the horſe which was painted in the ſame picture, "being deceived by the exact imitation of nature; "upon which Apelles ſaid to Alexander, the horſe, "O King, is painted much better than your Majeſty." I ſhall omit the circumſtances, which Eraſmus relates, and which are not in Ælian; and confine my ſelf to the reflection, which he tells us the Painter made upon it; Sir, I have ſucceeded much better in painting your horſe than in painting your Majeſty. This is not the ſenſe of the Greek; a learned Critic has ſhewn, that γραφικὸς ſignifies a perſon, who underſtands painting; and has proved by this that Cælius, Rhodiginus, and Eraſmus have extremely miſrepreſented this ſtory (21). I am ſurprized that Pliny was ignorant of this, who has ſaid ſomething relating to the neighing of a horſe. See below the Remark [K].

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Eraſm. in Apophthegmat.

(21) Paulus Leopardus Emendationum, lib. 12. cap. 4.

[E] The anſwer, which he made concerning Lais, is no compliment to his morals.] She was but a young girl, when Apelles ſeeing her return from the well, and ſtruck with admiration of her beauty, courted her to go along with him in ſo engaging a manner, that ſhe ſubmitted to it immediately. He carried her to a feaſt, where he expected to find ſeveral of his friends; who rallied him for bringing a raw girl, inſtead of a courtezan to them. Do not you trouble your ſelves with this, replied he; do not be ſurprized at it; I ſhall inſtruct her in ſuch a manner, that before three years are paſt, ſhe ſhall know her buſineſs to perfection. Χλευασάντων δ' αὐτὸν τῶν ἑταίρων ὅτι ἀπ' ἰτυίας παρθένον εἰς τὸ συμπόσιον ἀγάγοι. μὴ θαυμάσητε, εἶπεν, ἐγὼ γὰρ αὐτὴν εἰς μιᾶλλόσαι ἀπόλαυσιν μετ' οὐ πολὺν χρόνον καλὴν δείξω (22). Would not one imagine, that he was ſpeaking here of a young horſe who was not broken yet; but under the care of a skilful querry, would ſoon learn all ſorts of airs and paces? It it dreadful to conſider the corruption of thoſe times. Apelles's friends even ſhew'd a more irregular and vicious diſpoſition than he (23). Lais became one of the moſt celebrated courtezans of that age. The Painters frequented her houſe, in order to take a copy of her fine breaſt (24). Apelles, as a Painter, without doubt made uſe of the ſame original. Nemini dubium eſſe poteſt, quin hanc ipſam quoque Laidem ſibi veluti in contubernium aſciverit Apelles, quo vivam emendatiſſimæ formæ imaginem ab animali exemplo in tabulas ſuas transfunderet (25).

(22) Athen. lib. 13. p. 588.

(23) Richelet in his Dictionary under the word Pucelage, tells us, that a Maidenhead is called the Rageo of Fools.

(24) Athen. lib. 13. p. 588.

(25) Junius, in Catalogo Artificum in Apelle, p. 19.

[F] No perſon has perceived the miſtakes, which are in the account of the fact, which gave occaſion to that picture.] Lucian tells the ſtory thus. Antiphilus, the Painter, being piqued at the favour which Apelles was in at the Court of King Ptolomy, accuſed him of being an accomplice in the conſpiracy of Theodotus, Governor of Phœnicia. He affirmed, that he had ſeen Apelles at dinner with Theodotus, and whiſpering to him all the time of the entertainment. After this he was informed, that by the advice of Apelles the city of Tyre had revolted, and that of Peluſium was taken. However it was certain, that Apelles had never been at Tyre, and knew nothing of Theodotus, but that he was Governor of Phœnicia. Ptolomy was ſo enraged at this, that without examining into the affair, he was juſt reſolved to put Apelles to death. He conſidered neither the circumſtances of the accuſer, nor thoſe of the perſon accuſed. The former, out of envy with regard to his profeſſion, might attempt the ruin of an innocent man; and the latter was too inconſiderable a man to be capable of forming ſuch a plot, tho' his gratitude for ſo many favours, which he had received from Ptolomy, had not reſtrained him from ſuch malicious deſigns. The King regarded none of theſe conſiderations; he never enquired whether Apelles had ever made a voyage to Tyre; he did nothing but rave and ſwear; and if one of the conſpirators had not ſhewed him, that it was a mere calumny of Antiphilus, he muſt infallibly have been put to death upon the accuſation. But as ſoon as Ptolomy knew the crime of his accuſer, he condemned him to be a ſlave to Apelles, and gave the latter an hundred talents. This is the affair, which gave occaſion to Apelles's excellent picture of calumny, which Lucian has given us a deſcription of. It is a misfortune, that this Author in his Deſcription did not obſerve the monſtrous anachroniſm, which he has fallen into; for the conſpiracy of Theodotus was in the reign of Ptolomy Philopator, which did not begin till an hundred years after the death of Alexander the Great (26). Judge now whether Apelles could be living then. We muſt ſuppoſe one or other of theſe two things, either that Lucian ſpeaks of an Apelles, different from him who was in ſuch great reputation at Alexandria; or that he has confounded ſome plot, which was contrived under Ptolomy Philadelphus, with the conſpiracy of Theodotus. As we have no Author, who can give us any light with regard to any plot, in which our Painter might be falſely accuſed of being engaged, it would be to no purpoſe to examine into the foundation of Lucian's error. Let us ſee then whether he had in his view another Apelles, than him, we are ſpeaking of in this article. I cannot imagine to myſelf ſuch a perſon; for every writer of judgment takes particular care, when he mentions a Painter, who has nothing in common with the great and incomparable Apelles but his name, not to call him ſimply Apelles without ſome other character to diſtinguiſh him. He tells us, that he does not ſpeak of the great Apelles. Now Lucian tells us nothing of this; and whatever he ſays relates directly to the great Apelles: it is of him therefore, that he pretends to ſpeak. I know indeed that a learned man fixes upon the epithet of Epheſian, Ἀπελλῆς ὁ Ἐφέσιος, ad diſtinctionem illius Apellis, qui ſub Alexandro & Ptolomæo Lagi vixit maximi nominis & artis, Coi patria. Hic autem patriâ Colophonius, verum θέσει, id eſt adoptione fuit Epheſius, teſte Suidâ, Pamphili Amphipolitæ diſcipulus (27); i. e. "A- "pelles the Epheſian, to diſtinguiſh him from that Apel- "les, who lived under Alexander the Great and Pto- "lomy Lagus, and was famous for his prodigious "excellence in painting. But this Apelles was of "Colophon, tho' by adoption an Epheſian, as Suidas "tells us, and was ſcholar to Pamphilus of Amphi- "polis." But I know likewiſe, that others have given this epithet to the great Apelles (28). And I can confirm this by a reaſon, which is contained in the paſſage, which I have quoted; for if Lucian could give this epithet to his Apelles, becauſe he was ſpeaking of a Painter born at Colophon, and adopted by the Epheſians, I may argue from thence, that he has applied it to the great Apelles, who was born in the iſle of Cos, but was without doubt a Citizen of Epheſus. Would a man of his eminence have ſettled in that city, (for it was there, that Alexander ſaw and viſited him,) unleſs he had received all the rights of a Citizen? Here is another proof: Mr. Tollius owns, that Lucian ſpeaks of the ſame Apelles, that Suidas mentions. Now Suidas ſpeaks of the great Apelles only. I ſhall prove this, 1, becauſe he ſpeaks but of one Apelles: it is probable, that he would

(26) See Polybius, lib. 4 and 5. He gives a long account of it.

(27) Jacobus Tollius Notis in Lucian. de Calumniâ, cap. 2. n. 1.

(28) Strabo, Ælian, Tzetzes.

picture of Venus rising out of the sea [G]. Some writers tell us, that the mistress which Alexander gave him, served him for the original when he drew that piece; others say that Phryne the Courtezan was employed for that purpose. It is said, that he began another picture of Venus, which would have excelled the former, if he had not been prevented by death from finishing it [H]. Moreri has taken one of these pieces for the other [I], and have passed by the great and celebrated Painter of that name, and mentioned only another who was obscure and unknown? II, Because he tells us, that his Apelles was a scholar to Pamphilus of Amphipolis, which Pliny expressly mentions of the great Apelles (29). Thus Lucian's error is very evident; and I am surprized, that neither John Baptista Adriani (30), nor Carlo Dati (31), nor Francis Junius (32), nor a great many other famous Authors, who have spoken of this treatise of Lucian, have perceived it, but taken the whole story as a real adventure of the great Apelles. Mr. Tollius knew very well, that the crime, of which Apelles was accused, had relation to the reign of Ptolomy Philopator; but he did not imagine that Lucian was deceived; he chose rather to suppose, that Lucian had in view another Apelles, who was contemporary with Antiphilus, and a scholar to Pamphilus. I cannot tell when Antiphilus or Ctesidemus, whose scholar he was (33), lived; but it is plain from Pliny, that Pamphilus flourished in the time of Philip, father to Alexander the Great (34).

(9) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10. & init. cap. 11. Carlo Dati, Postille sopra la Vita d'Apelle, and Father Hardouin upon Pliny, tom. 5. p. 205, tells us, that Plutarch in his Life of Aratus says, that Apelles was scholar to Pamphilus; but it is a very obscure testimony. Plutarch, p. 1032, seems rather to say, that Apelles was a scholar to Melanthus.

(30) In a letter, which is at the beginning of the 3d volume of Vasari.

(31) In his Postille sopra la Vita d'Apelle.

(32) In Catalogo Artificum, in Apelle.

(33) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. 222.

(34) Idem, ibid. p. 206.

[G] His master-piece was the picture of Venus rising out of the sea.] Augustus dedicated it in the temple of Julius Cæsar. The lower parts were injured, and no person could be found capable of restoring them. Length of time destroyed the rest; and then Nero had another Venus drawn by Dorotheus, which he placed in the room of that of Apelles. Venerem exeuntem è mari Divus Augustus dicavit in delubro patris Cæsaris, quæ Anadyomene vocatur, versibus Græcis tali opere tum laudatur victo, sed illustrato: hujus inferiorem partem corruptam qui reficeret non potuit reperiri. Verum ipsa injuria cessit in gloriam artificis. Consenuit hæc tabula carie, aliamque pro eâ Nero principatu substituit suo. These are the words of Pliny, in the 10th chapter of his 35th book. I have quoted in remark [C] the passage, where he says, that Alexander's mistress was the original of this Venus. The article of PHRYNE will shew us a tradition different from this.

[H] He would have finished a finer picture of Venus, if he had not been prevented by death.] If Calcagnini had chosen rather to give us the testimonies of ancient Authors, than have spoken things of his own head, he would never have assured us, that Apelles left his Venus Anadyomene imperfect with design. The reason of that conduct, says he, was, that Apelles despaired of finishing it to the same perfection as he had begun. Sed ô me multo Apelle incautiorem! ille enim tanta felicitate Veneris emergentis partes superiores expressit, ut diffisus penicillo reliquas posse absolvere desperaverit, atque in admirationem posteritatis tabulam inchoatam reliquerit (35). Carlo Dati, who accuses this Author of advancing a great many things, without mentioning whence he took them, gives us two other instances of it. It is certain, that the words of Pliny prove Calcagnini guilty of an error; and are as follows: Apelles inchoaverat aliam Venerem Cois superaturus etiam suam illam priorem. Invidit Mors peracta parte, nec qui succederet operi ad præscripta lineamenta inventus est (36). That is, "Apelles had "begun another Venus for the Coans, which would "have excelled his former; but death cut him off, "when but part was finished, and no person could "be found to compleat the rest according to his "draught." Cicero in two places of his work, tells us only, that Apelles left his Venus imperfect (37).

(35) Calcagnini, lib. 13. p. 177, apud Carl. Dati, p. 145.

(36) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. 212.

(37) Cicero Epist. 9. ad Famil. lib. 1. & de Officiis, lib. 3. c. 2.

[I] Moreri has taken one of these pictures for the other.] He expresses himself in this manner. The finest of all Apelles's pieces were his two Venus's, one of which rising out of the Sea was called Anadyomene, and the other is that, which he drew for the inhabitants of the island of Cos, and which is mentioned by Ovid in these terms,

Si nunquam Venerem Cois pinxisset Apelles,
Mersa sub æquoreis illa lateret aquis.

That is,

"——— If great Apelles
"Ne'er for the Coan Isle had painted Venus,
"She still beneath the Sea had lain conceal'd."

He quotes Ovid in Sent. He should have quoted his third book De Arte Amandi. It is certain that Apelles never finished the last of these two pictures; Pliny expressly assures us of it (38). What probability is there then, that Ovid, who had two pictures of Venus to mention, the one compleat, the other but half finished, should leave the former to speak of the latter? To act in that manner shews an ignorance of the common methods of reasoning. Besides the second verse is a plain allusion to the Venus Anadyomene, that is, rising out of the waves of the Sea. So that he must necessarily mean the first picture. We know, that Venus had that attitude in the first piece, but we cannot tell whether she had it in the latter. I add, that if these two verses of Ovid were written by him as they are represented above, he must have reasoned very absurdly; so that we must correct them in this manner; and then they form a good proof of what is gone before.

(38) See the preceding remark.

Si Venerem Cois nusquam posuisset Apelles,
Mersa sub æquoreis illa jaceret aquis.

The best Criticks are for reading it Coüs and not Coïs. I think this is right, tho' it is plain, that Apelles drew his Venus Anadyomene for the inhabitants of the Isle of Cos; for it was of them that Augustus procured it, and remitted them in consideration of this picture the payment of an hundred talents of the tribute, which they owed to his treasury. They had this Venus in the temple of Æsculapius, with the Antigonus of the same Painter. Lacter promontorium est Coæ insulæ, in cujus suburbio est ædes Æsculapii nobilitata Antigono Apellis . . . . conspiciebatur ibidem quoque ejusdem artificis Venus Anadyomene (39). Ἡ νῦν ἀνάκει-ται τῷ Θεῷ Καίσαρι ἐν Ῥώμῃ, τοῦ Σεβαστοῦ ἀναθέντος τῷ πατρὶ τὴν ἀρχηγέτιν τοῦ γένους αὐτοῦ. φασὶ δ' τοῖς Κώοις ἀντὶ τῆς γραφῆς ἑκατὸν ταλάντων ἄφεσιν γενέσθαι τοῦ προσαχθέντος φόρου (40). That is, "This picture "is now dedicated to the divine Cæsar, Augustus "having consecrated to his father the Patroness of his "family. It is said, that the Coans had an hun-"dred talents of the tribute laid upon them, remit-"ted to them on account of this picture." Pliny might not know that the Venus Anadyomene was drawn for the Isle of Cos; and therefore we are not to wonder, that he speaks only of the second Venus of Apelles.

(39) Junius in Catalogo Artif. in Apelle, p. 22.

(40) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 452.

I have a doubt upon my mind, which I am going to propose; I cannot tell whether Pliny has not multiplied beings without necessity, when he mentions a Venus Anadyomene, and another Venus begun for the inhabitants of the Isle of Cos. The ground of my doubt is, that the former Venus was not perfect but with respect to the upper part of the picture. It is Pliny himself, who tells us this, and adds, that no Painter ever attempted to repair what had been injured (41). Now the other Venus was not finished but only with respect to the upper parts, and no Painter had the courage to undertake what was wanting. It is Pliny again, who tells us this (42). I believe he is the only Author, who made this remark with regard to the two Venus's of Apelles, which were defective in the same places. The other Writers observe this only of the Venus of Apelles in general; and when they mention this Venus, they place it in the Isle of Cos (43); and we have seen above that it was from this Isle that Augustus had the Venus Anadyomene (44). It is probable therefore, that Pliny was not exact in his account. I refer this to those Gentlemen, who will take the pains to examine this little doubt, which I have suggested.

AN enquiry, whether there are two Venus's of Apelles.

(41) Plinius, lib. 35. p. 212.

(42) Ibid.

(43) See Cicero de Offic. lib. 3. cap. 2. de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 27; in Verrem Orat. 4. cap. 60.

(44) Ex Strabonis lib. 14. pag. 452.

and misrepresented the story of painting of the horse [K]. There was no business so important, that could oblige Apelles to be one day without using his pencil, which gave occasion to the famous proverb [L]. The books, which this great Painter wrote upon painting, are all lost (c). We cannot tell where or when he died. One of his chief excellencies was to make his pictures so exactly resemble the persons painted, that the Physiognomists could form a judgment as readily from his portraits, as if they had seen the originals [M]. We may refer to this what he did at the court of Egypt (d).

(c) Voluminibus etiam editis, quæ doctrinam eam continent. Plin. l. 35. c. 10.

(d) See remark [B].

[K] Moreri has misrepresented the story of painting of the horse.] The ancient Authors have spoken with great esteem, says Moreri of an horse drawn so naturally by Apelles, that the mares neighed at the sight of it. I believe that no ancient Writer has said this; but let us see what Pliny tells us: Est & equus ejus, sive fuit, pictus in certamine; quod judicium ad mutas quadrupedes provocavit ab hominibus. Namque ambitu æmulos prævalere sentiens singulorum picturas inductis equis ostendit: Apellis tantum equo adhinnivere, idque & postea semper illius experimentum artis ostentatur (45). This passage acquaints us, that Apelles, in a contest with several other Painters, who could paint an horse best, mistrusting the integrity of the judges, chose to commit this cause to the decision of the brutes; he ordered horses to be brought in, which neighed at the sight of Apelles's picture only. Some Authors (46) are of opinion, that Ælian's story (47) is nothing but an alteration of this; that is, they imagine, that what passed between Apelles and the judges of the prize, when that Painter preferred the judgment of a horse to theirs, gave occasion to the report, that he said to Alexander, Your horse understands painting better than you. Others think that these are two entire different stories (48). With regard to my own opinion, I have already given it, that this story of Ælian is to be considered as a mere fable. The silence of Pliny upon so fine an opportunity of introducing it, confirms me in this sentiment. Would Pliny have omitted the mention of the horse's neighing in Apelles's shop before Alexander the Great, and the consequence which Apelles drew from it; when he has given us another story, which tells us, that Apelles appealed from the judges to the decision of the horses? Carlo Dati has observed, that in either of these cases Apelles did not speak as a skilful Painter, since he supposed that the better judge a man was of painting, the more readily he would take the picture for the object itself. But we must take notice, that this censure cannot fall upon the story, which Pliny relates; for Apelles preferred the judgment of the horses to that of men upon no other account, but because he saw his rivals had bribed the judges (49). The remark of Carlo Dati is very just at the bottom; it is more easy to deceive those, who do not understand painting, than those, who do. He quotes John Paul Lemazzo (50): we may quote hereafter Mr. Perrault, who has fully confuted the consequences which are drawn in favour of the ancient Painters, from their having deceived both men and beasts (51).

(45) Plinius, lib. 35. p. 213.

(46) Schefferus in Æliani Var. Hist. lib. 2. c. 3.

(47) See remark [D].

(48) Carlo Dati, Postille sopra la Vita d'Apelle, p. 128.

(49) Ibid. pag. 129.

(50) Lib. 3. cap. 1. della Pittura.

(51) Parallèle des anciens & des modernes, Dialog. 2. p. 136.

[L] He never passed one day without using his pencil, which gave occasion to the famous proverb.] It is Pliny, who tells us this: Apelli fuit alioqui perpetua consuetudo nunquam tam occupatam diem agendi, ut non lineam ducendo exerceret artem, quod ab eo in proverbium venit (52). Carlo Dati remarks upon this, that Salmasius in confirmation of this proverb quotes these words as a verse of Horace, Nulla dies abeat, quin linea ducta supersit, which belongs not to Horace, nor any other ancient Poet. He adds, that this Author appears very often to have trusted too much to his memory: Non lascerò d'avvertire in questo luogo, che Claudio Salmasio, grandissima critico dell' eta nostra, nelle Dissertaz. Pliniane sopra Solino a 5, in confermazione di questo proverbio, fidandosi troppo della memoria, come bene spesso egli fece, cita un verso d'Orazio. . . . il quale non è (ch'io sappia) ne d'Orazio, ne d'altro Poeta Latino antico, ma forse uno di quei versi proverbiali, che vanno per le bocche di gli uomini senza saperne l'autore (53).

(52) Plin. lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. 208.

(53) Carlo Dati, Postille sopra la Vita d'Apelle, p. 107. Father Hardouin makes the same remark. See tom. 5. of his Pliny, p. 208.

[M] The Physiognomists could form their judgments as readily upon his portraits, as from the originals themselves.] Apion the Grammarian tells a story upon this so improbable, that it would almost be treated as fabulous, tho' an Author of much better credit, than that great romancer was, had assured us of it. Let us content ourselves with knowing historically what Pliny says: Imaginem adeò similitudinis indiscretæ pinxit, ut (incredibile dictu) Apion Grammaticus scriptum reliquerit quendam ex facie hominum addivinantem (quos metoposcopos vocant,) ex iis dixisse aut futuræ mortis annos, aut præteritæ (54). Pliny could never possibly persuade himself, that at the sight of a picture, which extremely resembled the person painted, a man could tell immediately at what age he died, or would die. We must suppose, that this Diviner informed himself whether the person was living or not.

(54) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 10. pag. 210.

APELLES, an excellent Tragedian under Caligula, raised himself by a very infamous manner of life; but when the flower of his youth was gone, he turned Comedian (a), and maintained himself so highly in the good graces of Caligula, that this Emperor, who would always have him in his company even in publick (b), made him one of his Counsellors (c). But one day, having asked him as they stood by the statue of Jupiter, Which of the two seems the greatest person to you, Jupiter, or I? he fell into such a prodigious passion with Apelles for not answering quick enough, that he ordered him to be whipp'd very cruelly: and said upon this occasion by way of raillery, that Apelles had an agreeable voice, even when he cried [A]. Some authors assure us that he put him into irons, and gave orders from time to time to turn him upon a wheel (d).

(a) Philo Legat. ad Caium, pag. 1021.

(b) Dio, lib. 69. p. 643.

(c) Phil. Legat. ad Caium, pag. 1021.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] Caligula . . . . said . . . . that he had an agreeable voice, even when he cried.] Suetonius's words upon this subject are as follows: Inter varios jocos cum assistens simulacro Jovis Apellem tragœdum consuluisset, uter illi major videretur, cunctantem flagellis discidit, collaudans subinde vocem deprecantis, quasi etiam in gemitu prædulcem (1).

(1) Sueton. in Caligul. cap. 33.

APELICON, who bought the Library of Aristotle. See the remarks upon the article TYRANNION.

APICIUS. There were at Rome three Apicius's famous for their gluttony. The first lived before the change of the Commonwealth, the second under Augustus and Tiberius, and the last under Trajan. It is the first Apicius that Athenæus means, where after he has told us upon the authority of Posidonius, that they had preserved at Rome the memory of one Apicius, who exceeded every body in gluttony, he adds, that it was the same Apicius, who was the cause of Rutilius's banishment (a). We know that Posidonius flourished in the time of Pompey, and that Rutilius was banished about the year of Rome 660. The second Apicius is the most celebrated of the three. Athenæus places places him under Tiberius, and tells us, that he ſpent immenſe ſums of money upon his belly, and invented divers ſorts of cakes, which bore his name (b). It is of him that Seneca ſpeaks in the 95th Letter, and in the 11th chapter of his book de Vitâ beatâ, and in his treatiſe of Conſolation, which he wrote to his mother Helvia under the Emperor Claudius. We find in this laſt work, that this Apicius lived in the time of Seneca, and kept as it were a ſchool of gluttony at Rome; that he ſpent two millions and an half in entertainments; that finding himſelf very much in debt, he at laſt thought proper to examine into the ſtate of his affairs, and ſeeing that he had but two hundred and fifty thouſand livres remaining, he poiſoned himſelf out of apprehenſion of being ſtarved with ſuch a ſum. Dion, who calls him M. Gabius Apicius, relates the ſame thing (c), and adds one particular, which we meet with likewiſe in the firſt chapter of the fourth book of Tacitus's Annals, that Sejanus, when he was very young, had proſtituted himſelf to him. Pliny calls him M. Apicius, and mentions very frequently the ragoo's which he invented (d): Nepotum omnium altiſſimus gurges: i. e. "He was the compleateſt glutton "that ever appeared in the world." There was a book written upon his gluttony, which is quoted by Athenæus (e). There is no doubt but the Apicius of Juvenal, Martial, Lampridius, &c. is the ſame with this [A]. The third APICIUS lived under Trajan. He had an admirable ſecret to preſerve oyſters; he ſhewed this by ſending ſome to Trajan as far as Parthia, which were extremely freſh when he received them (f). The name of Apicius continued a long time applied to ſeveral kinds of meats, and made a ſort of ſect amongſt the cooks. We have a treatiſe de Re Culinaria under the name of Cælius Apicius, which is judged by ſome Critics to be very antient, though they do not ſuppoſe it was written by either of theſe three Apicius's (g). Some are of opinion the author's name was Apicius Cælius. A learned Dane is of this ſentiment, and aſcribes this work to him, who ſent the oyſters to the Emperor Trajan. This book was found in the Iſle of Megulonne near Montpellier, by Albanus Torinus, who publiſhed it at Baſil twelve years after [B]. It had been diſcovered near an hundred years before under Pope Nicholas V, by Enoch d'Aſcoli (b). It had in the title M. Cæcilius Apicius. Voſſius is of opinion, that the Author called himſelf M. Cælius, or M. Cæcilius, and that he intitled his work Apicius, becauſe it treated of cookery (i). We find in Caſaubon's remarks

(a) Athen. l. 4. pag. 168.

(b) Idem, lib. 1. pag. 7.

(c) Dio, lib. 57.

(d) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 51; lib. 9. cap. 18; lib. 10. cap. 48; lib. 19. cap. 8.

(e) Apion was the author of it. Ath. l. 7. p. 294.

(f) Athen. lib. 1. p. 7.

(g) Borrichius, Cogit. de variis Linguæ Lat. ætatibus, p. 18.

(b) Platin. in Vit. Nicolai V.

(i) Voſſ. de Analog. lib. 1. cap. 14. p. 55.

[A] The Apicius of Juvenal, Martial, Lampridius, &c. is the ſame with this.] I refer to theſe words of Juvenal:

Multa videmus,
Quæ miſer, & frugi non fecit Apicius . . . (1).

"Many things we ſee
"Which ev'n Apicius, ſordid as he was,
"Would never do."

(1) Juvenal. Sat. 4. ver. 23.

And to theſe two verſes of Martial:

Ipſe quoque ad cænam gaudebat Apicius ire;
Cum cænaret, erat triſtior ille, domi (2).

"Apicius went with joy to ſup abroad:
"To ſup at home, would vex him to the ſoul."

(2) Mart. Epigram. 69. lib. 2. See likewiſe Epig. 73. lib. 10.

And to that paſſage of Lampridius, where we read, that the Emperor Heliogabalus eat very often the tongues of peacocks and nightingales, in imitation of Apicius. Comedit ſæpius ad imitationem Apicii calcanea camelorum, & criſtas vivis gallinaceis demptas, linguas pavonum, & luſciniarum (3). There is in Juvenal another paſſage, where Apicius ſignifies in general a man, who ſpends a great deal in eating;

Quid enim majore cachinno
Excipitur vulgi quam pauper Apicius (4)?

"What greater object of the publick laughter
"Than indigent Apicius?

(3) Lamprid. in Heliogab. cap. 19. p. 835. See likewiſe cap. 18. pag. 827, and cap. 24. p. 857.

(4) Juven. Sat. 11. ver. 2.

Some Commentators very abſurdly ſuppoſe, that the Poet intends here either the Apicius of the firſt book of Athenæus (5), or him in the fourth Satyr of Juvenal (6).

(5) Bernardus Autumnus upon this paſſage of Juvenal.

(6) Farnabius upon the ſame paſſage.

[B] His book was found by Albanus Torinus, who publiſhed it at Baſil twelve years after.] He publiſhed it in 4to in 1541. He added it to the treatiſe of Paulus Ægineta de Facultatibus Alimentorum, which he had tranſlated, and the ten books of Platina de tuendâ Valetudine, de Naturâ Rerum, & Popinæ Scientiâ. He ſays in his Preface, that going to the Iſland of Magulonne twelve years before with William Peliſſier (7), he ſaw a manuſcript, in which he diſcovered by tracing the characters the title of CÆLII APITII DE RE CULINARIA LIBRI X. He was prodigiouſly pleaſed with the diſcovery. He got the work exactly copied; and found it was the production of an ancient Author; but as the manuſcript was in great diſorder, he thought proper before he put it to the preſs to collate it with a copy at Venice, which he expected for a long time. This was ſent him at laſt, but he found it more corrupt than that of Maguelonne. He would have reſolved never to have printed it, if ſeveral Students had not induced him by their complaints and importunity to publiſh it. He publiſhed a ſecond edition of it the ſame year in 8vo at Lions, by Sebaſtian Gryphius. It was publiſhed at Zurich in 1542 in 4to, with the notes and corrections of Gabriel Humelbergius. I am of opinion, that Geſner and Simler deſerve no cenſure for ſaying, that this work was printed at Venice, before Albanus Torinus publiſhed it. It is pretended that they miſunderſtood the expreſſions of this Torinus: In Bibliotheca Simlero-Geſneriana dicuntur Apicii libri primum excuſi Venetiis, quod acceptum ex male intellectis Torini verbis in dedicatione (8). Torinus's expreſſions are as follow: Premendum plane cenſebam donec melioris alicujus exemplaris fieret copia, quod acceperam eſſe annis abhinc plus minus quinquaginta Venetiis impreſſum (9). Tho' this does not very clearly acquaint us, that he ſpeaks here of an impreſſion of this book, yet it is excuſable to underſtand him ſo, and in reality we find a certain Bibliographer, who aſſures us, that Apicius was printed at Venice in 1503 in 4to apud Joban. de Cereto de Tridino (10). The heirs of Andrew Wechel had ſome deſign to reprint this work. Pignorius offered them by Velſerus a good manuſcript (11). This was not executed. There was in the Library of the Dukes of Urbin an Apicius, the characters of which are like thoſe of the Pandects of Florence. It is now in the Vatican Library. Gudius compared it with the edition of Lyons (12). Beſides, Albanus Torinus has been ſeverely cenſured for pretending to have diſcovered the air and taſte of antiquity in this Author. Olfaciebam ſtatim autorem eſſe vetuſtiſſimum & obſcœnum, qui de re popinali linguâ coquinariâ egregiè præter cæteros ſcripſiſſet, & qui obſonia delicatius quam pro eâ ætate, quâ glandibus veſcerentur homines, confeciſſet (13). Latinus Latinius aſſures us, that a man muſt have a very indifferent taſte, who can form ſuch a judgment; and that this pretended Apicius is a mere ſtupid and barbarous Writer, whoſe methods of cookery are very often more proper to bring the ſkin off the mouth and to ſet one a vomiting. In Latini Latinii Bibliothecâ profanâ, ubi quædam illius viri docti in

(7) He was Biſhop of Maguelonne, that is, of Montpellier.

(8) Joh. Albertus Fabricius in Biblioth. Latinâ, pag. 130. edit. Hamburgenſ. an. 1697.

(9) Alban. Torinus, in Epiſt. Dedicat.

(10) Merckli-nus, in Lindenio renovato, p. 85.

(11) See the Letters of Reineſius to Daumius, pag. 109.

(12) Joh. Albert. Fabricius, Biblioth. Latin. p. 130.

(13) Alban. Torin. in Epiſt. Dedicat.

marks upon Athenæus ſomething relating to our Apicius (k). I have diſcovered ſeveral errors in different authors upon this article [C]. I ſhall collect them all into a ſingle remark below.

(k) Caſaub. in Athen. lib. 1. cap. 6; and lib. 4. cap. 19.

In Apicium obſervationes leguntur, ad verba editoris, ubi in præfat. ait ſe ſtatim olfeciſſe autorem eſſe vetuſtiſſimum, hæc nota occurrit: "Quam vereor ne tuæ "nares obeſiores fuerint: Quid enim vetuſtatis redo- "lere poſſunt verba ſemibarbara, & ab eo florenti "ſeculo prorſus aliena? Ego vero, ut quod ſentio "paucis expediam, commentum puto eſſe hominis "otioſiſſimi, qui cum illudere poſteris ejuſdem naris "facilè ſibi eſſe perſuaſiſſet, mentito nomine Apicium "credidit venditare poſſe. Sed paſſim occurrunt, "quibus pene manifeſto prodit ſeipſum autor inep- "tus, barbarus, & nullius in eâ arte ingenii, aut gu- "ſtûs, qui ea interdum conjungat ad ſaporis gratiam, "quæ uſu docente omnes interdum ſcimus ſummam "palato moleſtiam, nauſeamque ſtomacho creare ſo- "lere (14)." The judgment of Latinius is not amiſs; Iſaac Grangæus would have done much better to agree to it, than have pretended, that the ten books de Re coquinariâ, which paſs under the name of Apicius, were written by our ſecond Apicius (15). I confeſs the Scholiaſt upon Juvenal obſerves, that this Apicius wrote a treatiſe upon Cookery (16); and I own likewiſe, that Iſidorus Hiſpalenſis aſcribes ſuch a piece to the ſame Apicius: Coquinæ apparatum Apicius quidam primus compoſuit, qui in eo abſumptis bonis morte voluntariâ periit (17). But theſe are not two Writers, whoſe teſtimony can be a ballance to the ſilence of ſo many other Authors of greater credit, who had unavoidable occaſions to quote this book of Apicius. However, a juſt criticiſm will oblige us to judge, that if there ever was ſuch a book, it is not that publiſhed by Albanus Torinus.

(14) Joh. Albert. Fabric. Biblioth. Lat. Append. p. 179.

(15) Iſaac. Grangæus, in Juvenal. Sat. 3. ver. 23.

(16) Auctor præcipiendarum cænarum, qui ſcripſit de juſcellis; fuit enim exemplum gulæ. Vetus Scholiaſt. in Juvenal. Sat. 4. ver. 23.

(17) Iſidor. Hiſpalenſ. Origin. lib. 20. cap. 4. apud Joh. Albert. Fabricium, Bibliothecæ Latinæ, p. 132.

[C] I have diſcovered ſeveral errors in different Authors upon the article.] I ſhall begin with Moreri. He was miſtaken in ſaying, that the Apicius, whom Seneca ſpeaks of, wrote a book of the Delicacies of eating, and that he hanged himſelf out of deſpair, finding that he ſpent all his ſubſtance. Moreri quotes Seneca lib. de conſol. This is too general and uncertain, ſince we have three treatiſes of that Philoſopher intitled de Conſolatione. He ſhould have quoted that, which he addreſſed to his mother. We find there that Apicius poiſoned himſelf, upon finding on a calculation of his eſtate, that he had but two hundred and fifty thouſand livres remaining, when all his debts were paid (18). Ære alieno oppreſſus, rationes ſuas tunc primum coactus inſpexit. Superfuturum ſibi ſeſtertium centies computavit, & velut in ultimâ fame victurus ſi ſeſtertio centies vixiſſet, veneno vitam finivit. Quanta luxuria erat, cui ſeſtertium centies egeſtas fuit (19)! Martial has the following Epigram upon this ſubject:

Dederas, Apici, bis trecenties ventri,
Sed adhuc ſupererat centies tibi luxum.
Hoc tu gravatus, ni famem & ſitim ferres,
Summa venenum potione duxiſti.
Nil eſt, Apici tibi guloſius factum (20).

(18) I make uſe of the valuation of Lipſius in his Commentaries upon Tacitus, lib. 4. cap. 1.

(19) Seneca, Conſol. ad Helviam. cap. 10.

(20) Martial, Epigram 22. lib. 3.

It is a ſmall fault in Moreri not to have followed the Author, whom he quotes, with regard to the manner of Apicius's death; but he has taken away all that is ſurprizing in this ſtory, by ſuppreſſing the ſum, which this luxurious perſon had remaining, when he killed himſelf. The quotation from Athenæus li. ii. is to no purpoſe. In ſhort Moreri ought to have known, that there were three Apicius's, and have confined himſelf to one. Charles Stephens pretends, that the Apicius, whom Seneca ſpeaks of (21), hanged himſelf, and that he publiſhed a book de Gulæ Irritamentis, which is ſtill in the hands of every body. There is no good critic, who thinks, that the work, which we have de Re culinariâ, is that Apicius's whom Seneca mentions (22): However, this is the original, from which Moreri took ſeveral of his errors. It is from hence that he learned, that Apicius hanged himſelf, and that he wrote a book of the Delicacies of Eating. He ſhould likewiſe have learned from the ſame place, that Apicius had ſtill two hundred and fifty thouſand livres; for this is a fact, which Charles Stephens has not omitted. Lloyd has followed Charles Stephens in every point, except that he has not ſaid, that the book de Gulæ Irritamentis is now in the hands of every body. He has conſiderably enlarged the article by copying what Lipſius had remarked upon the three Apicius's; but he knew not, that the paſſage of Suidas, relating to the oyſters ſent to Trajan into Parthia, was to be found in Athenæus. The memory of the greateſt men fails them in a thouſand inſtances. Thus Lipſius, who quotes Athenæus twice with regard to Apicius, yet has omitted a third paſſage of that Author, which is in every reſpect as remarkable as the two others (23). If he had conſulted it, he would never have conjectured, that the word Trajan was corrupted in Suidas. Hofman has only copied Lloyd, except that he has quoted more paſſages. His quotations are not always very juſt; for inſtance, he quotes Seneca de Conſolatione ad Albin. & de Conſolatione ad Elbiam, as if they were two different pieces. Caſaubon (24) tells us, that Athenæus ſays, that ſeveral cakes bore the name of the firſt Apicius; but it is certain, that Athenæus ſays this of the ſecond Apicius, who lived under Tiberius the Emperor: Ἐγένετο κατὰ τοὺς Τιβερίου χρόνους ἀνήρ τις Ἀπίκιος, πλουσιώτατος, τρυφητὴς, ἀφ' οὗ πλακοῦντας νῦν πολλοὶ Ἀπίκια ὀνομάζουσι (25). Dalechamp has committed in his tranſlation of Athenæus an error, which is very obvious. It is in the fourth book, p. 168. Athenæus having told us, what Poſidonius ſaid concerning the firſt Apicius, a man infamous for his gluttony, adds, Περὶ δὲ Ἀπικίου τοῦ καὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ ἀσωτίᾳ διαβοήτου ἐν τοῖς πρώτοις εἰρήκαμεν; the meaning of which is, that at the beginning he had ſpoken of Apicius, who was alſo himſelf well known for his gluttony. So that the Latin verſion is falſe; Antea nos quoque iſtius Apicii ob immodicum luxum famoſi meminimus; that is, "We have likewiſe before men- "tioned that Apicius, who was infamous on account "of his extravagant luxury." This, I ſay, is doubly falſe; for it does not anſwer the force of the Greek, and imputes a falſity to Athenæus. It is not true, that Athenæus had already ſpoken of that Apicius, whom Poſidonius mentioned. Dalechamp obſerves, that Athenæus in his third book had ſpoken of the ſame Apicius, who was mentioned at the beginning of page 7 (26). I am of opinion, that this is falſe. I ſhall ſay nothing upon his quoting Cælius lib. v. cap. 30 (27). He means Cælius Rhodiginus, whoſe fifth book has but fourteen chapters. He ſhould have quoted the eleventh chapter of the ninth book (28). This Author ſays there are ſeveral things relating to Apicius; but if he falſifies in every other place what he quotes, as he has done in this place a paſſage of Athenæus, it is a misfortune for thoſe, who depend upon his authority. Athenæus, according to him, relates, that Apicius being very diligently enquiring for a certain kind of cray-fiſh at Alexandria, was told, that there were very large ones upon the coaſts of Libya; upon this he ſailed thither immediately; but finding that he had been impoſed upon, he curſed the Country, and left it with a reſolution never to return thither as long as he lived. This is far from the account, which Athenæus gives: he tells us, that Apicius having eat at Minturnæ in Campania a kind of water-locuſts, which exceeded the lobſters of Alexandria in bigneſs, and being told, that ſome of them were found in Africa, which were prodigiouſly large, he paſſed over thither immediately, in ſpite of a great many inconveniencies. The fiſhermen, being told of his arrival, went to him with the largeſt that they had taken. But as ſoon as he found by them, that they had none which exceeded them in ſize, he gave orders to carry him back to Minturnæ without ever going aſhore (29).

(21) Charles Stephens quotes him in Libro de Conſolatione ad Albinam. Caſaubon, in Athenæum, pag. 23. quotes him in the ſame manner.

(22) See remark [B] towards the end.

(23) It is that in the firſt book, p. 7.

(24) In Athen. pag. 23.

(25) Athen. pag. 7.

(26) Dalechamp, Not. in Athen. p. 706.

(27) Idem, ibid.

(28) I do not pretend to deny, that the firſt edition of Rhodiginus was differently divided into books and chapters, from that which is now common.

A modern Author, whom I have quoted, is miſtaken in ſaying that the manuſcript of Apicius was found in the Iſle of Maguelonne by Enoch d'Aſcoli, in the time of Pope Nicholas V. He founds this aſſertion upon the authority of Leander Albertus, and that of Philip of Bergomum. Ut tradit, ſays he (30), Leander Albertus Bononienſis in Deſcriptione Italiæ, p. 267, & Philippus Bergomas in Chronici continuatione, qui M. Cæcilium

(29) Athen. lib. 1. p. 7.

(30) Joh. Albert. Fabricius, Biblioth. Latinæ, p. 129.

APIEN (PETER), in French, in Latin APIANUS, a Mathematician of Germany in the ſixteenth Century. I ſhall add but one thing to what Moreri has ſaid, and this is, that he has been accuſed of being a plagiary of Regiomontanus [A].

Cæcilium appellat. But theſe two Writers never mention the Iſle of Maguelonne, and it is certain, that the manuſcript was not found there by Albanus Torinus till the year 1529. Philip of Bergamum, without mentioning any place, ſays only, that Enoch Aſculanus found, in the time of Pope Nicholas V, theſe two books, Porphyrio upon Horace, and M. Cæcilius Apicus. He mentions this under the year 1454. Herman Buſchius agrees with him in reſpect to the time. The words of Leander Albertus are as follow: Cujus (Enochi Asculani) induſtriâ M. Cælius Apitius & Pomponius Porphyrio in Horatium circa Nicolaum V Pontificum inventi ac è tenebris in lucem vindicati ſunt (31). That is, "By his (Enoch "d'Aſcoli's) induſtry M. Cælius Apitius and Pompo- "nius Porphyrio upon Horace were diſcovered and "brought to light in the time of Pope Nicholas V." Volaterranus aſſures us, that Suidas ſays, that Marcus Apicius wrote a book de Gula. Robert Stephens, a great copier of Volaterranus, aſſures us of the ſame thing in his Elucidarium Poeticum. They have been cenſured for this; Vellem locum indicaſſent, ſays our modern Author (32), hoc enim apud Suidam non reperio: That is, "I wiſh they had quoted the place; for I can "find nothing of this in Suidas."

(31) Leander Albertus in Deſcriptione Italiæ, p. 404.

(32) Joh. Albert. Fabricius, Bibliath. Latin. pag. 132.

[A] He has been accuſed of being a Plagiary of Regiomontanus.] Thoſe, who deſign to enlarge the Catalogues of Plagiaries already publiſhed, may, if they pleaſe, make uſe of this paſſage of G. B. Benedetti: Hæc omnia, ſays he (1), tradita fuerunt, & ſcriptis mandata ab antiquis & à recentioribus uſurpata, ut facilè deprehendi poteſt in Eraſmo Oſualdo, qui omnem ferè ſui primi mobilis rationem à Petro Apiano deſumpſit; Petrus verò Apianus hæc eadem cum multis aliis propoſitionibus à Monte Regio accipiens ſibi ipſi aſcripſit. That is, "All theſe things were delivered to writ- "ing by the Ancients, and uſed by the moderns; as "appears from Erasmus Osualdus, who took al- "moſt the whole demonſtration of his Primum Mo- "bile from Peter Apianus, and Peter Apianus bor- "rowed the ſame with a great many other propoſi- "tions from Regiomontanus, and claimed the ho- "nour of them to himſelf."

(1) Joh. Baptiſta Benedictus de Gnomorum Umbrarumque ſolarium uſu, cap. 2. fol. 2.

APION, a famous Grammarian, born at Oaſis in Egypt [A], was a Profeſſor at Rome in the reign of Tiberius (a). It is undeniable that he was a man of learning [B], and that he had made the moſt diligent enquiries into the moſt abſtruſe ſubjects of antiquity, and was maſter of thoſe points, which give to learning the character of accuracy and variety. But he had all the arrogance of a mere pedant [C], and amuſed himſelf too much with difficult and inſignificant enquiries [D]. The Emperor Tiberius knew very

(a) Suidas in Apion.

[A] Apion . . . . was born at Oaſis in Egypt.] I cannot imagine why Moreri's Dictionary has made two articles of this Grammarian, one under the name of Apian, and the other under that of Appion, without acquainting us, that they were but one and the ſame perſon. I believe that no good Scholars have ever called him Apian; but I am certain that thoſe, who value themſelves upon exactneſs, never call him Appion. Their reaſon is, becauſe his name was derived from Apis, the Deity of the Egyptians, and not from Appia, a Roman family (1). His country has been horribly diſfigured in Moreri: it was changed into Oſias. The Supplement has corrected it as it ought to be. Suidas obſerves, that Heliconius had ſaid, that Apion was of the Iſle of Crete; but there is no queſtion but he was born at Oaſis, ſince Joſephus aſſures us of it, and repreſents it as a crime in him, that he abjured his country, and called himſelf an Alexandrian (2). This accuſation of Joſephus would have ſignified nothing, tho' it had not been exaggerated and heightened with great pomp of words; for Apion, in ſtyling himſelf an Alexandrian, after he was made a Citizen of Alexandria, did nothing but what ſeveral famous Profeſſors practiſed before. The ſirname of Pliſtonices, which was given him (3), carried it in a very honourable meaning (4); but we know nothing of the reaſon why he was called ſo. Suidas makes him the ſon of a man, who was named Pliſtonices, Ἀπίων ὁ Πλειστονίκου. Upon that foot his ſirname would have been no manner of honour to him. Others ſay, that his father was named Poſidonius, Ἀπίων ὁ Ποσειδωνίου (5). It is poſſible, that the copiers might have changed Πλειστονίκου into Ποσειδωνίου.

(1) Voſſius de Hiſt. Græcis. pag. 531.

(2) Joſeph. contra Apion. lib. 2.

(3) Plinius, lib. 37. cap. 5. Aul. Gellius, lib. 5. cap. 14; and lib. 6. cap. 7.

(4) Ἀπίων ὁ γραμματικὸς, ὁ Πλειστονίκης ἐπικαλούμενος: that is, "Apion the "Grammarian, "who was ſir- "named Pliſto- "nices, which "ſignifies that he "was very often "conqueror.

(5) Jul. African. apud Euſeb. Præparat. Evangel. lib. 10. cap. 10. p. 490. Juſtin. Admonit. ad Græcos, p. 9.

[B] It is undeniable that he was a man of learning.] Tatian treats him as a man of great reputation, ἀνὴρ δοκιμώτατος (6). Aulus Gellius ſpeaks of him in this manner: Literis homo multis præditus; rerumque Græcarum plurima atque varia ſcientia fuit: ejus libri non incelebres feruntur, quibus omnium fermè quæ mirifica in Egypto viſuntur audiunturque hiſtoria comprehenditur (7). That is, "He was a man of great "learning, and extenſive and various knowledge in "the Greek affairs. His books are of conſiderable "reputation, in which we have an Hiſtory of all "the wonderful things, which are to be ſeen or "heard of in Egypt." This is what relates to his learning, and we may judge of his talkative and bold humour by the following words of the ſame Author, facili atque alacri facundiâ fuit (8). But let us not anticipate the following remark.

(6) Tatian. apud Euſeb. Præpar. lib. 10. cap. 11. p. 493, D.

(7) Aul. Gellius, lib. 5. cap. 14.

(8) Idem, lib. 6. cap. 7.

[C] He had all the arrogance of a mere Pedant.] Aulus Gellius ſays enough to give us an idea of him as a man of extreme vanity and oſtentation. In his quæ audiviſſe vel legiſſe ſeſe dicit, fortaſſe à vitio ſtudioque oſtentationis ſit loquacior. Eſt enim ſanè quam in prædicandis doctrinis ſuis venditator (9). Apion uſed to boaſt, with the greateſt aſſurance, that he gave immortality to thoſe, to whom he dedicated his works. There never was any prediction or promiſe more falſe than this. None of his books were able to reſiſt the injury of time; and if other Authors had not told us, that there was ſuch a writer, we ſhould have known nothing now of his name or his perſon. So that he has done no ſervice to thoſe, whom he placed at the head of his writings. I ſhall give the paſſage of Pliny at length. Apion quidam Grammaticus, hic, quem Tiberius Cæſar cymbalum mundi vocabat, quum publicæ famæ tympanum potius videri poſſet, immortalitate donari à ſe ſcripſit, ad quos aliqua componebat (10). Mr. de Tillemont confeſſes, that he does not underſtand what Pliny ſays of our Apion in this paſſage (11). I ſhould chooſe rather to confeſs as much, than to adopt the interpretation, which I have read in the Supplement to Moreri. He boaſted, ſays the Supplement, that he ſhould immortalize thoſe, to whom he dedicated any of his works. It is for this reaſon, that the Emperor Tiberius called him the Cymbal of the world; upon which occaſion Pliny ſays, that he ſhould rather be called the Drum of the world, becauſe he gave but a very diſagreeable ſound. But in the firſt place it is falſe that Pliny tells us, that becauſe Apion valued his Dedications at ſo high a rate, this Emperor called him cymbalum mundi. In the ſecond place, Pliny does not ſay, that he ought rather to be called the Drum of the World; he uſes the expreſſion Publicæ Famæ Tympanum, which has a particular force to repreſent him as a kind of publick Cryer, who, at the ſound of a drum or of his horn, proclaims to the whole City what is neceſſary to be known publickly. In the third place, Pliny does not ſay, that becauſe Apion gave but a very diſagreeable ſound, it was more proper to call him Tympanum than Cymbalum. Who told the Author of the Supplement to Moreri, that the cymbal was a more agreeable inſtrument than a drum?

(9) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 14.

(10) Plinius in Præfat. Nat. Hiſt.

(11) Tillemont, Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 1. p. 776. Errors in the Supplement to Moreri. See likewiſe the remark [E].

[D] He amuſed himſelf too much with difficult and inſignificant enquiries.] Julius Africanus calls him the moſt formal of all the Grammarians, or ſuch an one, as very well the defect of this man's genius; for though we do not perhaps understand all that this Emperor meant (b), yet we see plainly that he considered Apion as a romancer, who made too great a noise and ostentation of his learning. He was the head of an embassy, which the inhabitants of Alexandria sent to Caligula, to complain of the Jews who lived in their city, with whom they had great contests. He went to Rome with two other Deputies. The Jews sent likewise three persons (c) to Caligula to justify their conduct. Philo was the head of their Embassy. Apion, animated with all the hatred which the Egyptians had maintained for time immemorial against the Jewish nation, accused the Jews of several crimes, and insisted principally upon a point, which was most likely to provoke the resentment of Caligula; and this was, that the Jews would not dedicate images to him [E], nor swear by his name, while all the nations of the Empire dedicated temples and altars to him (d). One of the chief works of Apion was his Antiquities of Egypt. It is without doubt in this book, that he speaks of the Pyramids so amply, as to merit a place amongst the twelve authors, which Pliny tells us wrote upon that subject (e). He speaks in the same work very severely of the Jews, but he was not content with abusing them upon the occasion which was given him in his Antiquities of Egypt, for he wrote an express work against them (f). Josephus thought himself obliged to confute the malicious calumnies which this author had thrown upon them [F]. Apion was not living when this confutation was written; for we have an observation in it concerning the manner of his death. We are assured, that after he had so much ridiculed the Jewish ceremonies, without considering that in some respects by his reproaches upon the Jews he trampled upon the antient Laws of the Egyptians (g), he found himself seiz'd with (b) See the remark [C].

(c) This is according to Josephus, Antiq. Judaic. lib. 18. cap. 10. for Philo p. 1043 tells us, that there were five deputies of the Jews.

(d) Joseph. Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 10.

(e) Plin. lib. 36. cap. 12. See likewise lib. 37. cap. 5.

(f) Justin. Parænet. ad Græcos, p. 9. Clemens Alexand. Strom. l. 1. p. 320.

(g) Amongst the rest that of circumcision.

as examined things with the greatest exactness imaginable, περιεργότατος γραμματικῶν (12). According to Suidas he had the surname of μοχθος given him. This word signifies labour, and is stronger and more expressive in this place than that of μοχθηρος, laboriosus, or importunate, which according to the conjecture of a very ingenious person (13), was perhaps inserted in Suidas instead of μόχθος. Dydymus, who was surnamed χαλκέντερος (14), that is, a man with entrails of brass, had in the person of Apion a perfect imitator of himself. Apion, as laborious as his master, had like him a surname, which shewed this disposition. I am of opinion, that the Scholar was of the same taste with his Master in the choice of his subjects. Didymus wrote Dissertations upon Homer's country, upon the true mother of Æneas, upon the manners of Anacreon and Sappho (15). His Scholar was so zealous in his enquiries into the country and family of Homer, that he made use even of magick spells for that purpose. He imagined himself to have made a wonderful discovery, when he found that the two first letters of the Iliad taken numerically made up 48. Upon this foundation he assures us, that Homer waited to add the first verse of his Iliad, till his two Poems were finished; and that he chose to begin his Iliad with a word, the two first letters of which would shew, that his two Poems would contain 48 books. This savours very much of the mysteries of the Cabala. This man, who was so great an enemy to the Jews, gave very readily into their reveries, with regard to the mysterious positions of letters. However that be, let us hear what the Author says, who relates these facts: Quærat aliquis quæ sint mentiti veteres magi, cum adolescentibus nobis visus Apion Grammaticæ artis, prodiderit cynocephaliam herbam, quæ in Ægypto vocaretur Osyrites, divinam & contra omnia veneficia: sed si tota erueretur, statim eum, qui eruisset, mori; seque evocasse umbras ad percontandum Homerum quanam patriâ, quibusque parentibus genitus esset, non tamen ausus profiteri, quid sibi respondisse diceret (16). It appears from this passage, that Apion boasted in his writings, that he had made use of magic to gain a conversation with Homer, and that he made a mystery of the answers, which he received to his questions. This savours very much of the mountebank. Pliny gives us his opinion of this man plainly enough. Seneca had no regard for him. Apion Grammaticus, says he (17), qui sub C. Cæsare tota circumlatus est (18) Græcia, & in nomen Homeri ab omnibus civitatibus adoptatus, aiebat, Homerum utramque materiâ consummatâ, & Odysseâ & Iliade, principium adjecisse operi suo, quo bellum Trojanum complexus est. Hujus rei argumentum afferebat, quod duas literas (19) in primo versu posuisset ex industriâ librorum suorum numerum continentes (20). We find by these words, that this Grammarian imposed very much upon Greece, since he was received in every city as a second Homer, as Homer revived. A man, who has a share of learning, and besides that impudence and vanity, may easily deceive many people by his talk.

(12) Jul. Afric. apud Euseb. Præpar. Evang. lib. 10. cap. 10.

(13) Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. 1. p. 776.

(14) Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22. cap. ultimo, pag. 344.

(15) Seneca, Ep. 88. p. 361.

(16) Plinius, lib. 30. cap. 2. sub finem.

(17) Seneca, Ep. 88. p. 361.

(18) Lipsius's manuscript in these words of Seneca, approves this reading, and pretends that Apion was a Quack and Mountebank, Agyrta fuit & circulator.

(19) The first word of the Iliad is μῆνιν. The letter μ is 40, and the ν is 8.

(20) Compare what Plutarch says Sympos. lib. 9 cap. 3. pag. 739.

[E] He accused the Jews to Caligula for not dedicating images to him.] This was the chief accusation. Josephus, in a passage quoted in the Supplement to Moreri, tells us this very plainly; and as they were the Jews of Alexandria, whom Apion had orders to accuse, it appears that the question was not concerning what the Jews of Jerusalem did or did not. However, if we believe the Author of the Supplement, he had only this to speak of; and it was not the City of Alexandria, which complained of the Jews; it was Caligula himself, who complained that they would not receive his image into the temple of God. It must be confessed, that this Emperor endeavoured extremely to get his statue placed in the Temple of Jerusalem (21); but we must confess likewise, that neither the embassy of Philo, nor that of Apion, had any relation to that fact. Philo, when he gives so exact an account of the complaints and questions of Caligula to himself, mentions nothing relating to this statue in the temple (22). Caligula complained in general, that the Jews were the only people, who refused to honour him as a God. Apion had already irritated him upon that point, in order to prevent him from doing justice in the main dispute. The question was properly concerning the privileges, which the Jews ought to enjoy at Alexandria; their cause was good; they would certainly gain it before disinterested Judges. What then does Apion do? He changes the question; he makes the Jews odious to Caligula, he accuses them of impiety, and amuses the Court with captious incidents. It is this method, which is daily taken by zealots to support themselves in the unreasonable power, which they have usurped as well upon the consciences of mankind, as in all other affairs. This remark cannot be too often repeated.

(21) Philo de Legat.

(22) Ibid. pag. 1041, & seq.

[F] Josephus thought himself obliged to confute the malicious calumnies, which this Author had thrown upon the Jews.] The Author of the Supplement to Moreri has been mistaken again in this passage. This, says he, occasioned Josephus afterwards to write the Life and Errors of Apion. It is false, that Josephus wrote the Life of this Grammarian; and it is a very improper way of speaking to say he wrote his Errors. These words naturally suggest to us this thought, that Josephus wrote a book of controversy against the heresies of Apion. The truth is, that having understood, that several Criticks had attacked his Jewish Antiquities, not with exceptions against the manner or style, but accusing him of having invented a thousand fabulous stories for the honour of his nation; he wrote an Apology, in which he replies to their objections, and the calumny, which had been cast upon the Jews. Half of the Apology has no relation to Apion, tho' it is generally quoted, as if the whole was levelled against Apion. It is mentioned by Origen under the title de Antiquitate Gentis Judaicæ (23).

(23) Origen, contra Celsum.

with a diſeaſe, which requires inciſions in the natural parts; but this remedy could not prevent him from dying of this diſeaſe amidſt the greateſt pains imaginable (b). He boaſted of having raiſed the ſoul of Homer from the dead, to enquire concerning the country and family of that Poet (i). We have an account of the titles of four or five of his books [G].

(b) Joſeph. lib. 2. contra Apionem, ſub finem.

(i) See remark [D].

It is falſe, that Apion related, that Euphranor intending to paint Jupiter, went to Athens to conſult a Profeſſor, who read Homer to his ſcholars, and that this Painter drew an admirable picture of that God from the deſcription, which that Poet in the firſt book of his Iliad has given us of Jupiter, &c. (k). This error, which was committed by Father Rapin in the firſt edition of his Reflections upon Poetry, was very ſeverely taken notice of by the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur [H].

(k) Rapin, Reflex. ſur la Poetique, num. 28. p. 73. edition of 1674.

[G] We have an account of the titles of four or five of his books.] I have ſpoken of his Antiquities of Egypt, divided into five books (24), and his Treatiſe againſt the Jews. Beſides theſe he wrote a treatiſe de Luxu Apicii (25), another de Linguâ Romanâ (26), and another de Diſciplinâ Metallicâ (27). Suidas aſcribes to him an Hiſtory, in which he treated of all nations, ἱγραψε ἱσοριαν καθ' ἑθνος. The famous Hiſtory of the Lion of Androcles is known only from the account of Apion. He ſpeaks of it as an eye-witneſs. Aulus Gellius relates it after him (28). He owes another remark to him; which is the reaſon why the ancients wore the ring on the fourth finger of the left hand. Apion gives a reaſon for it taken from the diſcoveries, which were made in Egypt by Anatomy (29).

(24) Tatian, apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evangel. p. 493.
(25) Athen. lib. 7. p. 294.
(26) Idem, lib. 15. p. 680.
(27) Plinius in Indice Libri 35.
(28) Aul. Gellius, lib. 5. cap. 14.
(29) Idem, lib. 10. cap. 10.

[H] An error which was committed by Father Rapin with relation to Apion was ſeverely taken notice of by the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur.] He mentions the fact firſt, and then adds: "Gueſs, reader, the pleaſant blunder "of our Reflector, occaſioned by his miſunderſtanding two words of this Commentator (30). In the "place, where I have given it, when he went from "the ſchool of the Profeſſor, he painted the picture of "Jupiter, our Reflector in tranſlating theſe words of "Euſtathius, καὶ αἰτιὼν ἱγραψιν, i. e. he went out and "painted, has thought proper to render it, as Apion "the Grammarian has written. The good man ſure "was very careleſs in this, he never perceived either "that this participle αἰτιὼν is not Apion, as the "Grammarian is called; or that the verb ἱγραψιν ſig-"nifies in this place, he painted, as it was ſaid be-"fore in the ſame ſenſe γράφων and γράψει; or in "ſhort that αἰτιὼν, when he went out, anſwers to the "verb that goes before, παρῆν, he ſtood by. After-"all this, if the Reflector ſaw this paſſage of Eu-"ſtathius himſelf, I am ſurprized that he miſtook "it ſo; and if he took this tranſlation from ſome "other perſon, I am ſtill more ſurprized that he "ſhould pretend to have conſulted Euſtathius, having "marked very carefully the paſſage which he ne-"ver ſaw (31).

(30) Euſtathius.

(31) Remarques ſur les nouvelles Reflexions touchant la Poetiques, p. 56, 57.

APOLLINARIS (CAIUS SULPITIUS) a very learned Grammarian, born at Carthage [A], lived in the ſecond Century, under the Antonines. He had for his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſion of Grammar Helvius Pertinax, who had been his ſcholar, and was at laſt Emperor (a). He is ſuppoſed to be the author of the verſes which are prefixed to the Comedies of Terence [B], and contain the argument of them. We have an Epigram, which he wrote upon the orders which Virgil gave to burn his Æneid [C]. Aulus Gellius, who had ſtudied under him, ſpeaks very often of him with great commendation [D]. I would adviſe the reader particularly to ſee what he ſays in the fourth chapter of (a) Julius Capitolinus in Pertinace, cap. 1.

[A] Born at Carthage.] I have found no antient author who aſſures me of this; I only relate it upon the credit of the moderns, who have publiſhed the Collections of Epigrams, or Catalecta of antient Poets.

[B] He is ſuppoſed to be the author of the verſes prefixed to the Comedies of Terence.] I have read in a letter of Petrus Crinitus (1) that Politian had remarked, that theſe verſes were not to be aſcribed to Terence, as ſeveral were of opinion, but to Sulpicius Apollinaris. He adds, that there was to be read in a very ancient manuſcript of Terence this inſcription in large characters prefixed to the arguments, G. SULPICII APOLLINARIS PERIOCHA. People have much governed themſelves by this inſcription in the editions of Terence. Mr. de Tillemont refers us to Seth Calviſius with regard to theſe arguments (2). It is true, that Calviſius ſpeaks of them under the year 163; but he quotes Suidas; and I am very much in doubt, whether he ought to do it. It would ſeem from Mr. de Tillemont's manner of expreſſing himſelf, that we have ſtill two works of Apollinaris remaining. He * left ſeveral letters, ſays he, and a † writing, in which he cenſures another Grammarian named Caſſellius Vindex.

(1) It is amongſt thoſe of Politian the 22d of the 12th book; Paris edition in 1526 in 4to.

(2) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 2. p. 589.

* Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 5.
† Idem, lib. 2. cap. 16.

[C] We have an Epigram, which he wrote upon the orders, which Virgil gave, to burn his Æneid.] It is but a diſtich, and is as follows:

Infelix alio cecidit prope Pergamon igne,
Et pene eſt alio Troja eremata rogo.

Theſe verſes make us regret the loſs of the others. Verſus habemus ejus aliquos de Æneide Maronis, qui deperditorum accendunt ſitim (3). Theſe are the Jeſuit Brietius's words. I am ſurprized, that he ſays nothing of the arguments of Terence, and that Voſſius ſays nothing of our Poet. I confeſs he ſpeaks of one Apollinaris, who is placed by Giraldus among the Latin Poets; but as this Apollinaris lived in the time of Martial (4), it is plain that it is not he whom we are ſpeaking of. Beſides every perſon, who amuſes himſelf in writing verſes, is not a Poet: ſo that there is ſome reaſon to diſpute with Giraldus the character of a Poet, which he gives to Martial's Apollinaris, and which he grounds upon the regard, which this Apollinaris had for Martial's Poetry. Eum in Poëtis memorat Lilius, ſed non ſat firmo argumento; nec enim ſi dilectaretur Epigrammatis, eo & ipſe fuerit Poeta (5).

(3) Brietius, de Poet. Lat. pag. 42.

(4) He addreſſes to him his 25th Epigram of the 7th book.

(5) Voſſius, de Poet. Lat. pag. 50.

[D] Aulus Gellius . . . ſpeaks very often of him with great commendation (6).] He calls him virum præſtanti literarum ſcientiâ (7); i. e. "a man of excellent "learning:" hominum memoriæ noſtræ doctiſſimum (8); i. e. "the moſt learned man of our age:" virum eleganti ſcientiâ ornatum (9); i. e. "a man of great ſkill "in polite learning:" virum in memoria noſtra præter alios doctum (10); i. e. "a man ſuperior to all others "of our age in learning." See the 13th chapter of his 12th book. He gives him another qualification, which is no leſs valuable than that of learning; which is, that Apollinaris had nothing of that pedantic arrogance, which prompts a man to cenſure thoſe with a magiſterial air, who take the liberty to talk upon ſubjects, which they do not perfectly underſtand. As for him, he always ſhewed them their miſtake in an eaſy gentile manner. Aulus Gellius gives a noble inſtance of this: for as little as Apollinaris was a Pedant, he might juſtly have expreſſed his cenſure in the ſevereſt terms upon an occaſion, wherein Aulus Gellius repreſents him as acting with the utmoſt politeneſs. There was a queſtion asked in his preſence, who one Cato Nepos was, that appeared in the title of a book? A young Scholar began firſt, and attempted to anſwer the queſtion, but was abſolutely wrong in it. The dignity of the Profeſſor

(6) Aul. Gell. Noct. Attic. lib. 6. cap. 6; and lib. 13. cap. 16; and lib. 20. cap. 6.
(7) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 17.
(8) Idem, l. 13. cap. 16.
(9) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 5.
(10) Idem, lib. 18. cap. 4.

of the eighteenth book. He will find there the true picture of a pretender to learning, and ſee the genteel manner in which Apollinaris rallied him [E].

was injured by this; to ſee a young man give his opinion upon a queſtion before a Profeſſor of Grammar, without waiting for the judgment of the Grammarian. This forwardneſs was inſupportable; however Apollinaris did not correct his miſtake, without commending him in a very civil manner. Tum Apollinaris, ut mos ejus in reprehendendo fuit, placide admodum leniterque, "Laudo, inquit, te, mi fili, quod in "tantulâ ætate etiamſi hunc M. Catonem, de quo nunc "quæritur, quis fuerit ignoras, auditiunculâ tamen "quadam de Catonis familiâ aſperſus es (11): That is, "Upon this Apollinaris ſaid to him in a mild "and gentle way, as was his manner of reproving a "perſon; "I commend you, my ſon; that tho' you "are ſo young, and know nothing of this Cato, "whom we are inquiring about, yet you have heard "ſomething concerning the family of Cato."

(11) Aul. Gell. Noct. Attic. lib. 13. cap. 18.

[E] He rallied a pretender to learning in a very genteel manner.] This pretender boaſted in a Bookſeller's ſhop, that he was the only perſon, who underſtood Salluſt thoroughly: "I do not ſtand, ſays he, "upon the ſhell or ſurface of a thought; I penetrate "to the blood and marrow of it." Neque primam tantum cutem ac ſpeciem ſententiarum, ſed ſanguinem quoque ipſum ac medullam verborum ejus eruere atque introſpicere penitus prædicaret. Apollinaris aſſuming the ironical humour of Socrates (12), addreſſed himſelf to this man with an air of great reſpect, and congratulated himſelf upon his having ſo opportunely met with an Oracle, to conſult upon a paſſage of Salluſt, the meaning of which he had been asked the day before, without being able to give any anſwer to it. He asked him what difference Salluſt intended between ſtolidior and vanior, when he tells us, that Cn. Lentulus . . . . per incertum ſtolidior an vanior (13). The pretender to learning replied with an air of contempt, that ſuch trifles were to be propoſed to others; and that he never gave himſelf the trouble of explaining what all the world underſtood. However he did not refrain from ſhewing very plainly his ignorance upon the queſtion propounded; but when he ſaw that he was preſſed more cloſely, and expoſed to ridicule, he hurried away under pretence of having buſineſs ſomewhere elſe. Apollinaris afterwards explained this paſſage of Salluſt, and obſerved that vanus ſignifies a knave, and ſtolidus a rude ſtupid perſon. The words of Aulus Gellius are ſo very expreſſive, and deſcribe the fact ſo well, that they deſerve to be quoted. Tum ille rictu oris labiorumque ductu contemni à ſe oſtendens, & rem de qua quæreretur, & hominem ipſum, qui quæreret; "Priſcorum, inquit, & remote-"rum ego verborum medullas & ſanguinem, ſicuti dixi, "perſpicere & elicere ſoleo, non illorum, quæ proculca-"ta vulgo & protrita ſunt. Ipſo illo quippe Cn. Len-"tulo ſtolidior & vanior, qui ignorat ejuſdem eſſe va-"nitatem & ſtoliditatem.

(12) Jactatorem quempiam & venditatorem Salluſſianæ lectionis irriſit illuſitque genere illo facetiſſimæ diſſimilationis, quâ Socrates ad Sophiſtas utebatur. Aul. Gellius, lib. 18. cap. 4.

(13) Salluſtius, Hiſtor. lib. 12.

☞APOLLINARIS SIDONIUS (CAIUS SOLLIUS), an eminent Chriſtian writer [A], and Biſhop in the fifth Century, was born of a noble family in France. His father and grandfather were Prefects of the Pretorium there (a). There are different accounts of his country, but it appears from ſeveral paſſages in his works that he was born at Lyons, and very probably about the year 430 (b). He was educated under the beſt maſters, among whom he mentions Hoenius in Poetry, and Euſebius in Philoſophy (c). He made a prodigious progreſs in the ſeveral Arts and Sciences, but particularly in Poetry and polite Literature. After he had left the ſchools he applied himſelf to the profeſſion of war (d). He married Papianilla, the daughter of Avitus, who was Conſul, and afterwards Emperor,

(a) Vide Vitam Sidonii Apollin. præfixam editioni Operum ejus, Pariſ. 1614, in 8o.

(b) Du Pin, Biblioth. Part 2. tom. 3. p. 250. edit. de Mons 1691.

(c) Vita Sidonii Apollin. ubi ſupra.

(d) Cave, Hiſt. Litt. p. 292. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[A] An eminent Chriſtian writer.] He wrote a great many little pieces in proſe and verſe; but he preſerved none but thoſe, which he thought were worthy of being continued down to poſterity. He collected himſelf the nine books, which we have remaining of his letters. His chief pieces in Poetry are the three Panegyrics upon the Emperors Avitus, Majorianus, and Anthemius. The reſt of them are a collection of Poems addreſſed to his friends upon particular ſubjects. His letters contain a variety of particulars relating to polite Literature and profane Hiſtory. There are but few in which he ſpeaks of matters of religion; however theſe will furniſh us with ſome extracts, to ſhew the ſtate of the church at that time. In the twenty fourth letter of the fourth book he gives us the portrait of a Biſhop of Toulouſe in France, whoſe name was Maximus, and whom he viſited in order to requeſt him to allow one of his friends time to pay a ſum of money, which his father had borrowed of Maximus before he was raiſed to the Biſhoprick. He tells us, that having known him formerly, he found him entirely changed; that his dreſs, his countenance, and his diſcourſe breathed nothing but modeſty and piety; his hair was ſhort, and his beard long; his furniture was plain; he had nothing but wooden ſtools, curtains of coarſe ſtuff, a bed without feathers, a table without any covering of tapeſtry, and that pulſe was the chief diet at his houſe. Habitus viro, gradus, pudor, color, ſermo religioſus: tum coma brevis, barba prolixa, tripodes ſellæ, cilicum vela foribus appenſa, lectus nil habens plumæ, menſa nil purpuræ, humanitas ipſa ſic benigna, quod frugi, nec ita carnibus abundans, ut leguminibus. Certe ſi quid in cibis unctius, non ſibi ſed hoſpitibus indulgens. Sidonius being ſurpriſed to ſee him ſo prodigiouſly altered, asked thoſe who ſtood by him, what his profeſſion was, whether he was a Monk, a Clerk, or a Penitent. He was anſwered, that he had been lately made a Biſhop contrary to his own deſire. Cum ſurgeremus, clam percontor adſtantes, quod genus vitæ de tribus arripuiſſet ordinibus; monachumne ageret, an clericum, pœnitentemne? dixerunt, nuper impacto ſacerdotio fungi, quo recuſantem factioſè ligaſſet civicus amor. Mr. Du Pin obſerves upon this paſſage (1), that it is evident from hence, that the manner of life, dreſs, and furniture of a Biſhop ought to be like thoſe of a monk and a penitent. He ought to do that out of modeſty, which the others are obliged to do by their profeſſion or circumſtances. Maximus forgave his creditor the intereſt due to him, which amounted to double the principal, and allowed him time to diſcharge his debt: . . . . quod & annum ſolutioni ſpatium prorogabo, & ſuperpoſitam medietatem, quæ per uſuræ nomen accrevit, indulgeam, ſola ſimpli reſtitutione contentus. He informs us in the fourteenth Letter of the 5th Book, and in the firſt Letter of the 6th Book, that the cuſtom of Rogations was inſtituted by St. Mamertus Biſhop of Vienne. It is ſaid by ſome Writers, that they were antecedent to his time, and that he only reſtored them; but this, as Du Pin obſerves (2), muſt be a miſtake, ſince our Author poſitively affirms, that it was St. Mamertus, qui primus invenit, inſtituit, invexit (3). Proceſſions were in uſe before; but there was no fixed time for them, and they were performed without devotion, and very ſeldom, and in a negligent manner. They were interrupted with feaſts, and deſigned only to procure rain or fair weather. Vagæ, tepentes, infrequenteſque, utque ſic dixerim, oſcitabundæ ſupplicationes, quæ ſæpe interpellantum prandiorum obicibus hebetabantur maximè aut imbres aut ſerenitatem deprecaturæ (4). But St. Mamertus fixed the time and manner of celebrating them, and appointed that they ſhould be attended with faſting, prayer, ſinging of Pſalms, and tears. The Church of Clermont and ſeveral others followed this example of St. Mamertus, and in a ſhort time the cuſtom ſpread itſelf over all the Churches in Europe (5). In the 17th Letter of the 5th Book he obſerves, that the annual feſtivals of the Saints were celebrated with great ſolemnity; that the people reſorted to the church before day; that a great number

(1) Biblioth. Part 2. tom. 3. p. 251, 252.

(2) Pag. 252.

(3) Sidonii lib. 5. Epiſt. 14.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

Emperor, by whom he had three children (e). But Majorianus in the year 457 having deprived Avitus of the Empire, and taken the city of Lyons, in which our author reſided, Apollinaris fell into the hands of the enemy. However the reputation of his learning ſoftened Majorianus's reſentments, ſo that he treated him with the utmoſt civility, in return for which Apollinaris compoſed a Panegyric in his honour; which was ſo highly applauded, that he had a ſtatue erected to him at Rome (f), and was honoured with the title of Count (g). In the year 467 the Emperor Anthemius rewarded him for the Panegyric, which he had written in honour of him, by raiſing him to the poſt of Governor of Rome, and afterwards to the dignity of a Patrician and Senator, and erecting a ſtatue to him (b). But he ſoon quitted theſe ſecular employments for the ſervice of the

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(g) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(b) Idem, ibid.

number of candles were lighted up; and that the Monks and Clerks ſung the Vigils in two choirs. The ſpeech, which he made upon the choice of a Biſhop of Bourges, and which we find in the 9th Letter of the 7th Book, ſhews us how great a taſk it is to chooſe a Biſhop, and how difficult to ſatisfy every perſon. "If I "name a Monk, ſays he, it will be ſaid, that ſuch "an one is proper for an Abbot, and not for a Biſhop. "If I chooſe a perſon of remarkable humility, it will "be apprehended, that he may become contemptible. "If I chooſe a man of reſolution, he will be thought "proud. If I chooſe a man of little learning, his "ignorance will expoſe him to ridicule. If he be "learned, his knowledge will be ſuppoſed to render "him haughty and opinionated. If I chooſe a perſon "of great ſtrictneſs and ſeverity, he will be thought "cruel; if a man of gentle diſpoſition, his eaſineſs "will be objected againſt. If I chooſe a man of "ſimplicity, he will be deſpiſed as ignorant and "uncultivated; if a man of ſagacity, he will be "avoided as a man of cunning and deſign. If "I chooſe a man of diligence and application, he "will be repreſented as ſuperſtitious; if a man of "leſs attention, he will be thought negligent. If I "chooſe a man of an abſtemious temper, he will "be called covetous ..... If I chooſe one "one of the Clergy, thoſe, who are above him, will "deſpiſe him, and thoſe who are below him, will en-"vy him. Age and ſeniority in the Clergy are al-"moſt the only thing regarded at preſent; as if a per-"ſon's having been ſeveral years in Orders gave "him the merit, which he wanted in all other re-"ſpects; and as if it were ſufficient to deſerve a Bi-"ſhoprick to have lived a long time without having "lived well. We find among the Clergy ſome, who "have been their whole life negligent in the diſcharge "of their function, and indulged themſelves in all "the intemperance of the tongue, ready to engage "in parties and factions, averſe to charity, always "full of envy and ambition; and yet notwithſtand-"ing towards the end of their life they endeavour to "gain a Biſhoprick, and want to govern others at "a time when they have occaſion to be governed "themſelves." Hic qui nominatur, inquiunt, non epiſcopi, ſed potius abbatis complet officium; & intercedere magis pro animabus apud cæleſtem, quam pro corporibus apud terrenum judicem poteſt. Sed quis non exacerbaſcat, cum videat ſordidari virtutum ſinceritatem criminatione vitiorum? Si eligimus humilem, vocatur abjectus; ſi proferimus erectum, ſuperbire cenſetur. Si minus inſtitutum, propter imperitiam creditur irridendus: ſi aliquatenus doctum, propter ſcientiam clamatur inflatus. Si ſeverum, tanquam crudelis horretur; ſi indulgentem, facile culpatur. Si ſimplicem, deſpicitur ut brutus; ſi acrem, vitatur ut callidus. Si diligentem, ſuperſtitioſus decernitur; ſi remiſſum, negligens judicatur. Si ſolertem, cupidus; ſi quietum, pronuntiatur ignarus. Si abſtemium producimus, avarus accipitur; ..... Si elericum dixero, ſequentes æmulantur, derogant antecedentes. Nam ita ex iis pauci, quod reliquorum pace ſit dictum, ſolam clericatus diuturnitatem pro meritis autumant calculandam; ut nos in antiſtite conſecrando, non utilitatem velint eligere, ſed ætatem; tanquam diu potius, quam benè vivere, debeat accipi ad ſummum ſacerdotium adipiſcendum, pro omnium gratiarum privilegio, decoramento, lenocinamento. Et ita quidam in miniſtrando ſegnes, in obloquendo celeres, in tractatibus otioſi, in ſeditionibus occupati, in caritate infirmi, in factione robuſti, in æmulationum conſervatione ſtabiles, in ſententiarum aſſertione mutantes, nituntur regere eccleſiam, quos jam regi neceſſe erit per ſenectam. As ſuch a diſcourſe as this might offend the Clergy of the Church, in which he ſpoke, he ſoftened the rigour of it in a very artful manner, by obſerving, that his deſign was not to reflect upon a great many perſons on account of the ambition of a few; that by not mentioning any perſon in particular, thoſe, who ſhould ſhew themſelves offended by what he had ſaid, would by that means declare their diſpoſition; that there were many in that church, who deſerved to be raiſed to the Biſhoprick: but it was impoſſible that all, who merited it, could obtain it. Having thus diſpoſed them to approve of the choice, which he was about to make, he proteſted ſolemnly in the name of the Holy Ghoſt, that he was not influenced by any ſecular conſideration, by money, or intereſt; and declared at laſt, that he determined upon Simplicius, who was a Clergyman of that Church, and whoſe character he extolled. And becauſe they had all ſworn to follow his advice in the election, he declared in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, that it was Simplicius, who muſt be Biſhop of Bourges, and Metropolitan of that Province. Theſe are the moſt remarkable circumſtances with regard to the diſcipline of the Church, which are to be found in Sidonius's Letters. They inform us likewiſe of ſeveral things relating to the Biſhops of that time, to whom Sidonius wrote, and who are called Papæ or Popes, according to the cuſtom of that age. His works were publiſhed with the Commentaries of John Baptiſta Pius at Baſil 1542 in 8°; and at Lyons 1552 in 8°, by Elias Vinetus (6). The learned John Savaro in 1599 publiſhed an edition of them at Paris in 4to, in which an infinite number of errors are corrected, with excellent notes, which fully explain the text, and contain a great many very uſeful and curious remarks. It might have been imagined, that this editor had left nothing to be attempted in any future edition; but this did not deter Father Sirmond, who had laboured upon this Author before Savaro's edition appeared, from publiſhing Sidonius's works at Paris in 8vo, 1614, with notes, which ſhewed his great ſagacity, and the extent of his learning. For tho' it ſeemed that nothing had eſcaped the exactneſs of Savaro, yet Father Sirmond found a great many things, that deſerved an explication and remarks, which had been omitted by Savaro: and his notes are ſo judicious, and learned, and curious, that they are far ſuperior to Savaro's in the opinion of the beſt judges. However, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (7), it is proper to have both editions; and it were to be wiſhed, that we had another edition, in which the notes of both thoſe commentators were included. Since Father Sirmond's death, his edition has been reprinted with ſeveral additions in 4to (8) at Paris 1652. Dr. Cave mentions an edition of Sidonius, Hanov. 1617 in 8vo. Our Author's works are publiſhed in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Tom. VI. p. 1075 (9). Dr. Cave gives us a Catalogue of ſeveral works of his, which are loſt; particularly the Hiſtory of King Attila and the Siege of Orleans, mentioned in the 15th Letter of the 8th Book, which he began at the deſire of Proſper Biſhop of Orleans, but broke it off before he had finiſhed it. Exegeras mihi, ut promitterem tibi Attilæ bellum ſtylo me poſteris intimaturum; quo videlicet Aurelianenſis verbis obſidio, oppugnatio, irruptio, nec direptio, & illa vulgata exauditi cælitus ſacerdotis vaticinatio continebatur. Cæperam ſcribere, ſed operis arrepti faſce perſpecto tæduit inchoaſſe. Dr. Cave tells us, that he begun this work at the requeſt of Leo, Counſellor of King Evariges; but he does not mention any authority for this aſſertion; and it is evident that this muſt be applied to the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, which Apollinaris ſent to Leo, as appears from the 3d Letter of the 8th Book, which is addreſſed to this Leo, who, as Father Sirmond

(6) Cave, Hiſt. Liter. p. 292.

(7) Pag. 253.

(8) Dr. Cave ſays that it was in 8vo.

(9) Cave, ubi ſupra.

the church. The Biſhoprick of Clermont being vacant in 472 by the death of Eparchius, Apollinaris, who was then only a Layman, was choſen to ſucceed him without any intereſt or ſollicitation on his part (i), in which See he acted with the greateſt integrity [B]. Clermont being beſieged by the Goths, he animated the people to the defence of that city, and would never conſent to the ſurrender of it; ſo that when it was taken about the year 480 he was obliged to retire, but he was ſoon reſtored by Evariges King of the Goths, and continued to govern the church as he had done before (k). Not long before his death, as we are informed by Gregory Turonenſis (l), he was deprived of the adminiſtration of his church by two ſeditious Prieſts, but one of them dying in a very miſerable manner, he was reſtored about a year after with great honour. He did not long ſurvive this; and having appointed Aprunculus, who had been Biſhop of Langres, for his ſucceſſor, he died in peace the 21ſt of Auguſt 487, as Du Pin tells us (m), or in 482, according to Dr. Cave and Olearius (n). Du Pin informs us, that he had been fifteen years Biſhop, and had lived ſixty ſix years. His feſtival is ſtill obſerved in the church of Clermont, where his memory is held in great veneration. He left three children, whom he had by Papianilla before he was raiſed to the Biſhoprick, Apollinaris a ſon, and two daughters Roſcia and Severiana (o). He is eſteemed the moſt elegant writer of his age both in proſe and verſe, ſo that Claudius Mamertus ſtiled him the Prince of Orators in his time, the moſt eminent among the Learned, and the Reſtorer of the antient Eloquence. His writings confirmed this character of him; they are full of genius and fire; we find in them many excellent, agreeable, and lively thoughts; there is a copiouſneſs and variety, which ſurpriſes and charms the reader. His expreſſions are proper, ſignificant and extraordinary, but he uſes ſome phraſes which are not pure Latin, though there is a great deal of wit and poignancy in them. His manner of writing is truly Epiſtolary, that is, conciſe, agreeable, and full of points and diverting thoughts; he excels in deſcriptions and portraits of perſons and things, which are the chief ornament of his writings. However his too great ſubtilty joined to his profound learning renders him ſometimes very obſcure; and his expreſſions, metaphors, and compariſons are frequently too bold and affected. He had a ready talent at Poetry, but he did not take ſufficient time to poliſh his compoſitions of that kind (p).

(i) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(k) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(l) Hiſt. Franc. lib. 2. cap. 23. apud Cave, ubi ſupra.

(m) Pag. 251.

(n) Bibliœth. Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 161. edit. Jenæ 1710.

(o) Vita Sidonii, ubi ſupra.

(p) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

☞ APOLLI-

mond obſerves in his Notes, was Counſellor to King Euricus or Evariges. Apollonii Pythagorici vitam, non ut Nicomachus ſenior è Philoſtrati, ſed ut Taſcius Victorianus è Nicomachi ſchedio exſcripſit, quia juſſeras, miſi; quam dum parere feſtino, celeriter ejecit in tumultuarium exemplar turbida & præceps & opica tranſlatio. Dr. Cave ſuppoſes, that Sidonius tranſlated this Life of Apollonius from the Greek into Latin; but it is evident from Father Sirmond's Notes upon this paſſage, that Leo had deſired him to ſend him a copy of Philoſtratus's Life of Apollonius, which Sidonius accordingly did, and at the ſame time acquainted him, that it had been tranſcribed from the manuſcript, which Victorianus had reviſed. He tells him likewiſe, that Victorianus had tranſcribed his copy from that, which had been written and corrected by Nicomachus, and Nicomachus had tranſcribed his copy from the original of Philoſtratus. So that Nicomachus and Victorianus are not the names of Authors, who wrote the Life of Apollonius, nor of ancient copiers of books, but of men who were dignified with the title of Viri clariſſimi, and who corrected at their leiſure and for their own ſatisfaction the faulty copies, which had been written by the tranſcribers. Nicomachus ergo & Victorianus nomina ſunt, non auctorum, qui Apollonii vitam ſcripſerint, neque ſcribarum antiquariorum, ſed clariſſimorum virorum, qui ab antiquariis mendosè ſcripta per otium & animi gratia caſtigabant. Father Sirmond obſerves, that there are ſeveral manuſcripts of Livy, in which it appears, that Nicomachus and Victorianus took the ſame pains with the copies of that Hiſtorian. We find the following words in thoſe manuſcripts. Nicomachus Dexter V. C. emendavi ad exemplum parentis mei Clementiani, ab urbe condita. Victorianus V. C. emendabam domnis Symmachis. And in another place: Emendavi Nicomachus Flavianus V. C. Præfectus urbi apud Hennam, ab urbe condita. Victorianus V. C. emendabam domnis Symmachis. As there were therefore two Nicomachus's, Sidonius to diſtinguiſh them, added the epithet of Senior. With regard to the word Tranſlatio in the paſſage abovementioned from Sidonius, Father Sirmond obſerves, that it generally ſignifies in him only a tranſcript or copy; as appears from the 16th Letter of the 9th Book, where he ſpeaks of the copies of his Letters; raptim, coactimque TRANSLATOR feſtinus exſcripſi; and again in the 11th Letter of the ſame Book, copiæ TRANSFERENDI. Ruricius likewiſe in the 8th Letter to Sidonius ſays; Codicem namque quem de fratre meo Leontio me recipere juſſeratis, TRANSTULISSE me fateor; which he explains afterwards by the word exemplaſſe. It is plain therefore, that Dr. Cave was miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that Sidonius tranſlated the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus into Latin; and that Mr. Bayle has committed ſeveral errors in note [I] of his article of APOLLONIUS, where he aſſerts that Nicomachus, and Victorianus, and our Author, wrote each of them a lye of that Impoſtor.

[B] In which he acted with the greateſt integrity.] As ſoon as he was raiſed to the Biſhoprick, he applied himſelf to thoſe ſtudies, which were ſuitable to his function. His reputation for knowledge and wiſdom was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that being ſent for to the city of Bourges, the See of which was vacant, all the Biſhops unanimouſly gave him the power of chooſing the Biſhop. He appointed Simplicius, as we obſerved in the preceding note; and his choice was univerſally applauded. He was actuated by a truly Epiſcopal ſpirit of charity towards the poor of his Dioceſe; he diſtributed among them whatever he was poſſeſſed of, and even ſold his plate to ſupport them, without the knowledge of his wife, who was obliged to buy them back again. He maintained at his own expence and with the aſſiſtance of Ecdicius his brother-in-law above four thouſand Burgundians, who had been compelled to leave their country. He viſited his Dioceſe very frequently, and was one of the firſt Biſhops in France, who introduced into his church the cuſtom of Rogations, which had been juſt before inſtituted by Mamertus Biſhop of Vienne (10). In ſhort, as he undertook the charge of his See with the greateſt modeſty and diffidence, ſo he executed it with equal integrity and care, in times of the utmoſt perplexity and diſtreſs. Quod munus ſumma cum modeſtia ſuſceptum pari cum ſanctitate ac vigilantiâ turbidiſſimis temporibus, maximaſque inter difficultates tum privatas tum publicas adminiſtravit (11). Gennadius Maſſilienſis in his book de Viris illuſtribus (12), having extolled him on account of his excellent genius and learning, and recommended his performances both in proſe and verſe, tells us, that he was animated with a true Chriſtian reſolution amidſt all the ravages of the Barbarians, which at that time oppreſſed France, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf like a Catholick Father and Doctor. Scripſit varia & grata volumina, & ſanæ doctrinæ. Homo ſiquidem tam divinis quam humanis ad integrum imbutus, acerque ingenio, ſcripſit ad diverſos diverſo metro vel proſâ compoſitum inſigne volumen, in quo quid in literis poſſit oſtendit. Verùm in Chriſtiano vigore pollens etiam inter barbaræ ferocitatis duritiem, quæ eo tempore Gallos oppreſſerat, catholicus Pater & Doctor habetur inſignis.

(10) Du Pin, p. 250.

(11) Vita Sidon. Apollin. ubi ſupra.

(12) Cap. 92.

APOLLINARIUS the younger [A], ſon of a famous man of the ſame name, was at firſt Lector or Reader at Laodicea, and afterwards Biſhop of that city [B]. He was univerſally eſteemed the greateſt man of his age, both for learning and piety, and a moſt accurate and nervous defender of the faith againſt all its enemies, whether Heathens or Hereticks (a). He was highly valued by the moſt eminent perſons of that age [C]. Vincentius Lirinenſis repreſents him as a very extraordinary man, that he had a moſt acute wit and ſublime learning; that in many volumes he had overthrown hereſies, and confuted errors oppoſite to the faith; that in thirty large and noble books, he had moſt convincingly baffled the calumnies of Porphyry; that it would be too long to recite all his works by which indeed he might have been equalled with the chiefeſt pillars of the church, had he not fallen into hereſy (b). Philoſtorgius tells us (c), that the books which Apollinarius wrote againſt Porphyry were much ſuperior to thoſe of Euſebius and Methodius on the ſame ſubject; and he prefers Apollinarius to Baſil and St. Gregory Nazianzen, with regard to Theological Learning (d). His words, as we find them in Suidas (e) are to this purpoſe; Apollinarius, Baſil, and Gregory Nazianzen defended the Divinity of Chriſt better than any either before or after them, in compariſon of whom the great Athanaſius was eſteemed but a child. They had not only an extraordinary faculty both in ſpeaking and writing, but their lives were ſo attracting, that whoever either ſaw or heard them, was drawn and perſuaded by them; but the moſt eſteemed and conſidered of theſe three was Apollinarius (f). Philoſtorgius adds (g), that the reaſon why Apollinarius excelled our Baſil and Gregory was, that he was ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue, which is abſolutely neceſſary to underſtand and explain the holy Scripture. If we may believe the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians, and thoſe Fathers who wrote againſt Apollinarius, this great and good man entertained the moſt groſs and monſtrous hereſies that were ever invented; for he ſaid, "that the only begotten God, who is the Judge of all Men, the Author of Life, "and the Deſtroyer of Death, was mortal, ſuffered in the very Godhead, and even "died with the body, and was reſtored to life by the Father (h)." He is alſo charged with having maintained, that "there were different degrees of dignity in the Deity, and "that

(a) King, on the Creed, p. 243.

(b) Vincent. Lirin. Commonit. cap. 16. pag. 46. apud King, ubi ſupra.

(c) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 8. n. 14. In Hiſt. Eccleſ. Script. edit. G. Reading, tom. 3. p. 525.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) In Voce Ἀπολλιναρίστ.

(f) I follow my Lord King's tranſlation, pag. 244.

(g) Hiſt. ubi ſupra, in Notis Valeſii, n. 1.

(h) Gregor. Nazianz. apud Sozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 27. pag. 255.

[A] Apollinarius the Younger.] He is called ſo to diſtinguiſh him from his father, who bore alſo the name of Apollinarius, and is ſtyled the Elder. His family was of Alexandria; but he himſelf firſt taught Grammar at Berytus (1), and afterwards at Laodicea. He was very well verſed in the Greek learning, and in polite Literature. Being at Laodicea he there married, and (perhaps after his wife's death) entered into Prieſt's Orders (2). After the death of Conſtantius (3), Julian his ſucceſſor gave our Apollinarius a fair opportunity of acquiring much glory. For that Emperor having made a law, by which the Chriſtians were prohibited to inſtruct their children in the Greek learning, and to read any of the Greek Authors, Apollinarius and his ſon undertook to ſupply this defect. The Father being a ſkilful Grammarian, wrote a Grammar adapted to the genius of the Chriſtian Religion (4), which ſignifies, I ſuppoſe, that inſtead of explaining his rules by paſſages of Heathen Writers, he imitated thoſe paſſages in ſuch a manner, that inſtead of the profane ſenſe they had originally, he made them ſignify ſomething agreeable to the Goſpel. He alſo tranſlated the books of Moſes in heroic verſe, and expreſſed the other hiſtorical books of the Old Teſtament, partly in dactyl verſe, partly in the form of Tragedy; and employed all his ſkill and induſtry, that the Chriſtians might not be unacquainted with any phraſe or expreſſion of the ancient Greek Writers (5). Zozomen ſays (6), that Apollinarius wrote the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament in heroic verſe from the beginning to the reign of King Saul, and divided it into twenty four books, each of which bore the name of a letter of the alphabet, which was prefixed to it. That he wrote Comedies in imitation of Menander, and alſo imitated Euripides and Pindar. He adds, that if men were not accuſtomed to admire antiquity, and to be delighted with ſuch writings only, as they are uſed to, they would highly extol Apollinarius's works, and admire his genius and wit, who excelled in all kinds of writing and learning; whereas the ancients applied themſelves to one ſort of ſtudy only. But Zozomen does not diſtinguiſh the father from the ſon, and aſcribes to the latter ſome books, which Socrates gives to the former. Voſſius (7) alſo aſcribes to Apollinarius the Elder, a Paraphraſe on the Pſalms ſtill extant, which has been ſometimes printed ſingly, and is alſo to be found in the Appendix to the Bibliotheca Patrum printed at Paris in 1624. Dr. Cave (8) is of opinion, that this Apollinarius is the author of a Tragedy intitled Chriſtus Patiens, i. e. "Chriſt's Paſſion," which is uſually printed with the works of Gregory Nazianzen, under the name of that Father. Moreri without quoting any authority, and even againſt the poſitive evidence of Socrates and Zozomen ſays, that Apollinarius the Elder was not very learned; whence he concludes that the works of the ſon have been erroneouſly aſcribed to the father.

(1) A city in Phœnicia.

(2) Socrates, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 46. p. 163. edit. Reading. Cambridge 1720, fol.

(3) In the year 361.

(4) Idem, lib. 3. cap. 16. p. 191.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Zozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 18. p. 207. edit. Reading.

(7) De Hiſtor. Græc. lib. 2. cap. 18. p. 252.

(8) Hiſt. Liter. Vol. 1. p. 176.

[B] At firſt Reader and afterwards Biſhop of Laodicea.] Philoſtorgius expreſly calls him Biſhop, on which occaſion Photius ſays, he does not know whence that Author has took particular (9). But Philoſtorgius's aſſertion is ſupported by the authority of Athanaſius (10), of Jerom (11), who had been Apollinarius's diſciple, and of Rufinus (12). With regard to the City, of which he was Biſhop, the learned are not agreed, whether it was Laodicea in Syria, or that in Phœnicia of Libanus: Theſe are the words of a celebrated Author (13). But Mr. Baſnage (14) affirms on the authority of Suidas, that Apollinarius was Biſhop of Laodicea in Syria, the great Laodicea, built by Seleucus, and the ſiſter and rival of the See of Antioch, which being near the former was ſoon infected with the arch-heretick's poiſon. Suidas, ſays he, Laodiceam Siriæ appellavit (15), & fuit procul dubio Laodicea magna, à Seleuco condita, Antiochinæ ſedis ſoror & æmula, quam brevi veneno ſuo, ut viciniorem, infecit Hereſiarcha.

(9) Philoſtorgius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 8. n. 15. edit. Reading, tom. 3. p. 525.

(10) In Ep. Synod. ad Euſebium & Luciferum, p. 580.

(11) De Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

(12) H. lib. 20.

(13) King's, Hiſt. of the Apoſtles Creed, pag. 243.

(14) In Diſſertatione de Apollinaris Hæreſi, p. 41. annexa Epiſtolæ D. Chryſoſtomi ad Cæſarium, edit. a Jac. Baſnage, 1687. 8vo.

(15) In voce Ἀπολλινάριος.

[C] Highly valued by the moſt eminent perſons of the age.] He had a very intimate friendſhip with St. Athanaſius, who viſited him after his return from baniſhment, as appears from St. Epiphanius (16). Leontius in his third book againſt Neſtorius tells us that Apollinarius boaſted, that he had received letters from St. Athanaſius, Serapion, and the moſt eminent perſons of his time. He cites likewiſe a fragment of a Letter of our Author, in which he ſpeaks of the letters which he received from St. Athanaſius. His Deputies were preſent at the Council of Alexandria, and ſigned as Deputies of an orthodox Biſhop. It does not appear, that St. Athanaſius ever broke off the friendſhip between them. St. Baſil in his 82d Letter tells us, that he had a great regard for him; and that he was ſo much his friend, that he would readily take his errors upon himſelf. St. Epiphanius ſtiles him a venerable old man, and obſerves, that he was careſſed by St. Athanaſius and all the orthodox Biſhops. St. Jerom in his 64th Letter tells us, that he had often ſeen him at Antioch, and had a prodigious eſteem for him, and had learned a great many things of him. We find likewiſe many teſtimonies to the advantage of his character in many other ancient Writers (17).

(16) Hæreſ. 77. apud Du Pin, p. 128 in Notis.

(17) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

"that the myſtery of our redemption was imperfect, ſince the human ſoul was excluded "from ſalvation (i)." But if we rightly conſider theſe heavy charges, it will appear that they were only conſequences, which Apollinarius's adverſaries drew from his real opinion [D], and which he does not appear to have ever maintained himſelf. It appears from Socrates (k) that his real ſentiment was, that "the Logos, or Son of God only aſ- "ſumed an human body, without a ſoul, or at leaſt with only a ſenſitive ſoul, but deſtitute "of an intelligent mind, the want of which was ſupplied by the Divinity." In this only, adds the ſame Hiſtorian (l), did Apollinarius differ from the Orthodox, for he and his followers admitted the Conſubſtantiality of the bleſſed Trinity. The ſame will appear by the following authorities, quoted by my Lord King (m). "The hereſy of Apollinarius "was, according to St. Auſtin's expreſſion, that Chriſt (n) aſſumed fleſh without a ſoul, "or, as Caſſian words it (o), that he had not an human ſoul, or a rational ſoul; for he "allowed him a ſenſitive ſoul as in brutes, but denied him to have a reaſonable one, as "Vincentius Lirinenſis writes (p), that Apollinarius affirmed, That there was not in our "Saviour's body an human ſoul, at leaſt not ſuch a one wherein was mind and reaſon; but "that (q) inſtead thereof his Divinity ſupplied its room and place. So that in ſhort, the "error of Apollinarius was this; that though Chriſt in his becoming man was ἐνσαρκος, "that is, was incarnate, had real fleſh and a ſubſtantial body, yet he was not ἐμψυχος "νους, that is, he had no reaſonable human ſoul, but his Divinity performed all the "actions and offices thereof." Gregory Nazianzen adds (r), that Apollinarius maintained that the human nature was not aſſumed by Chriſt, but that he brought it with him from heaven. To ſupport this opinion, he quoted ſome paſſages from the Scripture, as for inſtance theſe words (s), No man has aſcended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man; whence he concluded, that Chriſt was the Son of Man, even before he deſcended from heaven, and that he brought his own fleſh from thence, that ſame fleſh which he had already in heaven, and which was eternal and blended with his own ſubſtance [E] (συνκαιμένην). He alſo alledged theſe words of St. Paul (t), the ſecond man from heaven. How far St. Gregory is to be credited in this, we leave our

(i) Theodoritus, Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 5. cap. 3. p. 194.

(k) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 46. p. 164.

(l) Ibid.

(m) On the Creed, p. 247.

(n) De Hæreſ. cap. 55. p. 182.

(o) De Incarn. Chriſt. lib. 1. p. 1241.

(p) Comment. cap. 17. pag. 50.

(q) Epit. Hær. Fab. lib. 4. in Hær. Apol. pag. 167.

(r) Ap. Sozom. lib. 7. cap. 27. p. 255.

(s) John iii. 13.

(t) 1 Cor. xv. 47.

[D] Theſe charges are only conſequences, which Apollinarius's adverſaries drew from his real opinion.] It is the common practice in all diſputes about theological ſubjects, to charge an adverſary with all the conſequences, that may really or ſeemingly be drawn from his opinion. This was the caſe of Apollinarius, as appears expreſly by the words of Theodoret, who charges him with denying the redemption and ſalvation of the ſoul. "Since the Word, ſays he (18), did not "take upon him an human ſoul, according to Apol- "linarius's opinion, he could not give any aſſiſt- "ance or honour to it. But the body, which is ter- "reſtrial, is worſhiped by the inviſible powers, whilſt "the ſoul, tho' created in the image of God, re- "mains here below, ſtill involved in the ſhame and "infamy of ſin." Now it appears plainly that this is only an inference drawn from Apollinarius's opinion, which he might eaſily deny, by ſaying, that it was enough for us, if God would be pleaſed to accept of Chriſt's ſacrifice both for the redemption of our ſoul and body. Or if this anſwer was not ſatisfactory, Apollinarius ſhould have been charged with inconſiſtency; but it is unfair to accuſe a man of ſuch conſequences, which he does not expreſly admit. The ſame may be ſaid of thoſe other charges, that the Divinity was mortal, ſuffered with the body, and even died with it. Theſe are only conſequences, which Apollinarius was not bound to admit of in his ſyſtem. He could anſwer, that a body with a ſenſitive tho' without a rational ſoul, may ſuffer and die; which he could illuſtrate by the example of brutes, which have no rational ſoul, and yet ſuffer and die (19). He might have added, that as in men death conſiſts in the ſeparation of the ſoul from the body, the ſoul ſtill remaining immortal, notwithſtanding this ſeparation; ſo Chriſt died, when the Divinity united with the body came to be ſeparated from it on the Croſs; which does not ſuppoſe that the Deity itſelf died. But that the reader may be convinced, that moſt of the hereſies charged upon Apollinarius, were only dangerous conſequences, which, according to his adverſaries, followed from his opinion, we ſhall tranſcribe here a paſſage from the Critical Hiſtory of the Apoſtles Creed. "This hereſy, ſays that noble and learned Author (20), "the Fathers apprehended to be attended with moſt "dreadful conſequences; for if Chriſt had been deſti- "tute of an human ſoul, and the place thereof ſup- "plied by his Deity, then ſeveral actions, as deſiring, "grieving, and the like, would have been moſt im- "piouſly attributed by the holy Scripture unto his Di- "vine Nature; which argument is urged to very "good purpoſe by Epiphanius (21) againſt theſe here- "ticks; and Athanaſius moſt pertinently aſks them, "how Chriſt could be ſorrowful, and troubled (as it "is ſaid of him in John xiii. 21.) if he had not (22) "had an human ſoul? For to aſcribe that to inſenſible "matter was ridiculous, or to the immutable Godhead "was blaſphemous." But (23) to this the Apollinarians rejoined, that Chriſt's being ſorrowful and exceeding heavy &c. might well be underſtood of the body, that was perceptive and ſenſible of ſuffering (24); an example whereof is found in brutes, who tho' they have no rational ſoul, yet appear to be capable of ſenſation and paſſion. "Beſides if Chriſt had been void "of a reaſonable ſoul, he would not have had the "whole eſſence of man, his humanity would have "been defective and imperfect. On which account "Vincentius Lirinenſis anathematiſes Apollinarius for "(25) taking away the property of the perfect humanity; "and Epiphanius accuſes his followers (26) of mak- "ing the incarnation of Chriſt imperfect, by holding "that he did not aſſume a ſoul. Clemens Romanus "writes (27), that Chriſt gave his fleſh for our fleſh, "and his ſoul for our ſoul: But thoſe hereticks by "denying our Lord an human ſoul, by CONSEQUENCE "rendred his ſalvation defective and incomplete, and "confined it ſolely to the ſenſitive and bodily part "of man. For, as Athanaſius proves againſt them, "one thing could not be redeemed by another diffe- "rent therefrom; but (28) the body muſt be given for "the body, and the ſoul for the ſoul. And therefore "Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, in the ſynodical Epiſtle, "which he wrote on purpoſe to condemn that hereſy, "aſſerts in oppoſition thereunto, that Chriſt the Son "of God our Lord, by his Paſſion (29) brought ſuch "full ſalvation to mankind, that he freed the whole "man, which was intangled by ſin, from all iniquity. "And in another ſynodical Epiſtle penned before this "at Alexandria, Anno 362, in contradiction to that "neceſſary conſequence of this hereſy, Chriſt is de- "clared to be the Saviour of the whole man (30), "not of the body only, but alſo of the ſoul." Thus it appears, not that Apollinarius held all theſe opinions, but only that they were ſo many conſequences drawn from his ſentiment, and thought ſufficient to ſhew the abſurdity of it.

(18) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 3. p. 194.

(19) See King on the Creed, p. 254.

(20) Pag. 248—251.

(21) Adv. Hæreſ. Hær. 77.

(22) Tom. 1. de Incarn. Chriſti adverſ. Apollin. p. 628.

(23) King, ubi ſupra, p. 252.

(24) Int. Opera Athanaſ. tom. 2. De S. Trinit. Dial. 4. p. 246.

(25) Commonit. cap. 22. p. 69.

(26) Serm. Ancorat. p. 502.

(27) Epiſt. 1. p. 64.

(28) Tom. 1. De Incarn. Chriſti adverſ. Apoll. p. 630.

(29) Apud Theodorit. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 10. p. m. 208.

(30) Athanaſ. tom. 1. Epiſt. ad Antiochen. pag. 578.

[E] Blended with his own ſubſtance.] Apollinarius is by ſome writers accuſed of maintaining, that the body of Chriſt was conſubſtantial with his Deity: But Mr. Baſnage ſhews that this is falſe (31). For he obſerves

(31) Ubi ſupra, pag. 44.

our readers to judge; only we ſhall obſerve with Mr. Baſnage (u), that it is not ſafe to ſearch for a man's opinion, in the works of thoſe who wrote againſt him. As for the time when Apollinarius began his hereſy it is not exactly known. He was not anathematized as an heretick by name till the ſecond general Council at Conſtantinople, anno 381. But nineteen years before that, viz. anno 362, his hereſy was condemned by a Synod at Alexandria, in which were preſent Athanaſius, Euſebius Biſhop of Verceil in Piedmont, with ſeveral others, without mentioning his name. The reaſon of this might be, either becauſe ſome Monks were ſent by him thither to purge him of the ſuſpicion of hereſy, as there is ground in the relation of the Synod (x) for ſuch a conjecture; or becauſe they were unwilling to believe that ſo great a Doctor of the church could fall into ſo foul an hereſy. Epiphanius writes, that when he firſt heard of this error, by ſome who came from him, he could not believe that a man of his character had eſpouſed ſuch heretical notions, and that they were only ſome people's miſtaken apprehenſions, who could not fathom the depth and profundity of ſo great a ſcholar (y). Or elſe they were unwilling to caſt ſo eminent a man out of the communion of the church, and therefore would firſt condemn his hereſy without mentioning his name, hoping that this might be a means to regain him to the Catholick faith, of which he had been ſo noted and ſtrenuous a Defender. How long before this Synod he vented his hereſy is not certainly known; only it could not be a very conſiderable time, and not above three or four years at fartheſt (z). The ancient and modern Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorians and other writers of controverſy aſcribe Apollinarius's hereſy to very bad motives, but he has been very well defended on that account by the learned Mr. Baſnage, as we ſhall ſhew in the note [F]. We may obſerve, that Jerom, who ſtudied under Apollinarius, aſſerts, that he was of Tertullian's opinion concerning the origin of the ſoul, which he ſaid was ex traduce, that is, that as the body was propagated by the body, ſo was the ſoul by the ſoul. To which Nemeſius adds (aa), that Apollinarius ſupported his opinion

(u) In Diſſert. de Apollinaris Hæreſi.

(x) Athanaſ. Epiſt. ad Antiochen. tom. 1. p. 580.

(y) Epiph. adv. Hær. Dimærit. p. 421.

(z) King, On the Creed, pag. 245, 246.

(aa) In Bibl. Patr. tom. 12. p. 730.

obſerves that Apollinarius in a letter of his to Serapion has theſe words: Eorum autem, qui dicunt carnem Deo conſubſtantialem, magnam inſaniam damnavimus (32); that is, "We condemn the great folly of thoſe who "ſay, that the fleſh is of the ſame ſubſtance with the "Deity." Neither did Apollinarius believe, the two ſubſtances were confounded and blended together in the perſon of Chriſt; for theſe are his own words: "If "a man, ſays he (33), have a ſoul and body, which "tho' united remain ſtill diſtinct, how much more "muſt the Divinity of Chriſt remain unconfounded "with his body." Notwithſtanding theſe poſitive declarations of Apollinarius, moſt of the Fathers have bitterly inveighed againſt him as the author of the greateſt blaſphemies. But this, adds Mr. Baſnage (34), happened, 1. becauſe if Apollinarius drop'd any expreſſion, which could be taken in an heretical ſenſe, even the moſt candid men were apt to object that ſenſe to him as his own. 2. They charged him with the conſequences, which they drew from his opinion, tho' he did not admit them. 3. They aſcribed to him ſeveral opinions, which were only thoſe of his followers. 4. The Fathers too eaſily gave credit to all that was falſly ſaid of Apollinarius. See Epiph. Hær. 77.

(32) Leont. in Bibl. Patr. tom. 4. Part 2. pag. 1031.

(33) Ap. Theodoret. Dial. 2. tom. 4. p. 112.

(34) Ibid.

[F] He has been very well defended by the learned Mr. Baſnage.] The famous Petavius, following Socrates's account (35), ſays, that both the Apollinarius's father and ſon, were very intimate at Laodicea with one Epiphanius a Heathen and a Sophiſt; and that Theodotus Biſhop of that City, fearing that they might by him be drawn over to Paganiſm, adviſed them to have no converſation with Epiphanius. But they both ſlighted his advice; and George the ſucceſſor of Theodotus, having in vain exhorted them again, excommunicated both the father and the ſon; whereupon Apollinarius the Younger, not being able to bear this treatment, and confiding in his eloquence, and in order to revenge himſelf, invented his new hereſy (36). But Mr. Baſnage obſerves upon this, that Petavius (as well as Socrates, whom he copies) muſt be miſtaken. For Apollinarius was very young, when he was excommunicated by Biſhop George; and when he began to publiſh his hereſy he was already advanced in years, if we may believe Nilus (37), and had already publiſhed a great number of books. Beſides, he had been perſecuted by the Arians ſoon after his excommunication, and ſuffered very courageouſly for the orthodox faith; and was afterwards made Biſhop of Laodicea by the orthodox before he began to propagate his heretical opinions. How then can this agree with the learned Petavius's aſſertion (38)? Sozomen's account is not more probable. He tells us (39), that when Theodotus, George's predeceſſor, was Biſhop of Laodicea, Epiphanius an eminent Sophiſt ſung an hymn to the honour of Bacchus, and that Apollinarius, then a young man, and a ſcholar of Epiphanius, was preſent at it. That when Epiphanius, according to cuſtom, ordered all the prophane, who were not initiated in the myſteries of Bacchus, to depart, Apollinarius the father and ſon ſtayed with all the other Chriſtians that were preſent. This coming to the knowledge of the Biſhop, he was extremely offended at it, and having gently reprimanded the laity, he pardoned them; but caſt both the Apollinarius's, who were in Orders, out of the Church. But in a little time, upon their repenting, he admitted them again. However when George was made Biſhop of Laodicea, Apollinarius the Younger having kindly entertained Athanaſius, the Biſhop excommunicated him; and would never admit him again, tho' he often entreated him very earneſtly for it. Apollinarius finding he could not prevail over him, out of ſpite and revenge reſolved to diſturb the Church, and invented his hereſy for that purpoſe. Here follow Mr. Baſnage's obſervations on this paſſage: "I "confeſs, ſays he (40), that all thoſe who communicated "with Athanaſius abhorred George for being an Ari- "an: nor do I deny that both the Apollinarius's "were Athanaſius's intimate friends; for Apollinarius "the Elder has ſaid in writing, that Alexander Biſhop "of Alexandria had been informed from heaven, "that Athanaſius would ſucceed him, and confound "the Arians. Athanaſius himſelf on his return from "his baniſhment went to Laodicea, where he entered "into a great friendſhip with Apollinarius the younger. "But tho' this be true, I cannot believe that George "gave occaſion to Apollinarius's hereſy. What ſort "of a vengeance would this be? Beſides, as the Em- "peror Julian gave liberty of conſcience to every "ſect, the Jews themſelves not excepted, ſo the Ari- "ans favoured all thoſe who did not communicate "with the orthodox. How then is it poſſible, that if "Apollinarius had broke off all communion with "Athanaſius, and often earneſtly deſired George to "admit him, he would have been denied to commu- "nicate with the Arians? Epiphanius, who was co- "temporary with Apollinarius, is not only ſilent a- "bout this application to the Arian Biſhop, but on "the contrary ſays expreſly (41), that Apollinarius "refuſed to agree with the Arians, and underwent his "baniſhment with a truly Chriſtian courage." Theodoret pretends that Apollinarius publiſhed his hereſy out of ambition, and becauſe he had been deprived of the government of the Church (42): "But, ſays Mr. Baſ- "nage (43), where Theodoret differs from other Hi- "ſtorians, he does not deſerve much credit. Beſides, "we may obſerve that the Synod of Antioch, which "Theodoret

(35) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 46. p. 161.

(36) Petav. Dogm. Theol. tom. 4. lib. 1. cap. 6. p. 24, 25.

(37) In Ep. 234.

(38) Baſnage, ubi ſupra, p. 37.

(39) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 25. p. 251.

(40) Ubi ſupra, p. 37, 38.

(41) Hær. 77. p. 1018.

(42) Theodoret. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 4. p. 197.

(43) Ubi ſupra, p. 38, 39.

opinion by the following arguments, 1. That if God created a ſoul for every body that was conceived in the womb, he would be aſſiſting to the fornicators in their lewd actions. 2. That Moſes would then be guilty of a falſity, ſince he affirms that God reſts from all his works (bb). It is not known when he died, though he was certainly living in the time of Theodoſius the Great (cc). Beſides his large work againſt Porphyry, and his other pieces againſt the Hereticks, Socrates ſays (dd), that he wrote an Expoſition of the Goſpels and of the writings of the Apoſtles by way of dialogue after the manner of Plato. And Sozomen mentions a book intitled Of Truth, againſt the Emperor Julian, and the heathen Philoſophers, in which Apollinarius confuted the falſe notions which the Heathens entertained concerning God, and reaſoned only upon the principles of common ſenſe, without quoting any part of the Scriptures (ee). But in that ſame place Sozomen aſcribes to our Apollinarius ſome books which belong to his father, as we have already obſerved (ff). There is alſo an Epiſtle of our Apollinarius, which we have quoted in the remark [E]. The errors objected to him were probably the occaſion of the loſs of his works. For the Orthodox had ſo great a dread of the books of the Hereticks, that they did not even preſerve thoſe which had no manner of relation to their hereſies, though they might have been of great uſe to the church. It was upon this account, as Mr. Du Pin (gg) obſerves, that we have ſcarce any of the works of the ancient Hereticks now remaining; and that the Eutychians were obliged to give the ſanction of the names of ſome Catholick writers, as St. Athanaſius, St. Gregory, and St. Cyril, to thoſe of Apollinarius, in order to preſerve them.

(bb) Apud Baſnage, ubi ſupra, p. 42.

(cc) Labbe, De Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. p. 99.

(dd) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 17. p. 191.

(ee) Sozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 18. pag. 207, 208.

(ff) In the remark [A].

(gg) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 64 and 127. edit. de Paris 1693.

" Theodoret mentions, was held under the Emperor " Gratian, at the time, when the church of that city " was ſo miſerably rent on account of Paulinus and " Meletius, that their diviſion was like to occaſion " a ſchiſm not only in the Eaſt but even in the Weſt. " But Apollinarius's hereſy had already been condemn- " ed by the Synod of Alexandria in 362, and himſelf " anathematized by Pope Damaſus, as appears from " Theodoret himſelf (44). How then is it poſſible, that " an hereſy condemned ſome years before, ſhould now " begin to be publiſhed? It was not therefore out of " ambition that Apollinarius invented his hereſy. But " it is the general fault of Hiſtorians both ancient and " modern, that they chooſe rather to render the au- " thors of hereſies odious, than to anſwer them with " ſolid arguments. They make revenge, ambition, " or avarice the parents of all hereſies, as if men were " ſo fooliſh as wilfully to renounce heaven; and as if " the mind of man, naturally ſubject to error, could " never go aſtray, without ſome particular and ex- " ternal motive and inducement (45)." Mr. Baſnage's Latin words are ſo ſtrong, that we think we ſhall oblige the readers by tranſcribing them here. Hæc obſervo, ſays he, adverſus veteres & recentiores biſtoricos, qui plerumque Hæreſes Auctorum vitiis potius, quam pondere rationum vileſcere volentes, Vindictæ ſtudium, Ambitionem, Auri ſacram famem omnium Hæreſeon genetrices faciunt; quaſi cœlum ipſum non peteremus ſtultitiâ; errorique ſubjecta mens ſine motivis externis in devia tranſgredi nequaquam poſſet. P.

(44) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 5. cap. 3. pag. 195.

(45) Baſnage, ubi ſupra, p. 40.

APOLLO, a Heathen Deity. See PHŒBUS.

APOLLODORUS. A great many perſons of different profeſſions and diſtinguiſhed merit have had this name. Scipio Tetti (a), a Neapolitan, has written a Treatiſe of the Apollodorus's, printed at Rome in 1555, with the Bibliotheca of Apollodorus tranſlated into Latin by Benedictus Ægius (b). Dr. Thomas Gale has treated of this ſubject again above an hundred years after (c). Moreri has given us under this name a great many articles, which have great need of being reviſed. He has omitted a famous Apollodorus, who is the only one that I intend to ſpeak of.

(a) Moreri calls him Tattius, inſtead of Tattius.

(b) See Nicodemo, Additione alla Biblioth. Napolit.

(c) See his Apollodorus printed at Paris with other Tracts, in 1675.

APOLLODORUS, a famous Architect, under Trajan and Hadrian, was born at Damaſcus. He had the direction of the Bridge of Stone, which Trajan ordered to be built over the Danube in the year 104, and which was eſteemed the moſt magnificent of all the noble works of that Emperor. Procopius ſpeaks of it (a); and it is ſomewhat probable, that Apollodorus left a deſcription in writing. Hadrian, who valued himſelf ſo highly upon his underſtanding all Arts and Sciences to perfection, that he grew jealous of and hated every one, who had raiſed himſelf a great reputation in his profeſſion, had ſome very particular reaſons to have no affection for Apollodorus; for one day as Trajan was diſcourſing with the great Architect upon the buildings which he raiſed at Rome, Hadrian gave his judgment, but ſhewed that he knew nothing of the matter (b). Apollodorus turned upon him very bluntly, and ſaid, Go, paint Citruls, for you are very ignorant of the ſubject which we are talking upon. Hadrian at that time was engaged in painting of Citruls, and even boaſted of it. This inſult of Apollodorus coſt him very dear. Hadrian remembered it his whole life, and when he came to be Emperor he did not forget to take his revenge. He never employed Apollodorus, but baniſhed, and at laſt had him accuſed of ſeveral crimes, under the pretence of which he put him to death. He would have been aſhamed to have declared the true cauſe of his puniſhment. Apollodorus had added to his former offence a new injury, which touched this Emperor to the quick: he had found fault with, and what is ſtill worſe, very juſtly found fault with a coſtly building which Hadrian had made. The Emperor, to ſhew Apollodorus that he had no abſolute occaſion for him, ſent him the plan of a temple of Venus; and though he aſked him his advice, it was not to be directed by it, for the temple was already built. Apollodorus wrote very freely what he thought of it, and found ſuch eſſential faults in it [A], as the Emperor could neither deny, nor remedy. It was this which threw the Prince

(a) De Ædific. lib. 4. cap. 6. p. 81. apud Tillemont Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 2. p. 302.

(b) Xiphilin in Hadriano.

[A] He found very eſſential faults in the plan of the Temple of Venus.] He ſhewed by convincing reaſons, that it was built neither large, nor high enough; and that the ſtatues in it were diſproportioned to the Prince into the greateſt paſſion imaginable, and prompted him to get rid of Apollodorus (c). This latter freedom of his was infinitely more excuſable than the former. We do not know whom we offend, when we treat with contempt thoſe ignorants, who pretend to ſhew their knowledge before the greateſt maſters. We ſometimes offend a perſon, whom we may come to be ſubject to [B], or whom we may have great occaſion for. This confirms me in my conjecture with regard to the converſations between Apelles and Alexander [C].

(c) Ex Xiphilin. in Hadriano.

the bulk of the Temple; for, ſaid he, if the Goddeſſes ſhould have a mind to riſe and go out, they could not do it (1). One of our Authors has paraphraſed this thought in the following manner. The Architect Apollodorus ſeeing ſeveral images of the Gods in the Temple of Venus, ſaid immediately, " Theſe Gods would do well to continue " fixed where they are. If they ſhould have a mind to " riſe, unleſs they ſtoop extremely, they muſt beat thro' " the top of the Temple; and it would be ſtill worſe, if " they ſhould attempt to go out; for the door being too " low for them, they muſt ſtoop in a very inconvenient " and indecent manner (2)." I have read ſome where or other, that the ſame objection was made againſt the Olympian Jupiter of Phidias; but others have given a pious turn to it. Let us hear Bardin: It is ſaid, that Phidias having orders to make a ſtatue of Jupiter Olympius, choſe to make it in a poſture of ſitting, and of a height ſo diſproportionate to that of the Temple, that if it had been ſtanding, the top of the temple would have been too low for it. We may obſerve from hence, that God deſcends into our ſouls, which are his temples; but his Eſſence can never be contained in them to its whole extent (3).

(1) Idem.

(2) Coſtar, Apologie, p. 90.

(3) Bardin, Lycée, chap. 2.

[B] We ſometimes offend a perſon, whom we may come to be ſubject to (4).] The relation between Trajan and Hadrian might have put Apollodorus in mind of this; but here we ſee the defect of thoſe, who think themſelves neceſſary, and whom their ſuperior abilities introduce into favour. They imagine, that they have no need to uſe any addreſs towards young Princes, and that their grand patron is ſufficient for them. The times afterwards change, and they find by experience that their magiſterial and haughty behaviour, and their contempt towards every one, who ventures to ſpeak impertinently of their profeſſion before them, is a great inſtance of folly in their conduct.

(4) See the text of the article ANTONIANO towards the end.

[C] This confirms me in a conjecture with regard to the converſations between Apelles and Alexander.] I have declared above (5), that I cannot perſuade myſelf, that this great Painter would venture to take ſo great a liberty of cenſuring that young conqueror, as ſome Authors mention. I know well enough, that thoſe, who excel in certain arts, are ſometimes of ſo capricious an humour, that they are incapable of containing themſelves within the bounds of reſpect, when the whim ſeizes them; but I know alſo, that Apelles is ſaid to have been a man of great civility and politeneſs. This is not my principal reaſon; for my ſtrongeſt is as follows. Alexander, who was a man the leaſt able of all others to bear an affront, would never have ſuffered ſo contemptuous a reproach to eſcape with impunity. Now we do not find, that Apelles ever loſt his favour. The argument from the greater to the leſs is in force here. Hadrian was leſs paſſionate than Alexander. He was not an Emperor, when the affront was offered him; and yet the cenſure of our Architect proved fatal to the latter.

(5) In the remark [D] of the article APELLES.

☞ APOLLONIUS the author of the Argonautics, was born at Alexandria in Egypt (a). He was called Rhodius or the Rhodian, becauſe he taught Rhetoric a long while in the city of Rhodes, as we are informed by the anonymous writer of his life in Greek. Suidas ſtiles him an Alexandrian. Meurſius in his notes upon Apollonius Dyſcolus diſtinguiſhes Apollonius of Rhodes from Apollonius of Alexandria; for which he is juſtly cenſured by Voſſius in his book de Hiſtoricis Græcis (b). He was ſon to Illeus or Silleus, and ſcholar to Callimachus, whom he is accuſed of having treated with ingratitude; by which means he expoſed himſelf to the indignation of that Poet, who gave him the name of Ibis, a bird of Egypt, which uſes to purge itſelf with its bill. He flouriſhed about the 133d Olympiad, under the reign of Ptolomy Euergetes, and ſucceeded Eratoſthenes the Grammarian in the place of Keeper of the Alexandrian Library, as Suidas tells us. We have a Poem of his upon the Expedition of the Argonauts into Colchis or Mingrelia, as it is called at preſent (c). Quintilian in his Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ (d) tells us, that this Poem is of a middle nature between the ſublime and low manner of writing, and that the Author has preſerved a juſt and uniform tenour in his performance. This appears likewiſe to have been the opinion of Longinus in his Treatiſe Of the Sublime (e), who acknowledges that Apollonius never ſinks in his Poem, but has kept it up in an uniform and equal manner. However he declares, that notwithſtanding this advantage he is infinitely inferior to Homer, even with all the faults of the latter, becauſe the ſublime, though ſubject to irregularities, is always preferable to all other kinds of writing. The moderns have proceeded further in their judgments upon our Poet, but their opinions are a little different concerning him [A]. He is ſaid to have written likewiſe a book concerning Archilochus, a Treatiſe of the Origin of Alexandria, Cnidos, and other works. We have the antient Scholia upon his Argonautics ſtill extant; they are very ſhort, but extremely

(a) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans ſur les Poetes Grecs, tom. 3. Part 1. num. 1127. p. 430. edit. Amſterdam 1725.

(b) Lib. 1. c. 16.

(c) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(d) Lib. 10. c. 1.

(e) Cap. 27.

[A] Their opinions are a little different concerning him.] Lilius Giraldus in his Hiſtory of the Poets (1) obſerves, that his Poem is a work of great variety, which coſt the Author an infinite deal of pains; however the ſtyle and manner of it are harſh, and the Poem itſelf is far from being agreeable, except in that part, where the paſſion of Medea is deſcribed. This paſſage, according to the Author above quoted, pleaſed Virgil ſo highly, that he made no ſcruple to copy it almoſt entirely, in order to compoſe the fineſt part of the fourth book of his Æneid. Tanaquil Faber in his Abregé des Vies des Poetes Grecs (2) was of the ſame opinion with Giraldus with regard to Virgil's borrowing from our Poet; but he cannot agree with Longinus, who affirms, that there never was any thing found, which could be objected to in the œconomy of his Poem. He cenſures likewiſe thoſe criticks, who thought that his compoſition was equal, eaſy, and agreeable. However he owns, that he underſtood Greek tolerably well, and had ſome notion of the difference of characters. Claude du Verdier in his Cenſ. omnium Auctorum (3) tells us, that according to the judgment of a great many perſons, the ſtyle of Apollonius was always conſidered as low, rough and inelegant, and that all his contemporaries ridiculed him upon that account. Olaus Borrichius takes notice of this objection in his Diſſertation. de Poetis Græcis (4), and allows, that he was at firſt deſpiſed for the roughneſs of the verſes, which he wrote when he was very young; but he aſſerts, that he afterwards corrected and poliſhed them in ſuch a manner, that they were univerſally applauded. This Critic

(1) Dialog. 3. pag. 338, 380, 341. apud Baillet, tom. 3. Part 1. p. 431.

(2) Pag. 159. apud Baillet, ubi ſupra.

(3) Pag. 46. apud eundem.

(4) Num. 46.

tremely uſeful and full of learning, and are ſuppoſed to have been written by Tarrhæus, Theon, and others (f). Henry Stephens publiſhed an edition of this Poem in Greek in 4to, in 1574, with the Scholia and his own Annotations. There is likewiſe another edition in 8vo publiſhed in Greek and Latin at Leyden in 1641, by Jeremiah Hoelzlin, which is highly eſteemed by ſome perſons, though others have no better opinion of it than of many other editions of the Variorum (g). Monſieur de la Monnoye in his notes upon Baillet's Jugemens des Savans (b), obſerves, that though Hoelzlin's ſtyle is very harſh, yet he is very learned; and that at the end of his Commentary upon Apollonius there are three pages of ſmall notes by Lucas Holſtenius, which Mr. Menage reproaches Baillet for omitting to take notice of, though the latter never undertook to give a compleat Catalogue of all the works, which have been written in order to explain the Authors whom he treats of.

(f) Baillet, pag. 432.

(g) Idem, p. 432, 433.

(b) In loco ſupra citato.

Critic is likewiſe of the ſame opinion with thoſe, who eſteem Apollonius's diction to be pure, correct, uniform, eaſy, and agreeable; and he affirms that our Poet has obſerved the proper order and proportion in his work, and interſperſed in it a great many excellent maxims of policy. But Father Rapin in his Reflections upon Poetry (5) declares that his ſtyle has no manner of elevation or ſublimity, and that the ſtructure of the fable of his Poem is very injudicious; that the Catalogue of the Argonauts has nothing of that variety, which the ſubject was capable of; and that the Poem grows extremely languid from the firſt book. Add to this, that Apollonius has made this expedition to continue but four months; which is an egregious error in him. T.

(5) Part 2. Reflec. 15.

APOLLONIUS of Perga, a city of Pamphylia, was a great Geometrician (a), under the reign of Ptolomy Euergetes, which reaches from the ſecond year of the 133d Olympiad, to the third year of the 139th. He ſtudied a long time at Alexandria under the diſciples of Euclid (b), and compoſed ſeveral works, of which only that of the Conicks remains [A]. This is very much valued, and many Authors both ancient and modern have laboured in commenting upon it, or tranſlating it [B]. M. Des Cartes did not judge

(a) Eutocius Aſcalonita, initio Commentar. in Conica Apollonii, ex Heraclii Vitâ Archimedis.

(b) Pappus, in Proœmio ad l. 7. Mathemat. Collection.

[A] He compoſed ſeveral works, of which we have only that of Conicks remaining.] Two books περὶ λόγου ἀποτομῆς, of the ſection of proportion; two περὶ χωρίου ἀποτομῆς, of the ſection of ſpace; two διωρισμένης τομῆς, of determinate ſection; two ἐπαφῶν, of tactions; two νεύσεων, of inclinations; two τοπων ἐπιπέδων, of plain places (1); eight of Conicks. We cannot doubt of there being eight books in that laſt work. The Author's preliminary Epiſtle, addreſſed to a Geometrician of Pergamus, named Eudemus, ſhews it plainly. The Publick has not yet ſeen the laſt of theſe eight books: the four firſt are the only ones that we have in Greek; the three following were only tranſlated into Latin from the Arabic verſion. See the following note. We find in quotations the books of Apollonius de cochlea, and de perturbatis rationibus (2). I do not know whether we muſt not aſcribe to the ſame Author the Comment on the Phænomena of Aratus, which is attributed by the ancients to Apollonius the Geometrician (3).

(1) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathemat. cap. 16. p. 55. ex Pappi, lib. 7. Mathematicæ Collectionis.

(2) Apud Proclum in Euclidem. See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca, pag. 71.

(3) See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathemat. cap. 32. pag. 156, and de Hiſtor. Græcis, p. 505.

[Dr. Halley * informs us, that there is another work of Apollonius mentioned by Eutocius, in his Commentary on Archimedes's Dimenſio Circuli, commonly called Ὠκυτόκιον †, in which he ſeems to have treated of the rendring of Arithmetical Calculations more expeditious, which were very intricate before the invention of figures. He adds that there is a ſpecimen of it in a Fragment of the ſecond book of Pappus, according to Dr. Wallis, who publiſhed that Fragment in 1688. ADD. REM.]

* Præf. ad Apol. edit. Oxon. in folio, 1710.

† Dr. Halley conjectures with his uſual ſagacity, that for Ὠκυτόκιον we ought to read Ὠκυτόκιον.

[B] Several Authors ancient and modern have laboured in commenting on his Conicks, or tranſlating them.] It is ſaid, that Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, made a Comment on Apollonius's Conicks (4). We have ſtill that which Eutocius of Aſcalon compoſed on the four firſt books of this work, with ſome lemma's and corollaries of his own. He promiſed to comment on the four others. See his Epiſtle dedicatory to Anthemus. We have alſo (5) to the number of ſixty five lemma's, which Pappus diſpoſed and ſet in order on the Conicks of Apollonius. The Catalogue of the works of Francis Maurolycus, printed at Venice, informs us, that this able Mathematician compoſed a book intitled Apollonii conica elementa, libris quatuor & demonſtrationibus & lineamentis opportunis inſtaurata (6). Joannes Baptiſta Memmius (7), a noble Venetian, and Profeſſor of Mathematicks at Venice, made a Latin verſion of the four firſt books of Apollonius, which was printed in 1537 (8). It is good for nothing: he did not underſtand the ſubject, and that was the cauſe of his not perceiving the moſt viſible faults of the Greek manuſcript. Eos primus tranſtulit, ſays Voſſius (9), Joannes Baptiſta Memmius; ſed infeliciter, eò quod argumentum operis non intelligerat: unde non vidit ſat manifeſtas Græci codicis mendas, ac ſæpe pueriliter allucinatur; ſicut monitum Franciſco Maurolyco præfatione in Coſmographiam ſuam. Frederick Commandin (10) made a new verſion of it, a great deal better, which he printed at Bologna, in 1566. He joined to it the verſion of the Commentary of Eutocius, and ſeveral notes. But becauſe he made uſe of a Greek manuſcript, that was full of faults, he could not make his verſion ſo good as he deſired: wherefore Marinus Ghetaldus (11) thought himſelf obliged to go up quite to the ſource of the evil: he endeavoured to correct the manuſcript according to the ſenſe of the Author, and to ſolve the problems: and thought he had reſtored this ancient Geometrician to life (12). See the book which he intitled Apollonius redivivus, ſeu reſtituta Apollonii Pergæi inclinationum Geometria, and his Supplementum Apollonii Galli, ſeu exſuſcitata Apollonii Pergæi tactionum Geometriæ pars reliqua, printed at Venice, in 1607, in 4to. Claudius Richardus a Jeſuit of Franche Comté and Royal Profeſſor of Mathematicks in the Imperial College of his Order at Madrid, explained in his publick Lectures, in 1642, the four firſt books of Apollonius, and in 1643, four other books, of which he was the Author, wherein he ſupplied the other part of the work of this ancient Geometrician (13). What he has done on the four firſt books was printed at Antwerp, in 1655, in folio. He acknowledges, that after having finiſhed theſe two works, he read with a great deal of pleaſure and admiration the Conicks of Claudius Middorgius (14), and the Quadrature of the Circle by Gregory of St. Vincent, where there are a great many things that relate to the loſt books of Apollonius. In quibus (de Quadraturâ Circuli duobus tomis) præter elementa conica peculiari ordine diſpoſita, innumera prodit ſicuti Middorgius, quo ſpectant ad poſtremos quatuor Apollonii libros injuria temporum ſuppreſſos, in lucem revocandos (15). Ferdinand I, Grand Duke of Florence, deſigned to procure ſeveral Arabian Manuſcripts to be tranſlated, that were in his Library. John Baptiſt Raimond, who held the firſt rank amongſt thoſe to whom that Prince allowed penſions for this work, had promiſed to tranſlate Apollonius, of whom there was an Arabic copy in that Library; and there are ſome Authors, who have publiſhed that this verſion was finiſhed (16); but nothing has been found of it amongſt his papers (17). At laſt the Grand Duke Ferdinand II, and his brother Prince Leopold de Medicis caſt their eyes upon Abraham Ecchellenſis, Profeſſor of the Oriental languages at Rome, and impoſed this taſk upon him. He tranſlated into Latin the 5th, 6th,

(4) Claud. Richardus, Præf. ad Apollon. Pergæum, Sect. 10.

(5) In Libro 3. Mathemat. Collect. Pappi.

(6) Claud. Richard. Præf. ad Apollon. Pergæum, Sect. 4.

(7) Moreri calls him, de Meſmes; he took him no doubt for a Frenchman of the family of that name.

(8) Claud. Richardus Præfat. in Apollon. Pergæum, Sect. 15.

(9) Voſſius, de Scient. Math. p. 55.

(10) And not Commandon as Moreri calls him.

(11) He was a Patrician of Raguſa.

(12) Ex Voſſio, de Scient. Mathemat. p. 434.

(13) Claud. Richard. Præf. in Apollon. Sect. 11.

(14) Tres Conicorum Libros Claudii Middorgii .... novâ methodo ex Apollonianis fontibus petitos & proprio ingenio appoſitè digeſtos. Claud. Richard. Præf. in Apollon. Sect. 11.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) As Jerom Lunadorus, in his book de Romanâ Curiâ. See Borelli, in his Preface.

(17) Abrah. Ecchellenſis, in Præfat. Verſionis Apollonii.

judge favourably of it [C]. Some have thought that Apollonius appropriated to himſelf the writings and diſcoveries of Archimedes [D]. He had a ſon who called himſelf Apollonius, 6th and 7th book of Apollonius, with the aſſiſtance of Alfonſus Borelli, Profeſſor of Mathematicks in the Univerſity of Piſo. This tranſlation was printed at Florence in 1661, in folio, with the ſame Borellus's Comment, who maintains in his Preface, that theſe books are not ſuppoſititious, but belong really to our Apollonius. He anſwers the difficulties of Claudius Middorgius, who imagined that the three books, which Golius had brought out of the Levant (18), were written by an Arabian, who had concealed himſelf under the illuſtrious name of Apollonius. Father Merſenna informs us of this opinion of Claudius Middorgius; but he does not approve of it: he is of opinion that the eighth book of the Conicks of Apollonius, and all the other works of the ſame Author, even thoſe which Pappus has not quoted, really exiſt in Arabic tranſlations (19). He depends in this point on Aben Nedin, who wrote a book de Philoſophis Arabibus (20). Obſerve I, that at the end of Golius's manuſcript, it was noted that the eighth book of Apollonius had not been tranſlated into Arabic, becauſe it was wanting in the Greek books, from which the tranſlation of the others had been made. II, That the manuſcript, from which Ecchellenſis made his tranſlation, came out of the Oriental Library, which Ignatius Neama, Patriarch of Antioch, had left to the Grand Duke Ferdinand the firſt (22). III, That Abalphat Aſphahanenſis is the Author of the Arabic tranſlation, which ſerved Ecchellenſis for his original; and which he made for King Abicaligiar, who aſcended the throne in the 372d year of the Hegira. Whence it follows, that this verſion is not the firſt that was made in this language; for Gregory Barhebræus obſerves, that ſeven books of the Conicks of Apollonius were tranſlated into Arabic in the time of Almamun. Now Almamun was inaugurated in the 203d year of the Hegira (23). IV, That Abalphat pretends nevertheleſs that his verſion is the firſt, and that before they had only ſome fragments of the moſt eaſy places of Apollonius. Hence we may conclude, either that he had never ſeen the tranſlation made under Almamun, or that this tranſlation contained only ſome fragments of the Conicks of Apollonius (24).

(18) The 5th, 6th and 7th of the Conicks of Apollonius.

(19) Merſennus, Præfat. in Apollonii Conica, quæ ſunt in ejus Συνόψει Mathematicâ.

(20) See Voſſius de Scientiis Mathemat. p. 55.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Borellus, in Præf.

(23) Abrah. Ecchellenſ. in Præfat.

(24) Idem, ibid.

This is what I could ſay by way of comment on the text of this note. I do not ſpeak of the Apollonius Batavus of Willibrord Snellius, ſeu exſuſcitata Geometria Apollonii Pergæi περὶ διωρισμένης τομῆς, a work printed at Leyden in 1608, in 4to; and I omit Vincentio Viviani, Author of the treatiſe de Maximis & Minimis, geometrica Divinatio in quintum librum Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi, printed at Florence, in 1659, in folio.

[It would be a piece of injuſtice not to take notice in this place of that excellent edition of Apollonius, publiſhed by Dr. Halley in the year 1710, and printed at the Theatre at Oxford, in folio, with the Lemma's of Pappus, and the Comments of Eutocius *. This work was begun by Dr. Gregory, who had undertaken to prepare the four firſt books of Conicks for the preſs, with the Comment of Eutocius, in Greek and Latin, while Dr. Halley was to tranſlate the three laſt out of Arabic into Latin, and to endeavour to reſtore the eighth, which was loſt thro' the injury of time. But the death of Dr. Gregory hindred him from proceeding any farther than the 44th page; ſo that the whole remainder of the work fell upon Dr. Halley. This learned Editor chiefly made uſe of an Arabic verſion in the Bodleian Library, made by Thebit ben Corah, but reviſed about four hundred and fifty † years ago by Naſir-Eddin two of the moſt famous Mathematicians of the Eaſt. He ſometimes alſo conſulted another Arabic manuſcript in the ſame Library, made by Abdolmelec Schirazita a Perſian five hundred years ago, and brought out of the Eaſt by Chriſtianus Ravius, who had given a barbarous tranſlation of it. But what was principally of uſe to him was the famous manuſcript of Golius, which Dr. Marſh, Archbiſhop of Armagh, had purchaſed of Golius's heirs, and readily communicated to him for the publick benefit. From this he in many places not only corrected his own verſion, but alſo ſupplied the deficiencies in the Greek text. This valuable manuſcript contains the firſt ſeven books of the Conicks of Apollonius, and in the margin of the laſt page is written to this effect ‡: "At the end of the copy from which this was tranſcribed it is written, that the eighth part of this book was not tranſlated into Arabic, becauſe it was wanting in the Greek copies." It was tranſlated by Thebit ben Corah, and corrected by Beni Moſes. It was afterwards reviſed by Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Al Haſan Tuſæus, who began his corrections Auguſt 16, 1247, and finiſhed them March 9, 1248. The Scholia were written by Achmed Ebn Aly Abul'farai Mohammed, ſurnamed Ebno' Ibawwâb of Bagdad, who finiſhed that in October 1263. The whole was compleated on the 30th of March in 1303, at Marága, a city on the confines of Media and Aſſyria. Theſe were the helps our Editor had to compleat his work. However the 8th book was ſtill wanting, a difficulty with which no man elſe would have thought of encountering. But it was no diſcouragement to Dr. Halley. That great genius diſcovering the neceſſary connection there muſt be between the ſeventh and eighth books, ventured to ſupply the eighth, and in ſuch a manner, that one cannot fail of thinking, that, if the real book ſhould ever be recovered, it cannot poſſibly differ much from the conjecture of this ſagacious editor. ADD. REM.]

‡ See the Preface to the fifth book.

* See the Preface.

† This was writ in 1710.

[C] Mr. Des Cartes did not think favourably of his Conicks.] "It did not ſeem ſtrange to him, that there "were people who could demonſtrate Conicks more "eaſily than Apollonius, becauſe this ancient writer is "exceſſively tedious and perplexed, and all that he has "demonſtrated is eaſy enough of it ſelf (25)." He compared what he had done in Metaphyſicks to Apollonius's demonſtrations; in which there is really nothing but what is very plain and certain, when one conſiders each point ſeparately. But becauſe they are ſomething long, and one cannot ſee in them the neceſſity of the concluſion, if one does not exactly remember all that went before, there is hardly a man to be found in a whole city, or in a whole province, that is capable of underſtanding them.] However, on the teſtimony of thoſe few that comprehend them, and affirm that they are true, there is no body who does not believe them (26).

(25) Baillet, Vie de des Cartes, tom. 2. p. 39.

(26) Ibid. p. 161.

[D] It has been thought that he appropriated to himſelf the writings and diſcoveries of Archimedes.] Heraclius affirms, that Archimedes was the firſt who laboured on conick theorems, and that his compoſitions thereupon fell, before they were publiſhed, into the hands of Apollonius, who publiſhed them as his own work (27). Eutocius refutes this by two arguments: one that Archimedes ſpeaks in ſeveral places of his books of the Knowledge of Conicks, as of no new thing; the other is that Apollonius does not boaſt of being the inventor of what he has writ: he contents himſelf with ſaying, that he has handled this ſubject more amply than had been done before him (28). This methinks is but a ſorry juſtification with regard to the crime of plagiariſm; for one may eaſily appropriate to one's ſelf the works of another, provided they be not works, wherein the Author pretends to ſay nothing but what is new. The glory of explaining a difficult ſubject, better than had been done before, is enough to tempt a man to ſeize upon a work, that may gain him this honour. Apollonius muſt be in this caſe, as appears by the very terms of his own Apologiſt. This is not all; he boaſts ſometimes in the general ſummary of his eight books to advance ſome new things (29). Judge if it was not a powerful motive to aſcribe a like work to himſelf. Eutocius then ſeems to me to defend him very ill, and I ſhould chooſe to juſtify him by the ſilence of Pappus his cenſurer, and a very ſevere one too. And obſerve, that Pappus not only does not accuſe him of being a plagiary, but alſo acknowledges him expreſly for the true Author of the eight books of Conicks; tho' he pretends that Euclid had already compoſed four books on this ſubject (30). He takes Euclid's part againſt Apollonius, who has obſerved, that this famous Geometrician had ſucceeded very ill in a certain point. He excuſes Euclid by what Apollonius himſelf had acknowledged; that before the diſcoveries of Apollonius it was impoſſible to handle that ſubject well. The

(27) Heraclius, in Vitâ Archimedis, apud Eutocium, init. Comment. in Apollonii Conica.

(28) Eutocius, ibid. See Claudius Richardus in his Preface to Apollonius, Sect. 7.

(29) See the Letter of Apollonius to Eudemus, at the beginning of his firſt book. See alſo his Letter to Attalus, at the beginning of the 4th book.

(30) Pappus, in Proœmio, lib. 7. Mathem. Collect.

lonius, and who carried the second book of Conicks to him, to whom the Author had dedicated it. The Arabians have been very ignorant with regard to his chronology [E]. Moreri has committed many faults here [F].

☞ We may add here from the learned Dr. Halley *, that "He was very famous under "Philopator, who died in the seventeenth year of his reign, and the two hundred and "fifth before Christ; whence we may gather that he was forty years younger than Ar- "chimedes, and that he was not much antienter than Geminus Rhodius, who was cer- "tainly before Hipparchus. This Geminus tells us that our Apollonius obtained on ac- "count of this excellent book of Conicks, the name of the Great Geometrician among "the Mathematicians of his own time." Sub Philopatore (qui imperii sui anno xvii ante Christum ccv. diem obiit supremum) maxima erat in celebritate, teste Ptolemæo Hephæstione apud Photium Cod. cxc. adeo ut hinc liceat conjicere, quod annis circiter xl. minor fuerit Archimede, quodque non longo intervallo præcesserit Geminum Rhodium, certe Hipparcho majorem. Testatur autem Geminus hunc nostrum Apollonium, propter eximium hoc Conicorum opus, inter sui ævi Mathematicos Magni Geometræ nomen adeptum esse.

* Præf. in Apollon. edit. Oxon. in fol. 1710.

The principles, which were made use of before, were not sufficient to lead to it. He pretends that Euclid, full of mildness, honesty, and modesty, kept to the discoveries of Aristæus with relation to Conicks, without desiring either to oppose them, or go beyond them, and that he stopp'd where they could carry him no further; but he was careful not to say, that the point of perfection was there: he would have been blameable in that case (31). Observe by the way, that this shews the falseness of what Heraclius pretends, that Archimedes was the first that wrote concerning Conicks. Vossius has not taken notice of the proofs that overturn this pretence. He observes as something in justification of Heraclius, that Archimedes has sometimes referred to a work on Conicks; and that after his peculiar manner of referring to his own writings (32). He adds, that Guido Ubaldus has proved against Eutocius, that Archimedes was not ignorant that Cones could be cut by planes, that have an inclination different from the side of the Cone (33). But how does this prove the point in dispute? Let us grant that Archimedes had composed a work on Conicks, that was good, fine, and excellent: is this saying that no body had treated of this subject before him, or that this work was stolen by the plagiary Apollonius?

(31) You will find Pappus's words in the note on the article ARISTÆUS the Geometrician.

(32) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. in Addendis, pag. 434.

(33) Guido Ubaldus, initio Commentarii in secundum ἰατροσυνικὸν Archimedis.

[E] The Arabians have been very ignorant in Chronology, with regard to Apollonius.] They have said, that he lived in the time of Ahaz King of Judah, and that his writings on Conicks were the cause of Euclid's writing some books a long time after (34). This is so strange a blunder, that one may well be surprized, that Ecchellensis has treated it with so much precaution. He has abstained from saying that the Arabian Author, who has made it, is mistaken: he says only that this Chronology seems very different from the common. In his longè videtur discrepare Gregorius à communi Chronologorum sententia & opinione, qui Apollonium floruisse scribunt anno periodi Julianæ 4474 . . . . . discrepat præterea ab iisdem Chronologis in ætate Euclidis, quem Apollonio juniorem agnoscit, ubi illi eum collocant in anno periodi Julianæ 4430 (35). That is, "In these things Gregory seems to differ "widely from the common opinion of Chronologers, "who write that Apollonius flourished in the 4474th "year of the Julian Period. . . . . He differs besides "from the same Chronologers in the age of Euclid, "whom he acknowledges to be younger than Apol- "lonius; whereas they place him in the 4430th year "of the Julian Period." Ecchellensis leaves us the liberty of choosing between these two opinions: he had better have decided, that the Arabian Author was mistaken; for that is very certain. And observe, that his mistake is not a difference of a few years: Ahaz began to reign in the 3970th year of the Julian Period. Ptolomy Euergetes, under whom Apollonius flourished, succeeded the King his father, in the 4468th year of the same Period. Thus the mistake is very considerable, it contains a difference of about five hundred years.

(34) Gregorius Barhebræus, l. 3. Chronicorum in Achaz, apud Abrah. Ecchell. Præf. in Apollon.

(35) Ecchellens. ibid.

[F] Moreri has made a pretty many faults in this place.] I. He has given the surname of Great Geometrician simply and absolutely to our Apollonius. He should have used some restriction, and contented himself with saying, that his contemporaries gave him that surname, on account of his capacity in Conicks. This is to a tittle what Eutocius of Ascalon relates (36). II. Moreri pretends, that this surname is the same with that of ὁ Κίτιος: it is a great blunder, be it treated ever so favourably; for in fine, the Apollonius, who had the surname of Κίτιος, was not the Geometrician; he was a native of Cyrene (37), and never had any reputation (38). III. Eutocius does not relate the work of Heraclius concerning the life of Archimedes: he only quotes it. IV. To say that we have the treatise of Cones, Conicorum, translated by John Baptist de Mesmes, is committing a barbarism, and endeavouring to persuade the readers, that this John Baptist has translated all this work; whereas he has translated only the four first books. V. It is not true, that the learned know that these (39) four first books of Apollonius are Euclid's of Megara. VI. No body has said, that Apollonius was the disciple of Eubulides the disciple of Euclid, and there is no probability that he was so, for Eubulides cultivated only the quirks of Dialecticks, and did not teach in Alexandria, where our Apollonius studied under the disciples of Euclid (40). VII. After having advanced, that Euclid is the real Author of the four first books of Apollonius, ought he to have said, that this last wrote Comments on the four first books of Cones of this Philosopher? what confusions, or rather what contradictions! VIII. It is not true, that Golius has translated the fifth, sixth, and seventh Books of Apollonius out of Arabic into Latin. Moreri, who affirms it, is inexcusable, because he had read in Vossius, only that Golius had brought these three books in Arabic out of the Levant, and that the Mathematicians would soon be under great obligations to him, and especially when these three books should be printed (41). IX. The Apollonius, who was Diodorus's master, is not the person treated of in this article. See above (42) two other faults in Moreri.

(36) Eutoc. Ascalon. initio Comment. in Conica Apollonii. He builds upon the testimony of Gemini, lib. 6. Mathemat. Præceptionum.

(37) Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 576.

(38) Idem, lib. 14. pag. 453.

(39) Observe that Moreri had said nothing to which the word these might refer; which makes insufferable nonsense.

(40) See Diogenes Laertius, lib. 2. num. 3.

(41) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. cap. 16. p. 55.

(42) In the note [B] in the marginal quotations (9) and (m).

APOLLONIUS of Tyana, was one of those men of whom the most extraordinary things have been said. I had resolved to make a very long article of him; but having seen that which Mr. Tillemont has given us of him, I thought it was better to employ my time in searching for other things, than to take a great deal of pains only to repeat what he has said, or only to take the trouble of barely copying him. His book will go thro' more hands than this; every body will be readier to consult that than my Dictionary. It will be sufficient to say, that you may find in the second volume of his work (a) a full and exact collection of all that there is most remarkable to be said concerning Apollonius of Tyana. I shall observe however, though it be only for form, that he was born at Tyana in Cappadocia, about the beginning of the first Century; that when he was but sixteen years old, he set up for a strict observer of Pythagoras's rule, renouncing wine, women, and all sorts of flesh, not wearing shoes, letting his hair grow, wearing nothing but linen (b); that that a little after he ſet up for a reformer; that he choſe a habitation in a temple of Æſculapius, where many ſick perſons went to him to aſk for their cure; that when he was of age he gave one part of his wealth to his eldeſt brother; that he diſtributed another part to ſome poor relations; and that he kept very little for himſelf; that he went five years without ſpeaking; that this ſilence did not hinder him from ſtopping many ſeditions [A] in Cilicia and in Pamphylia (c); that he went to travel, and that he ſet up for a Legiſlator; that he boaſted he knew all Languages without having ever learnt them, perceived the thoughts of men (d), and underſtood the oracles which birds gave by their ſinging (e); that he condemned dancing and other diverſions of this nature; that he recommended works of charity (f); that he travelled to almoſt every part of the world (g); that at Cadiz he ſtirred up the Super-intendant of the Province againſt Nero (b) [B]; and that he died very old, without its being ever certainly known where, or in what manner (i). His life has been amply deſcribed by Philoſtratus [C]; it is not to be doubted but that it contains a thouſand fabulous things, or if the facts were true, that they ought to be attributed to the Magic Art. The Heathens were very glad to put the pretended miracles of this man in oppoſition to thoſe of our Saviour [D], and to make them parallel with one another. It is remarkable that St. Auguſtin has acknowledged that Apollonius at the worſt

(a) Pag. 200, &c. of the Brussels edition.

(b) Philost. in Vitâ Apollonii, lib. 1.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid. cap. 14.

(f) Idem, ibid. lib. 4. cap. 1 and 2.

(g) See the 16th Letter of St. Jerom.

(b) Philoſt. lib. 5. cap. 3 and 12.

(i) Under the Empire of Nerva, in the year of Chriſt 96 or 97.

[A] During his ſilence he put a ſtop to ſeveral ſeditions.] That which he put a ſtop to in Aſpendus (1) was one of the moſt difficult to appeaſe, becauſe it conſiſted in making thoſe hearken to reaſon whom hunger had driven to revolt, fames magiſtra peccandi, duriſſima neceſſitatum (2). i. e. "hunger the miſtreſs "of offending, and the hardeſt of neceſſities." They were ready to burn the Governor, becauſe ſome rich perſons, by concealing corn, had brought an extreme ſcarcity on the city. Apollonius, without ſaying a ſingle word, ſtopped this popular emotion. Was ever ſilence ſeen more eloquent, more active, more perſuaſive? He was quite another ſort of man than he of whom Virgil ſpeaks:

Tum pietate gravem ac meritis ſi forte virum quem
Conſpexere ſilent, arrectiſque auribus aſtant:
Ille regit DICTIS animos ac pectora mulcet (3).

"As when in tumults riſe th' ignoble crowd,
"Mad are their motions, and their tongues are loud;
"And ſtones and brands in rattling vollies fly,
"And all the ruſtick arms that fury can ſupply:
"If then ſome grave and pious man appear,
"They huſh their noiſe, and lend a liſt'ning ear;
"He ſooths with ſober WORDS their angry mood,
"And quenches their innate deſire of blood."
Dryden.

He muſt ſpeak, if he would put a ſtop to the fury of a mutinous people. Apollonius had no need of that: his Pythagorean ſilence brings about all that the fineſt figures of the art of Oratory could have effected.

(1) It was the third city of Pamphylia.

(2) Quintil. Declamat. 12. The French have a Proverb, Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles, i. e. "A hungry "belly has no "ears." The Antients had one like it. See in the Chiliads of Eraſmus, Venter non habet aures; i. e. "The belly has "no ears." Cato began a harangue with theſe words, Arduum eſt ad ventrem verba facere, qui careat auribus. i. e. "It is difficult "to argue with "the belly, "which has no "ears." The deſign of it was to appeaſe the people that were crying out for corn.

(3) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 148.

[B] He ſtirred up at Cadiz . . . . him that had the government of the country.] "Philoſtratus extolls him "for having ſtirred up at Cadiz the Governor of the "country againſt Nero, and the other Philoſophers "made no more ſcruple of it than he, [not having "the Chriſtian Religion, which teaches us to conſider "men according to what they are, not in themſelves, "but in the order of God, and never to violate one's "promiſe (4)."] Mr. de Tillemont might have ſpared this moral reflection, and his whole parentheſis. Chriſtianity has many real and ſublime advantages above all Philoſophy; but upon the point here in queſtion, I do not ſee that for theſe thouſand years it has any right to inſult the Philoſophers. The Chriſtians and they have not been in debt to one another on this account for a long time. One may ſay of this engagement never to violate one's promiſe, what the Poets ſaid of chaſtity;

Credo pudicitiam Saturno rege moratam
In terris, viſamque diu . . . .
Quippe aliter tunc orbe novo cœloque recenti
Vivebunt homines (5).

"I grant that chaſtity when Saturn reign'd
"Was ſeen on earth . . . .
"For in the earth's nonage, under heav'n's new frame
"No vice they knew. Sir Robert Stapylton.

(4) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 208.

(5) Juven. Sat. 6. init.

It did not get beyond the three firſt Centuries. Mr. de Tillemont obſerves, that Apollonius ſtrove to ſtir up every body againſt the Emperor Domitian (6). The Author of this Philoſopher's Life reckons it an heroic action (7). This impoſtor had mimicked the Son of God in ſeveral things; but with regard to ſubmiſſion and patience, he dropp'd the maſk, and miſſed his aim. There is no parallel here.

(6) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 210.

(7) Philoſt. lib. 7. cap. 2.

[C] His life has been amply deſcribed by Philoſtratus.] That which Damis, a native of Niniveh, the moſt attached to him of all his diſciples, had compoſed, was in reality nothing but Memoirs indifferently written (8). They fell into the hands of the Empreſs Julia the wife of Severus. She gave them to Philoſtratus, who, from them, and from what he could gather from Apollonius's own works, and ſome other memoirs, compoſed the Hiſtory which we have of him. He ſpeaks of one Maximus of Eges, who had compoſed a book on Apollonius, and of one Mæragenes, who had written four books, but he would not have us depend much upon this laſt (9). See in the note [I] ſome other authors of the Life of Apollonius. As to what Philoſtratus has compoſed, it was firſt printed in Greek, at Venice, by Aldus Manutius, with Euſebius's treatiſe againſt Hierocles. This treatiſe was turned into Latin by Zenobius Acciaioli: the Life of Apollonius was tranſlated into the ſame language, by Alemannus Rhinuccinus, of Florence. Theſe two works were printed in Latin, at Cologn, in 1532, in 8vo, with ſeveral corrections and little marginal notes, by Giſbert Longolius. The Paris edition of all the works of the Philoſtrati, by the care of Frederick Morel, is better than thoſe which were before it; but it were to be wiſhed that ſome good Grecian would correct the Latin verſion. He would find there a good many things that require the hand of a ſkilful Phyſician. See the note [I], and the marginal quotation (n), on the ſubject of Vigenere's tranſlation.

(8) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. p. 201. Ex Philoſt. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(9) Tillemont, ibid. ex Philoſt. lib. 1. cap. 2 and 3.

[D] The Pagans were very ready to oppoſe this man's pretended miracles to thoſe of our Saviour. We need only conſult Euſebius's work (10) againſt one Hierocles, a great enemy of the Goſpel under the Emperor Diocletian. The drift of Hierocles, in the treatiſe which Euſebius refutes, ſeems to have been to draw a parallel between Jeſus Chriſt and Apollonius of Tyana, where he gave the preference to the latter. Theſe words of Lactantius confirm what I have juſt ſaid: Item cum facta Jeſu Chriſti mirabilia deſtrueret nec tamen negaret, voluit oſtendere Apollonium vel paria vel etiam majora feciſſe (11). i. e. "Alſo when "he would have diſcredited the wonderful works of "Jeſus Chriſt, and yet did not deny them, he would "have ſhewn that Apollonius did as great, if not "greater." Mr. Tillemont has ſaid ſomething remarkable: Apollonius, ſays he (12), was one * of the moſt dangerous enemies that the Church has had in its beginning, by the apparent innocence of his life, and by his pretended miracles. The † Devil ſeems to have ſent him into the world, according to his own panegyriſts, [about the ſame time that Jeſus Chriſt was pleaſed to appear in it, either to § ballance his authority in the mind of thoſe who ſhould take the illuſions of this magician for true miracles,] or that thoſe who ſhould acknowledge him for a real cheat and a magician, ſhould be carried ſo far as to doubt alſo of the miracles of Jeſus Chriſt and his Diſciples.

(10) In his book de Demonſt. Evangel. p. 511.

(11) Lact. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 5. cap. 3.

(12) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 200.
* Godeau, Hiſt. de l'Egliſe, pag. 245.
† Apollon. Vita, lib. 1. cap. 3.
§ Godeau, Hiſt. de l'Egliſe, pag. 246.

worſt was preferable to the Jupiter of the Gentiles (k). It cannot be denied but that this Philoſopher received very great honours, both during his life, and after his death [E]; and that his reputation laſted as long as Paganiſm [F]. He left ſome works, which are

(k) See the note [F] quotation (28)

[E] He received very great honours, both during his life and after his death.] Mr. de Tillemont reproaches him juſtly, for † not having been offended at being treated as a God §, and for having ſuffered himſelf ‡ on one occaſion from having divine honours publickly paid him, it was, ſays his Hiſtorian, for fear of envy (13). The inhabitants of Tyana built a temple to their Apollonius after his death (14): his image is alſo in a great many other temples (15). The Emperor Adrian collected the letters of Apollonius, as much as poſſibly he could, and laid them up in his fine palace of Antium, with a little book of this Philoſopher's concerning the anſwers he had received from the Oracle of Trophonius. This little book was ſtill to be ſeen at Antium, in the time of Philoſtratus; and there was nothing that rendred this city ſo particularly famous as that little book (16). Antoninus Caracalla had a very great veneration for Apollonius: he built alſo a temple to him as to a Hero (17). The Emperor Alexander had the image of his Philoſopher, in a particular place of the palace, amongſt thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt, Abraham, and the beſt Princes (18). Aurelian, after having taken a reſolution to ſack Tyana, did not do it, becauſe Apollonius appeared to him, and forbad him. Not contented with obeying this order of Apollonius, he vowed to him an image, a temple, and ſtatues. Vopiſcus, when he informs us of that, declares himſelf an admirer and devotee of Apollonius, and promiſes to write his Life. The paſſage is worth relating notwithſtanding its length; almoſt the whole of it is a proof of the text of this remark. Taceri non debet res quæ ad famam venerabilis viri pertinet. Fertur enim Aurelianum de Thyanæ civitatis everſione vera dixiſſe, vera cogitaſſe: verum Apollonium Thyanæum celeberrimæ famæ autoritatiſque ſapientem, veterem philoſophum, amicum verum Deorum, ipſum etiam pro numine frequentandum, recipienti ſe in tentorium ea forma qua videtur, ſubito aſtitiſſe, atque hæc Latine, ut homo Pannonius intelligeret, verba dixiſſe: Aureliane, ſi vis vincere, nihil eſt quod de civium meorum nece cogites. Aureliane, ſi vis imperare, à cruore innocentium abſtine. Aureliane, clementer te age, ſi vis vincere. Norat vultum Philoſophi venerabilis Aurelianus, atque in multis ejus imaginem viderat templis. Denique ſtatim attonitus, & imaginem & ſtatuas & templum eidem promiſit, atque in meliorem rediit mentem. Hæc ego à gravibus viris comperi, & in Ulpiæ bibliothecæ libris relegi, & pro majeſtate Apollonii magis credidi. Quid enim illo viro ſanctius, venerabilius, antiquius, diviniuſque inter homines fuit? Ille mortuis reddidit vitam? Ille multa ultra hominem & fecit & dixit: quæ qui velit noſſe, Græcos legat libros, qui de ejus vita conſcripti ſunt. Ipſe autem, ſi vita ſuppetat, atque ipſius viri favori uſquequaque placuerit, breviter ſaltem tanti viri facta in literas mittam: non quo illius viri geſta munere mei ſermonis indigeant, ſed ut ea quæ miranda ſunt omnium voce prædicentur (19). i. e. "I muſt not conceal a thing "that conduces to the honour of the venerable man. "For it is reported, that Aurelianus ſpoke truly and "thought truly of the ſubverſion of the city Thyana: "but that Apollonius of Thyana, a man of great "fame and authority, an old Philoſopher, and true "friend of the Gods, and himſelf alſo to be reſorted "to as a Deity, appeared to him on a ſudden, in ſuch "a ſhape as he is ſeen, juſt as he was retiring into "his tent, and ſpoke to him thus in Latin, ſo as Aurelian a native of Pannonia might underſtand: If you would conquer, O Aurelianus, you muſt not think of the deſtruction of my Citizens. If you would reign, O Aurelianus, abſtain from the blood of the innocent. If you would conquer, O Aurelianus, behave your ſelf with clemency. Aurelianus knew the face of the venerable "Philoſopher, and had ſeen his image in many temples. And being immediately aſtoniſhed, he promiſed him an image, and ſtatues, and a temple, "and altered his former reſolution for the better. This I "have had from men of gravity, and have read it in "books in the Ulpian Library, and believed it the "more on account of the majeſty of Apollonius. "For what was more holy, more venerable, more "noble, and more divine amongſt men? He reſtored "the dead to life. He did and ſaid many things "above the reach of man: which he that deſires to "know muſt read the Greek books that are written "concerning his Life. And I myſelf, if my life "be but ſpared, and he himſelf ſhall be pleaſed with "it, will commit to writing briefly at leaſt the actions of ſo great a man: not that the deeds of ſuch "a man ſtand in need of my praiſe, but that ſuch "things as are to be admired, may by celebrated by "the voice of all men." Thoſe words of Lampridius, concerning the adoration of the Emperor Alexander are no leſs worthy to be related. We learn from thence, that he began the day with acts of devotion, when he was in a fit ſtate, that is, when he had not lain with his wife. He went in the morning into his oratory, to perform there the religious ceremonies in honour of the Patrons he had choſen; of whom Apollonius was one. Uſus vivendi fuit. Primum ut, ſi facultas eſſet, id eſt, ſi non cum uxore cubuiſſet, matutinis horis in lararia ſuo (in quo & divos principes, ſed optimos electos & animas ſanctiores, in queis & Apollonium, & quantum ſcriptor ſuorum temporum dicit, Chriſtum, Abraham, & Orpheum, & hujuſcemodi Deos habebat, ac majorum effigies) rem divinam faciebat (20). Euſebius teſtifies, "that in "his time there were ſome that pretended to make "enchantments, uſing with them the name of Apol- "lonius (21)."

(19) Vopiſcus, in Aureliano, cap. 24.

(20) Lamprid. in Alexand. Severo, cap. 29.

(21) Euſeb. in Hierocl. p. 476, 477. quoted by Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emp. p. 220.

[F] His reputation laſted as long as Paganiſm.] Mr. de Tillemont, who denies this, makes uſe of the teſtimonies of Lactantius and Euſebius. About the beginning of the fourth Century, ſays he (22), Apollonius was no longer honoured as a God, tho' it is pretended that the Epheſians ſtill reverenced his ſtatue, tho' not under his own name but that of Hercules, becauſe it was manifeſt that he was nothing but a mere man and an impoſtor. Euſebius affirms alſo, that [ſcarce] any body knew Apollonius any longer at that time, not only as a God, or an extraordinary and wonderful man, but even as a mere Philoſopher. Mr. de Tillemont quotes the third chapter of the fifth book of Lactantius, and Euſebius againſt Hierocles, pag. 468. I acknowledge Lactantius ſuppoſes, that no one honoured Apollonius as a God: Cur igitur, aſks he, ô delirum caput, nemo Apollonium pro Deo colit? niſi forte tu ſolus illo ſcilicet Deo dignus, cum quo te in ſempiternum verus Deus puniet; i. e. "Why then, O madman, does no one "worſhip Apollonius for a God? unleſs perhaps you "alone who are worthy of ſuch a God, with whom "the true God will puniſh you eternally." But he does not deny what the Author whom he refutes had advanced; that they ſtill honoured at Epheſus the image conſecrated to Apollonius under the name of Hercules: Simulacrum ejus ſub Herculis Alexicaci nomine conſtitutum ab Epheſiis etiam nunc honorari (23). He contents himſelf with making uſe of Apollonius's not being honoured under his true name, but a borrowed one. Ideo alieni nominis titulo affectavit divinitatem, quia ſuo nec poterat nec audebat; that is, "Therefore he affected Divinity under a borrowed "name, becauſe he neither could nor durſt do it under "his own." That is more ſubtil than ſolid; for when the Epheſians conſecrated this image, they had no deſign to honour any but Apollonius, and they made uſe of the title of Hercules ἀποτροπαῖος, or Alexicacus, only to ſhew that Apollonius delivered them from the plague. There does not ſeem to be any artifice in all this: Apollonius did not ſeek to cover himſelf under another name thro' any fear, that his own might give men's minds any ſcruple. Here then is a good teſtimony produced by Lactantius, concerning the worſhip that was ſtill given to our Apollonius at the beginning of the fourth Century. With all the reſpect due to this Father, I know not how to perſuade myſelf that thoſe of Tyana had diſcontinued their veneration, or that the images of Apollonius were taken out of all their temples (24). I find in Euſebius, that in his time, there was a rumour that abundance of things were done by the invocation of the name of Apollonius.

(22) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 220.

(23) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 5. cap. 3. pag. 310.

(24) See the paſſage of Vopiſcus in the preceding note, quotation (19).

† Philoſt. in Apollon. Vitâ, lib. 8. cap. 2. pag. 376.

§ Ibid. lib. 7. cap. 10. p. 346. See alſo lib. 1. cap. 13. pag. 25.

‡ Ibid. lib. 4. cap. 19. p. 189.

(13) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 216.

(14) Philoſtrat. lib. 1. cap. 4. p. 6. See alſo lib. 8. cap. ult.

(15) Vopiſcus, in Aureliano, c. 24.

(16) Philoſt. in Vita Apollonii, lib. 8. cap. 8.

(17) Herodian. Dio, lib. 77. pag. 878. c. apud Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emp. pag. 219.

(18) Lamprid. pag. 123, apud eundem.

are not now extant [G]. They mention another Philoſopher named Apollonius of Tyana [H]; he lived under the reign of Hadrian. I do not know of what ſect he was; but no body is ignorant that our Apollonius was a ſtrict Pythagorean. He made ſo open a profeſſion of the belief of Tranſmigration, that he cauſed a Lion to be worſhiped, under pretence that the ſoul of Amaſis (l) was united with the body of this beaſt (m). We have his life tranſlated into French by Blaiſe de Vigenere, from the Greek of Philoſtratus (n), with a very ample commentary by Artus Thomas Sieur d'Embry a Pariſian. It is not long ſince an Engliſh tranſlation of this life, with notes, furiouſly offended the pious (I]. It was condemned, proſcribed, anathematiz'd, and not without reaſon. I ſhall Apollonius. Αὐτίκα τῶν νῦν εἰσιν, οἱ περίεργοις μηχαναῖς τῇ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἀνακλήσεως προσηγορίᾳ κατειληφέναι λέγουσι (25); i. e. "And there are ſome now, who ſay "they have found magical powers in the invocation "of his name, whereby ſome ſuperſtitions are per-"formed." He calls them magical or ſuperſtitious; but we muſt not queſtion that ſeveral Pagans took them for good miracles. I find in St. Auguſtin, that in his time, the Chriſtians were ſo teazed with the chimerical parallel between the miracles of Apollonius, and thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt, and with the ridiculous pretence that the firſt equalled or exceeded the laſt, that they had recourſe to this great light of the Church, for a refutation of this difficulty. Sed tamen etiam ego in hac parte, qui PLURIMIS quicquid reſcripſeris, PROFUTURUM eſſe confido, precator acceſſerim, ut ad ea VIGILANTIUS reſpondere digneris, in quibus nihil amplius Dominum quam alii homines facere potuerunt, feciſſe vel geſſiſſe mentiuntur. APOLLONIUM ſiquidem ſuum nobis & Apuleium alioſque magicæ artis homines in medium proferunt, quorum majora contendunt extitiſſe miracula (26); that is, "But yet I alſo, who "truſt that whatſoever you ſhall write on this occaſion "will be of USE to VERY MANY, beſeech you to an-"ſwer thoſe VERY CAREFULLY, who feign that our "Lord has done no more than other men could "have done. And they produce their Apollonius "and Apuleius, and other magicians, whoſe miracles "they affirm to be greater." It was then that St. Auguſtin declared what has been read in this article (27; that Apollonius of Tyana was preferable to Jupiter, which by the way ought to make ſome modern Divines aſhamed, who cannot bear that one ſhould look upon the privation of the knowledge of God as a leſs ſin than the Gentiles worſhipping abominable Deities, and worſe, in St. Auguſtin's opinion, than magicians. Quis autem vel riſu dignum non putet, quod Apollonium & Apuleium exteroſque magicarum artium peritiſſimos conferre Chriſto, vel etiam præferre conantur, quamquam TOLERABILIUS ferendum ſit, quando illos ei potius comparent quam Deos ſuos: multo enim melior, quod fatendum eſt, Apollonius fuit, quam tot ſtuprorum auctor & perpetrator, quem Jovem nominant (28); that is, "But who does not think it "ridiculous, that they endeavour to compare Apollo-"nius and Apuleius and other Magicians with Chriſt, "or even prefer them, tho' this is more TOLERA-"BLE than the comparing of their own Deities with "him: for it muſt be confeſſed, that Apollonius was "much preferable to that author and perpetrator of "ſo many adulteries, whom they call Jupiter." The ſame Father obſerves that the Pagans, who made a jeſt of the Hiſtory of Jonas, would have given a great deal of credit to a like adventure, if it had been related of Apuleius or Apollonius of Tyana. Si hoc quod de Jona ſcriptum eſt, Apuleius Madaurenſis, vel Apollonius Tyaneus, feciſſe diceretur, quorum multa mira, nullo fideli auctore, jactitant . . . . ſi de iſtis ut dixi quos Magos vel Philoſophos laudabiliter nominant tale aliquid narraretur, non jam in buccis creparet riſus, ſed typhus (29). Laſtly I find, that Eunapius wrote at the beginning of the fifth Century, that Apollonius was not ſo much a Philoſopher, as ſomething between a God and a man, and that Philoſtratus ought to have intitled his Hiſtory of him, the deſcent of a God upon the earth (30). Am I then in the wrong to affirm, that Apollonius's glory laſted as long as Paganiſm?

(l) He had been King of Egypt.

(m) Philoſt. lib. 5. cap. 15.

(n) The title informs us that Fed. Morel, Reader and Interpreter to the King, has reviſed and corrected this verſion exactly according to the Greek original. It was printed at Paris in 1611, in 2 vol. in 4°.

There is nothing more for me to do now than to anſwer to the authority of Euſebius, which Mr. de Tillemont has laid great ſtreſs upon. This is no difficult matter; for it is plain from the facts juſt now alledged, that Euſebius repreſents hyperbolically what ſeems to have no ſhadow of truth. How could it be true, that no body, in the time of Euſebius, did Apollonius the honour of treating him as a Philoſopher, when Ammianus Marcellinus, in the ſame Century, having ſpoken occaſionally of a fountain near Tyana, mentions Apollonius with this elogy, Ubi ampliſſimus ille Philoſophus, Apollonius traditur natus (31)? I ſhould chooſe rather to ſay, for the honour of Euſebius, that he ſpeaks of Philoſtratus, in ſuch a manner that his ſenſe is, that there is no occaſion to refute at large the whimſies related by Philoſtratus, ſeeing he is an author not at all regarded, and not ſo much as ranked in the number of Philoſophers. This explication is (I confeſs) ſubject to ſome difficulties; but it is certain, that Euſebius pretends to attack the Phantom of Philoſtratus, and not the real Apollonius. Does not he declare, that he has always looked upon Apollonius as a learned man, and conſents that he ſhould be placed in the number of the Philoſophers with all ſorts of honour? that he rejects only the fables and ſupernatural virtues, of which Philoſtratus and ſome other Panegyriſts have ſpoken: and that in the reaſoning upon what Philoſtratus aſſerts, he will ſhew that Apollonius is unworthy to be reckoned, not only in the number of the Philoſophers, but alſo in the number of perſons of a moderate degree of virtue: ſo far was he from deſerving any competition with Jeſus Chriſt: Μόνην ἐπισκεψώμεθα τὴν δ' Φιλοστράτου γραφὴν δι' ἧς εὐθυνοῦμεν ὡς οὐχ ὅτι γε ἐν φιλοσόφοις ἀλλ' οὐδ' ἐν ἐπιεικέσι καὶ μετρίοις ἀνδράσιν ἄξιον ἐγκρίνειν, οὐχ' ὅπως τῷ σωτῆρι ἡμῶν Χριστῷ παρατιθέναι τὸν Ἀπολλώνιον (32).

(31) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 23. cap. 6. p. 370.

(32) Euſeb. in Hierocl. pag. 514.

[G] He left ſome works, which are now loſt.] He had writ four books of Judicial Aſtrology (33), and a Treatiſe upon the ſacrifices (34), to ſhew what is to be offered to each Deity. This laſt work grew very famous: Euſebius quotes it (35). Suidas alſo takes notice of it, and adds to it a Teſtament, a Collection of Oracles and Letters, and the Life of Pythagoras (36). The Theology, of which Euſebius quotes a paſſage (37), is perhaps the ſame with that on ſacrifices. Apollonius wrote an infinite number of Letters: Philoſtratus has inſerted ſome of them in his Hiſtory, all very ſhort. The Hymn on Memory is not a work of Apollonius, as Mr. de Tillemont pretends. He quotes the eleventh chapter of the firſt book of Philoſtratus, page 18. I have not found it there, but only that Apollonius at the age of a hundred years had a better memory than Simonides ever had, and that he often ſung the Hymn which Simonides had compoſed in praiſe of memory. Suidas relates this ſo confuſedly, that he ſeems to ſay it was Apollonius that compoſed this piece. Konig was entrapped by it. See his Bibliotheca, page 49. The Teſtament, which Suidas mentions, διαθήκη, is no doubt the ſame book that Philoſtratus has quoted in theſe words: Καὶ διαθήκαι ὃ τῷ Ἀπολλωνίῳ γεγράφθαι παρ' ὧν ὑπάρχει μαθεῖν ὡς ὑπολιάζων τὴν φιλοσοφίαν ἐγένετο (38); that is, "And there were Teſtaments "(or Memoirs) written by Apollonius, by which one "might learn how tranſported he was with Philo-"ſophy."

(33) Περὶ μαντικῆς ἀστέρων. De Divinatione Aſtrorum. Philoſtrat. in vitâ Apollonii, lib. 3. cap. 13.

(34) Idem, ibid. Vide etiam lib. 4. cap. 6.

(35) Euſeb. Præparat. Evangel. lib. 4. cap. 13. pag. 150.

(36) Suidas in Ἀπολλώνιος, pag. 376.

(37) Euſeb. Demonſt. Evangel. l. 3. c. 3. p. 105.

[H] There is mention made of another Philoſopher called Apollonius of Tyana.] It is Suidas that ſpeaks of him upon the credit of Agreſphon, who wrote a book concerning perſons of the ſame name, περὶ Ὁμωνύμων, de Homonymis. This brings to my mind that a learned man, whom I quoted before (39), queſtions whether the ancients wrote books like thoſe of Leo Allatius, de Simeonibus, de Pſellis, &c. But he need not queſtion it; for beſides Agreſphon, we have Demetrius Magnes. Some learned men would add Dionyſius of Sinape and Simariſtus; but they are miſtaken. See the note [B] of the article of this DEMETRIUS towards the end.

(38) Philoſtrat. Vita Apollon. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(39) Mr. de Sallo. See the note (F) of the article ALLATIUS, towards the middle.

[I] An Engliſh tranſlation of this Life . . . . has furiouſly offended the pious.] The Author of this verſion

(25) Euſeb. in Hieroclem, pag. 541.

(26) Marcellin. ad Auguſtinum, Epiſt. 3. inter Auguſtini Epiſtolas,

(27) Quotation (k).

(28) Auguſt. Epiſt. 4. p. 23.

(29) Idem, Epiſt. 49. pag. 208.

(30) Eunapius, de Vitis Philoſoph. Præf. p. 2. I make uſe of Mr. de Tillemont's words, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. p. 220.

ſhall ſpeak of it in the notes. If we had what a contemporary Philoſopher, named Euphrates, had ſatyrically written againſt Apollonius, we ſhould have an ample collection of ſlanders, for when ſuch rivals once declare a war, they diſcloſe many ſecrets. Philoſtratus was in the right to make uſe of the ſilence of this Euphrates, to convict thoſe of calumny who had ſlandered Apollonius with regard to his chaſtity, and boldly to maintain that Apollonius, in the moſt vigorous part of his youth, had triumphed over nature, and had always lived in a ſtrict continence (o). Sidonius Apollinaris has drawn a character of Apollonius, in which you may ſee as great a philoſophical hero as can be imagined [K]. The author of the portrait does not forget to make a good many excuſes to the Catholick faith.

(o) Philoſt. lib. 1. cap. 8.

ſion had brought it down only to the third book excluſively. If he had only tranſlated it, there had been no room to complain; but he has added a great number of very large notes to his verſion, which he had taken for the moſt part out of the manuſcripts of the famous Lord Herbert. That is the name of a great Deiſt, if one may believe a good many people. Thoſe who have read theſe notes, have aſſured me that they are full of poiſon; that they tend only to the ruin of revealed Religion, and to render the holy Scriptures contemptible. The Author does not endeavour after this by reaſons propoſed gravely and ſeriouſly, but almoſt continually by prophane ralleries and little ſubtilties. It was therefore with a great deal of juſtice and wiſdom, that this book, which was printed at London, in 1680 (40), has been ſeverely prohibited. This new tranſlator of Philoſtratus was Mr. Charles Blount, an Engliſh Gentleman. He publiſhed, in 1693, a treatiſe intitled the Oracles of Reaſon, and accompanied it with other little pieces of the ſame ſtamp. He came to a tragical end, the ſame year. He was very fond of his brother's widow, and pretended he might marry her without inceſt: he had writ a treatiſe to prove it; but he ſaw no probability of obtaining the conſent of the Church. Upon that, he fell into deſpair and killed himſelf. See the Hiſtory of the works of the learned (41). To conclude, Mr. de Tillemont, ſpeaking of thoſe who have written the Life of Apollonius, ſtops at Philoſtratus. Let us go farther: Nicomachus, who lived under the Empire of Aurelian, wrote the Life of Apollonius after that which Philoſtratus had writ. Taſcius Victorianus made another upon that which Nicomachus had compoſed. Sidonius Apollinaris made another, and regulated himſelf much more by the model of Victorianus, than upon that of Nicomachus (42). We read in Suidas, that Soterichus, a native of Oaſis in Egypt, had compoſed the Life of Apollonius. This Author lived under the Empire of Aurelian. I cannot gueſs at Savaron's authority for putting Plutarch among thoſe who have writ the Life of our Apollonius (43).

(40) The title expreſſes the year 1680. The book muſt have remained concealed ſeveral years; for it was not condemned before 1695.

(41) Month of November 1693, pag. 135, 136.

(42) Ex Sidonii Apollinaris, Epiſt. 3. lib. 8.

(43) Savaro in Sidon. Apollinar. pag. 491.

[K] Sidonius has repreſented him in a Deſcription, wherein we ſee a Hero of Philoſophy as great as poſſible.] That every one may judge of it, let us give here the words of Sidonius Apollinaris. He had written the Life of Apollonius, and ſending it to a Counſellor of Evariges King of the Goths, this is what he ſays to him. Lege virum (fidei Catholicæ pace præfatâ) in plurimis ſimilem tui, id eſt, à divitibus ambitum, nec divitias ambientem; cupidum ſcientiæ, continentem pecuniæ; inter epulas abſtemium, inter purpuratos linteatum, inter alabaſtra cenſorium: concretum, hiſpidum, hirſutum, in medio nationum delibutarum; atque inter ſatrapas regum tiaratorum myrrhatos, pumicatos, malobatratos, venerabili ſqualore pretioſum. Cumque proprio nihil eſui aut indutui de pecude conferret, regnis ab hoc, quæ pererravit, non tam ſuſpicioni, quam fuiſſe ſuſpectui; & fortuna regum ſibi in omnibus obſecundante, illa tantum beneficia poſcentem, quæ mage ſit ſuetus oblata præſtare, quam ſumere (44); that is, "Read of a man (with reverence to the Catholick Faith be it ſpoken) in moſt things like your ſelf, ſought after by the rich, yet not ſeeking after riches; covetous of knowledge, not of money; abſtemious in the middle of feaſts; plainly cloathed amongſt the ſumptuous, ſevere amongſt the luxurious, rough and unadorned in the midſt of delicate nations; and ſhining with a venerable negligence amongſt the wanton Nobles of Perſian Kings. And when he made no uſe of the flocks either for food or apparel, he was rather ſlighted than envied in the Kingdoms thro' which he travelled: and when the good fortune of Kings favoured him in every thing, he only aſked thoſe favours, which he was more ready to give than take."

(44) Sidon. Apollinar Epiſt. 3. lib. 8. pag. 486.

APONO (a) PETER DE) one of the moſt famous Philoſophers and Phyſicians of his time, was born 1250 (b), in a village ſituated four miles from Padua. He ſtudied a long time at Paris, and was there promoted to the degree of Doctor in Philoſophy and Phyſick [A]. I do not know whether he died rich or not, but I have read that he would

(a) Some call him Peter de Avano.

(b) Jacobus Philippus Tomaſinus, Elog. Illuſt. Vir. pag. 22.

[A] He ſtudied a long time at Paris, and was there advanced to the degree of Doctor in Philoſophy and Phyſick.] Naudæus obſerves this in an Oration wherein he extols as much as he is able the ancient glory of the Univerſity of Paris. I ſhall relate his words at length, becauſe they inform us by the way, that Peter de Apono compoſed at Paris the great work, which obtained him the name of the Reconciler. Prodeat tandem Petrus Aponenſis ab inſigni libro, quem dum veſtras ſcholas frequentaret edidit, Conciliatoris nomen adeptus: certè latebat in Italia, nulli prope cognita, nullis aliis diſciplinis, nullis artibus, nedum propriis exculta, nulla denique, vel linguarum cognitione, vel Philoſophiæ nitore decorata medicina; cum ecce tutelaris illius genius, ex Aponenſis balnei pago, Italiam ab ignorantiæ barbarie, velut alter Camillus Romam à Gallorum obſidione liberaturus; diligenter inquirit, ubinam gentium humaniores literæ felicius excolerentur, Philoſophia ſubtilius traderetur, medicina purius & ſolidius doceretur: cumque reſciviſſet uni Lutetiæ hanc laudem deberi, in eam ſtatim involat, illius gremio totum ſe tradit, Philoſophiæ Medicinæque myſteriis ſedulo incumbit, gradum, & lauream in utraque conſequitur, utramque poſtea celeberrimè docet, & poſt diuturnam annorum moram divitiis veſtris onuſtus, imò Philoſophus, Medicus, Aſtrologus, Mathematicus ſuæ tempeſtatis præſtantiſſimus in patriam ſuam revertitur, & primus omnium, Scardæoni viri gravi ſſimi judicio, ſynceram Philoſophiam, & Medicinam illi reſtituit. Unde gratitudinis ergo compellandus venit, & à vobis merita gratia proſequendus Michael Angelus Blondus Medicus Romanus, quod ſuperiori ſeculo Aponenſis veſtri Conciliationes phyſiognomicas elegantioribus typis demandare volens; cum vidiſſet eas à doctore veſtro, Pariſiis, & in facultate veſtra fuiſſe elaboratas, has idcirco veſtri Collegii nomine & auſpicio in lucem prodire voluerit, ut communis loci famæ beneficio frueretur (1). That is, "At length let us ſpeak of Peter de Apono, who obtained the name of the Reconciler by a famous book, which he put out whilſt he frequented your ſchools. Phyſick then lay hid in Italy, hardly known by any body, cultivated with no other diſciplines, and no arts, not ſo much as thoſe which properly belong to it, not adorned with any knowledge of languages or ſplendor of Philoſophy; when behold its tutelar genius comes out of the village of Apono like another Camillus, to free Italy from the barbarity of ignorance, as the firſt did from the beſieging of the Gauls; he inquires diligently, where the liberal ſciences were moſt ſucceſsfully cultivated, where Philoſophy was moſt ſubtilly handled, where Phyſick was taught moſt purely and ſubtilely: and as ſoon as he knew that this glory was entirely due to Paris, he immediately flies thither, throws himſelf would be paid very large ſums for his viſits to the ſick [B]. He was ſuſpected of Magick, and proſecuted by the Inquiſition upon that account [C]; and if he had lived to the end of the proceſs, it is very likely that he would have ſuffered in perſon what he only ſuffered in effigy after his death. We ſhall relate (c) what his Apologiſts obſerve. His corps

(1) Gabriel Naudæus, de Antiquitate Scholæ Medicæ Pariſienſis, pag. 44, & ſeq.

(c) In the note [C].

" himſelf wholly into her boſom, labours diligently " upon the myſteries of Philoſophy and Phyſick, ob- " tains a degree and the laurel in both; afterwards " teaches both of them with honour, and after a ſtay " of many years, returns into his own coun- " try, laden with your riches, and at the ſame " time the beſt Philoſopher, Phyſician, Aſtrolo- " ger and Mathematician of his time, and was the " firſt, in the opinion of Scardæonus a man of great " judgment, who reſtored true Philoſophy and Phyſick " to it. Whence gratitude leads you to celebrate " Michael Angelus Blondus a Roman Phyſician, who " in the laſt Century being about to print the Conci- " liationes Phyſiognomicæ of your Apono in a beautiful " manner, when he ſaw they were drawn up by a " Doctor of yours, at Paris, and in your Faculty, " was pleaſed to publiſh them in the name and under " the patronage of your College."

[B] He took large ſums for viſiting the ſick.] It is not ſet down what he demanded for the viſits he made in the place of his reſidence, but it is affirmed that he would not go to the ſick out of the city unleſs they gave him a hundred and fifty florins a day (2). It is added, that being ſent for by Pope Honorius IV, he demanded four hundred ducats a day (3). Thus much we learn from the abridgment of his Life inſerted in the new edition of Vander Linden de Scriptoribus Medicis; Camerarius relates the ſame thing (4); but does not name the Pope who had recourſe to this Phyſician. But he is not ſilent with regard to the place where Peter de Apono lived. He ſays it was Bologna. He makes mention alſo of Honorius IV; but pretends that the Phyſician, who exacted ſo enormous a ſum of the Pope, was not Peter de Apono. He ſays to this effect: In the time of our fathers, a Florentine Phyſician, named Thaddæus, gained ſuch reputation, that going to practiſe out of the city, he got fifty crowns a day, and being ſent for by Pope Honorius the fourth, he had a hundred a day, ſo that at his return from Rome he brought with him ten thouſand crowns (5). If he had looked into Chronology, he would not have ſaid in the time of our fathers; for this Pope was elected in 1285, and died in 1287. Don Lancelot de Perouſe quoting Ciaconius (6), ſays that this Thaddæus, a Florentine, and Profeſſor at Bologna, got a promiſe of a hundred crowns a day, when Pope Honorius IV ſent for him, and adds that this journey was worth ten thouſand crowns to him; but he obſerves that others write that Peter de Apono obtained of this Pope four hundred crowns a day (7). He had ſaid this Peter did not go out of the city to ſee the ſick, without having fifty florins given him. You will find in Paul Freher's Theatrum, that he was Profeſſor of Phyſick at Bologna, and that he was called to patients in all parts of Italy, tho' he exacted fifty florins a day (8). You will find there alſo that he ſtipulated with Honorius IV for the ſum of a hundred florins a day; and that when he had cured this Pope, he received a thouſand. Here are a good many variations.

(2) Mercklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 878.
(3) Idem, ibid.
(4) Camerarius, Meditations Hiſtor. tom. 1. liv. 1. chap. 4.
(5) Ibid.
(6) In Vitâ Honorii IV.
(7) Lancelloti da Perugia, l'Hoggidì, Parte 2. Diſinganno 18. pag. 377.
(8) Freher. in Theatro Viror. Illuſtr. p. 1209. He quotes Bernardus Scardeonus, lib. 2. Claſſe 9. Hiſtoriæ Patavinæ.

[C] He was ſuſpected of magick, and perſecuted by the Inquiſition on that account.] This ſuſpicion is ſtill remaining among a good many people: we may ſee that they do more than ſuſpect, and are even perſuaded of it. The common opinion of almoſt all Authors is, that he was the greateſt Magician of his age; that he had acquired the knowledge of the ſeven liberal Arts by means of the ſeven familiar Spirits, which he kept incloſed in a cryſtal; that he had the cunning, like another Paſetes, to make the money he had ſpent come back again into his purſe (9). He that furniſhes me with theſe words, adds, that it is manifeſt he was accuſed of magick in the eighteth year of his age (10), and that when he was dead in 1305 (11), the proceſs againſt him was not yet finiſhed, and that nevertheleſs, according to the relation of Caſtellan *, they condemned him to the fire, and burned a bundle of ſtraw or oſier to repreſent him in the publick place of the city of Padua, deſigning by ſo rigorous an example, and the fear of incurring a like puniſhment, to ſuppreſs the reading of three ſuperſtitious and abominable books which he had compoſed: the firſt is that Heptameron, which is now printed at the end of the firſt volume of Agrippa's works: the ſecond, that which is called by Trithemius, Elucidarium Necromanticum Petri de Albano; and the laſt, one that is called by the ſame Author, Liber Experimentorum mirabilium de annulis ſecundum 28 manſiones Lunæ (12). Theſe proofs ſeem ſtrong: but Naudæus however does not much regard them. He refutes them at once by this remark; that Peter de Apono was a prodigy of wit and learning in an age of darkneſs: now this was enough to make him be taken for a Magician, eſpecially as he was alſo very much attached to the curious and divinatory ſciences. He was a man, ſays he (13), that appeared as a prodigy and a miracle amidſt the ignorance of his age, and that, beſides the knowledge of Languages and of Phyſick, had ſo dived into the leaſt common ſciences, that after having left very ample teſtimonies by his writings of Phyſiognomy, Geomancy, and Chiromancy, of what he was able to do in each of them, he forſook them all, along with the curioſity of his youth, to give himſelf up entirely to Philoſophy, Phyſick, and Aſtrology, the ſtudy of which was ſo favourable to him, that to ſay nothing of the two firſt, which introduced him into the good graces of all the Popes and ſovereign Pontiffs that were in his time, and acquired him the authority which he has at preſent among the learned men, it certainly appears that he was exceedingly well verſed in the laſt, as well from the aſtronomical figures which he cauſed to be painted in the great hall of the Palace of Padua, and his tranſlations of the books of Rabbi Abraham Aben-Ezra, added to thoſe which he compoſed on the critical days, and the eclairciſſement of Aſtronomy: as from the teſtimony of the famous Mathematician Regio-Montanus, who has drawn up a fine Panegyrick on him, as an Aſtrologer, in the Oration which he recited publickly at Padua, when he explained the book of Alfraganus there. Afterwards, Naudæus obſerves that Peter de Apono paid great deference to Aſtrology (14), and that from thence it came that many Authors maintain an opinion directly contrary to thoſe which went before, namely, that he underwent ſuch a condemnation, not on account of his magick, but becauſe he would give a reaſon for the marvellous effects that happen moſt frequently in nature by the virtue of celeſtial bodies, without aſcribing them to Angels or Dæmons, which ſeems very probable by the collection which Symphorian Champier * has made of the paſſages of his differences, which ought not to be read without precaution and by the peremptory authority of Francis Picus, who ſays expreſly, ſpeaking of him †, Ab omnibus ferme creditus eſt Magus; verùm conſtat quam oppoſitum dogma ei aliquando tributum ſit, quem etiam hæreſium inquiſitores vexaverunt, quaſi nullos eſſe Dæmones crediderit: to which we muſt add, that Baptiſta Mantuanus ‡ calls him on this occaſion, Virum magnæ, ſed nimium audacis temerariæque doctrinæ; that Caſmannus ‡ places him in the number of thoſe who aſcribed all the miracles to nature; and that Le Loyer, in his SPECTRES §, affirms that he made a jeſt of the witches and their ſabbath: whence one might be aſtoniſhed, that the ſame Authors name him in a great many other places amongſt Enchanters and Magicians, if it was not uſual for thoſe, who write on this ſubject, ſo to ſwell the bulk of their books by copying all that they find in others, that it is hard for them to obſerve the precept of the Poet,

(9) Naudé Apologie des grans Hommes accuſez de Magie, ch. 14. pag. 380.
(10) That is falſe. See the note [F].
(11) That is falſe. See the ſame note.
* In Vitis Illuſt. Medicorum.

(12) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes accuſez de Magie, pag. 380.
(13) Ibid. p. 382.
(14) This appears from all his works, and principally in the 156th Difference of his Conciliator. Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 384.
* Part 3. lib. Cribrat.
† Lib. 7. de Prænot. cap. 7.
‡ Lib. 1. de Patientia, cap. 3.
‡ Angelogr. Part 2. cap. 21. Quæſt. 2.
§ Book 4. ch. 3.

Primo ne medium, medio ne diſcrepet imum (15).
That is,
" Make all ſeem uniform, and of a piece."
Roſcommon.

(15) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 384.

After that, his Apologiſt declares that he has wherewithal to defend him, both from the crime of Magick, and from that of Atheiſm, as well by the teſtimony which the moſt illuſtrious and religious Frederick Duke of Urbino was pleaſed to give to his merits, making a ſtatue for him amongſt thoſe of the illuſtrious men, which are ſet up in his citadel, as alſo by the publick

atteſtation corps being ſecretly taken up by his friends, eſcaped the vigilance of the Inquiſitors, who would have burnt it [D]. It was tranſported to ſeveral places, and at laſt they placed it in the church of St. Auguſtin, without an epitaph, and without any mark of honour (d). The accuſers of Peter de Apono attributed to him ſome opinions that were very incompatible. They will have it that he was a Magician, and that he did not believe there were any Devils [E]. He had ſuch an antipathy againſt milk that he could not ſee any eaten, without being ſick (e). He died in 1316, being ſixty ſix years old [F]. One of his chief books is that which gave him the ſurname of Conciliator. There is a very ridiculous ſtory told of him, which is, that having no well in his houſe, he cauſed his neighbour's to be carried into the ſtreet by Devils, when he heard they had forbid his maid fetching water there (f). He had much better have employed the Devils in making a well in his own houſe, and have ſtopt up his neighbour's, or at leaſt tranſported it into his houſe, rather than into the ſtreet.

(d) Tomaſini, Elog. Viror. Illuſt. pag. 24.

(e) Mercklinus, in Lindenio renovato, pag. 879. Freherus in Theatro, p. 1209. He quotes Marcellus Donatus, and Matth. de Gradibus.

(f) Tomazo Garſoni, Piazza univerſale di tutti le Profeſſioni, Diſcorſo 135, folio 365 verſo.

APOSTO-

teſtation of the city of Padua, which ſet his ſtatue over the gate of their palace, amongſt thoſe of Titus Livius, Albertus and Julius Paulus, with this inſcription upon its baſe: Petrus Aponus, Patavinus, Philoſophiæ Medicinæque ſcientiſſimus, ob idque Conciliatoris nomen adeptus, Aſtrologiæ verò adeo peritus, ut in Magiæ ſuſpicionem inciderit, falſoque de hæreſi poſtulatus, abſolutus fuerit (16). . . . But, adds he (17), *to diſcover entirely the falſity of theſe objections, we may anſwer to what Ludwigius * has ſaid of the ſeven Spirits that taught him the ſeven liberal Arts, that this fabulous narration aroſe from what Peter de Apono † himſelf affirms, after Albumazar, that the prayers, which are made to God, when the Moon is in conjunction with Jupiter in the head of the Dragon, are infallibly heard; and that for his part, as he had asked, to uſe his own terms,* Sapientiam à primo viſus eſt ſibi in illa amplius proficere. Whereupon nevertheleſs, a good many Authors juſtly rally him for having ſo indiſcreetly diſavowed all his watchings and labours, that he might be indebted for his learning only to the ſuperſtition of this prayer, which muſt be vain and inefficacious, take it in what ſenſe you will. For if you ſay it is addreſſed to the Stars, it is a mere ſtupidity to think they are able to hear it; if to God, I would willingly ask whether he was deaf before this conjunction, whether he will not receive our prayers without it, or whether it can conſtrain and oblige him to condeſcend to the vows that are made to him. And hence Joannes Picus ‡, ſpeaking of this new Solomon, had reaſon to ſay, Conſulerem Petro iſti ut totum quod profecit ſuæ totius induſtriæ ingenioque acceptum referret, quam Joviæ illi ſuæ ſupplicationi. i. e. "I would adviſe him to aſcribe "all his proficiency rather to his own induſtry and "genius, than to that ſupplication to Jupiter." *One may ſay alſo, to give ſatisfaction to the proof of the three books publiſhed under his name, that they are no leſs falſly aſcribed to him, than a good many others to almoſt all the great genius's. And Trithemius * will not acknowledge them to be legitimate, on account of the great number of fables which people had taken a fancy to invent concerning this Author. He had ſaid alſo before in his Catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, that he did not give credit to what had been ſaid of the Magick of Peter de Apono, becauſe he had never found that he had written any book on that ſubject. To this teſtimony if we add the ſilence of all the writers of Bibliotheques, and the confirmation that Symphorian Champier † gives to this authority of Trithemius, when he affirms that he never ſaw any of his magical books, except one paſſage where he treats of it accidentally, I believe there will be nothing more to hinder us from acknowledging his innocence, and judging with the moſt ſenſible, that all the ſuſpicion of his Magick comes, as from its true ſource and origin, from the power he aſcribes to it in the hundred and fifty ſixth difference of his Conciliator, and from the predictions he was able to make by means of Aſtrology, whence in proceſs of time all theſe fables and chimæras have crept in, according to the very true ſaying of Propertius,*

*Omnia poſt obitum fingit majora vetuſtas .
That is,
"Time enlarges every thing after death.

Obſerve ſome faults of M. de Clavigni de Sainte Honorine. He pretends that the ſtatue of Peter d'Apono, which was made by the care of the Duke of Urbino, is in the publick place of Padua with Livy, Albertus and Julius Paulus, and that the inſcription contains Aſtrologiæ adeo peritus, ut in magiæ ſuſpicionem venerit (1). I. The ſtatue whereon are theſe words is not in the publick place of Padua, but over one of the doors of the Town-houſe. In unâ portarum Prætorii Patavini (19). II. The ſtatue which the Duke of Urbino cauſed to be made was not ſet up at Padua, but in the caſtle of that Duke. III. It does not contain the words related by M. de Clavigni. See Tomaſini (2), (16) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 386. This inſcription is in Tomaſini, in Elog. illuſt. Vir. pag. 23.

(17) Ibid. p. 388.
* Dæmonomagiæ Quæſt. 16.
† Differentia 156.
‡ Lib. 4. adverſus Aſtrolog. c. 8.
† Antipali, lib. 1. cap. 3.
† Tractat. 4. lib. de Claris Medicinæ Scriptoribus.
* Eleg. 1. ver. 20. lib. 3.

(18) Clavigni de Sainte Honorine, Lecture des Livres ſuſpects, pag. 101, 102.
(19) Tomaſini, Elog. Viror. illuſt. pag. 23.
(20) Ibid.

[D] His corps eſcaped the vigilance of the inquiſitors who would have burnt it.] Peter de Apono, being accuſed of Necromancy and Hereſy, died during the proceſs, and was interred in the church of St. Anthony. All the zealots were offended at it: the inquiſitors continued their proceſs, and having convicted him of impiety from his own writings, they condemned his corps to be burnt; and, as they did not find it, they burned publickly a figure that repreſented him. This is what we read in Spondanus (21): but how ſhall we make it agree with the inſcription which the Magiſtrates of Padua put under the ſtatue of this Phyſician, and wherein they declared that he was acquitted (22)? Pierre de St. Romuald relates, that the inquiſitors having read publickly the condemnation of Peter de Apono, threw his effigies in the fire. He obſerves alſo, that they could not find his body, becauſe his concubine Mariette had taken it up ſecretly by night, and hid it in a ruined ſepulchre (23).

(21) Spondanus. Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1316. num. 8. He quotes Scardeon. Hiſt. Patav. lib. 2. Claſſ. 9.
(22) See this inſcription above, quotation (16).
(23) Saint Romuald, Journal Chronol. & Hiſt. Decemb. 31. He quotes Bernard Scande: he meant no doubt Bernardin Scardeon.

[E] His accuſers attributed to him ſome opinions that were incompatible. They will have it that he was a Magician, and that he did not believe there were any Devils.] We have ſeen (24) how his Apologiſt took advantage of this contradiction; but he ought to have been aware that Bodinus places Peter de Apono among the Sorcerers, who, to elude the purſuits of juſtice, maintain, that all that is ſaid of Devils and Magick is a chimera. Bodinus declares that he has written a book on the Dæmonomania of Sorcerers, among other reaſons, "to give an anſwer to thoſe "who endeavour in printed books to ſave the Sor-"cerers by all means, ſo that Satan ſeems to have "inſpired them, and drawn them to his party to pub-"liſh theſe fine books, as one Peter de Apono, a "Phyſician, who endeavoured to make it believed "that there are no ſpirits, and yet it was afterwards "proved that he was one of the greateſt Sorcerers of "Italy (25).

(24) In the note [C].
(25) Bodin, Preface de la Demonomanie des Sorciers, pag. 5. See alſo ch. 5. p. 71.

[F] He died in 1316, being ſixty ſix years old.] So we read in an inſcription related by Tomaſini (26); it muſt be ſaid therefore, that Naudé is miſtaken when he ſays that Peter de Apono, being accuſed at the age of eighty years, died in 1305. Freherus ſays the ſame thing, as taken from Bernardin Scardeon (27). We may ſay alſo that Geſner is miſtaken in making Peter de Apono flouriſh in 1320 (28). Mr. Konig has copied this fault (29). But Father Rapin is more ſtrangely miſtaken, for he places him in the ſixteenth Century. Peter de Apono, ſays he (30), a Phyſician of Padua, who flouriſhed under Clement VII, ſo vitiated his imagination by reading the Arabian Philoſophers, and by too frequent ſpeculations upon the Aſtrology of Alfraganus, that he was put into the inquiſition on ſuſpicion of Magick. Voſſius has followed Geſner, and has made an obſervation that deſerves to be conſidered. Peter de Apono, ſays he (31), ſent his book de Medicinâ omnimodâ to Pope John XXII, who was elected in 1316, and ſate ſeventeen years. We know then by this the time of our Phyſician. But if the year 1316 was that of his death, the concluſion is not exact, and does not ſave Voſſius from being miſtaken.

(26) Tomaſinus, in Elog. Viror. illuſt. p. 22.
(27) Paulus Freher. in Theatro Viror. illuſt. pag. 209.
(28) Geſnerus, in Biblioth. folio 544.
(29) Konig, Bib. vet. & nova, pag. 49.
(30) Rapin, Reflex. ſur la Philoſ. num. 28. pag. 360.
(31) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 181.

APOSTOLIUS (MICHAEL) a learned Greek of the fifteenth Century, flouriſhed in the year 1450 and 1460, about the ſame time that the Empire of the Greeks founded by Conſtantine the Great was extinguiſhed under Conſtantine Paleologus the laſt Chriſtian Emperor. He was a man of diſtinguiſhed learning among the modern Greeks, as appears from a conſiderable number of little Tracts written by him [A], the greateſt part of which ſtill continue in manuſcript in ſeveral Libraries. He had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of Cardinal Beſſarion, Archbiſhop of Nice, whom he frequently wrote to, and from whom he received many letters. He had the misfortune to ſee Conſtantinople, the Capital of the Greek Empire, after a long ſiege, fall into the hands of the Turks, to the great diſhonour of the Chriſtians, who were at that time involved in wars among themſelves, inſtead of uniting to ſecure a city of ſuch importance from the violence of the Infidels. This calamity gave our Author an occaſion of writing a funeral Oration upon the Emperor Conſtantine, who loſt his life among many others at the taking of the city. It is ſuppoſed, that the deſtruction of the Eaſtern Empire obliged him to leave Greece ſome time after the year 1453, and to paſs over to Italy; ſince it appears by his manuſcripts, that in 1462 he lived at Viterbo, where he wrote a ſevere Treatiſe againſt Theodorus Gaza of Theſſalonica, who valued himſelf upon his Greek Eloquence (a). Leo Allatius, formerly Keeper of the Vatican Library, in his book De Eccleſiæ Occidentalis & Orientalis perpetua conſenſione (b), i. e. "Concerning the perpetual Agreement of the "Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches," having mentioned thoſe who had written in defence of (a) Caſimir, Oudin. Comment. de Scriptor. & Scriptis Eccleſ. tom. 3. Sæc. 15. Col. 2514. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(b) Lib. 3. c. 3. apud Oudin. Col. 2519.

[A] A conſiderable number of Tracts written by him.] There are ſeveral of them extant in Greek in the Library of the King of France at Paris, as Father Labbe aſſures us in his Bibliotheca Manuſcriptorum Librorum Græcorum, Latinorum, & Gallicorum; where he mentions particularly in part 1. p. 71, our Author's Funeral Oration upon Cardinal Beſſarion; in part 3. p. 99, three Letters of Cardinal Beſſarion, one of which was addreſſed to Apoſtolius in part 4. p. 109; Apoſtolius's Funeral Monody to Andreas Calerges; in part 4. p. 135, his Heroic, Elegiac, and Iambic Verſes upon the principal Feſtivals of our Lord and the Saints, with other Poems upon Beſſarion. Father Labbe mentions likewiſe a Collection of Proverbs written by our Author's own hand; and his Verſes in Praiſe of Homer's battle of the frogs and mice; and in his Supplement IV, p. 205. cod. 303. the Proverbs of Apoſtolius written very beautifully, and as large again as the edition, which was printed; and in Supplement VII, p. 287, cod. 1251, his Proverbs in the handwriting of the Author. Lambecius in the ſeventh book of his Commentar. Biblioth. Cæſar. Vindob. p. 113, tells us that in the Imperial Library at Vienna, there is extant a Greek Manuſcript in folio, containing I, Apoſtolius's Book concerning the Ariſtotelian Subſtance in defence of George Gemiſtus Pletho againſt Theodorus Gaza. II. His Menexenus, or Dialogue concerning the holy Trinity, upon this queſtion, Whether the Jews and Turks are more right in believing but one God, or the Chriſtians in believing the Trinity of the Godhead in Unity. Apoſtolius borrowed this title from Plato, who has a Dialogue ſtill extant, intitled Menexenus, or a Funeral Oration, in which that Philoſopher propoſes to exhort every perſon to the love of his country. This he does by two methods; firſt by extolling thoſe, who expoſe themſelves to danger and death for the good of their country; and then by recommending the antiquity and excellencies of his country. The whole deſign of his Dialogue is to ſhew, that one's country is to be preferred to every conſideration in the world, and that thoſe are happy, who died for it, ſince an immortal reward and honour attends them. This ſhews how great a difference there is between the Menexenus of Plato and that of Apoſtolius with regard to the argument. III. An Oration of Apoſtolius addreſſed to his father-in-law, who was angry with him for marrying a ſecond time. IV. His Appeal to the laſt Emperor of Conſtantinople, Conſtantine Paleologus, in which is contained a confeſſion of his ſuſpected Religion. We may obſerve, that he expreſly acknowledges the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt from the Father alone, and not from the Son likewiſe, in theſe words: Τὸ δ' ἅγιον Πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον ἐκπορευόμενον ἐκ Πατρὸς, οὐ μὴν οὐκ ἐξ Υἱοῦ, κατὰ τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας, ὡς τοῖς σοφωτέροις θεολογικώτερος εἴδοξε ῥητέον τ' ἀνδρὶ, ἐπιὼν πρὸς ὃ ταῦτα λέγειν ἐκκαλούμενον μὴ ψυδεῖσθαι γαλεπώτατα. It appears from hence, that Apoſtolius wrote his book concerning the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt againſt the Latins, in order to declare publickly to the Greeks that he was orthodox, and not a ſchiſmatic, as Lambecius aſſerts, and to remove the ſuſpicion of his being of the Latin Faith, which the Greeks taught to be ſchiſmatical. Hinc igitur patet, cur idem Apoſtolius librum de Proceſſione Spiritûs Sancti contra Latinos ſcribere atque docere conatus fuerit, nempe ut hoc ipſo publicè ſe orthodoxum, & non ſchiſmaticum, ut vult Lambecius, apud Græcos oſtenderet, & ſuſpicionem Latinæ ſive ſchiſmaticæ juxta Græcos fidei à ſe amoliretur (1). V. His Oration addreſſed to his maſter John Argyropulus, when he began to teach publickly at Conſtantinople, during the Life of Conſtantine Paleologus the laſt Emperor of Conſtantinople. VI. Forty five Epiſtles of Apoſtolius; the firſt of which is addreſſed to Gemiſtus Pletho, and the reſt to Emanuel Chryſoloras, Laonicus Chalcocondylas, John Argyropulus, Marcus Muſurus, Michael Marullus, John Chryſoloras, Cardinal Beſſarion, Peter Callerges, and divers other eminent men of that age; which Letters deſerve to be publiſhed, ſince they might give us a conſiderable light into the hiſtory of thoſe times. In the Duke of Bavaria's Library at Munchen, cod. 100, we have Apoſtolius's Congratulation to Cardinal Beſſarion; his Oration to his father-in-law, who was angry at his marrying a ſecond time, and concerning the three Affections of the mind; his Encomium upon Conſtantine Paleologus the Emperor, who was killed at the taking of Conſtantinople; his Confeſſion of Faith, with his Letter to Beſſarion; and Beſſarion's Letter to Apoſtolius. In the Heidelberg Library, which was removed to that of the Vatican at Rome, cod. 272, we have his Anſwer to thoſe, who aſſerted, that the learned men of the Weſt excel thoſe of the Eaſt in Philoſophy as well as in Divinity, and particularly againſt Scotus, in which likewiſe is an account of the manner of the Generation of the Son, and the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt. Oudin (2) is of opinion, that he maintains the Greek notion of the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt in this treatiſe, tho' he does not doubt but he wrote it in Italy. This Tract is extant in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, cod. 76, and among the Baroccian Manuſcripts, cod. 76 (3). In the Heidelberg Library is likewiſe Apoſtolius's Oration to the Emperor Frederic, written at the deſire of Ariſtonymus of Byzantium, but imperfect. In the ſame Library, cod. 275, we have his Apology for Pletho againſt the objections of Theodorus Gaza, in oppoſition to Ariſtotle concerning Subſtance; and his Menexenus or Dialogue upon the Trinity; and his ſix Orations and ſixty five Epiſtles, among which are ſeveral to Cardinal Beſſarion, and his Congratulation to him, with Beſſarion's Anſwer in defence of Theodorus Gaza. This volume is in folio, and written with Apoſtolius's own hand. In the ſame Library, cod. 126, is Cardinal Beſſarion's Epiſtle to our Author; and Michael Apoſtolius's book againſt Theodorus Gaza, written at Viterbo in 1462. Among the Baroccian Manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library, cod. 165, is extant the Diſpute concerning ſeveral Platonic Doctrines between Apoſtolius and Gemiſtus, Theodorus Gaza and Beſſarion; and there are ſeveral other Manuſcripts of our Author's works in the Libraries belonging to Cathedrals and other famous Libraries in England, as we are informed by Oudin (4).

(1) Oudin. tom. 3. Col. 2517.

(2) Col. 2518.

(3) Oudin, ibid.

T.

(4) Col. 2519.

of the Greek Schiſmatics, as he ſtiles them, againſt the Latins and the Council of Florence, tells us, that our Apoſtolius, who ſaid of himſelf, that he was King of the Poor there, Βασιλεὺς τῶν τῆδε πενήτων, and was ſupported only by the generoſity of Cardinal Beſſarion, grew uneaſy, that he ſhould be leſs conſidered than the other learned men who flouriſhed at that time; upon which he wrote againſt ſeveral perſons of the greateſt character and diſtinction among them. This expoſed him to the reſentment of Beſſarion, ſo that he was obliged by poverty to retire to the Iſland of Crete, where he maintained himſelf in a very mean manner by tranſcribing books, and inſtructing children. His averſion to the Roman church induced him likewiſe to compoſe a Tract againſt it concerning the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt. But the judicious reader will conſider how far a regard is to be paid to Allatius, who was prodigiouſly devoted to the church of Rome, when he ſpeaks of a perſon of the contrary party. Though he wrote many things, yet Oudin tells us (c), that he never ſaw any book printed under his name, except his Proverbs collected out of the beſt Greek Authors, publiſhed in Greek and Latin at Leyden in 4to, 1653, with the tranſlation and notes of Peter Pantinus, and others. This is a large work, and of conſiderable importance. He was a Layman, but moſt of his writings relate to diſputes of religion. Mr. Wharton in his Appendix to Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Literaria, has entirely omitted the mention of him. He is taken notice of by Lambecius in the ſeventh book of his Commentarii Bibliothecæ Cæſareæ Vindobonenſis (d); by Poſſevinus in the ſecond volume of his Apparatus Sacer, and at the end of his Apparatus; and by Frederic Spanheim in his Catalogue of the Library at Leyden (e).

(c) Col. 1514.

(d) Pag. 113, 114, 115, 116.

(e) Pag. 169. apud Oudin. Col. 2519.

☞APPIAN, an eminent writer of the Roman Hiſtory in the Greek Language, flouriſhed under the reigns of the Emperors Trajan and Hadrian, as we are informed by Photius in his Bibliotheca (a), and wrote about the nine hundredth year of the city of Rome, and about two hundred years from the beginning of the Monarchy under the Cæſars, as he tells us himſelf in his Preface. He ſpeaks of the deſtruction of Jeruſalem under Hadrian, as of an event which happened in his time (b). He was born of a good family in Alexandria in Egypt; from whence he went to Rome, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo highly as an Advocate, that he was choſen one of the Procurators of the Emperor (c), and the Government of a Province was committed to him (d). Sigonius and other writers call him the Alexandrian and Egyptian Sophiſt (e). He wrote the Roman Hiſtory in a very peculiar method [A]. But this performance of his is charged with a great many errors [B]; and the Author is particularly accuſed of plagi-

(a) Cod. 57.

(b) De Bellis Syr. pag. 119. edit. Hen. Stephani 1592.

(c) Idem in Præfatione, pag. 9.

(d) Photius, ubi ſupra.

(e) La Mothe le Vayer, Jugement ſur les anciens & principaux Hiſtoriens Grecs & Latins, p. 95. edit. Paris 1684.

[A] He wrote the Roman Hiſtory in a very peculiar method.] He did not compile it in a continued ſeries after the manner of Livy; but wrote diſtinct Hiſtories of all Nations, that had been conquered by the Romans, and in which he placed every thing which related to thoſe Nations, in the proper order of time. So that his deſign, which was highly approved of by Evagrius (1), was to write an exact Hiſtory of the Romans and of all the Provinces of their Empire to the reign of Auguſtus; nay he ſometimes deſcends as low as Trajan. La Mothe le Vayer (2) is of opinion, that this method of Appian's is not preferable to that of the other Hiſtorians; the moſt eminent of whom always follow the order of time, and give an account under every year of what was tranſacted in the moſt diſtant parts of the world. But tho' Appian ſeems to have obliged himſelf to a method, which is directly oppoſite to that of nature, and which none of the ancients have followed but himſelf, yet it muſt be owned, that this method is very proper for repreſenting every thing diſtinctly, and giving us a clear and full view of the Hiſtory of every particular country. Suidas informs us, that this Hiſtory was anciently diſtinguiſhed by the title of Baſilica or the Royal Hiſtory, which is a great compliment to it, if that Epithet does not particularly relate to the firſt of his works, which contained an account of the deſcendants of Æneas to the building of Rome, and the government of the ſeven Kings, as we may conjecture from the text of Photius. We may obſerve that Florus's EPITOME conſiſts likewiſe of diſtinct accounts of wars and events. But his method is different from that of our Author, who repreſents every thing in its full extent without any interruption, how long time ſoever it may contain; whereas Florus mixes them together; and places, for inſtance, between the firſt, ſecond, and third punic war, thoſe wars, which the Romans carried on againſt the Gauls, Ligurians, Macedonians, and divers other Nations, whom they attacked in the interval between their wars with the Carthaginians (3). Appian's Hiſtory was divided into three volumes, which contained twenty four books, according to Photius, who never ſaw thoſe, which Appian mentions in his Preface; or twenty two, according to Charles Stephens, Volaterranus, and Sigonius (4). Suidas mentions particularly what was contained in his Hiſtory of the Gauls. Photius tells us, that there were nine books concerning the civil wars, tho' there are but five now extant. Henry Valeſius publiſhed ſeveral Fragments of his works, which he extracted from the Collections of Conſtantine Porphyrogennetus, the ſon of Leo, and grandſon of Baſilius Macedo (5). David Hœſchelius was the firſt, who publiſhed his Iberica or Spaniſh Hiſtory, whereas there were only Fragments of it printed before (6). In the beginning of his Syriaca he mentions himſelf his Ἑλληνικὴν γραφὴν, or Hiſtory of Greece; and his Egyptian Hiſtory in his Mithridatics. Zonaras likewiſe in the ſecond tome of his Annals quotes our Author in his twenty ſecond book of the Roman Hiſtory; ἐν τῷ εἰκοστῷ δευτέρῳ λόγῳ τῆς ἱστορίας Ῥωμαϊκῆς.

(1) Lib. 6. cap. 24. apud Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 2. Part 2. pag. 548. edit. 2. Bruxelles. 1711.

(2) Ubi ſupra, pag. 88.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, p. 95.

(5) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 2. cap. 13.

(6) Idem, ibid.

[B] This performance of his is charged with many errors.] Bodin in his Methodus Hiſtorica (7) accuſes him of ſeveral falſities in point of Hiſtory, or rather of ſeveral defects of memory and judgment. For when that Critic aſſerts, that the Romans never lent their wives to one another after the manner of the Parthians and Lacedæmonians, it is in order to reproach our Hiſtorian with credulity; tho' Plutarch himſelf has related the ſame fact, and affirmed, that Cato voluntarily ſent his wife Martia to the Orator Hortenſius, that the latter might have iſſue by her. And we may obſerve, that the Law of Romulus, or that, which Aulus Gellius mentions againſt adultery, does not in the leaſt contradict this, as Bodin imagined (8). But when that Author charges Appian with having aſcribed to Cæſar in his ſecond book of the Civil Wars the words, which were ſpoken by M. Anthony alone, as Bodin tells us; or by Pompey, as la Mothe aſſerts, when he ſaid in the Senate in a threatening manner, and with his hand to his ſword, that if they would not grant him what he demanded, that ſword of his ſhould give it him; this may eaſily be excuſed as a mere ſlip of Memory, which every man is ſubject to. In the ſame manner we may conſider another error of his, in miſtaking Calphurnia for Pompeia the wife of Cæſar, who was debauched by Clodius in the temple of the Goddeſs, whom the Romans

(7) Cap. 4. pag. 58, 59. edit. Baſileæ, 1576.

(8) La Mothe le Vayer, p. 90.

plagiariſm [C]. However Photius is of opinion that he wrote with the utmoſt regard to truth, and has ſhewn the greateſt knowledge of military affairs of any of the Hiſtorians; ſo that we cannot but imagine, while we read him, that we ſee the battles which he deſcribes. But his chief talent, continues that Author, is diſplayed in his Orations, in which he moves the paſſions, as he thinks proper, either in reviving the reſolution of the ſoldiers, or repreſſing the impetuoſity of thoſe who are too precipitate. His ſtyle is plain and ſimple, without any thing turgid or ſuperfluous (f). He gives us in his Preface a general deſcription of the Roman Empire [D]. Of the great number of books which he wrote, we have but a ſmall part now extant, which are his Hiſtories of the Punic, Syrian.

(f) Photius, ubi ſupra.

mans called Bona Dea. Idem P. Clodium cum Calſurniâ Cæſaris ſtupri commercium habuiſſe, & in ſacris bonæ Deæ deprehenſum tradit, quæ ad Pompeiam pertinent (9). However tho' Bodin tells us, that Appian very often miſtakes in the Roman Hiſtory, cum in eorum [Romanorum] antiquitate ſæpiſſime offendat; yet he allows, that he is the only Hiſtorian, who gives a juſt and clear account of the Roman Provinces, riches, and armies, and a lively deſcription of the whole Empire: Unus eſt tamen ex omnibus hiſtoricis, qui Romanorum provincias, opes, exercitus, totiuſque imperii deſcriptionem ad intuendum velut in ſubjectâ tabulâ proponit (10). He obſerves likewiſe, that Strabo, Pliny, and Rufus have given ſome account of the Provinces, but omitted any mention of the riches of the Empire; whereas our Hiſtorian tells us in his Preface (11), that the Romans had forty thouſand Horſe, and two hundred thouſand Foot, with arms for above twice the number; two thouſand ſmaller ſhips, a thouſand ſhips of three banks of oars, and five hundred of five banks; a greater number of naval armaments, beſides eight hundred ſhips adorned with golden poops and prows; three hundred elephants, and two thouſand armed chariots; and ſeven hundred and forty thouſand talents in the Treaſuries of Egypt. Sigonius treats our Hiſtorian with much greater ſeverity than Bodin has done, and accuſes him of inaccuracy and omiſſions, without alledging any proof. Scaliger proceeds ſtill further in his Animadverſions upon Euſebius (12), where he does not ſcruple to call Appian a mere child with regard to hiſtory, unleſs, ſays he, it ſhould appear, that a great many things have been interpolated in his account of the wars of Syria. Scaligeri tamen in Animadverſionibus Euſebianis judicium eſt, vel admodum in hiſtoria eſſe infantem, vel multa ejus Syriacis eſſe adſuta (13). La Mothe le Vayer thinks (14), that the juſteſt ground of complaint againſt him, is what he has been reproached with by ſeveral perſons, that he ſhews too great a partiality to the Romans, by repreſenting always the right as well as the advantage to be on their ſide, to the prejudice of all other Nations, and even of his own Country among the reſt.

(5) Bodin. pag. 59.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Pag. 6.

(12) Pag. 195. a. apud Voſſium, ubi ſupra.

(13) Voſſ. ubi ſupra.

(14) Pag. 90.

[C] Is particularly accuſed of plagiariſm.] La Mothe le Vayer thinks it is impoſſible to defend him from this imputation. For it is evident, that he has borrowed a great number of paſſages word for word from Polybius, Plutarch, and other Authors, which he has inſerted in his book without mentioning thoſe, to whom he is thus obliged. Scaliger in his Animadverſions abovementioned (15), and Voſſius accuſe him of this fault. Sane multum Polybio debere, ac Plutarchum ad verbum exſcribere ſolitum viri docti jamdudum obſervârunt (16). Other Writers aſſure us, that he tranſcribed in the ſame manner the greateſt part of thoſe Commentaries of Auguſtus, which contained, as we are informed by Suetonius (17), the chief actions of his life. It is undoubtedly, as La Mothe le Vayer obſerves (18), a diſhonourable manner of acting, to borrow from others without any acknowledgment. This juſtly intitles him to the character, which Scaliger gives him, of alienorum laborum fucum, a drone, who robs the induſtrious bees of their labour. The Rhodians only changed the heads of the ancient ſtatues, which belonged to their city, and placed new ones upon them, whenever they thought proper to honour the memory of any perſon by ordering an image to be erected in publick. Plagiaries, ſays La Mothe la Vayer, do almoſt the very ſame thing, though in a manner ſtill more ridiculous than the other. By prefixing their own name to the labours of others, they imagine that they have appropriated them to themſelves, but do not reflect, that inſtead of the glory and immortality which they propoſe, they generally gain nothing but contempt and ſhame by ſuch a manner of proceeding. This puts one in mind of the ſtory of Alcibiades with regard to Diomedes his friend, who had given him the charge of the horſes, which he ſent to the Olympic Games. Alcibiades made them paſs under his own name, and by that means aſſum'd the honour of the victory, which they gained, and which was of great conſequence at that time. Nay he carried his injuſtice ſo far as to refuſe to reſtore the horſes to Diomedes, who had intruſted them to his care. This is juſt the ſame kind of artifice, as we are guilty of when we aſcribe the works of others to our ſelves, and claim the honour of their inventions. The figurative word plagiary, which the Latins gave to thoſe, who were convicted of this crime, ſhews their deteſtation of it, by intimating, that the ſcourge is the proper puniſhment for ſuch an offender. Vitruvius in the Preface to his ſeventh book of Architecture having obſerved, that ſuch perſons ought to be puniſhed as impious, mentions the ſeverity, with which King Ptolomy treated ſome Poets, who had the aſſurance to recite before him at Alexandria verſes, which they had ſtolen from different Authors, as if they had been of their own compoſition. And yet theſe Poets would have carried the prize, which the King propoſed, by the conſent of the ſix Judges and the people in general, if the ſeventh Judge, whoſe name was Ariſtophanes, and who was a man of greater reading than the reſt, had not detected the fraud, and preferred to them a Poet, who had been heard with the leaſt applauſe, tho' he recited nothing but what was really his own. Theocritus very juſtly values himſelf in one of his Epigrams upon not being one of thoſe, who ſteal the verſes of others, and claim them as their own. In excuſe for this conduct it is ſaid by ſome writers, that Clemens Alexandrinus in his Stromata, L. 5 & 6, and Euſebius in his Præparatio Evangelica, L. 9. c. 2 & 3. have ſhewn how the Greeks have borrowed their moſt valuable knowledge from the Hebrews, and have even robbed each other of their works; of which many inſtances are given. To this we may add the judgment, which Strabo in his 17th book paſſes upon the writings of Eudorus and Ariſton the Peripatetics, who wrote Commentaries concerning the Nile ſo exactly alike, that nothing leſs than the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon could diſcover which of them was the Plagiary. Marcianus Heracleota tells us, that Eratoſthenes tranſcribed entirely an Epitome concerning the Iſlands which had been compoſed by Timoſthenes, and publiſhed it as his own performance. Athenæus at the end of the eleventh book of his Deipnoſophiſts accuſes Plato of having borrowed the greateſt part of his Dialogues from Byrſon, Ariſtippus, and Antiſthenes. And tho' we ſee evidently that Apuleius has ſtolen the ſtory of his Golden Aſs, yet we cannot be certain whether it was from Lucius Patrenſis or Lucian, becauſe the two laſt mentioned Authors have been ingenious enough to make their copy paſs for an original. But all theſe examples with an infinity of others can never gain the end, which is deſigned by thoſe, who urge them. It is impoſſible to excuſe a fault by ſhewing only, that it is very common. And therefore La Mothe le Vayer concludes theſe obſervations with affirming, that he ſhould chooſe rather to ſuffer Appian to continue under the imputation of plagiariſm, than to palliate that fault in order to juſtify him.

(15) Pag. 163.

(16) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(17) C. 85.

(18) Pag. 91.

Reflections upon Plagiariſm.

[D] He gives us in his Preface a general deſcription of the Roman Empire.] He tells us, that this Empire was bounded in the Eaſt by the river Euphrates, Mount Caucaſus, the greater Armenia, and Colchis; and in the North by the Danube, beyond which however he obſerves that the Romans poſſeſſed Dacia, as

Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic and Spaniſh wars, with thoſe againſt Hannibal, and the Civil Wars, and thoſe in Illyricum; for with regard to the Celtic or Gallic wars, we have nothing but a fragment remaining, which can only make us regret what is loſt, inſtead of ſatisfying our curioſity (g).

(g) La Mothe le Vayer, p. 96.

as well as ſeveral other Nations beyond the Rhine. They were maſters of above half of Britain, but neglected the reſt, as he informs us, becauſe it was no uſe to them, and they received but very little advantage from what they actually poſſeſſed. There were ſeveral other countries, which coſt them more than they gained by them; but they thought it diſhonourable to abandon them. This occaſioned them to neglect the opportunities of making themſelves maſters of many other Nations, and to ſatisfy themſelves with giving them Kings, as they did particularly to the greater Armenia. He aſſures us likewiſe, that he ſaw at Rome Embaſſadors from ſeveral countries of the Barbarians, who deſired to ſubmit to the Roman Empire, but were rejected by the Emperor becauſe they were poor, and conſequently he could not expect any profit from them: ὧν ἐγώ τινας εἶδον ἐν Ῥώμῃ προσδυομένους τε καὶ δεδόσθαι ἑαυτοὺς ὑπηκόους εἶναι, καὶ ἃ δεξάμενοι βασιλέα ἄνδρας ἐσθῆτι αὐτῷ χρησίμους ἀπομένους (19).

(19) Appian. Præfat. p. 4.

APPIUS CLAUSUS, or CLAUDIUS SABINUS, a Sabine by birth and one of the principal inhabitants of Regillum, was very conſpicuous for his ſtrength and riches, but ſtill more illuſtrious for his virtue and eloquence. His ſhining merit having drawn the envy of ſome of his fellow-Citizens upon him [A], he retired to Rome with all his family, attended, as Plutarch relates (a), with five thouſand families; they were very kindly received by the Romans, who made them all Citizens, and gave each of them two acres of ground beyond the river Teverone. To Appius they gave five and twenty acres, and admitted him into the Senate. In this poſt he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very honourable manner by his wiſe counſels, and eſpecially by his ſteadineſs and reſolution (b). He was made Conſul with Publius Servilius Priſcus (c) in the year 259 from the building of Rome, and 495 before the birth of Chriſt. That year the people of Rome raiſed a tumult, on account of the heavy debts which they had contracted [B], and which they would have aboliſhed. Their rage proceeded ſo far, that the Conſuls themſelves, endeavouring to pacify the multitude, were in danger of their lives. Appius, who was of a very ſevere temper, was of opinion that this tumult could not be appeaſed but by the death of one or two of the ringleaders. But Servilius, more gentle, compaſſionate, and popular, maintained that ſome regard was to be had to the miſerable circumſtances of the people; and as the Romans were then threatened with a dangerous war, it was proper to give ſome ſatisfaction to thoſe who had been oppreſſed, and who would not inliſt themſelves, unleſs they were relieved. Servilius's advice prevailed; he publiſhed an edict in favour of the poor debtors, whereupon the army was ſoon raiſed. But the Conſul's edict was not very faithfully executed [C], ſo that after the campaign the people began to murmur, and to raiſe ſeditions with more fury than ever, eſpecially at the

(a) In Publicola, Oper. tom. 1. p. 108. Livius, lib. 2. cap. 17. and not Velleius Paterc. as Mr. Vertot ſays by miſtake, Revolut. Rom. tom. 1. p. 63.

(b) Plutarch. ibid.

(c) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 21. p. m. 39. Col. 1.

[A] His ſhining merit drew the envy of ſome of his Fellow-Citizens upon him.] The Sabines being engaged in war againſt the Romans, Appius adviſed them to conclude a peace with them. His enemies accuſed him of giving ſuch advice, only that the Romans might have time to become more powerful, and then he could eaſily make himſelf Tyrant of his own country. Appius perceiving that the people readily hearkened to this report, and that he was hated by thoſe who were againſt the peace, and ſought only to embroil the State, durſt not ſubmit to the judgment of the people; but finding his faction ſupported by a great many of his friends and relations, he raiſed a ſedition, which hindred the Sabines from carrying on the war with vigour againſt the Romans. The Conſul Publicola deſiring to know the cauſe of this, as well as to kindle the fire that had broke out among the Sabines, ſent ſome perſons to Appius, to let him know that it was his opinion, that a good and honeſt man, however injured by his fellow-citizens, ought never to revenge himſelf. He alſo promiſed him, that if he would conſult his ſafety, he ſhould leave his enemies, and go to Rome, where he might be raiſed in a manner ſuitable to his own virtue, and to the dignity of the Romans. Appius, who was not exaſperated againſt the Sabines, and loved a quiet and eaſy life, having conſulted with his friends, accepted Publicola's invitation, and retired to Rome (1). This happened in the year 250 from the building of that city, under the Conſuls P. Valerius Publicola IV, and T. Lucretius Tricipitinus II, 504 years before the Chriſtian Æra.

(1) Plutarch. in vit. Publicolæ, Oper. tom. 1. p. 108.

[B] On account of the heavy debts which they had contracted.] It was an ancient cuſtom at Rome during the government of the Kings, that when the Romans had ſeized the lands of their enemies, half of them was ſold to pay the expences of the war; the other half belonged to the publick, and was given either gratis, or under a very moderate rent to the pooreſt of the Citizens. But when the Regal Government had been aboliſhed, the Nobles and Patricians, who tho' they were now the only Rulers of the Commonwealth, kept for themſelves, under divers pretences, moſt of the conquered lands; which was not only a loſs to the State, but alſo a great injury to the poor ſoldier, who having ſpilt his blood to enlarge the territories of his country, was by the great men's avarice deprived of that portion of land, which was to be both his pay and reward. But theſe were not the only uſurpations of the Patricians. When there was a ſcarcity of proviſions, they, by aſſiſting them, knew how to raiſe a claim on the poſſeſſions of their poor neighbours. The ſoldiers then without pay, and deſtitute of all other means of getting a livelihood, were obliged to apply to the rich, who lent them money, but at an exorbitant intereſt; nay, if we believe Tacitus (2), intereſt was not then regulated by law, as it was afterwards, but exacted at the pleaſure of the rich. The debtor was obliged to engage his little inheritance, and it often happened, that the little aſſiſtance he received from the rich, coſt him his liberty. For according to law the creditor might arreſt his debtor, and keep him priſoner in his houſe, where the poor man was treated as a ſlave; nay he was often laſhed and cruelly tormented by his unmerciful creditor. Thus under pretence of law and ſtrict juſtice, the people ſuffered daily the ſevereſt injuries and ill uſage (3), being obliged to yield up their lands, in order to pay, beſides the principal, the heavy and accumulated intereſt. Such was the humanity of the ſo much celebrated ancient Romans!

(2) Annal. 6. p. 204. of Mr. Gordon's tranſlation.

(3) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 23. Vertot, Hiſt. des Revol. Rom. tom. 1. liv. 1. 57, &c.

[C] The Conſul's Edict was not very faithfully executed.] Servilius did indeed endeavour to perform his promiſe, and to engage the Senate to aboliſh all the debts. But Appius, who thought the leaſt alteration of the laws extremely dangerous, openly oppoſed his collegue's intentions. He gave all creditors leave to impriſon their debtors; and the applauſe he received from the year's end, when new Conſuls (d) were choſen. The people again refuſed to march againſt the enemy, and the Conſuls having endeavoured to terrify them by ſeizing ſome of the moſt ſeditious, the populace reſcued them out of the Lictor's hands. The Senate finding how the authority of the ſupreme Magiſtrates was ſlighted, conſulted what was to be done upon this urgent occaſion. Their ſentiments were divided [D], but Appius ſoon united them, by propoſing to create a Dictator. This ſeemed indeed very ſevere, and even dangerous; but faction and private intereſt, which always did and always will prevail in publick councils, determined the Senate in favour of Appius's opinion. Nay ſome of the youngeſt Senators propoſed to make him Dictator, which would have been of fatal conſequence, ſince it would have entirely alienated the people at a time when ſeveral neighbouring nations were already in arms, and ready to fall upon the Romans. But the Conſuls and the oldeſt Senators warded off the blow, and procured M. Valerius to be choſen, a man, who by his mild temper might mitigate the ſeverity of a Magiſtracy of its own nature, but too awful and dreaded (e). However the Dictator could not put an end to the civil broils, for finding he could not prevail with the Senate to annihilate the people's debts, he abdicated the Dictatorſhip; and the Senate being reſolved not to yield to the people's deſire, a great number of the Citizens left Rome and retired to Mount Velius, afterwards called the Sacred Mount, three miles diſtant from Rome. This retreat put the Senate under great conſternation, and was by ſome aſcribed to the creating of a Dictator, by which they that were condemned by the Nobles were deprived of the benefit of the Valerian Law, which allowed them to appeal to the people. This was inſinuated by M. Valerius, who added, that the ſovereign power committed to one man, as it was by the Dictatorſhip, would at laſt deſtroy the Commonwealth; that this novelty and alteration in the government was owing to the ſevere and haughty diſpoſition of Appius, and of thoſe who were in the ſame ſentiments with him; that they had no other view but to raiſe the power of the Nobles upon the ruins of the publick Liberty, and to reduce the Citizens to the mean condition of ſubjects and ſlaves to the Senate. Appius anſwered with his uſual ſteadineſs and reſolution, but at the ſame time with moderation and mildneſs [E]; and as Valerius and Menenius Agrippa had been of opinion that the Senate ſhould ſend deputies to the rebels, in order to appeaſe them, and invite them to return home; Appius on the contrary maintained, that ſuch a conduct would be a ſure token from the rich, as well as the curſes of the poor, equally concurred to confirm this Magiſtrate in his rigorous reſolution. They that were arreſted appealed to Servilius, and repreſented to him the promiſes he made them before the war, and their own ſervice againſt the enemy. They loudly entreated him, that as a Conſul he would defend his fellow-citizens, and as a General not abandon thoſe ſoldiers, who fought ſo bravely under him. But Servilius, who was of a mild and timorous temper, durſt not openly declare himſelf againſt the whole body of Patricians, and by wavering betwixt both parties, that of the Nobles, and that of the people, he offended them both, and drew upon him the hatred of the latter, and could not ingratiate himſelf with the former. The Senate look'd upon him as an ambitious but weak man; and the people thought he had deceived and betrayed them; ſo that it ſoon appeared he was become as odious as Appius himſelf (4).

(d) A. Virginius Tricaſtus, and T. Vetuſius Geminus.

(e) Livius, ibid. cap. 23—30. p. 39—42.

(4) Livius, ibid. cap. 27. Vertot, ibid. p. 77, 78.

[D] Their ſentiments were divided.] There were three different opinions propoſed. P. Virginius ſaid, they ought not to aboliſh the debts of all the people indifferently, but only of thoſe who in the late wars had faithfully ſerved the Commonwealth. This, he added, was in juſtice due to them, and they had a right to expect it, ſince Servilius promiſed it; and it was with this hope that they had followed him againſt the enemy. T. Largius, who had been a Dictator, repreſented that this was not a time to do ſtrict juſtice, or to reward only ſuch as deſerved it. That the whole people was involved in heavy debts, and thereby ruined. That if the debts of ſome were aboliſhed, whilſt others remained under an obligation to pay theirs, this would rather increaſe than aſſuage the ſedition. That therefore nothing leſs than a general abolition could reſtore the publick tranquillity. Appius rejected both theſe propoſals. "All this mutiny and "rebellion, ſaid he, does not proceed from the peo- "ple's miſery, but is rather the effect of an unbound- "ed and immoderate licentiouſneſs, which the ſedi- "tious are pleaſed to call Liberty. This riot and "diſturbance is owing to the ill uſe the people make "of the Valerian Law. The Majeſty of the Conſuls "is violated with impunity, becauſe the rebels have "the liberty to appeal from the ſentence juſtly pro- "nounced againſt their crime, to their accomplices "in that ſame crime. What order, what regularity "will there ever be in a State, where the laws and "decrees of the Magiſtrate are ſubject to the appeal "and judgment of an unruly populace, who have "no other guide but their folly and paſſion?" This was the reaſon why Appius propoſed to create a Dictator, that there might be a Magiſtrate, from whoſe judgment there was no appeal (5).

(5) Livius, ibid. cap. 29. Vertot, ibid. p. 79, 80.

[E] Appius anſwered with his uſual ſteadineſs and reſolution, but at the ſame time, with moderation and mildneſs.] Thus he ſpoke, addreſſing himſelf to M. Valerius: "If you had been contented with only delivering "your opinion, without attacking me unjuſtly, you "would not have expoſed your ſelf to hear ſome un- "welcome truths. But before I lay them before this "Aſſembly, it is but juſt that I ſhould anſwer your "charge againſt me. Pray tell me, Valerius, who "are thoſe Romans, whom I have proſecuted to force "them to pay what they owe not. Name, if you "can, thoſe Citizens, whom I kept in irons. Go to "Mount Velius (6), and look whether among the "number of rebels, if you can find but one only, "who complains that he left the city for fear of "being arreſted by me. On the contrary, all the "world knows that I have acted with my debtors as "with my clients and my friends; and without hav- "ing any regard to old debts yet unpaid, I have aſ- "ſiſted them freely in their wants, and as much as it "was in my power, the Citizens have always been "free. I don't pretend by ſaying this, that my con- "duct ought to be a rule for other people. I will "always maintain the laws in favour of thoſe who "will have their recourſe to them. I am even per- "ſuaded, that with regard to certain debtors, "thoſe who lead a debauched and luxurious life, it is "as juſt to demand payment, as it is honourable and "generous to quit it to thoſe who are peaceable and "laborious, and by misfortunes fall into extreme "miſery and want. Such has been conſtantly my "conduct; thoſe are the ſevere and haughty princi- "ples, with which I am charged. But, ſay they, "I have declared myſelf a Partiſan of the Nobles, "and it is by my counſel and advice that they have "invaded the Government. This crime, Gentle- "men, added Appius turning himſelf to the Chiefs "of the Senate, this crime is common both to you "and

(6) Where the rebels had retired.

ken of weakneſs in the Senate, and conſequently raiſe the ſpirits of the rebels; "If of "their own accord, added he, they return to their duty, we muſt treat them with mode- "ration; but we muſt purſue them ſword in hand, if they perſiſt in their rebellion." Appius's ſentiment was followed by all the rich Senators, and by the young men; the Conſuls on the contrary, and moſt of the old Senators, men naturally timorous, thought a civil war was the greateſt misfortune that could befal the State. They were ſupported by thoſe Senators, who had nothing more in view but the conſervation of liberty, and who were afraid, leſt ſome ambitious and enterpriſing men ſhould take hold of this opportunity of a civil war to invade the ſovereign power. But theſe Patriots could ſcarce get any attention, ſuch were the cries and threatnings that were heard from all ſides. The young Senators, proud of their birth, and jealous of the prerogative of their rank, and in all likelihood animated by Appius's example, went ſo far as to inſinuate to the Conſuls that they ſuſpected them. They put them in mind that they repreſented the perſon of the antient Kings, and that they ought to maintain the Kingly power veſted in them, together with the authority of the Senate, againſt the bold enterpriſes of the people. Nay ſome of the moſt hot and violent of theſe Senators added, that if the leaſt attempt was made againſt their authority, they would take up arms to maintain in their order that power which they had received from their anceſtors (f). However the Conſuls, who were reſolved to pleaſe the people, found means by threats and other artifices to win thoſe who were moſt exaſperated [F], ſo that Appius, ſtill firm and ſteady in his opinion, and incapable of altering it but by force of argument, remained on the contrary ſide, with only a few of his relations, who thought themſelves bound in honour not to forſake him. That great man being perſuaded in his conſcience, that all negotiation with the rebels would be deſtructive of the Senate's authority, addreſſed himſelf to both the Conſuls in theſe words: "Though you ſeem to be reſolved to treat with the people, and to accept "the terms they ſhall propoſe to you; and however thoſe who were of a contrary ſenti- "ment, may have altered their mind either through weakneſs or out of intereſt; yet I "ſtill

(f) Dionyſ. Halicar. lib. 6.

"and to me. The government naturally belongs "to you; and you are too prudent and wiſe, ever to "yield it up to a licentious populace, to that wild "beaſt, that hearkens only to its flatterers, but whoſe "ſlaves often become its tyrants. And this we are "to apprehend from Valerius, who being eſteemed "in the Republick only by the honours we have "conferred upon him, now makes uſe of them to "deſtroy our laws, to alter the conſtitution of our "Government, and by baſe arts and flatteries to pave "himſelf the way to tyranny. You have heard him; "and you may have underſtood from his diſcourſe, "that being perfectly acquainted with the pernicious "deſigns of the rebels, he will diſpoſe you to hearken "to new demands; and under pretence of aſking ſure- "ties for the liberty of the people (7), his only aim "is to oppreſs that of the Senate. But let us come "to the principal ſubject for which we are this day "aſſembled. I maintain, that to alter the laws of "any State, is to ſhake the very foundations of it; "and that we cannot annul thoſe bonds and contracts "between private men, without wounding the publick "faith, and deſtroying that original contract, on which "all ſocieties of men are grounded. Will you now "grant to thoſe rebels, who are ready to turn their "arms againſt their own country, what you have of- "ten ſo wiſely refuſed to ſubmiſſive and faithful Citi- "zens, to ſoldiers, who fought under your banner? "Depend upon it, if you yield up this article con- "cerning the debtors, you will at the ſame time "give occaſion to new demands and pretenſions. "The ringleaders of the ſedition, in concert with "Valerius, will ſoon demand the liberty of in- "termarrying with our families; and after that, they "will pretend a right to enjoy the higheſt poſts in "the State. May the tutelary Gods of Rome grant, "that the government of this Republick do not fall "into the hands of a vile populace, who will ſoon "puniſh you for your weakneſs, and even baniſh you "out of your country! But the arms of the rebels "are formidable: Why! have you not in your power "their wives and children, as ſo many hoſtages and "ſecurities againſt them? But ſuppoſe that they have "no more regard for their own blood, than they have "for the laws of the State; have they Generals, have "they proviſions, have they money to carry on this "raſh enterprize? And during the winter, which "draws near, what will become of them deſtitute "as they are of bread, without any place of retreat, "without being able to move one ſtep, but they muſt "fall into our hands. If they think to go to our "neighbours, will they not find there, as well as at "Rome, the whole government lodged with the No- "bles; and what other condition can rebels and de- "ſerters expect, but that of miſerable ſlaves? But "perhaps they will join with our enemies, and all to- "gether come and beſiege Rome, now deprived of "the inhabitants neceſſary to defend it: as tho' the "whole ſtrength of the Commonwealth conſiſted in "theſe rebels only. Have we not among the Patri- "cians a conſiderable number of young men, full of "vigour and courage? Our Clients, who are the moſt "ſound part of the State, are they not attached to "its true intereſt, as well as we? If there be occa- "ſion, let us even arm our ſlaves; let us make of "them a new but obedient people. They have learnt "under us and by our example how to make war. "With how much courage will they not fight, if li- "berty be the recompence of their courage and brave- "ry? If all this does not ſeem ſufficient, call back "your Colonies. You know, by the laſt ſurvey, that "the Commonwealth conſiſts of one hundred and thir- "ty heads of families; and ſcarce the ſeventh part of "them is to be found among the malecontents. "Laſtly rather than receive laws from theſe re- "bels, let us grant to the Latins the freedom of Ro- "man Citizens, which they have ſo long requeſted "of us. You will immediately ſee them fly to your "aſſiſtance, and you will want neither ſoldiers nor "citizens. In a word, I am of opinion, that we "ought not to ſend any deputies to the rebels, nor "do the leaſt thing that might betray either fear or "forwardneſs (8)."

(7) Valerius had inſinuated, that it was proper to create a new Magiſtrate, who would be the guardian of the liberty of the people. Accordingly, two Magiſtrates were created under the name of TRIBUNES OF THE PEOPLE.

[F] The Conſuls —— by threats and other artifices found means to win thoſe, who were moſt exaſperated.] The two Conſuls having conſulted together ſecretly, reſolved to let the paſſion of the Senate cool; for which purpoſe they deferred the deciſion of this affair to the next meeting. In the mean time they laboured to win thoſe, who had moſt violently oppoſed this propoſal. To terrify the young Senators, they threatened to deprive them of the right they enjoyed, to vote in the Senate. As it had not yet been determined at what age a man might have a vote, the Conſuls gave the young Senators to underſtand, that if they did not behave themſelves with more modeſty and moderation in that venerable Aſſembly, they would exclude them from it, by determining at what age a man ſhould be admitted into the Senate. Theſe young Senators valuing their dignity more than their virtue, theſe Romans, who were thought to be ſo reſolute and brave, ſtooped at the Conſul's threatning, and aſſured them,

(8) Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. 6. Vertot, ubi ſupra, p. 94—99.

" ſtill perſiſt in my opinion, that as we cannot have too much regard for the miſery of " a people ſubmiſſive and obedient, ſo I aſſert, that all negotiation with them is danger- " ous, as long as they continue in arms." But as the Senate was now come to a fixed reſolution, this diſcourſe of Appius was hardly attended to, and he was looked upon as a man zealous indeed for the glory of the Senate, but who had too great an opinion of his own wiſdom, and was, either out of vanity, or through the ſtiffneſs of his temper, incapable of altering his mind (g). The reſult of the negotiation with the rebels was, that two Tribunes of the People ſhould be created. Appius oppoſed this with all his power; he repreſented with the utmoſt force of eloquence, heightened with indignation, all the evils which this innovation in the government would occaſion in time; and as if his zeal or his anger ſerved him inſtead of a Divine inſpiration, he foretold to the Senate, that by their weakneſs and too eaſy temper, they were eſtabliſhing a Tribunal againſt themſelves, which would inſenſibly raiſe an oppoſition to their own authority, and deſtroy it at laſt entirely. But the ſtrongeſt repreſentations are to no purpoſe, where private intereſt prevails over Patriotiſm. Appius's diſcourſe was conſidered as that of a man obſtinately adhering to his own ſentiments, and angry becauſe they were not approved and followed. The Senate had ſoon occaſion to repent of their remiſſneſs; they found in the affair of Coriolanus what a dreadful power they had lodged with the people, by granting particular Magiſtrates to them. This Appius repreſented in a very eloquent and ſtrong Oration, which Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus relates (b), but too long to be here tranſcribed [G]. Though Appius appeared hitherto very zealous for maintaining the authority of the Senate, yet he alſo ſhewed by his conduct, that he was heartily in the real intereſt of the people. This appeared not only by his behaviour towards thoſe who were in his debt (i), but alſo by his conduct in the diſpute, which aroſe concerning the diſtribution of the conquered lands. For his opinion in this affair was, that to prevent the juſt complaints of the people, the Senate ought to chooſe ten Commiſſioners, who ſhould be appointed to make a ſtrict enquiry concerning thoſe lands which originally belonged to the publick; that part of them muſt be ſold for the uſe of the publick treaſure; that another part of them be diſtributed among the pooreſt Citizens, who had no land of their own; that marks ſhould be put every where to diſtinguiſh the limits of every one's poſſeſſions, the want of ſuch marks having occaſioned the grievance, of which the people then complained. What remained of the publick lands he propoſed to let out only for five years together, at a reaſonable rent, which rent was to be laid out in corn for thoſe Plebeians who ſerved in the army, and for their pay. This he thought would hinder the people from thinking any more of having the lands divided anew amongſt them; they would rather chooſe to have corn, money, and a ſettled allowance during the whole campaign, than a piece of ground, which they ſhould be obliged to cultivate. He added, that he knew of no other method to reform ancient abuſes, than to put things again on the ſame foot on which they were at firſt eſtabliſhed. His advice was followed, though moſt of the Senators holding lands, which originally belonged to the Commonwealth, could not bear the very name of an inquiry; yet to impoſe upon the people, they made a Senatus Conſultum, or a Decree, according to Appius's motion; but it was not put in execution till thirty five years after, when our Appius's grandſon was made the firſt of the Decemviri. We hear nothing of our Appius, after this decree concerning the publick's lands. For the Appius Claudius, who was Conſul in the year 282, or 283, and who killed himſelf, was the ſon of our Appius, as appears by Livy's own words, who calls him Appius Claudius Ap. Filius (k); ſo that Moreri ought not to have confounded them, as he has done. We ſhall give an account of this Appius in the following article.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(i) See the beginning of the remark [E].

(b) Lib. 7.

(k) Lib. 2. cap. 56. p. m. 54. Col. 2.

APPIUS

them, that they would always be ready to follow his ſentiments. Theſe two Magiſtrates employed another artifice againſt the party of the rich, who conſtantly oppoſed the aboliſhing of the debts. They let them know, that if at the next meeting of the Senate, they came not to a reſolution more agreeable to the common intereſt of all the Citizens, they would bring this affair before the people. They alſo repreſented, that if once the Aſſembly of the people had this affair before them, it was to be apprehended leſt they ſhould carry their authority ſtill farther, and do themſelves juſtice for all the vexations and injuries they pretended to have ſuffered from the Patricians (9). By this means the Conſuls gained the majority in the Senate; ſo true is Livy's reflection, of which we have given the ſenſe above (10), and which in his own words is thus: Factio Reſpectuſque rerum privatarum ſemper offecere, officientque publicis conſiliis (11).

(9) Vertot, ibid. pag. 101, 102. Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 6.

(10) Towards the quotation (e).

(11) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 30. pag. m. 42. Col. 1.

[G] Too long to be here tranſcribed.] We ſhall give only an abſtract of it. He repreſented to the Senate how well grounded his fears were, when he foretold, that the Tribunes, theſe new Magiſtrates of the people, would ſoon incroach upon the power and authority of the Senate. He obſerved, that what was tranſacted then and what had paſſed before was a ſure proof, that the people intended a change in the Government; how they had turned the condeſcenſion of the Senators againſt themſelves, pretending to cite them before their own Tribunal; which appeared by the example of Coriolanus, whom the people would try and judge, maintaining they had a right to do it by the Valerian Law (12). " But do not we all know, ſays " Appius, that this law, by which a man may ap- " peal from the Senate to the people, relates only to " poor plebeians, who being deſtitute of protection, " may be oppreſſed by a powerful party. The very " words of that Law are expreſly to this purpoſe. It " is there ſaid in ſo many words, that a Citizen con- " demned by the Conſuls, ſhall be at liberty to ap- " peal to the people. Valerius Publicola intended " only by this law to open a Sanctuary for the fortu- " nate, who might complain to have been unjuſtly uſed " by corrupt or paſſionate judges. What relation is " there between ſuch a law and the caſe of a Senator, " a man of a rank ſuperior to that of the people, " and who is accountable for his conduct and acti- " ons to the Senate alone? But to ſhew that the Va- " lerian Law regards only the plebeians, name but " one Patrician, who ſince nineteen years that this " law has been aboliſhed, was cited before the people (13)." Thus Appius pleaded the cauſe of Coriolanus, who as well as himſelf was a ſtrenuous aſſertor of the Senate's authority.

(12) Lex Valeria.

(13) Dionyſ. Hal. lib. 6.

P.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS SABINUS ſon of the preceding, inherited a very conſiderable eſtate from his father, with a large number of clients; but at the ſame time he had the ſame haughty temper and unconquerable firmneſs, which rendered his father ſo odious to the people. This was the reaſon that, when he firſt petitioned for the Conſulſhip, in the year of Rome 272 (a), he could not obtain it [A]. But though he did not enjoy that high poſt then, yet by his prudent and wiſe conduct in the Senate, he found means to engage the multitude to follow the Conſuls againſt the enemy. He underſtood the force of this maxim divide & impera, that is, "divide and you ſhall reign." For as the Tribunes, by the influence they had over the people, prevented them from liſting themſelves into the army, even at a time when the Æqui and Veii were plundering and deſtroying every thing in the neighbourhood of Rome, Appius made a motion, which proved very ſucceſsful. He repreſented, "that the power of the Tribunes was "dreadful only by their union; that if the oppoſition of one Tribune was ſufficient to "ſuſpend the execution of a decree from the Senate, it had the ſame effect with regard "to the deliberations and councils of his own Collegues the other Tribunes. That it "was not impoſſible to be jealous of one another's credit and authority; that therefore "it would be proper to ſow diſcord and diſſentions amongſt them, and ſecretly to gain "ſome of them to the intereſt of the Senate (b)." The Fathers followed his advice, and prevailed with four of the Tribunes, who by favouring the Senate rendered void and uſeleſs the oppoſition of the other Tribunes. Some time after Appius was made Conſul (c), without having in the leaſt petitioned for it; for it was obſerved that he was ſo far from making the leaſt intereſt for that high dignity, he did not even deign to appear before the Aſſembly of the People the day he was choſen (d). His Collegue in the Conſulſhip was T. Quintius Capitolinus, a man of a mild and inſinuating temper, who had gained the love of the people, though he was at the head of the oppoſite party. The Senate had choſen him in hopes that his example and moderate counſels might in a manner ſoften and allay the too haughty and proud behaviour of Appius, who had indeed his father's ſteady zeal for the intereſt of the Senate; but the heroic conſtancy and reſolution of the father was in the ſon degenerated into obſtinacy and ſeverity; for he was naturally proud, though not ambitious; would carry every thing by authority, without ever employing thoſe inſinuating arts, which have ſo great a power over the unthinking multitude. This man the Senate thought proper to oppoſe to Volero a Tribune of the People; who under pretence of promoting the intereſt of the Plebeians, was labouring to undermine the authority of the Senate and Patricians. Appius oppoſed with all his might the enterpriſe of Volero, who to make the people maſters of the elections, would have them made by Tribes, that every Citizen, whether an inhabitant of Rome or of the Country, might give his vote; and that with regard to the Tribunes, they ſhould be choſen without a decree of the Senate, and that the Aſſembly in which they were to be choſen ſhould be held without taking the Auſpices. This Volero required, becauſe all the Prieſts and publick Miniſters of Religion being Patricians, it was in their power to interpret the Auſpices according to the intereſt of their own order. Volero demanded beſides, that not only the Tribunes, but alſo the Ediles ſhould be choſen after the ſame manner, and that every affair, of which the people had a right to judge, ſhould be decided by ſuch an aſſembly, which was in fact to deprive the Senate of all power and authority, and lodge it with the people. Quintius, a man of a mild temper, and though not popular, yet a republican, was of opinion, that ſomething muſt be yielded to a brave people, who daily ſhed their blood for the Commonwealth. But Appius, proud and ſevere, maintained that this was betraying the intereſt of the Senate; that this indulgence was not the effect of kindneſs towards the people, but only diſcovered the weakneſs of the government; and concluded, that after ſo many uſeleſs diſcourſes that had been made on the ſubject before them, nothing but a bad attempt could repreſs the ſeditious enterpriſes of the Tribunes: "Let all "the Patricians, ſaid he, with all their clients, take up arms, diſperſe the people, and "kill indifferently all thoſe who ſupport ſo pernicious a ſcheme." The Senate did not think

(a) 482 before Chriſt.

(b) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 44. pag. 48, 49.

(c) A. U. 283; 471 before Chriſt.

(d) Dionyſ. Hal. lib. 9.

[A] This was a reaſon why he could not obtain the Conſulſhip.] The Senators, to maintain the dignity and authority of their Order, intended to make the choice of one of the Conſuls to fall upon Appius, but the people would by no means come into that deſign. The Senate perſiſting in their reſolution, and the people in their obſtinacy, the Conſuls could not be created. Some of the Senators, who were of a ſtrict and ſevere temper, would have a Dictator. But as there were reaſons to apprehend a general inſurrection, thoſe of the Senators, who were more moderate and prudent, thought it was not proper to venture the ſupreme authority againſt the fury of the people, who perhaps in theſe circumſtances would not ſubmit even to a Dictator, which would be of the moſt dangerous conſequence. The Senate therefore only created an Inter-Rex, as had been done during the Kingly Government, when the throne was vacant. This Magiſtracy laſted only five days. A. Sempronius Atratinus was at this time choſen by the Senate, and was ſucceeded five days after by Sp. Largius. This Magiſtrate repreſented to the Senate, that if they obſtinately perſiſted in their reſolution to promote Appius to the Conſulate, it was to be feared, that they would occaſion a very dangerous ſedition, in which perhaps they might loſe the right they enjoyed, of having the Conſuls choſen in a manner, by which they could almoſt command the choice. That it was prudence and wiſdom to avoid carefully whatever might in the leaſt affect or deſtroy ſo valuable a privilege, which they might make uſe of even in favour of Appius himſelf, in a more favourable opportunity. In ſhort Largius managed them ſo dexterouſly, that he made them conſent to have one of the Conſuls choſen by the people, who ſhould name a perſon amongſt thoſe Senators that were the moſt favourable to the multitude, and that the Senate ſhould chooſe the other (1). Thus Appius for this time was obliged to drop his pretenſions to the Conſulſhip.

(1) Dionyſ. Hal. lib. 6.

think it prudent or ſafe to follow his advice; but this ſhews how violent a man he was (e). He gave another inſtance of it ſoon after, in an aſſembly of the people, in which he ſpoke to them in a manner ſo haughty and reproachful, that he raiſed their fury, and narrowly eſcaped being killed [B], notwithſtanding his dignity of Conſul (f). The ſame year Appius went againſt the Volſci. When he found himſelf without the walls of Rome, veſted with that unbounded authority, which always accompanies a military command, he made his ſoldiers keep ſo ſtrict a diſcipline, that they aſcribed this ſeverity rather to his vengeance than to neceſſity. This rigour embittered them all againſt him, ſo that when he conducted them againſt the enemy, they refuſed to fight and ran away [C]. When they were returned to the territories of the Republick, Appius made them encamp, and to puniſh their voluntary cowardiſe, he ordered thoſe officers and Centurions to be beheaded, who abandoned their poſt, and decimated (g) his whole army. When Appius was returned to Rome, he exaſperated the people again by oppoſing the Agrarian Law (b). This affair was vigorouſly purſued the next year uuder the new Conſuls L. Valerius Publicola, and Tib. Æmilius Mamercus, who were in the people's intereſt [D]. Appius

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Idem, ibid. Livius, lib. 2. cap. 56. p. 54.

(g) Put to death every tenth ſoldier.

(b) The Law concerning the diſtribution of the lands.

[B] Appius ſpoke to them in a manner ſo haughty—— and narrowly eſcaped being killed.] He ſpoke with ſo much anger, that his diſcourſe had the ſame effect upon the people, as the moſt ſeditious harangues of the Tribunes, and only exaſperated more and more the plebeians, and alienated their hearts from the Senate. For in a manner, which the Patricians themſelves blamed, and which was odious to the people, he upbraided them with their late retreat to the ſacred Mount, with the creating of Tribunes, which, he ſaid, had been extorted from the Senate only by an open revolt and the threatnings of a civil war. No wonder, if a Tribunal erected by rebels, produced nothing but tumults and ſeditions. Theſe would end only in the total deſtruction of the Commonwealth, in which the leaſt tract of the ancient Government was no more to be found. The moſt ſacred laws were aboliſhed, the Conſular power deſpiſed, the dignity of the Senate diſgraced. The inſolence of the Tribunes proceeded ſo far, that they wanted to baniſh from future elections the Senatus-Conſultum, and the Auſpices; that is, all that was moſt ſacred in Religion, and moſt venerable in the Government. With a new Government, they would ſoon bring new Gods; and having aboliſhed the Senate, whoſe authority they were daily undermining, they would raiſe upon its ruins a ſupreme Council, compoſed only of the Tribunes of the people. He prayed to the Gods, to take away his life before he became a witneſs to ſo dreadful a revolution. "And, added he, turning himſelf to the people, to "let you know my ſentiments, I publickly declare, "that I will conſtantly oppoſe a law ſo unjuſt; and I "hope that before your Tribunes can publiſh it, I "ſhall make you feel how far the power of a Con"ſul reaches." Such haughty and opprobrious language filled the people with rage and fury. Lictorius, the eldeſt of the Tribunes, anſwered him, "It was "well known he was of a family in which pride "and inhumanity were hereditary; that his father had "been the moſt cruel enemy the people ever had; "and that he himſelf was rather a tyrant than a "Conſul. But, added Lictorius, notwithſtanding "your dignity and power, as a Conſul, I ſwear, that "the law concerning the elections of the Tribunes and "Ediles, ſhall paſs this very day, or I will loſe my "life in the attempt." He then commanded Appius to go out of the Aſſembly, that he might not occaſion new tumults when the votes ſhould be gathered (2). Appius deſpiſed the Tribune's command, and told him, he ought to know, that tho' a Tribune, he was only a private perſon, without any real Magiſtracy, and whoſe power conſiſted only in oppoſing ſuch Decrees of the Senate, as might be prejudicial to the plebeians. Then calling about him all his relations, friends, and clients, who were very numerous, he put himſelf in a condition to repel force by force. It was immediately proclaim'd by Lictorius's command, that the College of the Tribunes ordered the Conſul to be carried into priſon; whereupon one of the Tribunes officers was ſo bold as to attempt to arreſt the firſt Magiſtrate of the Commonwealth. But the Senators and Patricians, with the numerous band of Appius's clients, ſurrounded and ſaved him. Lictorius enraged at this advanced, and entreated the people to aſſiſt him. A terrible ſedition enſued, and would not have ceaſed without much bloodſhed, if Quintius had not engaged ſome ancient and venerable Senators to convey Appius away, whilſt he himſelf ſhould endeavour to appeaſe the raging multitude. But the night approaching forced both parties equally embittered againſt one another, to ſeparate. The next day the tumult began afreſh. The people ſtirred up by the Tribunes, and eſpecially by Lictorius, who had been wounded the day before, poſſeſſed themſelves of the Capitol, and ſeemed to be reſolved to carry on an open war againſt the Patricians. The Senate immediately met, not only to conſider how to appeaſe the ſedition, but alſo to endeavour an agreement between the Conſuls; one of whom, being the moſt moderate, was of opinion that ſomething was to be done in favour of the people; but Appius proteſted he would die rather than comply in the leaſt with the rebels deſire. Theſe tumults continued ſome days; but at laſt the Senate, by Quintius's advice, conſented that the Tribunes Law be publiſhed, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of Appius, who called Gods and men to witneſs, that the Commonwealth was betrayed, and that a Law was paſſing more prejudicial to the Senate's authority, than even that, which had been publiſhed on the ſacred Mount (3). In the firſt election that happened after this Law was made, the Patricians would not aſſiſt at it, that they might not be confounded with the vileſt populace. They were headed by Appius, who was ſtill more exaſperated againſt the Senate than againſt the people. It was a ſhame, he ſaid, that the Senate ſhould forſake him in an undertaking, in which they themſelves had engaged him, by raiſing him to a dignity, for which he did not ſue. He afterwards ſhewed that the victory, which the Tribunes had gained over him, had neither humbled his pride nor broken his courage.

(2) Idem, lib. 9. Livius, lib. 2. cap. 56.

(3) Livius, ibid. Dionyſ. Halic. ibid.

[C] The ſoldiers refuſed to fight and ran away.] They had made a kind of conſpiracy rather againſt his glory than againſt his life. To hinder him from gaining the victory and deprive him thus of the honours of a triumph, they reſolved unanimouſly not to reſiſt the enemy. Accordingly as ſoon as the Volſci approached, the Romans threw away their arms, fled ſhamefully, and thought they did not buy too dear the affront they did to their General, if it coſt them but the loſs of their own honour. Appius in the utmoſt concern did all that lay in his power to rally his ſoldiers, and lead them back againſt the enemy; he prays, he threatens, but to no purpoſe. Some ran from him, not to hear his reproaches; others, tho' not wounded, ſhew him ligatures and bandages, which they had purpoſely put over ſome ſound part of their body, to be excuſed from fighting, and earneſtly requeſt to be conducted to the camp, in order to have their pretended wounds dreſſed. Nay they all promiſcuouſly ran to the camp, without waiting for the order of the General. The Volſci purſued them, and began to attack the trenches of the camp. But here the ſoldiers ſhewed, that if they had not fought, it was not out of fear and cowardiſe; and by defending their camp bravely, they made their General ſenſible, that they could have won the victory if they had been willing (4).

(4) Livius, lib. 2. Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 9. Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 3. p. m. 304.

[D] The new Conſuls were in the people's intereſt.] The diſtribution of the lands was almoſt entirely in the pius oppoſed them with as much haughtineſs, as though he had been ſtill a Conſul, or even veſted with a perpetual Dictatorſhip. Yet to ſhew that he did not intend to ſupport thoſe who had uſurped the lands which belonged to the publick, he propoſed that all thoſe lands, to which thoſe who poſſeſſed them could not prove a juſt claim, ſhould be confiſcated to the uſe of the publick. Though this propoſal ſeemed very juſt, it was liked neither by the rich nor the poor, becauſe the rich would have been deprived of this poſſeſſion without any advantage to the poor; yet as in the main Appius was againſt diſtributing the lands among the people, he was highly applauded by moſt of the Senators, who dreaded an inquiry. But the Tribunes incenſed againſt him, becauſe in him they found united the hatred and oppoſition of all the Patricians, reſolved to ruin him. They cited him before the people as a declared enemy of publick liberty; this was uſually the crime of thoſe, who were guilty of none, and whom the people wanted to deſtroy. The Senate took this affair to heart as their own, and looked upon Appius as the undaunted aſſertor of their rights. Moſt of the Patricians would ſollicit the people in his behalf, but he refuſed their interceſſion with his uſual courage and conſtancy. He altered neither his dreſs (i), nor his language; and on the day appointed, he appeared in the aſſembly of the people, amidſt all his accuſers, with the ſame dignity, as though he had ſtill been a Conſul, and their Judge. The Tribunes reproached him with the cruelty of his adminiſtration, and his inhumanity, in having put to death by the common executioners more ſoldiers than the enemy had killed in the heat of the battle; and to render him ſtill more odious, they upbraided him with his father's ſevere conduct. But Appius anſwered all theſe charges with ſo much ſtrength and eloquence, that the people aſtoniſhed and aſhamed durſt not condemn him. The Tribunes, who were afraid leſt he ſhould be acquitted, put off the judgment of his cauſe to another day, under pretence that the night drawing on there would not be time enough to collect the votes. Appius, who underſtood that at laſt he muſt fall a ſacrifice to the Tribunes hatred and malice, voluntarily put an end to his life, as Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus relates (k), though, according to Livy (l), he died of ſickneſs, morbo moritur. His corpſe was brought into the publick place, and his ſon came to make his funeral oration according to cuſtom. The Tribunes pretended to oppoſe it, under pretence that Appius ought to be conſidered as a criminal, ſince having been accuſed he had not been acquitted before his death. But the people, more generous than the revengeful Tribunes, reverſed their oppoſition, and heard with pleaſure the praiſes of an enemy whom they could not but eſteem, and whom they no longer feared (m).

(i) They, who were accuſed, uſually put on a mourning dreſs.

(k) Dionyſ. Halicar. lib. 9.

(l) Lib. 2. cap. 61. p. m. 56. Col. 2.

(m) Idem, ibid.

the power of the Conſuls, who by the Senate's Decree made under the Conſulſhip of Caſſius and Virginius, were authoriſed to make the enquiry concerning the lands, and to divide them amongſt the people. The Tribunes, who had this affair at heart, found means to prevail upon the Conſul Æmilius, who promiſed them to favour their pretenſions. Valerius alſo had ſome particular reaſons to ſoften the people, who were exaſperated againſt him. When the affair came before the Senate, Æmilius, the father of him that was then Conſul, openly pleaded the cauſe of the people; "Nothing, ſaid he, appears to me more unjuſt, than "that a few perſons only ſhould enrich themſelves "by the ſpoils of the enemy, whilſt all the reſt of "the Citizens groan in miſery and poverty. The poor "plebeians are afraid of having any children, to "whom they can leave nothing but their want and "misfortune; and whereas every one ſhould cultivate "his own land to get a livelihood, they are now ob"liged to labour like ſlaves upon the lands of the "Patricians. Such a ſervile way of living, is not "very proper to raiſe the courage of a Roman; there"fore my opinion is, that our Conſuls ought imme"diately to chooſe the Decemvirs, that they may "make a diſtribution of the lands, which belonging "to the publick, ought to turn equally to the ad"vantage of every private man." Appius anſwered, "That, if the people were miſerable, it was owing "only to their own luxury and intemperance; that "they had had lands even from the foundation of "Rome; that the Conſuls had often yielded to them "all the ſpoils they had made in the enemy's terri"tories; and that if an exact enquiry was made, it "would be found, that thoſe, who had the greateſt "ſhare in the booty, were now the pooreſt of all "the Citizens. That as long as theſe plebeians lived "in ſloth and luxury, it was not in the power of the "State to enrich them. More than fifty Conſulates "had now paſſed, ſince the Decree for diſtributing the "lands had been made, and during all that time "none of the Conſuls ever thought of putting it in exe"cution, becauſe they perfectly well knew, that by "ſuch a Decree the Senate only intended to appeaſe "the ſedition, and to give the people time to con"ſider the injuſtice, and even the impoſſibility of "their pretenſions. Beſides, the ancient Conſuls "knew that this Decree was become void by pre"ſcription, and they were not willing to undertake a "commiſſion which was expired." Appius added, as a compliment to the Conſuls then in being, that there was no reaſon to fear, that they, wiſe and prudent men as they were, would undertake ſuch an affair, without the authority and concurrence of the Senate (5).

(6) Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 9.

P.

APROSIO (ANGELICO) born at Vintimiglia in the Republick of Genoa the 29th of October in 1607, has had great reputation among the Learned, and compoſed a great number of books. There are many learned men ſprung from his family (a). He was but fifteen years old when he entered into the order of the Auguſtins, and was ſo reſpected there, that at laſt he obtained the charge of Vicar General of the Congregation of our Lady of Conſolation at Genoa (b). As ſoon as he had finiſhed his ſtudies, he was thought fit to teach; ſo he taught Philoſophy five years; after which he travelled into ſeveral parts of Italy, and fixed at Venice in the year 1639, at the Convent of St. Stephen, where he taught polite Learning (c). One of the things, which have been to his glory, was the Library of the Auguſtins of Vintimiglia, which was his work, and a ſhining proof of his love for books, and of the habit he had acquired of knowing them well (d). He publiſhed a book concerning this Library, which is very much ſought after by the curious [A].

(a) See the following article.

(b) Michel Juſtiniani, Scrittori Liguri, p. 63.

(c) Philippus Elſſius, in Encomiaſtic. Auguſtiniano, apud Juſtinianum, p. 63.

(d) Raffael Soprani, li Scrittori della Liguria, pag. 21.

curious [A]. Beſides, he was mightily pleaſed with diſguiſing himſelf under fictitious names in the title pages of his books. Perhaps he durſt not write under his true name upon ſubjects not quite conformable to a religious life, ſuch as were the diſputes of the wits concerning the Adonis of the Cavalier Marino [B], and points of that nature [C]. Perhaps he was naturally pleaſed with ſearching after different alluſions, or with perplexing thoſe who love to take off the maſk from a diſguiſed Author. He loved this employment well enough himſelf [D]. However if you conſult the Authors who have given us a catalogue of the writers of Liguria (e), you will find by the title of his works that

(e) Raffael Soprani & Michel Juſtiniani, en 1667; Auguſtin Oldoïni, en 1680.

[A] He publiſhed a book concerning the Library of the Auguſtin Monks at Vintimiglia, which is much ſought after by the curious.] Morhof had heard this book much talked of; but he did not know that it had been printed. He mentions it in ſeveral places of his Polyhiſtor (1), publiſhed in 1688, and always as if he did not believe that work had been yet publiſhed. It is nevertheleſs certain that the Bibliotheca Aproſiana was printed at Bologna, anno 1673, and that Martin Fogelius (2), Profeſſor at Hamburgh, had a copy of it, as Morhof might have ſeen in the Catalogue of that Profeſſor's books; for he quotes that Catalogue (3), which was printed in the year 1678. See what Mr. Placcius obſerves in his Invitatio amica publiſhed at Hamburgh in the year 1689. He adds, that he has mentioned that work of Aproſio in his Pſeudonymie (4), and refers us to the Notes upon the Catalogue of Rhodius (5). Indeed, he tells us at page 150 of his Pſeudonymie, that he learnt by a letter from Mr. Magliabecchi to Martin Vogelius, that Aproſio under the feigned name of Cornelio Aſpaſio Antivigilmi tra i vagabondi di Tabbia detto l'Aggirato had publiſhed a book in 12, in the year 1673, entitled Bibliotheca Aproſiana, paſſa tempo Autonnale. In the notes upon the Catalogue of Rhodius, what Scavenius had ſaid is called in queſtion, that Aproſio had written a book intitled Bibliotheca Apocryphorum, wherein he reſtored ſeveral works to their real Authors (6). That is made a doubt of, becauſe in the Catalogues of Aproſio's works there is no mention of this Bibliotheca Apocryphorum, but only of Bibliotheca Aproſia. But it is thought that Scavenius might eaſily change Aproſia into Apocrypha. It is a little ſtrange that Father Oldoini has not mentioned the Bibliotheca Aproſiana paſſa tempo Autonnale, as he did not publiſh his Athenæum Liguſticum till the year 1680. It is very true that he does enumerate amongſt Aproſio's writings the Bibliotheca Aproſiana and Antiquitates Abintimillienſes; but in ſuch a manner as would incline one to think that that work had not yet been printed. Mr. Teſſier in 1686 has rather left the matter in doubt than decided any thing (7). Morhof remarks that Mr. Leti cites an Author, who has quoted the ſecond tome of the Aproſian Bibliotheca. Producit idem Leti ex Abbate Libanoro, pag. 379, locum, quo tomus ſecundus Bibliothecæ Aproſianæ citatur, quo multi continentur ab Hieron. Savanorola manuſcripti libri (8). i. e. "Leti produces a paſſage from "the Abbot Libanori, pag. 379, wherein the ſecond "tome of the Bibliotheca Aproſiana is quoted, in which "are contained many manuſcript books by Jerom "Savanorola."

This citation from Mr. Leti is very juſt: and by it and ſome other conſiderations, I am verily perſuaded that Morhof does not quote l'Italia regnante upon the credit of others; but that he had read it himſelf. How then comes it to paſs that he does not know that the Bibliotheca Aproſiana was printed at Bologna by the Manoleſſi, in the year 1673 in 12? Does not Mr. Leti poſitively affirm it in the 377th page of the fourth part of his Italia regnante, and does not he quote long paſſages of that book of Aproſio? He adds, that the Author having given an account of his Life to page 262, names after that, to page 666, divers Writers who had given him their works (9); and that the firſt volume only contains ſuch Writers whoſe names begin either with the letters A, B, or C. He believes that the following volumes will be ſpeedily printed; but he had been aſſured that the ſecond was not publiſhed, from whence he concludes that the Father Libanori, who quotes it, had only ſeen it in manuſcript (10). That work of Mr. Leti was printed in 1676.

[B] Perhaps he durſt not write under his true name upon the diſputes of the wits concerning the Adonis of the Cavalier Marino.] The Cavalier Stigliani having publiſhed the book of l'Occhiale, or the Spectacles, which is a ſmart cenſure of the Adonis, found himſelf attacked on all ſides (11). It was perceivable how much Italy was at that time infatuated with the Adonis. People ran into the quarrel as to a fire; but amongſt all who took up the pen for the Cavalier Marino, no body ſhewed more zeal for the Adonis, nor more fire againſt the enemies of that Poem than Father Aproſio de Vintimiglia, an Auguſtin Monk (12). He publiſhed l'Occhiale Stritolato di Scipio Glareano per riſpoſta al Signor Cavaliere Fra Tomaſo Stigliani (13). i. e. "The "Spectacles broken by Scipio Glareano, being an an"ſwer to Signor Cavaliere Fra Tomaſo Stigliani." La Sferza Poëtica di Sapricio Saprici, lo Scantonata Accademico Heteroclito per riſpoſta alla prima cenſura dell' Adone del Cavalier Marino, fatta dal Cavalier Tomaſo Stigliani (14). That is, "The poetical Scourge of "Sapricio Saprici, being an anſwer to the firſt "cenſure of the Cavalier Marino's Adonis, by Cava"lier Tomaſo Stigliani." Del Veratro, Apologia di Sapricio Saprici, per riſpoſta alla ſeconda cenſura dell' Adone del Cavalier Marino, fatta dal Cavaliere Fra Tomaſo Stigliani. i. e. "Hellebore, an Apology of "Sapricio Saprici, being an anſwer to the ſecond "cenſure of Cavalier Marino's Adonis, by Cavalier "Fra Tomaſo Stigliani." This work is divided into two treatiſes (15): it was an Hellebore given at two doſes. He wrote againſt the ſame Stigliani, Il Vaglio Critico di Maſoto Galiſtoni da Terama ſopro il mondo nuovo del Cavalier Fra Tomaſo Stigliani da Matera (16). i. e. "The critical Sieve "of Maſoto Galiſtoni da Terama for the new world "of the Cavalier Fra Tomaſo Stigliani da Matera." Il Burato, Replica di Carlo Galiſtoni al Molino del Sig. Carlo Stigliani (17). i. e. "The Bolter, or the Re"ply of Carlo Galiſtoni to the Mill of Sig. Carlo "Stigliani." Note that Maſoto Galiſtoni da Terama is the Anagram of Tomaſo Stigliani da Matera, and that inſtead of putting in the title in Trevigi, per Girolamo Righettini, it is ſo, in Roſtock, per Willermo Wallop, becauſe that Righettini was a Bookſeller of but little note. Aproſio gives that account in pages 112 and 113 of the Bibliotheca Aproſiana (18).

[C] His writings treated of ſubjects remote from a religious life —— or points of that nature.] I don't think that the diſputes about the Cavalier Marino's Adonis were more remote from a monaſtick profeſſion, than the following works. Annotationi di Oldauro Scioppio all' Arte de gli Amanti dell' Illuſtriſſimo Signor Pietro Michele Nobile Veneto (19). Lo Scudo di Rinaldo, overo lo Specchio del diſinganno, opera di Scipio Glareano (20). Le Bellezze della Beliſa Tragedia dell' Illuſtriſſimo Signor D. Antonio Muſcettola, abbozzate da Oldauro Scioppio Academico Incognito, Geniale, &c (21). There are ſeveral ſuch like compoſitions amongſt the writings of Angelico Aproſio that are not printed; but it muſt not be denied, I, That there are likewiſe to be ſeen amongſt them the Lectures which he made upon the Prophet Jonas, in the Church of our Lady of the Conſolation, at Genoa, in the year 1649, and the following (22). II, That he publiſhed in 1643, under the name of Oldauro Scioppio, the Italian tranſlation which he had made of the Spaniſh Sermons of Auguſtin Oſorius.

[D] The buſineſs of unmaſking diſguiſed Authors was what he took great delight in.] It was not abſolutely without foundation that Scavenius aſſerted, that Aproſio had written a book called Bibliotheca Apocryphorum, where he had reſtored ſeveral performances to their real Authors; for it is to him that two writings are aſcribed, one whereof is intitled, La Viſpera alzata Nezataſte di alcuni Scrittori che andarono in Maſchera ſupri del tempo di Carnevale; and the other, which is only a ſequel to the foregoing, is called Pentecoſte di alcuni

(1) Pag. 38, 59, 144.

(2) Or Vogelius.

(3) Polyhiſt. pag. 37.

(4) Num. 74.

(5) Pag. 27, 28.

(6) See the note [D].

(7) Teiſſier, Catalog. Auctorum Biblioth. &c. pag. 18.

(8) Morhof, Polyhiſt. p. 38.

(9) Narrando la ſua Vita con l'inſerirvi varie curioſita intorno ad amici ſuoi. Leti, Ital. regn. Parte 4. p. 378.

(10) Ibid. pag. 379, 380.

(11) See Baillet, Jug. ſur les Poëtes tom. 4. p. 198.

(12) Ibid. pag. 200.

(13) Printed at Venice in 1641.

(14) Printed at Venice in 1643.

(15) One printed in 1645, the other in 1647, at Venice.

(16) Printed at Trevigio, in 1637.

(17) Printed at Venice in 1642.

(18) Leti, Italia regnante, Part 4. pag. 360.

(19) Printed at Venice in 1642.

(20) Printed at Venice in 1642.

(21) Printed at Lovain in 1664.

(22) Soprani, Scrittori della Liguria, p. 23.

that he assumed a thousand fictitious names, sometimes that of Masoto Galistoni, sometimes that of Carlo Galistoni, sometimes that of Scipio Glareano, sometimes that of Sapricio Saprici, sometimes that of Oldauro Scioppio, &c. You may find his life in the book intitled La Bibliotheca Aprosiana. Several Authors have given him great commendations, and some perhaps have passed the bounds of reason (f). He was admitted amongst other Academies into that of gli Incogniti of Venice, as appears by the book intitled Le Glorie de gli Incogniti, overo gli huomini illustri dell' Academia de' i Signori Incogniti di Venetia [E], where there is a large encomium on him. He was alive in the year 1680, when Oldoini published his Athenæum Ligusticum.

(f) Magnifica ejus & planè invidenda elogia adferuntur à Gregorio Leti, Italia regnante, Part 4. lib. 3. pag. 377. Polyhist. Morhofii, pag. 38. See also p. 144.

Autori Anonimi è Pseudonimi scoperti per Mantissa della Necatasse della Visiera alzata Father Oldoini does not tell us whether these two works were printed or not; he only says that Aprosio wrote them under another name: and one cannot conclude that they were printed, from what he cites in the following page, La Visiera alzata evulgata sub nomine Friani Forbottæ; "The Visiera alzata was published under the name "of Frianus Forbotta;" for he plainly acquaints us that this Forbotta is a distinct person from Angelico Aprosio (23). There is no room to doubt but that the two works which he attributes to our Aprosio were the same which he has spoken of in the Journal of Leipsic (24). They were printed at Parma in 1689. The name which stands in the front is Jean Pierre Villani de Sienne, Academicien Humoriste, Infecond, & Genialis. It appears that they had been dedicated as early as the year 1678 to Messieurs Magliabecchi.

(23) Oldoïnus, in Append. Athen. Ligust.

(24) Mense Jul. 1690. p. 363.

[E] It appears by the book entitled Delle Glorie de Gli Incogniti, that he was a Member of that Academy.] It was printed at Venice in 1647, in 4to. Father Labbe thought that John Francis Lauredan was the Author of it (25); but others did not think so, for this, amongst other reasons, that the Elogium of Lauredan, which is in that book, is too pompous to be attributed to Lauredan himself (26). It is supposed that the verses which are at the beginning of the work, and which compliment Lauredan, not as the Author of the book, but as the Founder of the Academy de gli Incogniti, have been the occasion of Father Labbe's mistake.

(25) Labbe, Bibliot. Bibliothecar. p. 118. edit. anni 1678.

(26) Placcius de Anonymis, pag. 115. See in the same Vol. the Catal. of Rhodius, p. 25, 26.

APROSIO (PAUL AUGUSTIN) a Civilian, and Apatiste Academician of Florence, was born at Vintimiglia, of one of the principal families of the place, and which can boast of having produced, from the beginning of the seventeenth Century, to the year 1667, nine Doctors of Law, and one Physician. He of whom I am speaking having studied at Genoa under the Jesuits, went to Rome, to study the Law there. He was received Doctor in the year 1649; after which he returned home, bought many curious books, and retired to a country house, that he might peaceably enjoy the pleasure of reading and composing. He wrote Notes upon the Belisa of Antonio Muscetola, which have been printed with the Bellezze della medezima abozzate da Oldauro Scioppio, in 1664. When le Soprani, from whom I borrowed this article, published his Catalogue of the Writers of Liguria in 1667, our Aprosio laboured at a great work of morality on the defeat of the capital vices, by the contrary virtues. (a) Oldoini informs me that this work was printed at Genoa in 1674, and dedicated to the Prince of Monaco.

(a) Strage de Vitii capitali trionfati dalle Virtu opposte.

APULEIUS (LUCIUS) a Platonist known to all the world by the famous work of the Golden Ass, lived in the second Century, under the Antonines [A]. He was of Madaura a Roman Colony in Africa [B]. His family was considerable [C].

[A] He lived in the second Century, under the Antonines (1).] Peter Pithon strongly rejecting those who say that Apuleius lived after Theodosius, proves that he lived about the time of Antoninus Pius, and afterwards (2). This opinion is built upon such good reasons, that I do not find any one that does not embrace it. It is manifest that one Scipio Orsitus, that one Lollianus Avitus, that one Claudius Maximus, that one Lollius Urbicius, of whom Apuleius speaks as persons then living, lived under the Antonines. Father Noris makes a wrong criticism upon Elmenhorst: he imputes to him the having acknowledged his ignorance concerning the time in which Apuleius lived (3), and shews him two passages of the Apology of Apuleius, in one of which Antoninus is not honoured with the title of Divus, and the other mentions the Proconsul Lollianus Avitus, who was Consul in 144. The absence of Divus is a pretty good proof that Antoninus was still alive. Father Noris would not have been in the wrong, if he whom he criticises had not said as follows: Quo anno natus (Apuleius) *non liquido liquet. Verisimiliter tamen possumus adserere eum temporibus Antonini Pii Divorumque fratrum vixisse. Meminit enim * Lolliani Aviti, Lollii † Urbicii Pudentis, & ‡ Scipionis Orphiti Coss. qui sub Antonino præcipue floruerunt, summis macti honoribus, ut constat ex* L. 3. ff. de his quæ in testament. delent. & L. 3. §. 2. ff. de Decurion. (4). i. e. "In what year he "(Apuleius) was born, is not very clear. But we "may with probability assert, that he lived in the "time of Antoninus Pius and his brothers. For he "makes mention of Lollianus Avitus, Lollius Urbi"cius Pudens, and Scipio Orphitus the Consuls, who "principally flourished under Antoninus, and obtain"ed the highest honours." The passage, wherein Antoninus is not called Divus, contains the reproaches which Apuleius casts upon his wife's son, on his producing some love-letters of his mother. Hucusque à vobis miserum istum puerum depravatum, ut matris suæ epistolas, quas putat amatorias, pro tribunali Proconsulis recitet apud virum sanctissimum Claudium Maximum, ante has Imperatoris Pii statuas filius matris suæ pudenda exprobret stupra, & amores objectet (5). Jonsius is doubly mistaken, when to prove that Apuleius lived in the time I have assigned him, he says that this Philosopher gives Antoninus Pius the title of Divus (6). The fact is false, and no consequence can be deduced from it.

(1) And not under Domitian, with Apollonius of Tyana, as Anastasius Nicæus, Quæstione 23 in Scripturam. Observe that others ascribe this work to Anastasius Sinaïta.

(2) Pithœus, Adversarior. lib. 2. cap. 10.

(3) Noris, Cenotaph. Pisan. pag. 33.

* Apolog. p. 289. Capitol. Antonino, 27.

† Apolog. pag. 274. Capitolin. Pertinace, 78.

‡ Apuleii, Floridor, p. 357, 358.

(4) Elmenh. in Vitâ Apuleii.

(5) Apuleii Apologia, p. 327.

(6) Jonsius, de Script. Histor. Philos. p. 267.

[B] He was of Madaura, a Roman Colony in Africa.] This city, which belonged to Syphax, was given to Masinissa by the Romans. Neque hoc eo dixi, quo me patriæ meæ pæniteret, etsi adhuc Syphacis oppidum essemus: quo tamen victo, ad Masinissam regem concessimus, munere populi Romani, ac deinceps veteranorum militum novo conditu, splendidissima colonia sumus (7). i. e. "Nor did I say this, as if I repented of my coun"try, tho' we were a town of Syphax: which being "overcome, we were given to Masinissa by the Ro"man people, and since by a new foundation of ve"teran soldiers we are become a splendid Colony." A little before, he had said there was no shame in participating, like Cyrus, of different nations. De patriâ meâ verò quod eam sitam Numidiæ & Gætuliæ in ipso confinio meis scriptis ostendisti, quibus memet professus sum . . . . Seminumidam & Sæmigætulum, non video quod mihi sit in ea re pudendum, haud minus quam Cyro majori, quod genere mixto fuit, Semimedus ac Semipersa. i. e. "But as to my country, it is shewn to "be on the borders of Numidia and Gætulia in my "own writings, wherein I have professed myself half able [C]. He was well educated; he had a fine perſon; he had wit, and became learned; but he made himſelf be ſuſpected of Magick, and this ill character does great injury ſtill to his memory. He ſtudied firſt at Carthage, then at Athens, afterwards at Rome [D], where he learnt the Latin tongue, without any body's help. An inſatiable curioſity to know every thing engaged him to undertake ſeveral journies, and to enter himſelf into ſeveral ſocieties of religion [E]. He had a mind to ſee the bottom of their pretended myſteries, and it was for that reaſon that he deſired to be initiated amongſt them. He

(7) Apul. Apologia, p. 289.

" a Numidian and half a Gætulian, I do not ſee that " I have any more reaſon to be aſhamed of this, " than Cyrus the Great had of being a mixt breed, " half a Mede and half a Perſian." A certain man, who had a mind to ſet up for a general Cenſor, about the end of the ſixteenth Century falls in this place into our hands. After having ſaid that Lucian, under the pretended ſhape of an aſs, teaches a thouſand obſcenities, he adds, Apuleius hunc imitatus, ut vir Græcus ſe Latinè neſciviſſe ingenuè, confeſſus in Aſino aureo planè rudit (8). i. e. " Apuleius imitating " him, and as he was a Greek being ignorant of La- " tin, as he ingenuouſly confeſſes, quite brays in his " golden aſs." Firſt it is not true, that Apuleius confeſſes he does not underſtand Latin: he ſays only, 1, that he did not underſtand it, the firſt time he came to Rome; 2, that he learned it without a maſter. In the ſecond place it is not true that he was a Greek. Madaura was a Roman Colony; and when he endeavours to juſtify himſelf by the example of the other Poets, he quotes the Greeks as foreigners, and the Latins, as his countrymen. Fecere tamen & alii talia, & .... apud Græcos Teius quidam .... Apud nos verò Ædituus & Portius, & Catulus (9). The truth of it is, the Latin tongue was not common at Madaura. Apuleius, a ſon of one of the principal Magiſtrates, underſtood nothing of it when he came to Rome. The ſon of his wife Pudentilla underſtood only the Punic with a little Greek, which his mother being originally of Theſſalia had taught him. Loquitur nunquam niſi Punicè, & ſi quid adhuc à matre Græciſſat: Latinè enim neque vult neque poteſt (10).

(8) Claudius Verderius, in Auctores pene omnes Cenſion. p. 73. This book was printed at Lyons in 1586, in 4°.

(9) Apuleii Apologia, p. 278.

(10) Ibid. pag. 336.

[C] His family was conſiderable.] His Father's name was Theſeus. It is known only by theſe words: Si contentus lare parvulo, Theſei illius cognominis patris tui virtutes æmulaveris (11). He had born the office of Decemvir at Madaura. It was the principal poſt of a Colony. In quâ coloniâ patrem habui loco principe Duumviralem, cunctis honoribus perfunctum (12). His mother's name was Salvia (13); ſhe was originally of Theſſalia and deſcended from the family of Plutarch. He ſays ſo himſelf, at the beginning of his Romance. Saint Auguſtin acknowledges in his fifth Letter, that Apuleius was of a good family. See below the note [E], quotation (18).

(11) Apul. Metam. lib. 1. pag. 112.

(12) Idem, Apologiæ, pag. 289.

(13) Idem, Metamorph. lib. 2. pag. 115.

[D] He ſtudied firſt at Carthage, then at Athens, afterwards at Rome.] We ſhould not find this gradation, if we were to ſtop at the Prologue of his Romance, ſeeing he ſays nothing in it of Carthage. He contents himſelf with ſaying that his firſt ſtudy was the Greek language in Greece, and that afterwards he came to Rome, where he ſtudied Latin without the help of any maſter. Ibi linguam Attidem primis pueritiæ ſtipendiis merui, mox in urbe Latia advena ſtudiorum Quiritium indigenam ſermonem ærumnabili labore, nullo magiſtro præeunte, aggreſſus excolui. This narration is deceitful: it is far from being exact; it muſt be rectified by other paſſages of Apuleius. Should we be ſurprized at an Author's making an ill relation of another's actions? does not he ſometimes relate his own very confuſedly? Here follow other paſſages of our Author. He tells the Carthaginians, that he had ſtudied amongſt them in his infancy, and had alſo there began to embrace the ſect of the Platoniſts. Sum vobis nec lare alienus, nec pueritiâ inviſitatus, nec magiſtris peregrinus, nec ſectâ incognitus. .... Enimverò & pueritia apud vos, & magiſtri vos; & ſecta, licet Athenis Atticis confirmata, tamen hic inchoata eſt (14): to which he adds, Hanc ego vobis mercedem, Carthaginienſes, ubique gentium dependo pro diſciplinis, quas in pueritiâ ſum apud vos adeptus. Ubique enim me veſtræ civitatis alumnum fero (15). i. e. " I pay " you this reward, O Carthaginians, every where for " the learning I had amongſt you in my childhood. " For I declare myſelf every where a child of your " city." Some pages after, he enumerates the ſciences he ſtudied at Athens. Prima cratera Litteratoris ruditatem eximit; ſecunda Grammatici doctrinâ inſtruit: tertia Rhetoris eloquentiâ armat. Hactenus à pleriſque potatur. Ego & alias crateras Athenis bibi; Poeticæ commentam, Geometricæ limpidam, Muſicæ dulcem, Dialecticæ auſterulam, enimvero univerſæ Philoſophiæ inexplebilem, ſcilicet nectaream (16). i. e. " The firſt " cup, of the Schoolmaſter, takes off ignorance: the " ſecond, of the Grammarian, furniſhes with learn- " ing: the third, of the Rhetorician, arms with elo- " quence. Thus deep moſt perſons drink. But I " drank of other cups alſo at Athens: the fictitious " one of Poetry, the clear one of Geometry, the ſweet " one of Muſic, the rough one of Dialectic, nay and " the inexhauſtible, nectareous one of univerſal Phi- " loſophy." Some will have it that he ſtudied in Greece at two different times; firſt, before he ſtudied at Carthage, and afterwards when he had ſtudied in that city. They ſay nothing of Rome: and pretend it was at Carthage that he learned Latin (17). This laſt fact is evidently proved falſe by the Prologue of the Golden Aſs.

(14) Idem, Floridor. pag. 359.

(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 361.

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 363.

(17) He ſpent the firſt years of his infancy in Greece, and the following at Carthage, where he learned Latin without a maſter; and with a good deal of labour. He began alſo to ſtudy Philoſophy there. He went afterwards to Athens, where he learned Poetry, &c. Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 2. pag. 722.

[E] His inſatiable curioſity to know every thing engaged him to .... inliſt himſelf in ſeveral religious Societies.] He makes himſelf ſpeak theſe words in the third book of the Golden Aſs. Paveo & formido ſolidè domus hujus operta detegere, & arcana dominæ meæ revelare ſecreta. Sed melius de te doctrinâque tuâ præſumo, qui præter generoſam natalium dignitatem, præter ſublime ingenium, ſacris pluribus initiatus, profecto noſti ſanctam ſilentii fidem (18). i. e. " I am " afraid and dread to reveal the ſecrets of this houſe. " But I preſume better of you and your doctrine, " who beſides the honour of your generous birth, " beſides your ſublime genius, having been ini- " tiated into many rites, know full well the ſacred " obligation of ſilence." He finiſhes his romance with a narration of his entrance into the Religion of Oſiris. It was at Rome, that he had this honour. He was not long in the lower claſs of the initiated; he ſoon aroſe to the higheſt degrees. Denique per dies admodum pauculos, Deus Deûm magnorum potior, & majorum ſummus, & ſummorum maximus, & maximorum regnator Oſiris non in alienam quampiam perſonam reformatus, ſed coram ſuo illo venerando me dignatus affla- mine, per quietem præcipere viſus eſt. .... Ac ne ſacris ſuis gregi cætero permixtus deſervirem, in collegium me Paſtophororum ſuorum, imo inter ipſos Decurionum quinquennales elegit. i. e. " At laſt for a very few days " the greater God of great Gods, and the greateſt of " greater, and the Ruler of the greateſt, Oſiris, not " being changed into any other form, but plainly " thought fit to afford me his venerable inſpiration, " and ſeemed in my ſleep to command me .... and " that I might not ſerve in his rites, mixed with the " reſt of the troop, he choſe me into the college of his " Paſtophouri, nay into the very Decuriones quinquenna- les." Before he came to Rome, he had been initiated into the myſteries of Iſis: they were the firſt fruits of the recovery of his human ſhape. He mixes, in the deſcription of theſe ceremonies, abundance of noble ſentiments, and ſuch as are not unworthy the true Religion. As for example: Te jam nunc obſequio religionis noſtræ dedica, & miniſterii jugum ſubi voluntarium, nam cum cæperis Deo ſervire, tunc magis ſenties fructum tuæ libertatis (19). i. e. " Now dedi- " cate thyſelf to the obedience of our Religion, and " ſubmit thyſelf willingly to the yoke of the Mini- " ſtry; for as ſoon as thou haſt begun to ſerve the " Goddeſs, thou wilt perceive the fruit of thy liber- " ty." Thoſe who accuſed him of magic, objected to him amongſt other things, that he kept I know not what in his handkerchief with a particular ſuperſtition. This is his anſwer: Vin dicam cujuſmodi illas res in ſudario obvolutas laribus Pontiani commendarim? Mos tibi geretur. Sacrorum pleraque initia in Græcia participavi.

(18) Apuleii, Metamorph. pag. 136.

(19) Metamorph. lib. 11. p. 264.

He ſpent almoſt all his eſtate in theſe travels [F], inſomuch, that being returned to Rome, and deſiring to dedicate himſelf to the ſervice of Oſiris, he had not money enough to ſupport the expence of the ceremonies of the reception. He pawned even his clothes to raiſe the neceſſary ſum (a): after which he got his livelihood by pleading cauſes; and, as he was very eloquent, and was maſter of a ſubtle genius, he did not want cauſes, and even thoſe very conſiderable ones (b). But he rendered his circumſtances more eaſy by a good marriage, than by his pleadings. A widow named Pudentilla, who was neither young nor handſome, but wanted a huſband, and was very rich, liked him greatly [G]. He

(a) See the note [F].

(b) Quæ res ſummum peregrinationi meæ tribuebat ſolatium, nec minus etiam victum uberiorem ſubminiſtrabat. Quidni? Spiritu faventis eventus quæſticulo fovenſi nutrito per patrocinia ſermonis Romani... quam nunc incontanter gloriosa in foro redderem patrocinia. Apuleius, Metam. lib. 11. pag. 272. edit. Elmenhorſtii, an. 1621, in 8vo.

participavi. Eorum quædam ſigna & monumenta tradita mihi à ſacerdotibus ſedulo conſervo. Nihil inſolitum, nihil incognitum dico. Vel unius Liberi patris ſymmiſtæ, qui adeſtis, ſcitis quid domi conditum celetis, & abſque omnibus profanis tacitè veneremini. At ego, ut dixi, multijuga ſacra, & plurimos ritus, varias ceremonias, ſtudio veri & officia erga Deos didici. Nec hoc ad tempus compono, ſed abhinc fermè triennium eſt, cum primis diebus quibus Oeeam veneram, publicè diſſerens de Æſculapii majeſtate, eadem iſta præ me tuli, & quot ſacra noſſem percenſui. Ea diſputatio celebratiſſima eſt, vulgo legitur, in omnium manibus verſatur..... Etiamne cuiquam mirum videri poteſt, cui ſit ulla memoria religionis, hominem tot myſteriis Deûm conſcium, quædam ſacrorum crepundia domi adſervare, atque ea lineo texto involvere, quod puriſſimum eſt rebus divinis velamentum (20). i. e. "Would you have "me tell you what ſort of things I kept wrapt up in "my handkerchief and recommended to the Lares "of Pontianus? you ſhall be obeyed. I was initiated into moſt of the rites in Greece. I carefully "preſerve ſome ſigns and monuments of them which "were delivered to me by the Prieſts. I mention "nothing unuſual, or unknown. Even you the Symmiſtæ of Father Bacchus, who are preſent, know "what you keep laid up at home, and ſilently revere "in the abſence of the profane. But I, as I ſaid "before, have learned many ſacred things, and many rites, and various ceremonies, out of deſire after truth and duty to the Gods. Nor do I make "this for the preſent occaſion, but it is now three "years, ſince when I firſt came to Oeea, I diſputed "publickly concerning the majeſty of Æſculapius, "and mentioned theſe very things, and related how "many ſacred things I was acquainted with. That "diſputation is very famous, is frequently read, and "is in every one's hands.... Can it now ſeem ſtrange "to any one, who has any memory of Religion, that "a man conſcious to ſo many myſteries of Gods "ſhould keep at home ſome crepundia of their rites, "and wrap them up in a linnen cloth, which is the "moſt pure covering for divine things." It is probable, that if Apuleius was a Magician, his crime was incomparably leſs than that of the modern Magicians, becauſe he did not know that they were nothing but evil Spirits, who ſet themſelves to do certain things in the preſence of certain ceremonies. He thought with the Platoniſts, that the good Spirits were capable alſo of doing it (21). I have quoted Saint Auguſtin in the text of this article, who bears witneſs that Apuleius had a religious dignity, which gave him the ſuperintendance of the combats of Gladiators. Sacerdos Provinciæ pro magno fuit, ut munera ederet venatoreſque veſtiret (22). Laſtly, I find that our Author had conſecrated himſelf to the worſhip of Æſculapius, one of the principal Divinities of the Carthaginians, and that he had a dignity alſo in this College. Principium mihi apud veſtras aureis auſpicatiſſimum ab Æſculapio Deo capiam, qui arcem veſtræ Carthaginis indubitabili numine propitius reſpicit. Ejus Dei hymnum Græco & Latino carmine vobis ſic canam, jam illi à me dedicatum. Sum enim non ignotus illius SACRICOLA, nec recens cultor, nec ingratus ANTISTES (23). i. e. "I ſhall begin in the moſt auſpicious "manner with the God Æſculapius, who moſt undoubtedly looks down with favour on your Carthage. I will ſing you a hymn in Greek and Latin verſe, which I have dedicated to him before. "For I am neither one of his unknown PRIESTS, "nor a new worſhipper, nor an unpleaſing PRELATE."

(20) Idem, Apolog. p. 309, 310.

(21) See the diſpute of St. Auguſtin againſt the opinion de Apuleius in the 8th book of Civit. Dei, chap. 19, &c.

(22) Auguſt. Epiſt. 5.

(23) Apuleius, Florid. pag. 361.

[F] He ſpent almoſt all his wealth in his travels.] This was not the only cauſe of the poverty into which he fell: he was at other more laudable expences: at leaſt he boaſted of them, when he anſwered the reproach which had been thrown on him on account of his miſerableneſs. Ad iſtum modum deſponſus ſacris, ſumptuum tenuitate contra votum meum retardabar: nam & viriculas patrimonii peregrinationis attriverant impenſæ (24). i. e. "Being thus devoted to ſacred "things, I was retarded contrary to my deſire by the "ſmallneſs of my fortune: for even the charges of "my travelling had worn out my ſmall patrimony." It is thus that he ſpeaks, when he repreſents the difficulty he found himſelf in at Rome, on account of his vocation to the brotherhood of Oſiris. He was engaged to this myſterious congregation; the promiſes were given; but as nothing is done for nothing, ſomething was to be paid for the inaugural ceremonies, and he had not wherewithal to ſupply that expence. He was obliged, in a manner, to ſell as far as his very ſhirt: the Divinity, that preſſed him, ſhewed him there was no other remedy. Jamque ſæpiculè non ſine magna turbatione ſtimulatus, poſtremo juſſus veſte ipſa mea quamvis parvula diſtracta ſufficientem corrasi ſummulam, & id ipſum præceptum fuerat ſpecialiter. An tu, inquit, ſi quam rem voluptati ſtruendæ molireris laciniis tuis nequaquam parceres, nunc tantas ceremonias aditurus impœnitendæ te pauperiei contaris committere (25)? i. e. "And now being often ſpurred "on not without great diſturbance, at length being "commanded, I ſold even my poor cloaths, and "ſo ſcrap'd up a little ſum that was ſufficient, and "that was particularly commanded. Would you, "ſays he, ſpare a rag if you was about ſatisfying "of your pleaſures; and now you are about to enter "into ſuch great ceremonies, do you ſtick at committing yourſelf to a poverty that is in no wiſe to be "deſpiſed?" At that time, he aſcribes his indigence only to the expences of his travels; but on the other occaſion which I have mentioned, he ſays he had expended a great deal upon good works, in ſuccouring his friends, in acknowledging the cares of thoſe who had inſtructed him, and in giving portions to the daughters of ſome of them. He adds, he ſhould have made no difficulty to purchaſe the contempt of his patrimony at the expence of his whole patrimony: a contempt which is more valuable than the patrimony itſelf. This is ſpeaking like a Philoſopher. Si tamen neſcis (it is thus that he addreſſes his diſcourſe to his accuſer (26)) profiteor mihi ac fratri meo relictum à patre H-S. vicies, paulo ſecus; idque à me longa peregrinatione & diutinis ſtudiis, & crebris liberalitatibus modicè imminutum. Nam & amicorum pleriſque opem tuli; & magiſtris plurimis gratiam retuli, quorundam etiam filias dote auxi. Neque enim dubitaſſem equidem vel univerſum patrimonium impendere, ut adquirerem mihi quod majus eſt, contemptum patrimonii. He had made very ſolid and very moral reflections upon poverty (27).

(24) Apuleius, Metam. lib. 11. pag. 271.

(25) Idem, ibid.

(26) Apuleius, Apol. p. 288.

(27) Idem, ibid. pag. 285, 286, 287.

[G] A widow who was neither young nor handſome, but wanted a huſband,.... liked him greatly.] Apuleius's accuſer affirmed ſhe was ſixty years of age (28): whence he expected to prove that the paſſion ſhe had conceived for the accuſed was not natural, but the effect of ſome magical charm. Apuleius ſhewed that ſhe was not above forty, and that if ſhe had ſpent near fourteen years of it in widowhood, it was not on account of any averſion ſhe had to marriage, but on account of the oppoſitions of her father-in-law: that in fine, this ſtate of continency had ruined her health, inſomuch that the Phyſicians and Midwives had agreed, that there was no better remedy for the ſuffocations that tormented her, than marriage (29). A woman who is told that, and who has no time to loſe, if ſhe has a mind to make uſe of her remaining years of fertility, has no occaſion to be compelled by ſorcery to chooſe a huſband. This was Apuleius's reaſoning, and is pretty ſtrong. Eo ſcrupulo liberata, cum à principibus viris in matrimonium peteretur, decrevit

(28) Idem, Apolog. p. 317, 330.

(29) Idem, ibid. p. 330.

He was not backward, he was not ſollicitous about reſerving his good mien, his neatneſs [H], his wit, and his eloquence, for ſome young wench; he readily married the rich widow in a country houſe near to Oea, a maritime city of Africa. This marriage drew crevit ſibi diutius in viduitate non permanendum. Quippe ut ſolitudinis tædium perpeti poſſet; tamen ægritudinem corporis ferre non poterat. Mulier ſanctè pudica, tot annis viduitatis ſine culpa, ſine fabula abſuetudine conjugis torpens, & diutino ſitu viſcerum ſaucia, vitiatis intimis uteri, ſæpe ad extremum vitæ diſcrimen doloribus obortis exanimabatur. Medici cum obſtreticibus conſentiebant, penuria matrimonii morbum quæſitum. Malum indies augeri, ægritudinem ingraveſcere: dum ætatis aliquid ſuperſit, nuptiis valetudinem medicandam (30). It is a misfortune to a woman, that there are ſome trials, in which one is obliged to ſpeak a hundred things in full court, which one would rather conceal, whether the natural infirmity has more or leſs ſhare in it than the moral (31). If it had not been for ſuch a trial, Apuleius would never have been brought to diſcover the cauſe of the diſorders with which Pudentilla had been tormented during her widowhood. She found in it however ſome little alleviation; for ſince ſhe had ſuffered ſo much, it was a ſign ſhe had not made uſe of the true remedy. This conſequence was not alledged to the Judges; but it was affirmed that this widow had lived chaſtly, and that there had gone no evil report concerning her. To return to her age: I ſay Apuleius was younger than ſhe, for ſhe had a ſon who had been Apuleius's companion at Athens (32); but I add that he did not marry her without hopes of having children by her. He ſhews this, when he makes anſwer to the reproach that had been caſt on him, for going into the country to be married. After having anſwered, that this courſe had been taken to avoid the expences which would have attended their wedding in the city, he adds, that the country is a place much more favourable to fruitfulneſs than the city, and that to lie on the graſs, and under the ſhade of elms, and in the midſt of an infinite number of productions that grow out of the fruitful boſom of the earth, cannot fail of aſſiſting a new married couple who deſire to have children. He would have done well to keep this thought for his Florida, I mean for thoſe rhetorical declamations, wherein he gives a looſe to all the falſe thoughts of his imagination. This place ſpoils his apology, and is fit neither for the Judges to whom he ſpoke, nor for the cauſe which he pleaded. Immo ſi verum vis, uxor ad prolem multo auſpicatius in villa quam in oppido ducitur: in ſolo uberi, quam in loco ſterili; in agri ceſpite, quam in foci ſilice, mater futura in ipſo materno ſi nubat ſinu, in ſegete adulta ſuper fœcundam glèbam. Vel enim ſub Ulmo marita cubet in ipſo gremio terræ matris inter ſoboles herbarum, & propagines vitium, & arborum germina (33). We ſhall ſee by and by (34), that it was declared in full court, that Pudentilla was not handſome, and that her contract of marriage contained ſome clauſes which ſuppoſed ſhe was ſtill young enough to have children.

(30) Idem, ibid. pag. 318. CERTAIN trials, why diſpleaſing to the ſex.

(31) See below the note [I].

(32) Apuleii, Apolog. p. 320.

(33) Apulei, Apolog. p. 329.

(34) In the note [I].

[H] His good mien, his neatneſs, &c.] Here are ſome parts of his picture. At illa obtutum in me converſa, En, inquit, ſanctiſſimæ Salviæ matris generoſa proles. Sed & cætera corporis inexplicabiliter ad regulam congruentia, inenormis proceritas, ſucculenta gracilitas, rubor temperatus, flavum & inaffectatum capillitium, oculi cæſii quidem, ſed vigiles, & in aſpectu micantes prorſus aquilino, quoquo verſum floridi: ſpecioſus & immeditatus inceſſus (35). i. e. "But ſhe "turning herſelf upon me, ſaid, behold the generous "offſpring of thy moſt holy mother Salvia. But the "other parts of thy body are formed according to an "inexplicable ſymmetry, thy proportionable heighth; "thy ſlenderneſs without leanneſs; thy colour freſh "without being red; thy hair yellow without art; "thy eyes, though grey, yet quick and with the vi-"vacity of an eagle, and ſhining; thy gate agree-"able, without affectation." His accuſers reproached him with his beauty (36), his fine hair, his beautiful teeth, and his looking-glaſs. On the two firſt heads he anſwered, that he was ſorry the accuſation was falſe. Quod utinam tam gravia formæ & facundiæ crimina verè mihi approbaſſet! non difficile ei reſpondiſſem quod Homericus Alexander Hectori:

(35) Metamorph. lib. 2, pag. 115. See alſo lib. 1. pag. 112.

(36) Accuſamus apud te Philoſophum formoſum, & tam Græcè quam Latinè probè nefas! diſertiſſimum. Apuleius, Apolog. p. 275.

Ὅυτι ἀποβλητ' ἐπὶ σοῖσι μετὰ φρεσὶν ἠδὲ δόσησι·
Ὅσσα κεν αὐτοὶ δῶσιν, ἑκὼν δ' οὐκ ἄν τις ἕλοιτο.

Hæc ego de forma reſpondiſſem. Præterea, licere etiam Philoſophis eſſe vultu liberali. Pythagoram, qui primum ſeſe Philoſophum nuncuparit, eum ſui ſæculi excellentiſſima forma fuiſſe: item Zenonem..... Sed hæc defenſio, ut dixi, aliquam multum à me remota eſt: cui, præter formæ mediocritatem, continuatio etiam litterati laboris omnem gratiam corpore deterget, habitudinem tenuat, ſuccum exorbet, colorem obliterat, vigorem debilitat. Capillus ipſe, quem iſti aperto mendacio ad lenocinium decoris promiſſum dixêre, vides quàm nos ſit amœnus ac delicatus, horrore implexus atque impeditus, ſtuppeo tomento aſſimilis, & inæqualiter hirtus, & globoſus, & congeſtus: prorſus inenodabilis diutina incuria, non modò comendi ſed ſaltem expediendi & diſcriminandi (37). i. e. "I wiſh he had juſtly re-"proached me with theſe grievous crimes of beauty "and elegance: I ſhould have made no difficulty to "have anſwered him as Paris did Hector in Homer.

(37) Idem, ibid. and pag. 276.

"——Nor thou deſpiſe the charms
"With which a lover golden Venus arms;
"Soft moving ſpeech, and pleaſing outward ſhow,
"No wiſh can gain 'em, but the Gods beſtow.
Pope.

"I ſhould have added, that Philoſophers alſo might "have a handſome face. That Pythagoras, who "firſt called himſelf a Philoſopher, was the moſt "beautiful man of his time; likewiſe Zeno..... "But this defence, as I ſaid, is very remote from "me; who, beſides the indifference of my perſon, have, "by a continuance in learned labours, worn off all "grace from my body, emaciated my plumpneſs, "dried up my juices, obliterated my colour, and "weakened my vigour. My hair, which they have "with an open lie reported to be effeminately long, "is, you ſee, quite the contrary, uncurled and tang-"led, more like ropes, and uneven and clotted; "quite paſt being untangled, through a continual "neglect not only of trimming, but even of opening "and parting it." With regard to the third head, he did not vindicate himſelf from having ſent a friend ſome powder that was good to clean the teeth, and adding ſome verſes, that contained an exact deſcription of the effects of this powder: he maintained that all who ſpoke in publick ought to keep their mouths clean. He had there a fine field of defending his own cauſe, and turning the ridicule upon his adverſary, though probably he had given way to criticiſm, out of too great an affectation to diſtinguiſh himſelf amongſt the Learned. See how eaſy ſome cauſes are to defend, though perhaps one may be a little in the wrong. Vidi ego dudum, he anſwered (38), vix riſum quoſdam tenentem, cum mundicias oris videlicet orator ille aſpere accuſaret, & dentifricium tanta indignatione pronunciaret, quanta nemo quiſquam venenum. Quidni? crimen haud contemnendum Philoſopho, nihil in ſe ſordidum ſinere, nihil uſpiam corporis apertum, immundum pati ac fœtulentum; præſertim os, cujus in propatulo & conſpicuo uſus homini creberrimus: ſive ille cuipiam oſculum ferat, ſeu cum cuiquam ſermocinetur, ſive in auditorio diſſertet, ſive in templo preces alleget. Omnem quippe hominis actum ſermo præit: qui, ut ait poëta præcipuus, è dentium muro proficiſcitur. That is, "I ſaw ſome who could ſcarce keep from laughing, "when that Orator ſharply accuſed the cleanlineſs of the "mouth, and pronounced tooth-powder with as great "an indignation as one would have ſpoken of poiſon. "It is no contemptible crime truly for a Philoſopher, "to ſuffer nothing naſty about him, to ſuffer no part "of his body which is open to be unclean and ſtinking: "eſpecially the mouth which uſes to be moſt in view; "whether he offers to ſalute any one, or diſcourſes "with any one, or diſputes in the auditory, or prays "in the temple. For the diſcourſe of every man "goes before his action; which as a great Poet ſays, "comes forth from the wall of the teeth." We may

(38) Idem, ibid. pag. 277.

drew on him a troubleſome law-ſuit; the relations of this Lady's two ſons pretended that he made uſe of witchcraft to gain her heart, and her money [I]; they accuſed him of being a Magician (c), not before Chriſtian Judges, as a Commentator (d) pretends, that St.

(d) Leon Coqueus in Auguſtin. de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. c. 19. p. 790. ed. Francof. an. 1661, in 4to; but he is miſtaken: St. Auguſtin ſays quite the contrary.

(c) The accuſer's name was Sicinius Æmilianus. He was Pudentilla's firſt huſband's brother. Apuleius, Apologiæ initio.

form the ſame judgment of the laſt accuſation. It is no crime for a Doctor in any faculty to have a looking-glaſs; but if he was to conſult it too much when he dreſſes himſelf, he might very juſtly be cenſured. In the time of Apuleius, morality was much more rigid than at preſent, with regard to outward appearances; for he durſt not acknowledge that he made uſe of his looking-glaſs. He maintains he might have done it, and proves it by ſeveral philoſophical reaſons, which, to ſay the truth, are much more ingenious than judiciouſly placed; but he denies his conſulting his looking-glaſs. Sequitur de ſpeculo longa illa & cenſoria oratio, de quo pro rei atrocitate penè diruptus eſt Pudens, clamitans, Habet ſpeculum Philoſophus, poſſidet ſpeculum Philoſophus. Ut igitur habere concedam, ne aliquid objeciſſe te credas, ſi negaro, nam tamen ex eo me accipi neceſſe eſt exornari quoque ad ſpeculum ſolere. Plurimis rebus poſſeſſu careo, uſu fruor: quod ſi neque habere utendi argumentum eſt, neque non utendi non habere, & ſpeculi non tam poſſeſſio culpatur quam inſpectio, illud etiam doceat neceſſe eſt quando & quibus præſentibus in ſpeculum inſpexerim, quoniam, ut res eſt, majus piaculum decernis ſpeculum Philoſopho, quam Cereris mundum profano videre (39). i. e. "Now follows that long and cenſorious "Oration, where Pudens is almoſt burſt with the "heinouſneſs of the thing, crying out, The Philoſopher "has a looking-glaſs, The Philoſopher keeps a looking-glaſs. "To grant you therefore that I have one, leſt you "ſhould think you have made any objection, if I "ſhall deny it, it does not neceſſarily follow that I "am uſed to dreſs my ſelf at a glaſs .... I enjoy "the uſe of many things which I do not poſſeſs; "but if neither the having one is an argu-"ment of the uſing it, nor the not having one "of not uſing it, and not ſo much the poſſeſſion as "the uſing of a looking-glaſs, is blamed, he ought "to ſhew when, and in whoſe preſence I made uſe "of a looking-glaſs, becauſe, as the matter ſtands, "you make a looking-glaſs a greater crime in a Phi-"loſopher, than for a profane perſon to behold the "ſecrets of Ceres."

(39) Idem, ibid. p. 281, 282.

Obſerve Juvenal's invective againſt the Emperor Otho, who reckoned his looking-glaſs as one of the principal parts of his equipage for war.

Ille tenet ſpeculum pathici geſtamen Othonis,
Actoris Aurunci ſpolium: quo ſe ille videbat
Armatum, cum jam tolli vexilla juberet.
Res memoranda novis annalibus atque recenti
Hiſtoria, ſpeculum civilis ſarcina belli (40).

That is,

"He holds the mirrour pathic Otho bore
"(AURUNCANE ACTOR's ſpoils) that when he wore
"His arms he viewed himſelf in; when he gave
"The battles ſignal, and bid the enſigns wave.
"A gallant ſubject! for new annals fit,
"And ſhould in our times hiſtory be writ.
"A looking-glaſs did load the Gen'ral's care,
"And was the baggage of a civil war.
Sir Tho. Staplyton.

(40) Juvenal, Sat. 2. ver. 99.

Moreover, it ſeems to me, (but I dare not affirm it,) that Apuleius had his own caſe in view, when he deſcribed that of Marſyas in one of his Orations. He ſuppoſes that Marſyas began with praiſing his tangled locks, his rough beard, and his hairy breaſt, and with reproaching Apollo with an extreme neatneſs. Marſyas, quod ſtultitiæ maximum ſpecimen eſt, non intelligens ſe deridiculo haberi, priuſquam tibias occiperet inflare, prius de ſe & Apolline quædam deliramenta barbare effutivit; laudans ſeſe quod erat & coma relicinus, & barba ſqualliduſ, & pectore hurſutus, & arte tibicen, & fortuna egenus; contra Apollinem, ridiculum dictu, adverſis virtutibus culpabat. Quod Apollo eſſet & coma intonſus, & genis gratus, & corpore glabellus, & arte multiſcius, & fortuna opulentus .... Lingua fatidica ſeu tute oratione, ſeu verſibus malis, utrobique facundia æquipari ..... Riſere Muſæ, cum audirent hoc genus crimina, ſapienti exoptanda, Apollini objectata (41), & tibicinem illum certamine ſuperatum, velut urſum bipedem, corio exacto nudis & laceris viſceribus reliquerunt (42). i. e. "Marſyas, which is the greateſt mark of folly, not "underſtanding that he was looked upon with con-"tempt, before he began to blow upon his pipe, "firſt of all barbarouſly blabbed out ſome ravings "concerning himſelf and Apollo; praiſing himſelf "for having his hair tangled, his beard ſlovenly, "and his breaſt hairy, for being a piper by trade, "and neceſſitous: on the other ſide he ridiculouſly "blamed Apollo for the oppoſite virtues. That he "was long haired, handſome faced, ſmooth, skilled "in various arts and wealthy ..... that he was "every way equal in propheſying, either in proſe "or verſe, and eloquence. The Muſes laugh-"ed, when they heard ſuch crimes objected to Apollo, "as every wiſe man would have deſired, and when "the piper was overcome they left him, like a two-"footed bear, with his skin ſtript off, and with na-"ked and torn bowels." Obſerve, Apuleius affirms his accuſer was nothing but an ill-favoured country fellow: Mihi iſtud crede quamquam teterrimum os tuum minimum à Thyeſta tragico demutet, tamen profecto diſcendi cupidine ſpeculum inviſeres, & aliquando relicto aratro mirarere tot in facie tua ſulcos rugarum. At ego non mirer, ſi boni conſulis me de iſto diſtortiſſimo vultu tuo dicere, de moribus tuis multo truculentioribus reticere (43)? i. e. "Believe me, though your "moſt ugly face is very little different from that of "the tragic Thyeſtes, yet truly you might go to a "looking-glaſs to learn, and leaving the plough, "might ſometimes wonder at ſo many furrows of "wrinkles in your face. But I cannot wonder, if "you take it well that I ſhould ſpeak of that moſt "diſtorted face of yours, and be ſilent concerning "your much more horrid manners."

(42) Apuleius, Floridor, p. 341.

(43) Apuleius, Apol. p. 284.

(41) See the application which is made of this paſſage in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Sept. 1685, Article 7.

[I] He was accuſed of making uſe of Magick arts in order to get poſſeſſion of his wife's heart and money.] Apuleius was under no neceſſity of making any great defence with regard to this firſt article; for as Pudentilla was determined from conſiderations of health to enter upon a ſecond marriage, even before ſhe had ever ſeen this pretended Magician, the youth, good mien, pleaſant converſation, wit, and the other agreeable qualities of Apuleius were a charm more than ſufficient to engage the heart of this Lady. He had the moſt favourable opportunities in the world of gaining her friendſhip, for he lodged ſome time at her houſe: Pudentilla's eldeſt ſon was entirely fond of him; he was deſirous of the match, and ſollicited him to think of it (44). Apuleius managed all his advantages with a great deal of addreſs, and turned into ridicule the allegations of his accuſers with ſmart and agreeable turns. "You make a wonder of it, ſays he, "that a woman ſhould marry again after having "lived a widow thirteen years: it is much more "wonderful that ſhe did not marry again ſooner. "You think that Magick muſt have been employed "to prevail with a widow of her age to marry a "young man; on the contrary, this very circum-"ſtance ſhews how little occaſion there was for Ma-"gick." Cur mulier libera tibi nupſit poſt annos tredecim viduitatis? Quaſi non magis mirandum ſit quod tot annis non nupſerit, ... At enim major natu non eſt juvenem aſpernata. Igitur hoc ipſum argumentum eſt nihil opus magiâ fuiſſe ut nubere vellet mulier viro, vidua cælibi, major juniori (45). If the decree of the Judges had been formed upon the ſentence that was pronounced in a like caſe, by the mother of Alexander the Great, it would have been admirable. Ὁ βασιλεὺς Φίλιππος ἤρα Θετταλῆς γυναικὸς αἰτίαν ἐχούσης κατεφαρμακεύειν αὐτόν· ἐσπούδασε οὖν ἡ Ὀλυμπιὰς λαβεῖν τὴν ἄνθρωπον ὑποχείριον· ὡς δὲ εἰς ὄψιν ἐλθοῦσα, τό, τε εἶδος ὑπερεπῆς ἐφάνη, καὶ διελέχθη πρὸς αὐτὴν οὐκ ἀγενῶς οὐδὲ ἀσυνέτως, χαιρέτωσαν (ἔφην ἡ Ὀλυμπιὰς) αἱ διαβολαί. σὺ γὰρ ἐν σιωπῇ τὰ φάρμακα ἔχεις (46). i. e. "King Philip was in love with a wo-"man of Theſſaly who was accuſed of having be-"witched him. Olympias endeavoured to get the "woman into her hands. As ſoon as ſhe came into "her preſence, and both appeared beautiful, and "ſpoke

(44) Idem, ibid. pag. 320.

(45) Idem, ibid. pag. 291.

(46) Plutarch. in Præcept. conjug. pag. 141. B. See the note [L] of the article GRANDIER.

St. Auguſtin aſſures us, but before Claudius Maximus Proconſul of Africa, and a Pagan. He defended himſelf very ſtrongly; we have the Apology that he pronounced before the Judges; it is a very fine piece (e): it ſhews examples of the moſt ſhameful artifices, that the falſhood of an impudent calumniator is capable of exerciſing [K]. It has been obſerved that Apuleius, with all his Magick, could never obtain any Magiſtracy, altho' he was of a good family, had been very well educated, and his eloquence was very much eſteemed (f). It was not out of a philoſophical contempt, they ſay, that he lived out of political (e) Auguſtinus, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. cap. 19.

(f) St. Auguſtin made this remark in his 5th Epiſtle. See the note [L] at the end.

" ſpoke to her neither abjectly nor imprudently: " Let there be an end (ſays Olympias) of your accu- " ſations; for you have your incarnations in your " own perſon." Thus much for the article of the conqueſt of the heart. The other, which is that of the money, cauſes ſome ſuſpicions, not of Magic, but of avarice. One can hardly believe but this marriage was a ſacrifice to reaſons of intereſt. However, let us not condemn Apuleius without hearing him. He offers to prove by his marriage-contract, that he got nothing of Pudentilla, but only a promiſe of a very moderate ſum, in caſe he ſurvived her, and had children by her. He ſhews by ſeveral facts, how diſintereſted his conduct had been, and how reaſonable it was for him to exact of his wife the ſum ſhe had promiſed him. It was then that he was obliged in full court to make confeſſions, which Pudentilla would have been glad to excuſe. He ſaid ſhe was neither handſome nor young, nor a ſubject that could any ways tempt him to have recourſe to enchantments, and that there was no room to wonder that ſhe had given great advantages to ſuch as him. Quod inſtitui pergam diſputare, nullum mihi cauſam fuiſſe Pudentillam veneficiis ad nuptias prolectandi. Formam mulieris & ætatem ipſi ultro improbaverunt, idque mihi vitio dederunt talem uxorem cauſa avaritiæ concupiſſe, atque adeo primo dotem in congreſſu grandem & uberem rapuiſſe (47) . . . . . Quamquam quis omnium vel exigue rerum peritus culpare auderet, ſi mulier, vidua & mediocri forma, & non ætate mediocri nubere volens, longa dote & molli conditione invitaſſet juvenem neque corpore, neque animo, neque fortunâ pœnitendum (48) . . . . . He ſays that Pontianus the ſon of Pudentilla propoſed the marrying his mother to him only as a burthen, and as the action of a friend and a Philoſopher; I mean an action more ſuitable for a friend of Pontianus and a Philoſopher, than a match that might afford at the ſame time both riches and beauty. Conſidere ſeſe ſore ut id onus recipiam, quoniam non formoſa pupilla, ſed mediocri facie mater liberorum mihi offeratur. Sin hæc reputans formæ & divitiarum gratiâ me ad aliam conditionem reſervarem, neque pro amico neque pro philoſopho facturum (49). He raiſes extremely the advantages of a maid above a widow. " A fine girl, ſays he, let her be " ever ſo poor, brings you a large portion, a heart " quite new, the flower and the firſt-fruits of her " beauty. It is with a great deal of reaſon that all " huſbands ſet ſo great a value on the flower of vir- " ginity. All the other goods that a woman brings " them, are of ſuch a nature, that they may return " them again if they have a mind to be under no " obligation to her; ſhe may take them back, ſhe " may recover them. That alone cannot be reſtor- " ed; it always remains in the poſſeſſion of the firſt " ſpouſe. If you marry a widow, and ſhe quits you, " ſhe carries away with her all that ſhe brought " you, you cannot boaſt of retaining the leaſt thing " that belonged to her." He obſerves many other inconveniencies that attend the marrying of widows, and concludes, that it would have coſt Pudentilla a good deal to marry, if ſhe had not found a philoſophical humour in him. Virgo formoſa, etſi ſit oppidò pauper, tamen abunde dotata eſt. Affert quippe ad maritum novam animi indolem, pulcritudinis gratiam, floris rudimentum. Ipſa virginitatis commendatio jure meritoque omnibus maritis acceptiſſima eſt. Nam quodcunque aliud in dotem acceperis, potes cum libuit ne ſis beneficio obſtrictus omne ut acciperas retribuere: pecuniam renumerare, mancipia reſtituere, domo demigrare, prædiis cedere. Sola virginitas cum ſemel accepta eſt reddi nequitur. Sola apud maritum ex rebus dotalibus remanet. Vidua autem qualis nuptiis venit talis divertio digreditur. Nihil affert irrepoſcibile, ſed venit jam ab alio præflorata: certe tibi, ad quæ velis, minime docilis: non minus ſuſpectans novam domum, quam ipſa jam ob unum divortium ſuſpectanda: ſive illa morte amiſit maritum, ut ſævi ominis mulier, & infandi conjugii, minime appetenda; ſui repudio digreſſa eſt, utramvis habebat culpam mulier: quæ aut tam intolerabilis fuit ut repudiaretur, aut tam inſolens, aut repudiaret. Ob hæc & alia viduæ dote auctæ preces ſolicitant. Quod Pudentilla quoque in alio marito feciſſet, ſi Philoſophum ſpernentem dotis non reperiſſet (50). One might make a good many reflections upon this diſcourſe of Apuleius, if one had nothing elſe to do; but how haſty ſoever I may be to paſs on to other articles, I ſhall ſpeak of two things; one is, that this good which is never taken back out of the hands of a huſband, is very chimerical; there is never a baker nor a butcher that would lend ſixpence upon this unperiſhable poſſeſſion: the other is, that Apuleius had not conſidered the diſadvantages of widows in every reſpect. A Canon of Paris who embraced the Proteſtant religion at G. in 1672, ſoon picked out from amongſt the reſt of the women that he ſaw at church, a young, handſome, rich widow. He ſoon found an opportunity of ſpeaking to her, and the more he ſaw her, the more he thought her for his purpoſe. But as he had brought nothing from France but the good plight of perſons of his profeſſion, and ſome lights into the abuſes of Popery, he was refuſed with ſome indignation. He acquainted me with this refuſal, and complained leſs of the refuſal itſelf than of the manner of doing it (51). I repreſented to him ingenuouſly that he was in the wrong to quarrel about it, conſidering the preſent ſtate of his own fortune and the rank of the Lady. He confeſſed ſhe was a little too rich for ſuch a man as him; but, continued he, there muſt be a large abatement made on account of her not having had any children; that alone makes a deduction of thirty or forty thouſand livres. Without the preſumption of her being barren, I ſhould look upon her as a better match than I do, if it were not that my only brother has no heirs, and that my family is in danger of being extinct, if I leave no poſterity. I was not willing to enter into a diſpute with a man that had examined this matter ſo preciſely: I left him all his compenſations and eſtimations; and contented my ſelf with believing that the deſire of keeping his family from being extinct, had been a grand ſource of all his diſcoveries in religion.

Reflection of a converted Canon on a widow who had no children.

[K] We find in his Apology ſome examples of the moſt ſcandalous frauds that calumny can invent.] I will only produce one, to ſhew that in all ages the ſpirit of calumny has been buſied in forging proofs out of looſe paſſages, or by unfair repreſentations of what ſome one or other has ſaid or written. The accuſers of Apuleius, in order to convict him of magick, quoted a letter that his wife had written during the time of his addreſſes to her. They urged that in this letter ſhe had confeſſed that Apuleius was a Magician, and that he had bewitched her. It was no difficult matter for them to gain credit to this; for they only read ſome certain words of her letter without connecting them either with what went before or followed after, and no body moved for the reading the whole: but Apuleius put them to confuſion by cauſing the whole paſſage of Pudentilla's letter to be read; from whence it appeared that far from complaining of Apuleius, ſhe juſtified him, and bantered his accuſers ſmartly. See her words, in which you will find that the very ſame terms may be interpreted an accuſation or juſtification of Apuleius, according as they are diſjoined from what goes before, or are connected with it. Βυλομένῳ γάρ μοι δι' ἃς εἶπον αἰτίας γυμνάσαι, αὐτὸς τοῦτο ἔπεισας ἀντὶ πάλαι αἰρεῖσθαι, θυμοῦσθαι τὸν ἄνδρα καὶ σπουδάζειν αὐτὸν εἰωθὸς ἦθος δι' ἐμοῦ παῦσαι. νῦν δὲ ὡς μοχθηροὶ ὑμᾶς καλοσθῆς τε ἀναπείθουσι, αἰφνίδιον ἐγένετο Ἀπολλῶς μάγος, καὶ ἐγὼ μεμάγευμαι ὑπ' αὐτοῦ. καὶ ἰδοὺ. καὶ ἤδεται νῦν πρὸς ἐμοί, ἔτι σωφρονῶ (52). i. e. " For when I had an inclination

(50) Idem, ibid. pag. 352.

(51) He never ſpoke of it, without ſaying, Eſt modus in rebus.

(52) Apul. Apolog. pag. 326.

(47) Apuleius, Apolog. p. 331.

(48) Idem, ibid. pag. 332.

(49) Idem, ibid. pag. 320.

political employments, for he thought it an honour to have the office of a Prieſt, which gave him the direction of the publick games; and he diſputed briſkly againſt thoſe who oppoſed the erecting of a ſtatue with which the inhabitants of Oea would have honoured him (g). Nothing ſhews more plainly the impertinent credulity of the Heathens, than their ſaying, that Apuleius had done ſo great a number of miracles [L], that they equal or rather ſurpaſs thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt. There are many without doubt who take for a true hiſtory all that he relates in his Golden Aſs. I wonder that St. Auguſtin has wavered upon that ſubject (h), and that he did not certainly know that Apuleius had only given this book as a romance (i). He was not the inventor of it; the ſcheme was more ancient, as Moreri partly diſcovered [M] in the words of Voſſius which he did not well underſtand. Some Heathens have ſpoken of this Romance with contempt [N]. Apuleius

(g) Pro ſtatuâ ſibi apud Oenſes locanda ex qua civitate habebat uxorem, adverſus contradictionem quorundam civium litigaret, quod poſteros ne lateret ejuſdem litis orationem ſcriptam memoriæ commendavit. Auguſtinus, Epiſt. 5.

(h) Idem, de Civitate Dei, lib. 18. cap. 18.

(i) Sermone iſto Mileſio, varias fabulas conſeram, Apul. in Prologo Aſini aurei.

"clination to marry for reaſons I mentioned to you, "you your ſelf perſuaded me to take him before all "others, admiring the man, and endeavouring thro' "me to make one of our family. But now you are "ſet upon by ſpiteful and malicious men, Apuleius "forſooth is turned Magician all of a ſudden, and "has bewitched me. It is certain that I love him. "Come now to me while I am yet in my ſenſes." Apuleius greatly heightened the guilt of ſuch impoſtures. His words deſerve to be written in letters of gold, and fixed up in a thouſand places, to confound, if poſſible, thoſe traducers, who in every age and country make uſe of ſuch fraudulent practices. Multa ſunt quæ ſola prolata calumniæ paſſunt videri obnoxia. Cujavis oratio inſimulari poteſt, ſi ea quæ ex prioribus nexa ſunt principio ſui defraudentur, ſi quædam ex ordine ſcriptorum ad libidinem ſupprimantur, ſi quæ ſimulationis cauſâ dicta ſunt, adſeverantis pronunciatione quam exprobrantis legantur (53). i. e. "There "are many things (ſays he) which ſingly conſider'd "may ſeem liable to reproach: for example, any "man's words may be conſtrued in a criminal ſenſe, "if one ſentence be diſjoined from the foregoing "with which it bears a connection; or if ſome things "be taken out of their proper order and ſuppreſſed "at will, and eſpecially if thoſe words againſt which "the accuſation is laid, be pronounced in the man"ner of an aſſertion inſtead of that of a reproach."

(53) Idem, ibid.

[L] The Heathens gave out that he wrought a great number of miracles.] One would ſcarce believe that this had been reported, were it not atteſted by creditable perſons: but we find that this impertinence of the Heathens was ſo much talked of in the time of St. Auſtin, that this great Prelate was deſired to confute it. Precator acceſſerim ut ad ea vigilantius reſpondere digneris, in quibus nihil amplius Dominum quam alii homines facere potuerunt, feciſſe vel geſſiſſe mentiuntur. Apollonium ſiquidem ſuum nobis & Apuleium alioſque magicæ artis homines in medium proferunt, quorum majora contendunt extitiſſe miracula (54). i. e. "It is my humble requeſt that you will vouchſafe to "give a full anſwer to thoſe writings in which they "falſely pretend that our Lord neither did nor wrought "any thing more than other men were able to do; "and they produce their Apollonius, Apuleius and "other Magicians, who, they maintain, wrought "even greater miracles than his." St. Auſtin contented himſelf with this reply, that if Apuleius had been ſo powerful a Magician as was pretended, he would never have lived, as ambitious as he was, in ſo low a condition: That beſides he had made a defence againſt the charge of magick, as a great crime (55). His pretended miracles were talked of long before the time of St. Auſtin; for Lactantius expreſſes his ſurprize, that the Author whom he had refuted did not join Apuleius with Apollonius of Tyana. Voluit oſtendere Apollonium vel paria, vel etiam majora feciſſe. Mirum quod Apuleium prætermiſit, cujus ſolent & multa & mira memorari (56). Apuleius has met with the fate of a great many others, in that his miracles have only been talk'd of after his death; his accuſers laid nothing to his charge but trifles; or brought but very weak proof of any thing that carried the appearance of ſorcery. But I can't tell how to reconcile St. Auſtin with Apuleius. The one ſays that Apuleius could never advance himſelf to any poſt of judicature, ad aliquam judiciariam Reipublicæ poteſtatem (57). The other boaſts of poſſeſſing the very poſt that his father had born, who had gone through all the chief employments of his country. In qua Colonia patrem habili loco principe Duumviralem cunctis honoribus perfunctum. Cujus ego LOCUM in ea Republica exinde ut participare CURIAM cœpi, nequaquam degener, pari ſpero honore & exiſtimatione tueor (58). i. e. "In which Colony my father filled the head "poſt, being one of the Duumviri, after having gone "through the moſt honourable offices in the State. "From whom I hope I have not degenerated ſince "my firſt having a ſhare in the Government, but "that I diſcharge the ſame office with equal credit "and reputation."

(54) Marcellinus ad Auguſtin. Epiſt. 4. inter Epiſt. Auguſtini. See alſo the 49th Letter of St. Auguſtin, p. 208.

(55) Auguſtinus, Epiſt. 5.

(56) Lactant. Divin. Inſtitut. lib. 5. cap. 3. See alſo St. Jerom on the 81ſt Pſalm.

(57) Auguſtinus, Epiſt. 5.

(58) Apul. Apolog. pag. 289.

[M] Moreri has hinted that he was not the inventor of his Golden Aſs.] We ſhall firſt of all give you his own words: "The Metamorphoſis of the Golden Aſs is "a paraphraſe of what he had borrowed from Lu"cian, who himſelf had taken it from Lucius Pa"trenſis, of whom Photius ſpeaks. . . . . It is e"qually probable that Apuleius borrowed from him "the ſubject of the fable, which he has modelled "in his own way; for he was very well ſkilled in "the Greek and Latin tongues." In order to form a true judgment whether Moreri deſerves to be criticiſed on or not, we muſt compare what he ſays with that paſſage of Voſſius from which he has copied. De ætate Lucii Patrenſis non liquet, niſi quod antiquior credatur Luciano, quippe qui inde compilaſſe videatur Lucium ſeu Aſinum ſuum, uti ex Luciano poſtea Aſinum ſuum Aureum exſcripſit Apuleius: niſi is potius ex eodem Lucii fonte ſua hauſit, & hoc ſanè verisimilius eſt. Nempe ut Lucium in epitomen redegit Lucianus, ita paraphraſin Lucii ſcripſit Apuleius, ſed ille Græcè, hic Latinè (59). i. e. "We have no farther knowledge "of the time when Lucius Patrenſis lived, than that "he is look'd upon to be more ancient than Lucian, "ſince as he ſeems to have ſtolen from him his Lu"cius or Aſs, as Apuleius afterwards from him wrote "his Golden Aſs: Unleſs he took it from the ſame "original of Lucius, and indeed this ſeems more "likely: namely that as Lucian epitomized Lucius, "ſo Apuleius wrote a Paraphraſe on Lucius, but the "former in Greek, the latter in Latin." It is plain that Moreri miſtook the meaning of Voſſius; and that he ſhould not have ſaid that the work of Apuleius is a Paraphraſe of that of Lucian, but that Lucius Patrenſis had been abridged by Lucian, and paraphraſed by Apuleius. The argument that Moreri couches in theſe words, for he was very well ſkilled in the Greek and Latin tongues, is not the leaſt concluſive. Only put this Logick in form, and you will find in it this Euthymeme. He was very well ſkilled in the Greek and Latin tongues; therefore he has taken from the original the ſubject of this fable, which he has modelled after his own fancy; that is to ſay, therefore he has not paraphraſed Lucian but Lucius Patrenſis. This Euthymeme will appear quite ridiculous, when we conſider, that there is as much neceſſity of knowing the Greek tongue in order to borrow from Lucian as from Lucius; and there is no manner of occaſion to underſtand Latin, to model after his own fancy a ſubject borrowed from Lucius. Can't Mr. de la Fontaine, if he pleaſes, model after his own fancy a Tale taken from Ouville? It would be of greater uſe than is imagined, to criticiſe on the falſe Logick of Authors. Young men who have a genius for compoſition, might very ſoon reap great advantage from ſuch a piece of criticiſm.

(59) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græc. pag. 517, 518.

[N] Some Heathens have ſpoken of his Romance with contempt.] There needs no other proof of this than the Letter which the Emperor Severus ſent to the Senate, in which he complains to them of the honours that had been paid to Clodius Albinus. Amongſt other encomiums they had given him the title of learned.

leius was extremely laborious [O]; he compoſed ſeveral books [P], ſome in verſe, others in proſe, of which there is but part that has reſiſted the injuries of time. He delighted in declaiming, and he did it with the applauſe of all the audience. When he declaimed at Oea, the Auditors cried out with one voice that they ought to confer on him the honour of Citizen (k). Thoſe at Carthage heard him favourably, and erected a ſtatue for him (l); ſeveral other cities did him the ſame honour (m). It is ſaid that his wife held the candle to him whilſt he ſtudied; but I do not think that we ought to take that literally; in all likelihood it is a figure of the Gauliſh eloquence of Sidonius Apollinaris, Legentibus meditantibuſque candelas & candelabra tenuerunt (n). Several Criticks have publiſhed notes upon Apuleius [Q]. I do not know (o) that there are any other French tranſlations of the Golden Aſs, beſides the old French one [R]. This book is juſtly taken for (k) Apul. in Apol. p. 320.

(l) Idem, Florid. p. 355, & ſeq.
(m) Ibid. pag. 356.
(n) Sidon. Apollin. Epiſt. x. lib. 2.
(o) This was written in 1694.

The Emperor could not bear that that title ſhould be given to a man who had only ſtuffed his head with tales and rhapſodies taken from Apuleius. Major fuit dolor quod illum pro literato laudandum plerique duxiſtis, quum ille næniis quibuſdam anilibus occupatus inter Mileſias punicas Apuleii ſui, & ludicra literaria conſeneſceret (60). i. e. "It was matter of greater grief to "me that moſt of you ſhould think him deſerving of "the name of Learned, who ſpent his years in com- "poſing idle Ballads, and was taken up with the "Mileſian Tales and other ludicrous writings of his "favourite Apuleius." Macrobius has allotted to the peruſal of nurſes all ſuch romances as the Golden Aſs of Apuleius. Vel argumenta fictis caſibus amatorum referta quibus vel multum ſe Arbiter exercuit, vel Apuleium nonnunquam luſiſſe miramur. Hoc totum fabularum genus quod ſolas aurium delicias profitetur, è ſacrario ſuo in nutricum cunas ſapientiæ tractatus eliminat (61). i. e. "Or ſtories filled with feigned ad- "ventures of lovers, ſuch as either Petronius Arbi- "ter took ſo much pains in writing, or the eaſy pen "of Apuleius is admired for. All this kind of fa- "bles, whoſe ſole drift it is to delight the ear, Phi- "loſophy baniſhes from its ſacred cloſet to the nurſe- "ry."

(60) Jul. Capitolin. in Clodio Albino cap. 12.

(61) Macrobius Saturnalium, lib. 1. cap. 2.

[O] He was extremely laborious.] See his own words in his anſwer to his antagoniſt on the ſubject of Eloquence. De eloquentiâ verò, ſi qua mihi fuiſſet, neque mirum neque invidioſum deberet videri, ſi ab ineunte ævo uni ſtudiis literarum ex ſummis viribus deditus, omnibus aliis ſpretis voluptatibus, ad hoc ævi, haud ſciam annè ſuper omnes homines impenſo labore, diuque noctuque, cum deſpectu & diſpendio bonæ valetudinis, eam quæſiſſem (62). i. e. "And as to eloquence, "if I could never lay any claim to it, it neither "ought to be thought ſtrange, or envied, ſeeing from "my younger years to this very time I have wholly "applied myſelf to the ſtudy of letters, deſpiſing all "other pleaſure in compariſon of it, and have ſought "it, perhaps with more pains than any other man, "both day and night, even to the neglect and loſs "of my health."

(62) Apul. in Apolog. p. 276.

[P] He compoſed ſeveral books.] See the Diſſertation de Vitâ & Scriptis Apuleii, which Wower has prefixed to his edition, and which Mr. Fleuri, Scholiaſt to the Dauphin, has cauſed to be printed at the beginning of his. One may ſay that Apuleius was an univerſal Genius; for there are few ſubjects he has not treated of. He has tranſlated Plato's Phædo, and Nicomachus's Arithmetick: He has written a treatiſe de Republicâ, de Numeris, de Muſicâ: We meet with quotations out of his Table-Queſtions, his Letters to Cerellia, which were ſomewhat too looſe, his Proverbs, his Hermagoras, his Ludicra. He ſpeaks himſelf of this laſt: Legerunt è Ludicris meis epiſtolium de dentifricio, verſibus ſcriptum (63). i. e. "They read, "ſays he, out of my Ludicra a little Epiſtle on Tooth- "powder, in verſe." We have ſtill left his treatiſes de Philoſophiâ naturali, de Philoſophiâ morali, de Syllogiſmo categorico, de Deo Socratis, de Mundo, and his Florida. I am not willing to paſs by here the opinion of a learned Critic (64), touching his Letters to Cerellia. He thinks that the name of Cicero ought to be inſerted in that paſſage of Auſonius where mention is made of theſe Letters; for it is Cicero who is reproached for having indulged too great familiarities with Cerellia, and for having written to her too freely; for this reaſon we muſt read it thus in Auſonius, Eſſe Apuleium in vitâ Philoſophorum, in Epigrammatis amatorem, Ciceronis in præceptis omnibus exſtare ſeveritatem, in Epiſtolis ad Cerelliam ſubeſſe petulantiam. i. e. "That Apuleius was a Philoſopher in his Life, in his "Epigrams a downright Lover; that Cicero was "ſevere in all his precepts, but too wanton in his "Letters to Cerellia."

(63) Idem, ibid.

(64) Fredericus Gronov. in Auſon. Cent. Nuptial. in editione Auſonii, Amſtelodami, an. 1671, pag. 516.

[Q] Several Critics have publiſhed notes upon Apuleius.] Philip Beroaldus publiſhed very full ones on the Golden Aſs at Venice, in folio, 1594; which have been reprinted ſeveral times in 8vo, at Paris and other places. Godeſchalc Stewechius, Peter Colvius, John Wower, &c. have beſtowed ſome labour upon all the works of Apuleius. Priceus has publiſhed ſeparately the Golden Aſs, and the Apology, with a great number of obſervations (65). The notes of Caſaubon, and thoſe of Scipio Gentilis upon the Apology, are had in great repute. The former came out in 1594, the latter in 1607. The beſt edition of his book de Mundo is that of Leyden, in 1591, in 8vo. We owe that to Bonaventure Vulcanius. Give me leave to ſay by the way, that this treatiſe is little elſe than a tranſlation of a like work aſcribed to Ariſtotle. The book de Deo Socratis has been publiſhed with the notes of Joſias Mercerus (66). The Author cited will fully inform you of every thing concerning the editions of Apuleius (67). He has not mentioned in particular that of Baſil, apud Henricum Petri, in 1560, in 3 vol. 8vo; nor that of the ſame city, apud Sebaſtianum Henric. Petri, in 1620, in 2 vol. 8vo; nor that of Lyons, in 1614, in 2 vol. 8vo, which exactly reſembles that printed at Leyden, every part of which he takes particular notice of, and which he dates 1614. I queſtion whether or no he did not take Lyons (Lugdunum) in France for Leyden (Lugdunum Batavorum) in Holland.

(65) The Apology, printed at Paris 1635, in 4to. The Golden Aſs, printed at Gouda 1653, in 8vo.

(66) Printed at Paris 1624, in 12mo.

(67) Joh. Albertus Fabricius, in Bibliotheca Latinâ, p. 135, & ſeq.

[R] I know of no other tranſlations of the Golden Aſs, than what are in old French.] If I am not miſtaken John Louveau is the Author of the firſt. La Croix du Maine makes mention of it, though without taking notice of the year in which it firſt appeared (68); he only ſays that it was printed at Lyons. It was reprinted at Paris by Claudius Micard 1584. A certain Jeſuit of Montlyard has tranſlated it and given a Commentary upon it. The two editions that I have ſeen of it are, one from the copy printed at Paris by Abel Angelier, 1612; the other at Paris by Samuel Thibauſt, 1623. The preface is pretty long, and contains critical remarks on ſeveral faults of John Louveau.

(68) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotb. Franc. pag. 238.

But I have juſt now diſcovered that la Croix du Maine and du Verdier Vau-Privas have ſpoken of a tranſlation, probably more antient than that of John Louveau. They ſay that George de la Bouthiere, or de la Boutiere, a native of Autun, has tranſlated into French the Metamorphoſis or Golden Aſs of Apuleius (69). The one ſays that this verſion was printed at Lyons by John de Tournes and William Gazeau, 1553. The other that it was printed by John de Tournes 1516 (70). There is a fault of the preſs in this laſt date; and it is very plain, that if we place the figures in their true order, it muſt be 1556. Now as the ſame Bibliographer has ſaid that the tranſlation of John Louveau was printed in 1558 (71), there is reaſon to ſuppoſe that it was later than that of George de la Bouthiere.

(69) La Croix du Maine, pag. 118. Du Verdier, pag. 448.
(70) Du Verdier, Bibliotb. Franc. pag. 448.
(71) Ibid. pag. 716.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, there has come out at Paris a tranſlation of one part of the Golden Aſs. The Journal des Savans of the ninth of January 1696, makes mention of it. Mr. le Baron des Coutures publiſhed, with notes in 1698, his French verſion of the treatiſe de Deo Socratis.

for one continued Satyr on the diſorders which the Magicians, the Prieſts, the Diſſolute, the Thieves, &c. at that time ſpread all over the world [S].

[S] This book is juſtly taken for one continued Satyr on the diſorders which the Magicians and Prieſts at that time ſpread all over the world.] Theſe are the words which I find in the notes of Mr. Fleuri: Tota porro hæc Metamorphoſis Apuleiana, & ſtylo & ſententia, Satyricon eſt perpetuum (ut rectè obſervavit Barthius, Adverſ. lib. 51. cap. 11.) in quo magica deliria, ſacrificulorum ſcelera, adulterorum crimina, furum & latronum impunitæ factiones, palam differuntur (72). i. e. "This whole Metamorphoſis of Apuleius is "both in its ſtyle and meaning one entire Satyr (as "Barthius rightly obſerved, Adverſ. lib. 51. ch. 11.) "in which the idle fancies of Magicians, the roguery "of Prieſts, the crimes of fornicators, and the tole-"rated factions of thieves and robbers are expoſed to "open view." He adds, that thoſe who ſeek after the Philoſopher's ſtone, pretend to diſcover ſome ſecrets concerning this great work. A man that would take the pains, and had a ſuitable capacity, (for he ſhould have a very great one) might make a very curious and inſtructive Commentary on this Romance, and from which one might learn a great many things that former Commentators, though very good in other reſpects, have not touched upon. There are ſome very looſe paſſages in this book of Apuleius. It is thought that the Author has therein inſerted ſome Epiſodes of his own invention, and among others that of Pſyche. Horum certè noſter ita imitator fuit, ut è ſuo penu innumerabilia protulerit, atque inter cetera venuſtiſſimum illud Pſyches Ἔκφρασιν (73). Our Author was confeſſedly ſo ſkilful an imitator of things in this way, that he publiſhed ſeveral of his own, and among the reſt that very beautiful Epiſode of Pſyche. This Epiſode has in our days furniſhed Moliere with a ſubject for an excellent play, and Mr. de la Fontaine has taken occaſion to make a very pretty Romance upon it.

(72) Julius Floridus, Comment. ad uſum Delphini in Apul.

(73) Idem, ibid. pag. 2.

AQUÆUS (STEPHEN) in French de l'Aigue [A] Lord of Beauvais in Berri (a), his native country, was eſteemed for his military actions and his writings [B], under the reign of Francis I. Not that his Commentary upon Pliny, which is the beſt of his works, is in the main very good [C]; but it was remarkable at that time, that a Gentleman could do ſo much. This Commentary was printed in the year 1530. F. Hardouin was not very well acquainted with this date [D].

(a) Du Verdier, Bibliotb. Franſoiſe, p. 278.

[A] His name in French was de l'Aigue.] This is the Gaſcon word for Water. This Author ſtyles himſelf Stephen de Laigue, called Beaulnois *, at the beginning of his tranſlation of Cæſar, in the edition I make uſe of, which is the Paris one, printed by Peter Gualtier, in 1546, in 12.

* Beaulnois: This muſt be an error of the preſs, inſtead of Bauvais or Beaulvois, for the Author uſed to write either way the name of his Lordſhip (a). [Crit. Rem.]

(a) From the Crit. Rem. at the end of the French edition of Mr. Bayle's Diction. 1734.

[B] He was eſteemed for his military actions, and his writings.] Father Hardouïn makes him this compliment: Vir nobilis in primis,, ac militia quoque exacta egregiè ſordidus (1). The works which he publiſhed are; An excellent treatiſe containing the properties of tortoiſes, ſnails, frogs and artichoaks, printed at Lyons in 8vo (2); Julius Cæſar's Commentaries of the war of the Romans, and other military expeditions made by him in Gaul and in Africa, printed at Paris 1531, in folio. Du Verdier quotes this edition (3). La Croix du Maine ſpeaks of the Paris edition, printed by the Angeliers in 1539 (4), but does not ſay a word of that which I mentioned above in the remark [A]. We ſhall now proceed to his Commentary on Pliny.

(1) Harduinus, Præfat. in Plinium.

(2) Du Verdier, Bibliotb. Franc. pag. 278. La Croix du Maine takes notice of the Paris edition in 1530.

(3) Du Verdier, Bibliotb. Franc. pag. 278.

(4) La Croix du Maine, Bibliotb. Franc. pag. 76.

[C] His Commentary upon Pliny . . . . . is not very good in the main.] It is more conſiderable for its bulk, than for the learning it contains. The Author acts the part of a Plagiary in his corrections, and paſſes over almoſt all the difficult places. Father Hardouin's character of him is this: Commentarios ſcripſit in omnes Plinii libros; ſed mole magis quam eruditione inſignes. Nec verò emendationes ullas habet, quam quas à Rhenano mutuatus eſt: & ea ferè in quibus ſalebrarum eſt aliquid aut ambagis ſilet is, ceu foveam, ſecurus prætergredi (5). i. e. "He wrote, ſays he, Com-"mentaries on all the books of Pliny, but more con-"ſiderable for their bulk than learning. Nor has "he made any other emendations than what he bor-"rowed from Rhenanus; and where there happens "to be any thing difficult or perplext, he takes care "to avoid it as he would do a pit-fall." He gave into that fault of a great many other writers; of making advantage of another's labour, without naming his benefactor; and when he did mention his name, it was only when he wanted to find fault with him. Rhenanus was not ſilent upon this occaſion. See his words in a † letter to a Phyſician of the Cardinal of Mentz: Hoc mirum quod quum ex meis caſtigationibus nonnihil ſit adjutus, nuſquam tamen mei mentionem facit, niſi quoties vult reprehendere (6). i. e. "It "is ſtrange that he who had received ſome aſſiſtance "from my emendations, ſhould never mention me "but when he had a deſign to cenſure." The general character which he gives this book deſerves a place here. In primis ipſum volumen non eſt exiguum, ex variis congeſtum autoribus, quod uſui pauperculis eſſe poſſit, qui non habent Bibliothecam inſtructam, puta Ariſtotelem & Albertum de Animalibus, Raphaelem Volaterranum, ex quo integra fermè capita autor tranſcripſit, bona fide, hoc eſt una cum ipſis mendis ne ſyllabâ quidem mutatâ, Cælium Rhodiginum, Columellam etiam, Palladiumque & ſimileis ſcriptores. Nam hoc præcipuè habet ſtudio, citare teſtimonia autorum qui cum Plinio faciunt, de verbis ipſis minimum ſollicitus, quod illi penitus puerile videtur. In ſumma liber talis eſt, qui ſi non magnoperè juvet, excitet tamen literas, & Plinium ipſum vulgo fortaſſis commendet, quæ mihi res in primis grata eſt (7). i. e. "In the firſt place it is a volume "of no ſmall ſize, being collected out of various Au-"thors, and therefore may be of great uſe to the "poorer ſort of people who cannot afford to furniſh "a Library with ſuch ſort of books as Ariſtotle, Albertus de Animalibus, Raphael Volaterranus (from "whom he has tranſcribed entire chapters word for "word, with faults and all, without ſo much as al-"tering a ſyllable) Cælius Rhodiginus, Columella, Palladius, and the like. For he mightily affects to "quote teſtimonies out of Authors, who agree with "Pliny, tho' not ſo exact as to keep to the very "ſame words, which he looks upon to be puerile. "Upon the whole it is a book, which, if it does "not greatly improve learning, may ſerve to propa-"gate it, and cauſe Pliny to be underſtood by the "common people, which I very much approve of."

(5) Harduinus, Præfat. in Plin.

(6) See the 50th Letter of the Centuria Epiſt. Philolog. publiſh'd by Goldaſt, pag. 196. edit. of 1674.

(7) Paris edit. ubi ſupra.

† The Letter, in which Rhenanus ſpeaks of Aquæus's Pliny, is dated March 1531 or 1532 new ſtyle. That learned Gentleman died in 1537; about the ſame time died Germain de Bris, in Latin Brixeus. John Voulté made an Epitaph for them both. (Hendecaſill. 10, 4to, and in 24. 1537) (β). [Crit. Rem.]

(β) Paris ed. ubi ſupra.

[D] Father Hardouïn was not very well acquainted with the date of the edition of Aquæus's Commentaries upon Pliny.] He obſerves that Sigiſmond Gelenius publiſhed a volume of Corrections on Pliny, in 1535; and that the year after, Beatus Rhenanus put out his labours on the ſame Author, and that at the end of four years more Aquæus, of whom we are ſpeaking, printed his Commentary (8). According to that, he muſt have publiſhed them in 1540. But it is certain they were publiſhed in 1530. I fancy that Father Hardouïn fell into this miſtake for want of knowing that Gelenius took Pliny in hand twice before his edition of 1535 (9); and ſo it is poſſible that Aquæus's book might be later by five years than the firſt Corrections of Gelenius.

(8) Harduinus, Præfat. in Plin.

(9) See the 69th Letter of the 30th book of Eraſmus, pag. 1957.

AQUAVIVA (ANDREW MATTHEW) Duke of Atri in the Kingdom of Naples, and ſon of JULIUS AQUAVIVA, Count of Converſano [A], added to the ſplendour of his birth a great ſhare of learning, which rendered him very illuſtrious towards the end of the fifteenth Century, and the beginning of the ſixteenth. He was not contented with ſtudying, and becoming familiar with the learned, but he employed himſelf alſo in compoſing of books, and acquitted himſelf very honourably, as appears by his work intitled Encyclopedia, and by another, wherein he treats of moral virtue [B]. He alſo compoſed a book de Re Equeſtri. But before he applied himſelf to letters with ſo much ardour, he had given to the profeſſion of arms all that his birth could require of him; and he ſignalized himſelf in it, although fortune had been very adverſe to him. He was at two loſt battles, and was wounded and taken priſoner. Study comforted him in his priſon, and he was ſo happy as to obtain his liberty of Ferdinand King of Aragon, when Gonſalvo, ſurnamed the Great Captain, would have ſent him into Spain with the other priſoners. After that he enjoyed peacefully the ſweets of a private life in the midſt of books, and the converſation of men of letters, by whom he was very much praiſed and honoured [C]. He inſpired the ſame deſire of ſtudy in his brother Belliſarius, who alſo became an Author [D]. Our Aquaviva would have been happier, if he had been a better œconomiſt, but becauſe he had ſpent too much for many years, he found at laſt he was not able to ſpend enough. He died at Converſano, being ſeventy two years old, when the French army, under the conduct of Lautrec, ravaged Apulia (a) in the year 1528.

(a) Ex Jovii Elog. doctor. Vir. cap. 63.

[A] He was ſon to Julius Aquaviva, Count of Converſano.] This Count diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in ſeveral engagements, and he commanded the army of Naples, when he was killed in a ſkirmiſh during the ſiege of Otranto by the Turks, in 1480 (1). His ſon, who is the ſubject of this article, was a long while inconſolable for this loſs (2).

(1) See the Hiſt. of Mahomet II. by Guillet, tom. 2. pag. 373.

(2) See the verſes that Marullus addreſſed to him, Epigramm. lib. 1. pag. 16.

[B] He wrote a treatiſe on the ſubject of moral Virtue.] Paulus Jovius ſeems to ſay that it was a Commentary on Plutarch's treatiſe of moral Virtue; and the modern Author of the Notes upon the Latin Poems of Sannazarius is of the ſame opinion. Librum nempe nobilem, cui Encyclopædia nomen, itemque Commentarium in Plutarchum de Virtute morali (3). i. e. "He "wrote an excellent book entitled Encyclopædia, and "alſo a Commentary on Plutarch's treatiſe on moral "Virtue." But I do not find that the expreſſions of Paulus Jovius are clear enough to rely on. I am therefore inclined to ſuſpend my judgment on this matter. See the words of this Author: Nemo ex his qui illuſtribus orti familiis noſtrâ ætate claruerunt.... Andreæ Matthæo Aquavivio.... ſe luculentius optimis diſciplinis exornavit; uti præclarè conſtat eo Libro nobili pariter ac erudito, qui Encyclopædia inſcribitur, & de morali Virtute Plutarchi plenior liber ſubtili & copioſo Commentario perſimilis oſtendit (4). i. e. "Of all the "Perſons of Quality who have been famous in our "age, no one was a more accompliſhed Scholar than "Andrew Matthew Aquavivius, as abundantly ap"pears by his famous and learned book entitled En"cyclopædia, as alſo by that larger work of his con"taining an ingenious and learned Commentary on "Plutarch's book upon moral Virtue." This ſeems to imply an elaborate paraphraſe on this treatiſe of Plutarch.

(3) Notæ ad Sann. Elegias, pag. 188. edit. Amſtel. 1689.

(4) Paul. Jov. Elog. cap. 63. pag. 158.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have found that Paulus Jovius expreſſes himſelf improperly; for the title of our Author's work in the Naples edition, printed in 1526, in folio, runs thus: Commentarii in tranſlationem libelli Plutarchi Chæronei de Virtute morali.... liber primus. The title of the German edition in 1609, in 4to, is longer. Illuſtrium & exquiſitiſſimarum Diſputationum libri quatuor, quibus omnes divinæ & humanæ ſapientiæ, præſertim animi moderatricis, Muſicæ atque Aſtrologiæ arcana, in Plutarchi Chæronei de Virtute morali præceptionibus recondita, ſummo ingenii acumine retecta patefiunt, & figuris ſuo quæque illuſtrantur, &c. Neither Toppi, from whom I take this (5), nor Leonard Nicodemo, make any mention of the work intitled Encyclopædia.

(5) Toppi, Biblioth. Napol. p. 14.

[C] He was very much praiſed and honoured by men of learning.] Alexander ab Alexandro dedicated to him his Dies Geniales. Pontanus dedicated to him his firſt book de Rebus cæleſtibus, as alſo his treatiſe de Magnanimitate. Sannazarius has praiſed him with great delicacy upon his being (as has been ſaid ſince of Monſieur de Montauzier), Favori de Pallas, quelque nom qu'on lui donne,

Ou celui de Minerve, ou celui de Bellone.

"Of Pallas doubly favour'd, brave and ſage,
"Well ſkill'd in war, deep read in wiſdom's page.

See the laſt Elogy of the ſecond book, towards the latter end, and the ſecond Epigram of the ſecond book. As to the forty fourth Epigram of the ſame book, I am in doubt whether it is in praiſe of the Aquaviva we are ſpeaking of or not, as the Author of the Notes upon Sannazarius was of opinion (6); for it is addreſſed ad Neritinorum Ducem, who, according to Paulus Jovius, was Belliſarius Aquaviva, brother to Andrew Matthew. No more is the firſt Elogy of the third book, in my opinion, to be applied to this laſt, but to Julius Aquaviva his father. See in the Author I have quoted the names of ſeveral writers who have celebrated our Andrew Matthew (7).

(6) Notæ in Sannaz. p. 188.

(7) Nicodemo, Addizz. alla Biblioth. Napolet. pag. 11, 12.

[D] His brother Belliſarius alſo became an Author.] He wrote a treatiſe de Venatione, which he dedicated to John Matthew his brother; another de Aucupio, another de Principum Liberis educandis, another de Re militari, and another de ſingulari Certamine. Theſe works were firſt printed at Naples in folio, 1519, and afterwards reprinted at Baſil in-8vo, 1578, by the care of Leunclavius, with Manuel Palæologus on the Education of Kings.

☞ AQUILA, ſurnamed Ponticus, the Author of a Greek tranſlation of the Old Teſtament [A], was born at Sinope, a city of Pontus. He flouriſhed about the year 128 (a). Epiphanius in his book de Ponderibus & Menſuris (b) tells us that he was συγγενὴς or kinſman to Hadrian; but the Chronicon Paſchale obſerves (c), that he was συγγενὸς or father-

(a) Clerici Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 593. edit. Amſtelodami 1716.

(b) Pag. 170. tom. 2. edit. Petav.

(c) Ad Olympiad. 227, 4. pag. 255. edit. Pariſ. apud Clericum, ubi ſupra.

[A] Author of a Greek tranſlation of the Old Teſtament.] He publiſhed two verſions of it; in one of which he took a greater freedom in repreſenting the ſenſe of the original, and endeavoured to preſerve the entire meaning of it, without confining himſelf to a literal tranſlation. In his other verſion he tranſlated word for word, without even excepting thoſe, which cannot well be rendered into Greek; and particularly the word את eth; which, when it is the ſign of the accuſative caſe among the Jews, had no particular force in it, and yet becauſe in other caſes it ſignifies with, Aquila rendered it by the Greek word σὺν, without any regard to the genius of the Greek Language (1). St. Jerom in his Letter to Symmachus (2), ſays, that our Aquila was a man of too great exactneſs in his tranſlation, and attempted to render not only father-in-law to that Emperor. These accounts are entirely fabulous, though it is difficult to assign the origin of them. Nor is there any greater regard to be had to what Epiphanius relates afterwards, that when Hadrian resolved upon rebuilding of Jerusalem, he appointed Aquila to take care of that design, who, while he was employed at Jerusalem in that affair, was converted to the Christian faith, and baptized by the disciples of the Apostles, who returned thither from Pella [B]. But upon his refusing to abandon his former customs and practices, and giving himself up to the study of judicial Astrology, and defending very strenuously an Astronomical fatality, he was excommunicated. This reproach, says Epiphanius, exasperated him in such a manner, that he abjured the Christian religion, became a proselyte to that of the Jews, and submitted to the circumcision. He afterwards applied himself to the study of the Hebrew tongue, in which he gained so perfect a knowledge, that he gave a more accurate version of the Old Testament than ever had been seen before. Mr. Le Clerc observes upon this story, that if we had the same liberty of explaining it, as we have with regard to the fables of the Poets, we might perhaps conjecture, that Aquila was one of the Sect of the old Nazarenes, who fled with the rest of the Christians to Pella, just before the siege of Jerusalem; and that he learned the Hebrew language of the Nazarenes of his time, in which they were well skilled, only the words themselves, but even the Etymologies of them; upon which he was justly rejected: Aquila proselytus, & contentiosus interpres, qui non solum verba, sed & etymologias verborum transferre conatus est, jure projicitur à nobis. But in other passages of his writings that Father speaks of him in a much more favourable manner. He tells in his Quæst. 2. ad Damas. (3), that he render'd the original word for word with all the proper care and fidelity, and not in too scrupulous a manner, as some imagined: Aquilam non contentiosius, ut quidam putant, sed studiosius verbum interpretari ad verbum. In his Letter to Marcella (4) he calls him the most accurate Explainer of the Hebrew words: Verborum Hebræorum diligentissimum Explicatorem. He observes likewise in his Letter to the same Marcella (5), that he had compared Aquila's edition with the Hebrew originals, for fear lest perhaps the Synagogue should have made any alteration in it out of hatred to Christ. But after all he confesses, that he had found a great many things, which tend to the confirmation of our faith: Aquilæ editionem cum voluminibus Hebræorum confero, nequid forsitan propter odium Christi Synagoga mutaverit; & ut amicæ menti fatear, quæ ad nostram fidem pertineant roborandam, plura reperio. He very often prefers Aquila's translation to that of the Septuagint; and particularly in his Quæstion Hebraic. in Genes. iii. p. 216. Melius puto illud, quod habetur in Hebræo, Aquila transtulit. It is certain, that the ancient Christians had a great esteem for his versions; which is greatly recommended by Origen in his Commentary upon St. John (6), and upon Genesis Tom. III. and his Philocal. c. 14. where he says, that Aquila endeavoured to translate in the best and most exact manner possible: κυριώτατα ἑρμηνεῦσαι φιλοτιμούμενον. The same Father also observes in his Answer to Africanus (7), that Aquila confined himself to the Hebrew Idiom, and that the Jews esteem him as the best Interpreter of the Scripture; and that his translation was generally used by those, who are ignorant of the Hebrew tongue, because he has render'd the sense of the original in the most accurate manner: Οὕτω γὰρ Ἀκύλας δηλοῖ τῇ Ἑβραικῇ λέξει ἐπόδυσιν εἶναι. Φιλοτιμότερον πεπιστευμένος παρὰ Ἰουδαίοις ἑρμηνεῦσαι τὰς γραφὰς, ᾧ μάλιστα ἐμέβησαν οἱ ἀγνοοῦντες τὴν Ἑβραίων διάλεκτον χρῆσθαι, ὡς πάσων μᾶλλον ἐπιτετευγμένῳ. Wetstein in his Observations upon this passage of Origen has collected the various opinions of the ancients with regard to Aquila's translation. However notwithstanding all that is said concerning the Accuracy of it, and its Conformity with the Letter of the Hebrew Original, Dr. Cave remarks, that the ancients frequently complain, that it is not faithful in many places. Eusebius, in a manuscript Fragment mentioned by that Writer, says, that Aquila published his Translation with an insincere view, and with a design to prejudice Christianity. Dr. Cave likewise observes, that he undertook it in order to set aside that of the Septuagint, and to alter and pervert those testimonies of Scripture, which relate to our Saviour: Novam Bibliorum versionem Græcam aggressus sit, eo præcipuè animo, ut LXXII interpretationem eluderet, & testimonia de Christo in Scripturis prolata perverteret, atque aliter ederet. The Catenæ of the ancients, as well those which have been published, as those which are yet in manuscript, frequently animadvert upon his wilful or involuntary mistakes; and a Greek Chronographer, which was in manuscript in the possession of Dr. Thomas Gale, Dean of York, tells us, that the impious Aquila, who perverted the Scripture in his translation of it, lived under the Emperor Hadrian: Ἐπὶ Ἀδριανοῦ ὁ ἀσεβὴς Ἀκύλας, ὁ τὴν γραφὴν μεθερμηνεύσας ἐπὶ τοῦτο. An instance of this is alledged from Isaiah ix. 8. where the Septuagint say, that God sent the Logos to Jacob *; in which passage Aquila render'd the word λόγος by ῥῆμα, in order to prevent it from being applied to Christ the Logos or Word (8). Mr. le Clerc in his Ecclesiastical History takes notice of this imputation upon Aquila with regard to his insincerity in perverting designedly several passages, which favoured Christianity. But he remarks, that St. Jerom himself has acquitted him of this charge, and that learned men upon a critical examination of those passages, have shewn, that he was falsly accused. Christiani Scriptores aliquot Aquilam insimulârunt malæ fidei in Versionibus suis, quasi quædam loca, quæ Christianismo favent, datâ operâ, pravè vertisset. Sed eum dudum absolvit Hieronymus, & viri etiam docti, eorum locorum examine, temerè accusatum esse ostenderunt. There are some Fragments of this translation still extant in the writings of the ancients, which have been collected and published together by Nobilius, Drusius, and Dr. Walton. Mr. le Clerc regrets the loss of these versions of our Author; which might have been easily preserved and continued down to us, if the ancients had understood the proper use of them. They deserved, says he, to have been often transcribed at the common expence of the Churches, and reposited in the publick Libraries, in order that they might be handed down to posterity, which knew how to make a greater advantage of them. But the transcribers of those times were employed by persons of no learning in copying out an infinite number of useless Homilies and other trifling performances, while books of more consequence and value were neglected, to the irreparable loss of posterity. These complaints are and will be very frequent among learned men, who cannot but lament the destruction of so many noble treasures, while they have gained nothing but mere trifles in the room of them. Utinam verò Versiones ejus ad nos usque pervenissent! Quod fieri facilè potuisset, si Veteres earum usum satis intellexissent. Dignæ erant, quæ Ecclesiarum publico ære sæpius exscriberentur, & in Bibliothecis reponerentur; ut ad posteritatem, quæ melius iis uti potuisset, propagarentur. Sed innumeris inutilibus homiliis, aliisque quisquiliis exscribendis, neglectis melioribus Libris, irreparabili posterorum damno Librarii sunt ab indoctis hominibus occupati. Quas querelas sæpius viris doctis amissorum thesaurorum, pro quibus carbones habemus, dolor expressit, & porro exprimet.

(1) Clerici, Hiſt. Eccleſ. p. 594. edit. Amſtelod. 1716.

(2) Apud Cave, Hiſt. Litter. pag. 35. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

[B] Baptized by the Disciples of the Apostles, who returned thither from Pella.] They returned soon after the year 70 of the Christian Æra, in which Jerusalem was taken and destroyed. And therefore Epiphanius in the passage quoted above in the text places this return of them too late, since very few or none of those, who had fled to Pella, were living under the Emperor Hadrian (9).

(3) Tom. 3. p. 35. apud Cave, ubi supra. See Father Simon's Hist. crit. du Vieux Testam. lib. 2. c. 2. pag. 236.

(4) Tom. 3. p. 96. apud eundem.

(5) Tom. 2. pag. 312.

(6) Tom. 8. pag. 131. apud Cave, ubi supra.

(7) Pag. 224. apud Cave, ubi supra.

* Our English translators have rendered it, The Lord sent a Word into Jacob; which shews, that they understood it in the same sense as Aquila.

(8) Cave, ubi supra.

(9) Clericus in Not. (3) ad Hist. Eccles. pag. 593.

ſkilled, and not of the diſciples of the Apoſtles who returned from Palla. This conjecture is founded upon a paſſage in St. Jerom's Preface to Eſdras, where he ſays concerning the Greeks, that next to the ſeventy Interpreters, even at the time that the Goſpel of Chriſt ſhined forth, they read with great care the Jewiſh and Ebionite Interpreters of the Old Law, namely AQUILA, and Symmachus, and Theodotion, &c. We ſhall give that Father's own words in the note [C]. It is not an improbable conjecture, that he had this particular from the Nazarenes, from whom he likewiſe received ſeveral other things relating to Aquila; for he ſhews from their teſtimony, that he was a diſciple of the Rabbi Akiba. There is ſome diſpute whether he is not the ſame perſon with Onkelos, the famous Paraphraſt upon the Pentateuch. Several of the Rabbis and of the Chriſtian writers maintain the affirmative, while others are of the contrary opinion. However it is certain, that moſt of the Jewiſh Authors repreſent Onkelos as more antient than our Aquila, and that there are a great many paſſages in the former tranſlated in a manner from thoſe of the latter (d).

(d) Calmet, Diction. Hiſt. Critiq. &c. de la Bible, tom. 1. pag. 264. edit. de Geneve 1730.

[C] We ſhall give that Father's words in the note.] Poſt LXX Tranſlatores, jam Chriſti Evangelio coruſcante, Judæos & Ebionitas Legis Veteris interpres Aquilam videlicet, & Symmachum & Theodotionem curioſe legunt. T.

☞AQUILIA an ancient and Patrician Roman Family [A], produced ſeveral eminent men, the moſt conſiderable of whom we ſhall mention in this article. The firſt is C. AQUILIUS TUSCUS, who was Conſul in the year 266 (a) [B] from the building of Rome, according to Sigonius (b), and vanquiſhed the Hernici (c). C. AQUILIUS FLORUS was Conſul in the year 424 (d) with L. Cornelius Scipio, and the next year being Proconſul, he obtained the honours of a triumph for the victories he had gained over the Carthaginians in Sicily and Sardinia (e). M. or MANIUS AQUILIUS was Conſul with Marius in the year 651 (f) from the building of Rome, and the next year being Proconſul he went into Sicily againſt the ſlaves, who had revolted under the conduct of one Athenio, who having killed his maſter, put himſelf at the head of a vaſt number of ſlaves. That man had gained already ſome victories, having defeated the army commanded by (a) Or 267, according to Petavius.

(b) Comment. in Faſtis. Col. 98. Oper. tom. 1. P. 1. ed. Argelati, Mediol. 1732 fol.

(c) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 40.

(d) Eutrop. lib. 2. cap. 10.

(e) Tab. Capitol. apud Sigon. ubi ſupra, Col. 246.

(f) Sigon. ad b. ann. Petavius 653.

[A] A Patrician Family.] This we may ſafely affirm, ſince we find, that when Tarquin was expelled, this family was already ranked amongſt the Nobles (1). The Aquilii were the ſons of a ſiſter of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, who having been aſſiſtant in expelling the Tyrant, was made Conſul with Junius Brutus. Three perſons of this family were at that time Members of the Senate; but as they were ſtill young men, full of ambition, and fond of the pleaſures of a Court, they entered with ſome other young men, amongſt whom were two ſons of Brutus, into a conſpiracy to reſtore the abdicated King. But their plot being diſcovered, Brutus's children were by his own order beheaded before his eyes. Collatinus, who deſired to ſave the lives of his nephews, protracted that trial, that they might have time, and find means to defend themſelves. But he was diſappointed in his hopes; for the people unanimouſly ſentenced them to death, and they were immediately beheaded. Collatinus himſelf, who was odious to the people, becauſe he bore the name of Tarquinius, was obliged to abdicate the Conſulſhip, and went into a voluntary baniſhment (2). Livy ſpeaks (3) of Collatinus's abdication, before he mentions the conſpiracy of the Aquilii: but it is much more probable that the conſpiracy of his near relations created a ſuſpicion againſt him, which was ſupported by his being of the family, and bearing the name of Tarquin. And this is what Plutarch expreſly tells us. His words are (4): Ὁ δὲ Κολλατῖνος, ἦν μὲν, (ὡς ἔοικεν) ἐν ὑποψίᾳ τινὶ καὶ δι' ἃ συγγένειαν τῶν βασιλέων, ἔχθρᾳ δ' αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τῶν ὀνομάτων, ἀφεστιοῦμενοι τὸν Ταρκύνιον. ὡς δ' ταῦτα συνίδη, παντάπασι προστιθοῦσας, ἀφῆκε τὴν Ἀρχὴν ἑκὼν, καὶ τῆς πόλεως ὑπεξῆλθεν. i. e. "Collatinus, it ſeems, was already ſuſpected, becauſe "he was of the family of the Kings; and what rendered him ſtill more odious was the hateful name "of Tarquin, which he bore; and having beſides "given offence (by his behaviour with regard to his "nephews) he abdicated the Conſulſhip of his own "accord, and left the city." Tho' Collatinus's abdication was in a manner voluntary, yet, as Livy obſerves (5), he was prevailed upon by Brutus's exhortations and entreaties, and by the apprehenſion he was under, that if he did not abdicate voluntarily, he ſhould at the end of the year be ignominiouſly baniſhed, and have all his eſtate confiſcated. He therefore choſe to do of his own accord, what perhaps he might afterwards be forced to againſt his will. Cicero extolls the conduct of Brutus, for having obliged his collegue to abdicate, ſince this was neceſſary for the publick good. He adds, that Collatinus himſelf, tho' he ſuffered by it, could not but approve it, ſince whatever tends to the advantage of the publick, is for that very reaſon honeſt and good. Cicero's own words, of which we have given the ſenſe, are as follow: Poſſitne id, quod utile videatur, fieri non turpiter? Cum Collatino Tarquinio Collegæ Brutus imperium abrogabat, poterat videri facere id injuſtè, fuerat enim in Regibus expellendis ſocius Bruti, & conſiliorum etiam adjutor. Cum autem conſilium hoc Principes cepiſſent, cognationem Superbi, nomenque Tarquiniorum, & memoriam regni eſſe tollendam, quod erat utilæ Patriæ conſulere, id ita erat honeſtum, ut etiam ipſi Collatino placere deberet (6). Moreri, with his uſual accuracy, ſpeaks of the conſpiracy of the Aquilii, as if one perſon only of that family had been concerned in it; tho' Livy and Plutarch, whom he quotes, uſe the plural number, and the latter expreſly affirms, that three of the Aquilii were Members of the Senate.

(1) Livius, lib. 2. cap. 3, 4.

(2) Plutarch. in Vita Publicolæ, Oper. tom. 1. p. 98, 100. edit. Pariſ. 1624. fol.

(3) Ubi ſupra, cap. 2.

(4) Ubi ſupra, p. 100, D.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(6) Cic. Offic. lib. 3. p. m. 186.

[B] C. Aquilius was Conſul in the year 266.] This is another proof that the Aquilii were Patricians; for none of the plebeians were ever admitted to the conſular dignity before Sextius Sentinus Lateranus, who was Conſul with L. Æmilius Mamercus (7) in the year 387 (8) from the building of Rome. Tho' we cannot poſitively affirm, that L. Aquilius was of the ſame family with the Aquilii mentioned in the foregoing remark, yet it is very probable, that if he had been of another family, the ancient Hiſtorians would have hinted it, which we do not find they do. Livy ſays (9), that C. Aquilius vanquiſhed the Hernicians, but that T. Sicinius the other Conſul, who fought againſt the Volſci, had no advantage over them. Whereupon Sigonius obſerves (10), that this Hiſtorian is very conciſe in relating what happened ſoon after the liberty of the Commonwealth had been reſtored, ſince he does not take notice of what is moſt glorious to the Romans, I mean, their triumphs over the Nations they had conquered. Whereas Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus tells us (11), that both the Conſuls were ſucceſsful in their expeditions, but that Sicinius having delivered the city from a formidable enemy, obtained the honours of the great triumph; and Aquilius, who had not been engaged in ſo dangerous a war, was only allowed the leſſer triumph, called in Latin Ovatio.

(7) Livius, lib. 6. cap. ult. and lib. 7. cap. 1.

(8) According to Sigonius, or 388, according to Petavius.

(9) Lib. 2. cap. 40.

(10) Comment. in Faſtis, Col. 97. ad ann. U. 266.

(11) Lib. 8.

by Pretorius, and made himself master of the camp of Servilius, and of that of Lucullus. Aquilius finding this enemy very resolute, and determined with his whole army to perish rather than surrender, thought the best method to vanquish him, was to cut off all his provisions, and force him by famine to throw down his arms. The soldiers, or rather slaves who were under Athenio's command, would readily have submitted, if they had not been afraid of the punishment they deserved, and would certainly have suffered. They chose therefore a voluntary death. Athenio fell into the hands of the Romans, but he escaped the punishment, being torn to pieces by the soldiers, who struggled and fought amongst themselves who should take him prisoner (g). Thus Aquilius put an end to that war so effectually, that till Cicero's time there was no insurrection of the slaves in Sicily (b). His conduct in that Island gained him the honours of the lesser triumph (i). It appears that he had no less bravery than conduct and prudence, for he had received a great many honourable wounds in the armies; but his covetousness is a blemish upon his character. He was accused by L. Fusius (k) of having embezzled the publick money, and was very eloquently defended by M. Antonius the Orator [C], and acquitted, though he was guilty. C. Aquilius Gallus a contemporary of Cicero, was a very eminent advocate, and had so much business, that he declined standing a candidate for the Consulship [D]. He was a great friend of Cicero, and had been Prætor with him (l) in the year 687 from the building of Rome (m). Aquilius was a judge in the cause of P. Quintius, which Cicero pleaded (n) [E], and it appears that this great Orator placed a great confidence in the Judge's integrity and mildness of temper. In another place (o) Cicero bestows a very fine encomium on this great man [F], who indeed deserved it, not only by the useful books he wrote (p), but also by the rules and directions which he gave during his Quæstorship, to prevent frauds in contracts. This rule was so useful [G], that Cicero calls it "a remedy against all sorts of rogueries,"

(g) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 19.

(b) Cicero in Verrem, lib. 4. versus init.

(i) Idem, lib. 2. de Oratore, num. 195. p. m. 160. ed. Oxon. 1714. 8vo.

(k) Id. Offic. lib. 2. and in Bruto.

(l) Ibid. lib. 3. p. m. 196.

(m) Oeuvres, de St. Real. tom. 3. p. 418, 421.

(n) Cicer. Orat. pro P. Quintio.

(o) Orat. pro Cæcina.

(p) See the remark [G].

Everriculum

[C] He was accused of having embezzel'd the publick money, and was very eloquently defended by M. Antonius the Orator.] Aquilius refused or perhaps scorned to answer for himself; and as he was sitting before the Judges, Antonius, who pleaded his cause, made him rise up, tore his cloaths from his body, and shewed before the Court the wounds, which Aquilius had received. The Judges moved at this sight, acquitted him (12). Antonius in pleading this cause was himself touched to the greatest degree. Tully introduces him (13) speaking after this manner: "Do not think "that I was cold and unmoved, when I had M. Aquilius to defend. How could I avoid being affected "with the deepest sorrow? I saw a man, who had been "Consul, a General who had been highly extolled "by the Senate, whom I remember'd to have seen "triumphant, now weak, sick, afflicted, in danger "of his life. This it was that grieved me; and I "did not endeavour to excite the compassion of others, "before I myself was full of compassion; and when "I made the old man rise, when I tore his garments, "and shewed his wounds; all this was not the effect "of art, but only of the deep concern, which I then "felt myself." Cicero's words deserve to be here transcribed; since they contain an excellent rule for Orators. Nolite existimare —— me ipsum, cum mihi M. Aquilius in civitate retinendus esset, quæ in illa causa perorando fecerim, sine magno dolore feciſſe. Quem enim ego Consulem fuisse, Imperatorem ornatum à Senatu, ovantem in Capitolium ascendisse memuniſſem, hunc cum afflictum, debilitatum, mœrentem, in summum discrimen adductum viderem, non prius sum conatus misericordiam aliis commovere, quam misericordia sum ipse captus. Sensi quidem tum magnopere moveri judices, cum excitavi mœstum, ac sordidatum senem, & cum ista feci, quæ tu, Crasse, laudas, non arte, de quâ quid loquar nescio, sed motu magno animi, ac dolore, ut discinderim tunicam, ut cicatrices ostenderem. Cicero observes upon this action of Antonius, that the Judges could not be so inflexible as to condemn Aquilius, lest it should seem, that this man, whose life had escaped the fury of the enemy, whilst he himself exposed it bravely, had been spared not for the glory of the Romans, but only to fall a sacrifice to the cruelty of his Judges. Antonius eo adduxit eos, says Cicero (14), qui erant judicaturi, ut vererentur, ne, quem virum fortuna ex hostium telis eripuisset, cum sibi ipse non peperciſſet, hic non ad P. Romani laudem, sed ad judicum crudelitatem videretur esse servatus.

(12) Flori Breviar. in T. Liv. lib. 70.

(13) De Orator. lib. 2. num. 194, 195. pag. 160.

(14) In Verrem, lib. 5. vers. init.

[D] He had so much business that he declined standing a Candidate for the Consulship.] Cicero tells us (15) this circumstance: he adds, that the ill state of health was also one reason, why Aquilius would not be Consul. Aquilium non arbitramur (scilicet, Competitorem fori) qui & negavit, & juravit morbum, & illud regnum suum judiciale opposuit. Upon which the Abbot of St. Real observes (16), that Aquilius, for the sake of his own reputation, was obliged to declare publickly his intention, since he was resolved not to petition for the Consulship. For it was a kind of dishonour for a man to decline that high post, when his age and birth gave him a right to it, unless he had very good reasons not to desire it.

(15) Epist. ad Attic. lib. 1. Ep. 1.

(16) Oeuvres de St. Real, tom. 3. pag. 421.

[E] Aquilius was a Judge in the cause of P. Quintius.] Cn. Dolabella the Prætor had chosen Aquilius to judge this cause. This Judge took three other persons well skilled in the Law to assist him, namely, L. Lucullus, P. Quintilius, and M. Marcellus. Aquilius alone was sworn, and tho' his three assistants sate with him upon the bench, yet they did not take any oath; for they were not there to judge, having not received the authority of Magistrates, but only to give their advice (17). We may observe here, that according to Hottomannus (18), C. Aquilius Gallus had studied the Law under Q. Mutius, a man extremely conversant in the Roman Laws.

(17) Tho. Freigius, in Not. ad Cic. Orat. tom. 1. pag. 4.

(18) Apud eund. ibid.

[F] Cicero bestows a very fine encomium on this great Man.] He praises him very much in his Oration for P. Quintius; but as Cicero was then but twenty six years old (19), and Aquilius already an old man and his Judge, it might be thought, that Cicero's praises were the effect of flattery. But he commends him still more in his plea for Cæcinna, which he spoke eleven years after the other. He says (20) that if Aquilius had been present, he would not have ventured to extol his virtue and wisdom, for fear of offending his modesty; but as he was absent he could speak more freely. Aquilius had given some advice to Cicero concerning the cause of Cæcinna; and as Cicero intended to alledge the authority of that great Man, it was proper for him to shew how much the opinion of so eminent a person was to be considered. He therefore tells the Judges, that the Romans had experienced the wisdom and prudence of Aquilius, who in explaining the civil Law had always taken care never to make it clash with justice and equity; who for many years had exerted his genius and his industry for the good of his country; who was a man of so much goodness and justice in all his decisions, that he seemed to have been made a Lawyer by nature itself, rather than by study; that he had so much experience and was so prudent, that by his assistance the civil Law had produced not a mere fruitless science, but even goodness itself.

(19) A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 28. Euseb. in Chron. A. 4. Olymp. 174.

(20) Orat. pro Cæcinna.

[G] His Rule —— to prevent frauds in contracts.] What this particular Rule was, we do not find. Cicero, who mentions it often, does no where, as we can find, tell us in what it consisted. But we Everriculum malitiarum omnium (q). Dion Caſſius mentions (r) an AQUILIUS FLORUS, who with his ſon came to a very miſerable death. They had been of Marc Anthony's party againſt Octavius, and at the battle of Actium fell into the conqueror's hands, who ordered that they ſhould caſt lots who of them two ſhould be put to death. But the ſon, probably to ſave his father's life, offered his head voluntarily to the executioner, which his father ſeeing, killed himſelf out of grief and deſpair. We find in hiſtory ſome other perſons called Aquilius; but there is nothing very remarkable in their lives. We ſhall only give in the note a ſhort account of a Poet called AQUILIUS, whom Aulus Gellius mentions [H].

(q) De Nat. Deor. lib. 3.
(r) Lib. 51. p. m. 508.

we may know Aquilius's opinion concerning equity by the definition he gave of an intended fraud, which the Latins called Dolus malus. This according to him conſiſts "in feigning that we will do one thing, when "we really intend to do another;" cum aliud eſt ſimulatum, aliud actum (21), or, as Cicero expreſſes it in another paſſage (22), Dolus malus ſimulatione & diſſimulatione continetur; that is, "An intended fraud "conſiſts either in feigning or in diſſembling." Whence Cicero very juſtly concludes, that in all our dealings with others we muſt act with the utmoſt ſincerity; that we muſt not feign nor diſſemble the leaſt circumſtance on account of our private intereſt, either to ſell dearer or to buy cheaper. He alledges ſuch an inſtance of ſincerity and fair dealing, as could ſcarce be found in this age. Q. Scævola the ſon of Publius having bought a piece of land, found that it was worth more, than he had agreed for with the ſeller, and therefore added a large ſum of money to that which he had at firſt promiſed. Cicero's moral reflections on this ſtory are too long to be here inſerted. We muſt not omit to mention that ſome Authors are of opinion, that he wrote a whole treatiſe concerning Frauds. Some of his works, as that De Poſthumorum Inſtitutione, and De Stipulatione are quoted in the Code and in the Pandects (23).

(21) Lib. 3. de Offic. p. m. 197.
(22) Ibid. p. 198.

(23) Rutilius, in Vita Juriſconſ.

[H] Aquilius, whom Aulus Gellius mentions.] He tells us (24), that ſome of the Comedies, which bore the name of Plautus, were not written by him, but by M. Aquilius. The Comedies he names were Gemini Lenones (25), i. e. "The two Pimps;" Condalium (26), i. e. "The Ring;" Anus, i. e. "The old Woman;" Bis compreſſa, i. e. "The Maiden twice raviſhed;" Bæotia; Ἄγροικος or Agreſtis, i. e. "The Clown;" and Commorientes, i. e. "Perſons dying together." We may obſerve here, 1, that Athenæus relates that Philemon and Antiphanes wrote each of them a Comedy intitled Ἄγροικος, and that a Latin piece called Agricus is ſomewhere quoted (27). 2, The Play called Commorientes is expreſſly aſcribed to Plautus by Terence (28), who even deſcribes the ſubject of that Comedy, which Plautus, it ſeems, had borrowed from a Greek Poet. I wonder that Gellius, who endeavours to appear very accurate, did not take notice of that paſſage in Terence.

(24) Lib. 3. cap. 3. p. m. 214—218.
(25) Quoted by Priſcian lib. 6.
(26) Quoted by Varro, de Ling. Lat. lib. 5.
(27) Vide Thyſii & Oiſeli Notas in A. Gell. pag. 218. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1656, 8°.
(28) In Prologo Adelphorum.

P.

☞AQUILIUS [A] SEVERUS, a Spaniſh writer of the fourth Century was of the family of that Severus, to whom Lactantius dedicated two books of his Letters [B]. He wrote a book in the form of an Itinerary, which contained the whole hiſtory of his life, partly in proſe and partly in verſe (a). He gave it the title of the Cataſtrophe (καταστροφή) or Tryal (πεῖρα). He died under the reign of the Emperor Valentinian (b), that is, according to Du Pin (c), about the year 370. This is all that St. Jerom tells us of this Author, and all that we can poſſibly learn concerning him. Mr. Du Pin obſerves upon this occaſion, that works of the ſame kind with that of Aquilius, which contain an account of the lives of Authors, are very agreeable, when they are written by perſons of eminence and character, who have been employed in the management of affairs, or by thoſe whoſe lives have been full of extraordinary and ſurprizing incidents; and ſuch works are likewiſe very uſeful, when they are compoſed by men of virtue and merit. But when none of theſe circumſtances occur, books of that kind are commonly tedious and of no importance. It is probable, that the life of Aquilius was full of uncommon incidents, which induced him to write the Hiſtory of it, which he intitled the Cataſtrophe or Tryal. He ſhewed perhaps the wonderful conduct of Providence in the various events of his life. This is the only probable conjecture which we can fix upon, ſince we have no certainty in this point.

(a) The Greek tranſlation of St. Jerom de Vir. Illuſtrib. c. 111, ſays it was in Heroic Verſe, μέτρῳ ἡρῳκῷ.
(b) S. Hieron. de Viris Illuſtribus, cap. cxl.
(c) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 133. edit. de Paris 1693.

[A] Aquilius.] Honorius Auguſtodunenſis c. 112. calls him Achilius, which is agreeable to a MS. Copy, mentioned by Fabricius in his Notes upon St. Jerom de Viris Illuſtribus c. 111. who tells us, that the other MSS. conſulted by Suffridus Petri read it Acilius, as Martin Lipſius likewiſe remarked. Voſſius in his Book de Poetis Latinis obſerves, that other Copies have Atilius or Cæcilius; which Fabricius ſuppoſes that author had tranſcribed from Lilius Giraldus.

[B] To whom Lactantius dedicated two books of his letters.] Theſe letters are mentioned by St. Jerom de Viris Illuſtrib. c. 80, but are not now extant. Pſeudo-Dexter has borrowed the paſſage concerning Aquilius from that Father in his Chronicle under the year 370, where he tell us, that "Aqqilius Severus of To-"ledo, and of the ſame family with another Aquilius Se-"verus, to whom Lactantius addreſſed a volume of "Epiſtles, was in great reputation at that time." Aquilius Severus domo Toletanus ex genere alterius Aquilii Severi, ad quem Lactantius nuncupavit volumen epiſtolarum, hoc tempore magno in pretio habetur. We may obſerve here, that St. Jerom did not aſſert, that the perſon, to whom Lactantius wrote, was called Aquilius Severus, but only Severus. And therefore the name of Aquilius was added by Pſeudo-Dexter without any authority.

T.

AQUIN (PHILIP D') in Latin Aquinas or Aquinius, acquired much reputation by the knowledge of Hebrew, which he taught at Paris under the reign of Lewis XIII, and by the books that he publiſhed [A]. He was originally of Aquino * in the Kingdom of

* Originally of Aquino.] His name was Rabbi Mardocai or Mordecai. About the year 1610 the Jews expelled him out of their Synagogue at Avignon, becauſe he had ſome inclination for the Chriſtian religion. He went into the Kingdom of Naples, and was baptized at Aquino, for which reaſon it ſeems he took the ſurname of Aquino, of which he changed the termination, when ſome years after he retired into France with his whole family (a). [CRIT. REM.]

(a) Crit. Rem. at the end of the French edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

[A] He acquired much reputation by the books which he publiſhed.] The liſt of them is as follows: Dictionarium Hebræo-Chaldæo-Thalmudico-Rabbinicum, printed at Paris, 1629, in fol. The roots of the Holy Tongue, ad formam Cubi Hutteri- of Naples (a), and from thence he took his name; but he was born in the country of Avignon †. He turned from Judaiſm, and had a penſion from the Clergy of France (b): there is mention made of him in the trial of the Marſhal d'Ancre [B]. Simeon de Muis has given him great praiſe [C]: Valerian of Flavigni, on the contrary, has ſpoken ill of him [D]. There was a LEWIS HENRY D'AQUIN contemporary with this, and well verſed in the Oriental Languages. I do not know whether he was his ſon or his brother (c)*. He tranſlated ſomething out of Hebrew into Latin [E]. He had likewiſe been Jew, and he was alſo a Penſioner of the Clergy. ANTHONY D'AQUIN who was firſt Phyſician to Lewis XIV was grandſon of Philip.

† At Carpentras.

(a) I know this only by hearſay.

(b) See the Epiſtle dedicatory to his Interpretation of the Tree of the Cabala.

(c) Monſieur Colomies thinks that he was his ſon.

* There was one Lewis Henry . . . . . I don't know whether he was his ſon or his brother.] He was his ſon, and was born at Avignon about the year 1600: he was the father of Anthony, &c. See F. Deſmoletz, Continuation des Mem. de Liter. &c. tom. 2. Part 2. p. 48 (β). [CRIT. REM.]

(β) Paris edit.

Hutterianiani, at Paris 1620, in 16°; an Italian tranſlation of the Apophthegms of the antient Doctors of the Jewiſh Church, collected by the Rabbin Simeon ſon of Gamaliel; * the Expoſition of the thirteen ways which the ancient Rabbins make uſe of to explain the Pentateuch (1); the interpretation of the Tree of the Cabala, adorned with the cut of it taken from ancient Hebrew Authors, printed at Paris, at the expence of the Author, 1625, in 8vo: A Diſcourſe on the Tabernacle and Camp of the Iſraelites, at Paris, by Th. Blaiſe, in 1623, in 4o; Literal, allegorical and moral Explications of the Tabernacle which God ordered Moſes to build, of the veſtments of the Prieſts, and of the manner of conſulting the Breaſt-Plate under the ancient Law, together with the form of the Jewiſh Sacrifice; the whole curiouſly collected, and faithfully tranſlated from the moſt learned and ancient of the Hebrew Authors; together with a Diſcourſe on the Camp of the Iſraelites, and the Deſcription of the Precious Stones in the Breaſt-Plate of the High-Prieſt, added at the end of the ſecond Edition, reviſed by the Author, printed at Paris, at the Author's expence, in 1624, in 4o: Bechinas Olam, or an Examen of the World of Rabi Jacob; moral Sentences of the ancient Hebrews, and the thirteen methods by which they uſed to interpret the Bible, at Paris, by John Lacquehaye, 1629, in 8vo; Phil. Aquinatis, Hebraicæ Linguæ profeſſ. Lachrymæ in obitum illuſtriſſ. Cardinalis de Berulle: Pariſij apud Joannem Beſſin, 1629, in 8vo.

(1) Printed at Paris 1620, in 4to.

* The expoſition of the thirteen methods &c.] Mr. Bayle ſhould have ſaid, that this work is in Latin. F. Le Long ſays, that this firſt Vol. in 4to. was publiſhed under the name of F. Arnoux; but he is miſtaken; it is only dedicated to that Father, then Confeſſor to Lewis XIII. (γ) [CRIT. REM.]

(γ) Paris edit.

[B] Mention is made of him in the tryal of the Marſhal d'Ancre.] The thing is too remarkable to be paſſed over. "Item it is proved by informations, as alſo "by the depoſition of Aquinas, heretofore a Jew, and "now a Chriſtian, (whom Conchine and his wife ſent "for to Moulins, where this ſame Aquinas was, in the "houſe of the criminal judge) (2), that Conchine and "his wife made uſe of the Cabala and Jewiſh Books. "It is alſo to be obſerved that this Aquinas depoſed, "that Conchine, in the preſence of his wife, had taken "away a chamber pot on account of impurity, and car-"ried out the picture of a Crucifix, for fear of their "preventing the effect which the ſaid Conchine and his "wife pretended would follow from reading ſome verſes "of the 51ſt Pſalm, miſerere mei, in Hebrew, which "they deſired Aquinas to read according to the form "that Montalto had ſometimes read it to them before."

(2) Perhaps he was there as Preceptor to Gilbert Gaulmin, who has confeſſed that he had been a diſciple of Philip Aquinas. Integrum M. S. Librum, ſays he, ad Libros de vitâ & morte Moſis, pag. 305. ex Philippi D'Aquin præceptoris olim mei χειμηλίοις deſcripſimus.

[C] Simeon de Muis has given him great praiſes.] See what he ſays on the 14 Verſe of the xxxv Pſalm. Cum hic hærerem dubius, Philippus Aquinas, è Judæo Chriſtianus, vir raræ & exquiſitiſſimæ in Hebraicis literis doctrinæ, & quem nunquam fruſtra conſulas, fortè venit ad me viſendi gratiâ, & venit quidem optatus. Ille, ſtatim atque de re communicavi, ut ſingulos Bibliorum verſus, imo & voces ſingulas in numerato habet, ac tanquam digitos tenet, indicavit locum ex Eſaiæ lxvi. v. 13. i. e. "While I was muſing what the meaning of this "paſſage might be, as good luck would have it, Philip "Aquinas, a Jewiſh Proſelyte to Chriſtianity, a man "of uncommon and excellent abilities in Hebrew learn-"ing, and who is never at a loſs to reſolve doubts, "came to make me a viſit. As ſoon as ever I com-"municated the matter to him, (for he has not only "every verſe but even every word of the Bible at "his fingers ends) he quoted to me that place of Iſaiah "in the lxvi Chap. and 13. v."

[D] Valerian de Flavigni . . . has ſpoken ill of him.] He was Hebrew profeſſor in the College Royal at Paris. He very roughly handled the Bible of Mr. le Jai; and maintained that the Hebrew text therein had been ſhamefully mangled by Philip Aquinas. Tot ac tantis conſpurcatam maculis atque ſordibus, obſtetricantibus impuriſſimis manibus Philippi Aquinatis Avenionenſis, ex Judæo Chriſtiano, ut à planta pedis uſque ad verticem non ſit in eo ſanitas (3); i. e. "So corrupted and "defiled with ſpots and blemiſhes, being firſt pol-"luted by the unclean hands of Philip Aquinas of "Avignon, that Jewiſh proſelyte to Chriſtianity, that "from the very beginning of the work to the end "there is not one ſound part in it.

(3) Flavigni, in Epiſtola de Heptaplis Pariſienſibus, apud Colomeſium, Gall. Oriental. p. 256.

[E] Lewis Henry Aquinas tranſlated ſome piece from the Hebrew into Latin (4).] See the title as follows. Commentarius Rabi Levi filii Gerſonis in librum Jobi, ſeu in V prima capita, interprete Ludovico Henrico Aquino Lutetiæ, printed at Paris by Th. Blaiſe, 1622, in 4to; Scholia Rabi Salamonis Jarchi in librum Eſther: item excerpta quædam ex Talmudo & Jalcut in eundem librum, interpret. Lud. Henr. Aquino ibid. 1622, in 4to.

(4) See Colomies, Galliæ Oriental. p. 254, 256.

☞ AQUINAS (ST. THOMAS), who is ſtil'd the Angelical Doctor, and whoſe works are very numerous [A], was of the antient and noble family of the Counts of Aquino, who were deſcended from the Kings of Sicily and Aragon. He was born in the Caſtle of Aquino in the Terra di Lavoro in Italy about the year 1224 (a), or in the beginning

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. 10. pag. 74. edit. Paris 1702; and Cave, Hiſt. Liter. pag. 636. edit. Colon, Allobrog. 1720.

[A] Whoſe Works are very numerous.] They contain ſeventeen volumes in folio, which were printed at Venice in 1490, Nuremberg in 1496, Rome in 1570, Venice in 1594, and Cologne in 1612. We ſhall give an account of them from Du Pin (1). The five firſt volumes contain his Commentaries upon the works of Ariſtotle; the ſixth and ſeventh a Commentary upon the four books of Sentences; the eighth Queſtions in Divinity, particularly ten Queſtions concerning the Power of God, ſixteen Queſtions concerning Evil, a Queſtion concerning ſpiritual Creatures, another concerning the Soul, a Queſtion concerning the Union of the Word, a Queſtion concerning the Virtues in general, another concerning Charity, another concerning brotherly Correction, a Queſtion concerning Hope, another concerning the Cardinal Virtues, twenty nine Queſtions concerning Truth, and twelve quodlibetical Queſtions. The ninth volume contains the Sum of the Catholick Faith againſt the Gentiles, divided into four books. The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth the ſum of Divinity with the Commentaries of Cardinal Cajetanus. The thirteenth conſiſts of ſeveral Commentaries upon the Old Teſtament, particularly a Commentary upon the book of Job, a literal and anagogical Expoſition upon the firſt fifty Pſalms, an Expoſition upon the Canticles, which he dictated upon his death-bed to the Monks of Foſſa nova, Commentaries upon the Prophecies of Iſaiah and Jeremiah, and upon the Lamentations, which the beſt Critics are of opinion were written by Thomas Anglicus. The fourteenth volume contains the Commentaries upon the Goſpels of St. Matthew and St. John; but that upon St. Matthew ginning of the year 1225 (b). His father was Laudolph Count of Aquino, and his mother Theodora the daughter of Count Theates (c). When he was five years of age he was committed to the care of the Monks of Mount Caſſino, under whom he ſhewed the marks of an excellent genius, till he was ſent to the Univerſity of Naples, where he ſtudied Logick under Peter Hibernus, and polite Literature under Martinus (d). In the year 1241 he entered himſelf into the Order of the Preaching Friars at Naples, without the knowledge of his parents. But his mother being informed of it, uſed her utmoſt efforts to divert him from his deſign; to prevent which the Dominicans removed him to Terracina, and then to Anagna, and at laſt to Rome. His (b) Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 3. col. 254. edit. Lipſiæ 1722.

(1) Pag. 74.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Cave, ubi ſuprà.

was written by Peter Scaliger a Dominican Friar and Biſhop of Verona (2). The Commentary upon S. John was compiled by Reginald St. Thomas's companion, from the literal expoſition which he heard him make of that Goſpel. The fifteenth volume contains the Catena upon the four Goſpels extracted from the Fathers, and dedicated to Pope Urban IV. The ſixteenth volume conſiſts of the Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtles, and the Sermons of Aquinas preached on Sundays and the Feſtival of Saints (3). The ſeventeenth volume contains divers Tracts in Divinity, under the following titles; a Treatiſe againſt the Errors of the Greeks dedicated to Pope Urban IV; a Compendium of Divinity dedicated to Reginald a Monk of his Order, which ſome Writers aſcribe with great probability to Ulric of Strasburg; an Expoſition of ſome Articles againſt the Greeks, Armenians, and Saracens, dedicated to the Chantor of Antioch; a Treatiſe upon the two Precepts of Charity, and the ten Commandments of the Law; an Expoſition of the Lord's Prayer; an Expoſition of the Angelical Salutation; an Anſwer concerning an hundred and eight Articles extracted from the works of Peter de Tarentaſia, addreſſed to John de Verceil General of the Order of the Preaching Friars, but this is not ſuppoſed to have been compoſed by Aquinas; another Anſwer addreſſed to the ſame perſon concerning forty two Articles; an Anſwer concerning thirty ſix Articles, addreſſed to the Reader of Venice; another Anſwer concerning ſix Articles addreſſed to the Reader of Beſançon; a Treatiſe concerning the Difference between the divine and human Word; a Treatiſe concerning the Nature and Origin of the Word of the Underſtanding, de naturâ & origine verbi intellectûs: a Treatiſe upon ſeparate Subſtances, or of the Nature of Angels; a Tract concerning the Unity of the Underſtanding againſt the Averroiſts, who aſſerted all mankind had but one ſingle underſtanding; a Tract againſt thoſe, who endeavoured to divert men from entering into a religious profeſſion; a Treatiſe upon the Perfection of a ſpiritual life; a Tract againſt thoſe, who oppoſed the worſhip of the Deity and Religion, in which he defends the Orders of the Mendicant Friars in oppoſition to the books of William de Sancto Amore; four books of the Government of Princes, which were undoubtedly not written by St. Thomas, becauſe it is ſaid in that piece, that in the time of the Author Adolphus ſucceeded Rodolphus in the Empire, and Albert ſucceeded Adolphus, which did not happen till many years after the death of Aquinas; a Treatiſe of the Government of the Jews; a Treatiſe of the Form of Abſolution; an Expoſition of the firſt Decretal; an Expoſition of the ſecond Decretal; a Treatiſe of Lots; a Treatiſe of judicial Aſtrology; a Tract upon Eternity of the World; a Treatiſe concerning Fate; thirty ſeven (4) other Tracts in Logic and Natural Philoſophy; ſeven books of the Inſtruction of Princes, which are publiſhed in no edition except that of Rome; the Office of the Feſtival of the holy Sacrament written at the command of Urban IV, who appointed that ſolemnity. There is ſome reaſon to doubt whether St. Thomas compoſed the whole, or only made uſe of the office of the holy Sacrament, written by John the Clerk of Liege, and made ſeveral alterations in it. Henſchenius and Papebrock aſſert, that St. Thomas is not the Author of this office, which was compoſed by John of Liege abovementioned; which they endeavour to prove from the teſtimony of the Author of the Life of St. Juliana the Virgin, who aſſures us, that this Clerk of Liege wrote an Office of the holy Sacrament, conſiſting of hymns, anthems, reſponſes, leſſons, capitula's and collects; and they confirm this by the ancient books of the Church of St. Martin at Liege, in which part of the Office aſcribed to St. Thomas is to be found. Father Noel Alexander a Dominican affirms on the contrary (5), that this Office is the genuine work of St. Thomas; which he proves by the authority of William de Toco or Thoco, a contemporary Writer, who places this among the works of Aquinas; which is likewiſe done by Ptolomy of Lucca, Biſhop of Toricelli, the Scholar of St. Thomas, and by St. Antoninus. But, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (6), it is eaſy to reconcile theſe two opinions by ſuppoſing, that St. Thomas made uſe of the office written by John the Clerk of Liege, and inſerted part of it in that, which is aſcribed to him, becauſe he had ſome ſhare in the compoſition of it, and reduced it to the form, which it is in at preſent. And therefore it is only ſaid in the Hiſtory of the Tranſlation of St. Thomas's body, that he put in order (ordinavit) the Office of the holy Sacrament. In this volume are contained likewiſe a Treatiſe upon the Sacrament of the Altar divided into thirty two chapters, aſcribed to Albertus Magnus by Trithemius; another Treatiſe upon the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, but it is doubted whether this was written by St. Thomas, as well as the following Tracts, concerning the Humility of Jeſus Chriſt; of the Love of Chriſt and our Neighbour, of divine Morals; of Bleſſedneſs; of the manner of Confeſſion; of Purity of Conſcience; of the Duty of a Prieſt; of the Maſs; of buying and ſelling for a time, which is aſcribed by ſome to James of Viterbo; a Letter upon the method of acquiring divine and human knowledge; a Treatiſe upon the Vices and Virtues; of Concordances; and of Uſury. Beſides theſe ſuſpected Tracts there are two others, which are thought to be genuine performances of Aquinas, the former an Expoſition upon Boethius's book concerning Weeks, and the latter Queſtions upon the ſame Author's book concerning the Trinity. At the end of this volume is added a Commentary upon the four books of the Sentences, which ſome Writers ſuppoſe to be doubtful. There have been publiſhed ſeparately under his name ſeveral other Commentaries upon the Scriptures, particularly upon Geneſis, Lyons 1573 in 8vo; upon the Prophecy of Daniel; upon the Books of the Maccabees, Paris 1596, 8vo; upon all the canonical Epiſtles, Paris 1543, 8vo, 1550, Lyons 1556, Antwerp 1592; and upon the Apocalypſe (7). But all theſe Commentaries are thought not to have been written by Aquinas; and the greateſt part of them are aſcribed to Thomas Anglicus (8). We have likewiſe a Commentary upon Boethius's Conſolation of Philoſophy publiſhed under S. Thomas's name at Louvain in 1487 in fol. and at Lyons in 1514 in 4to, which Du Pin ſuppoſes to be a genuine work of his, tho' Dr. Cave is of the contrary opinion. Several difficulties have been raiſed with regard to his Summa Theologiæ, which have occaſioned ſome Authors to doubt, whether he was really the Author of it. Cardinal Bellarmin in his third Obſervation upon St. Thomas in his book de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis under the year 1265, tells us, that it is very ſurprizing that a great part of the Prima Secundæ and Secunda Secundæ is found word for word in the firſt and third part of the Speculum morale of Vincent Bellovacenſis or de Beauvais. It does not ſeem probable, continues the ſame Author, that Vincent ſhould borrow his work from the book of St. Thomas, ſince he died in the year 1256, as Anthony Senenſis aſſures us from Vaſeus in his Bibliotheca PP. Prædicatorum; whereas St. Thomas died in 1274, and wrote his Summa Theologiæ in the latter part of his Life. On the other hand it is by no means credible, that St. Thomas ſhould borrow the ſecond and moſt valuable part of his Sum from any other Writer. To clear theſe difficulties the Cardinal could find no expedient,

(2) Du Pin, ibid. and Cave, p. 636.

(3) Cave, ibid.

(4) Dr. Cave ſays 36.

(5) See his Article.

(6) Pag. 75.

(7) Cave, pag. 637.

(8) Cave, ibid. and Du Pin, pag. 75.

His mother followed him thither, but could not obtain leave of the Monks to ſee her ſon; ſo that being highly incenſed at this treatment, with the aſſiſtance of her two elder ſons, ſhe ſeized the youth in his journey to Paris, whither he was ſent by the Monks of his order. She ordered him to be ſhut up in her caſtle, where he ſtudied the Scriptures with the greateſt application, and continued inflexible to all the entreaties and threats of his mother, and brothers, and ſiſter. Two years after he eſcaped out of the Caſtle by the window, and fled to Naples, and then to Rome. In 1244 he went to Paris with John the Maſter of the Teutonic Order, and having ſtaid there a ſhort time removed to Cologne, in order to hear the Lectures of Albertus Magnus. From thence he was invited again to Paris to read publick Lectures upon the book of Sentences, which he performed with great applauſe before a very large audience. In the year 1255 he was created Doctor of Divinity at Paris on the ſame day with Bonaventure. He returned to Italy in or before the year 1263, and was appointed Definitor of his Order for the Province of Rome; and having taught School Divinity in moſt of the Univerſities of Italy, he dient, but to ſuppoſe, that the Speculum morale was not written by Vincent Bellovacenſis, but by ſome later Author, whoſe name was likewiſe Vincent, and who deſigned to give an abridgment of the ſecond part of St. Thomas's Sum. This he thinks is confirmed by this conſideration, that the Speculum morale ſeems much more ſolid than the Speculum doctrinale, naturale, & hiſtoriale, which were undoubtedly the performances of Vincent Bellovacenſis. Mirum valde eſt, quod magna pars Secundæ, & Secunda Secundæ inveniatur iiſdem verbis in primo & tertio Speculi Moralis Vincentii Bellovacenſis. Et quidem non videtur Vincentius potuiſſe Speculum ſuum morale conficere ex doctrina & verbis S. Thomæ, cum ipſe obierit anno Domini 1256, ut teſtatur Antonius Senenſis ex Vaſco in Bibliotheca PP. Prædicatorum; & S. Thomas obierit anno Domini 1274, & in extrema ætate Summam Theologiæ confecerit. Sed neque eſt ullo modo credibile ſanctum Thomam Summæ ſuæ partem ſecundam, tamque nobiliſſimam ex alio ſcriptore hauſiſſe. In his anguſtiis nihil mihi occurrit, niſi Speculum illud morale fortaſſe non eſſe Vincentii Bellovacenſis, ſed alicujus authoris poſteriores; qui fortaſſe Vincentius etiam dicebatur, quique ſecundam partem S. Thomæ in compendium redigere voluerit. Id quod videtur poſſe confirmari eo quod Speculum morale gravius multo eſſe videatur, quam ſint Speculum doctrinale, naturale, & hiſtoriale, quæ tria ſine ullo dubio ſunt Vincentii Bellovacenſis. Petrus de Alva, a Franciſcan, in his Nodus indiſſolubilis de conceptu mentis & ventris, publiſhed at Bruſſels in 1662 (9), has attempted to prove, that the Summa Theologiæ was not written by St. Thomas; but he was anſwered by Francis Janſſens, a Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Louvain in a book intitled, Authoritas divi Thomæ Aquinatis V. Eccleſiæ Doctoris vindicata, printed at Ghent in 1664. The learned Mr. Launoi, Doctor of Sorbonne, in a book of his entitled Venerandæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ circa Simoniam Traditio, printed at Paris 1675, likewiſe doubted whether the Sum is the genuine performance of St. Thomas, from the ſilence of Pope Clement VI, who in a Panegyric upon that Saint, which he pronounced ſoon after his canonization, and in which he gives an ample account of the works of that Author, makes no mention of this. Father Alexander wrote a Diſſertation in anſwer to this, inſerted in the 21ſt volume of his Selecta Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ Capita, in which he endeavours to invalidate all the objections urged by Launoi, Bellarmin, Peter de Alva, and others (10). He evinces St. Thomas's claim to this work from the teſtimonies of ſeveral Authors, who lived ſoon after him, particularly that of William de Toco, who was one of thoſe, that ſollicited to have him canonized, and who made an exact Catalogue of his works, among which his Sum holds the firſt rank; of William de la Mare, who oppoſing at the end of the thirteenth Century the doctrine of St. Thomas in a book of his intitled Correctorium Operum Fratris Thomæ, extracts moſt of the articles, which he objects againſt, from his Summa Theologiæ, as his principal work; of Ægidius Romanus, a Scholar of St. Thomas, who defended him againſt de la Mare; of John Lallemand and Nicholas Trivett, who wrote about the beginning of the following Century a Catalogue of the writings of St. Thomas; of St. Antoninus, and many others; without inſiſting upon Demetrius Cydonius a Greek, who tranſlated this work into the Greek language, and highly extolled the Author. It is evident therefore that the argument drawn from the ſilence of Clement VI is not equivalent to the teſtimonies of ſo many Writers, who were as ancient, or even older than that Pope. We may obſerve here that Aquinas did not finiſh his Sum, and that the concluſion of the laſt part was ſupplied by Peter de Alvernia, his ſcholar, who flouriſh'd about the year 1280, and who formed the greateſt part of that ſupplement from the other books of St. Thomas, and particularly his commentaries upon the maſter of the ſentences (11). With regard to the objection of Cardinal Bellarmin abovemention'd, that part of this work is to be found in the Speculum Morale of Vincent Bellovacenſis, the critics are divided in their opinions. Some of them alledge that perhaps the latter did not die till the year 1264, and that St. Thomas had already compoſed his Secunda Secundæ, which might therefore be communicated to Vincent. Others affirm that the Speculum Morale was not written by him; but that as this Author had never compoſed ſuch a work, or that, which he wrote, being loſt, ſome other perſon had ſubſtituted in the room of it theſe extracts from St. Thomas to render the performance of Vincent Bellovacenſis compleat. But theſe ſolutions, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves (12), are by no means probable; for in the firſt place almoſt all the authors, who have mentioned Vincent, tell us, that he died in 1256. And tho' we ſhould ſuppoſe that he lived till the year 1264, yet it is difficult to imagine, that he ſhould tranſcribe a work, which was not then publiſhed or finiſhed. Beſides, it cannot juſtly be ſaid, that he never wrote a Speculum morale, ſince he informs us in his preface, that it was one part of his work; and the antient writers, as Henry Gandavenſis and Trithemius, mention the latter, which begins with the words that are quoted by Trithemius as the beginning of the Speculum Morale of Vincent Bellovacenſis. On the other hand it appears, that St. Thomas's Summa Theologiæ is all written in the ſame ſtile and manner; and he quotes the Secunda Secundæ in the other parts of his work; whereas that of Vincent Bellovacenſis is a mere rhapſody extracted from different authors; and it is even ſaid, that he cites St. Thomas's ſum in his Speculum Naturale (13). The reader will find a very accurate examination of theſe difficulties, in Caſimir Oudin's Commentarius de Scriptoribus Eccleſiæ antiquis eorumque ſcriptis (14), wherein he determines, that St. Thomas Aquinas is the real author of the Summa Theologiæ. Before we conclude this note, it will not be improper to give an account of the plan of this celebrated work. In the firſt part, after the author has ſpoken in the firſt queſtion of the ſacred doctrine in general, he treats of God, his Eſſence, Attributes, and Operations, of the three divine perſons, the proceſſion of them, and their relations to each other, and laſtly of God conſidered with regard to his creatures, as their Creator and Preſerver. In the firſt part of the ſecond part he treats of the inclination of rational creatures towards God, of their ultimate end of the nature of thoſe actions, by which they may attain it, of the principle of them, of virtues and vices in general, of the laws and of Grace. In the ſecond part of the ſecond, he treats in particular of theological and moral virtues, and of every thing which relates to them. In the third part, he treats of the means, by which it is poſſible to approach to the Deity, and theſe means are the incarnation of Chriſt, and the Sacraments, that make the ſubject of this part; which concludes with queſtions relating to the four ends of man (15).

(9) See Oudin, tom. 3. Col. 354, 355.

(10) Idem, ibid. and Du Pin, p. 76.

(11) Du Pin, p. 76.

(12) Pag. 70.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 71.

(14) Tom. 3. Col. 356, & ſeq.

(15) Du Pin, pag. 76.

he ſettled at laſt at Naples, where he received a penſion from King Charles, and ſpent the reſt of his life in ſtudy, reading of Lectures and the exerciſes of piety [B], and was ſo far from the views of ambition or profit, that he refuſed the Archbiſhoprick of that City, when it was offered him by Pope Clement IV. In 1274 he was ſent for to the ſecond Council of Lyons by Pope Gregory X, that he might read before them the book which he had written againſt the errors of the Greeks at the command of Urban IV: but he fell ſick in his journey at the Monaſtry of Foſſanova near Terracina, where he died on the ſeventh of March the ſame year, being fifty years of age (e). Volaterranus tells us (f), that as he was about to receive the Euchariſt juſt before his death, he prayed to our Saviour that he would pardon what he had written concerning the myſteries of his religion and the univerſal Church, where-ever it was falſe, and he reſigned up all his works to the judgment of the church. This fact is partly confirmed by another writer, who was his ſcholar [C]. Sixtus Senenſis and other writers give him a noble character [D]; and Father Rapin repreſents him as the great improver of School Divinity [E]. He was very little ſkilled in Hiſtory, or polite Learning, and knew nothing of the Greek Language, which was occaſioned

(f) Lib. 21. pag. 758.

(e) Cave, and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

[B] Spent the reſt of his life in ſtudy, reading of lectures and the exerciſes of piety.] Pope John XXII. in the bull of the canonization of St. Thomas obſerves, that he was perpetually employed in the ſervice of God, or the proſecution of his ſtudies, or preaching, or in devout prayer, or meditating upon the ſcriptures, in which he had a very profound knowledge; ſo that his whole time, except what was neceſſary for the refreſhment of Nature, was devoted to the moſt valuable purpoſes. Totus divinis operibus intentus, aut eruditioni, quâ præcellebat, aut prædicationi, quâ immotus erat, aut orationi, quâ devotus, aut ſcripturæ ſacræ, quâ profundus, ſedulus vacabat; adeo ut præter naturalis neceſſitatis aut quietis horas, nullum ſibi aut vix temporis ſpatium relinqueret otioſum.

[C] Partly confirmed by another writer, who was his ſcholar.] This writer is William de Thoco or Toco, Prior of the Convent of preaching Friars at Beneventum, who was deputed by that order to ſollicit St. Thomas's canonization, and wrote a long account of his life (16). He tells in his xth Chapter N°. LIX, that as he was about to receive the Sacrament, he ſaid theſe words; "I receive thee as the price of the "redemption of my ſoul; for the love of thee I have "ſtudied, watched, and laboured; I have preach-"ed and taught thee; I have never advanc'd any "thing contrary to thee, and I am not obſtinate in "my own ſentiments. But if I have ſaid any thing "amiſs with regard to this ſacrament, I leave the "whole to the correction of the holy Roman Church, "in whoſe obedience I am now going to leave this "life." Et præmiſſis aliquibus devotis verbis, ſumenda ſacramentum prædixit; Sumo te in pretium redemptionis animæ meæ, pro cujus amore ſtudui, vigilavi, & laboravi, te prædicavi & docui, nihil unquam contra te dixi, nec ſum pertinax in ſenſu meo. Sed ſi quid malè dixi de hoc ſacramento, totum relinquo correctioni ſanctæ Romanæ Eccleſiæ, in cujus obedientiâ nunc tranſeo ex hac vitâ. Oudin (17) ſuſpects the truth of this ſtory, and obſerves, that William de Thoco might perhaps have been credited in relating it, if he had been preſent with St. Thomas when he died; but he did not compile the account of his life till fifty years afterwards, and then endeavoured to write in a rhetorical manner, and conſidered rather what might be ſaid, than the reality of the facts, which he relates.

(16) See Oudin, Col. 256, and 269.

(17) Col. 256.

[D] Sixtus Senenſis and other writers give him a noble character.] He tells us (18), that St. Thomas approached ſo nearly to St. Auſtin in the knowledge of true Divinity, and penetrated ſo deeply into the moſt abſtruſe ſenſe of that father, that, agreeably to the Pythagorean Metempſychoſis, it was a common expreſſion among all the men of learning, that St. Auſtin's ſoul had tranſmigrated into St. Thomas Aquinas. In ſacris ſinceriori Theologiæ ſtudiis ita ſapientiſſimo Auguſtino proximus inceſſit, atque ita mentem ejus & omnes reconditos ſenſus introſpexit, exhauſitque, ut juxta Pythagoræ Metempſychoſin communi omnium doctiſſimorum adagio jactatum ſit, Auguſtini animam migraſſe in Thomam. The reader may ſee many other encomiums upon him in Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Cenſura celebriorum Autorum. Julius Nigronius the Jeſuit, in the collection of his orations printed at Doway in 1614, has one intitled, De imagine Dei in homine, & laudibus S. Thomæ Aquinatis; i. e. "Of the image of God in Man, with an "elogium upon St. Thomas Aquinas." wherein he informs us, that Albertus Magnus, under whom he had ſtudied, ſoon obſerved the marks of a great genius in Aquinas, while he was under his care; and when St. Thomas's ſchool-fellows uſed to ridicule him on account of his ſilence, and gave him the title of the dumb ox, bos mutus, Albertus ſaid, that it was true, he was a dumb ox, but that he would ſome time or other low ſo loudly, that all the world ſhould reſound with the noiſe of it. Eſt quidem, inquit, bos mutus, ſed tantum edet aliquando mugitum, ut eo terrarum orbis reſonet univerſus (19). Olearius informs us (20), that ſome writers have affirmed, that there came a voice from Heaven to that purpoſe: In ſcholis condiſcipulis ridiculum fuiſſe, & bovem, eo quod ſemper taceret, ac tantummodo audiret, appellatum, cælicâ vero, de edendo hujus bovis per totum orbem mugitu, voce notatum, vide Dorſchei Epiſt. dedicat. ſuper Thom. Confeſſ. Fidei.

(18) Biblioth. lib. 4. pag. 308. apud Cave, pag. 636.

(19) Jul. Nigroni Orat. 22. n. 24. pag. 686.

(20) Biblioth. Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. p. 204. edit. Jenæ 1710.

[E] Father Rapin repreſents him as the great improver of ſchool divinity.] He tells us in his Compariſon between Plato and Ariſtotle, chap. V. that tho' Ariſtotle's works had been condemned in a council held at Paris in 1209, and were ordered to be burnt, and the reading of them prohibited upon pain of excommunication, yet there were in that city three of the greateſt Divines of that time, who began to honour him with their works and commentaries, Alexander Hales, Albertus Magnus, and St. Thomas Aquinas, ſcholar of the latter. S. John Damaſcenus had firſt open'd the way to them; for having made a very exact abridgment of the logic and ethics of Ariſtotle, he formed an excellent ſcheme of divinity in his four books of the Orthodox Faith. It was upon this model that Peter Lombard collected the opinions of the Fathers in Divinity, near 400 years after St. John Damaſcenus, in his book of ſentences; a work, which St. Thomas brought to the utmoſt perfection by following ſo well that noble original, of which Damaſcenus and the maſter of the Sentences had the firſt pattern from Ariſtotle. But St. Thomas undertook to follow their ſteps without obſerving their method; for he took a very particular way of his own, by which he became the firſt founder of the ſcholaſtics, who were afterwards ſo much in vogue, and which he very probably had at firſt from the Arabians. Rapin obſerves, that he does not venture to affirm this abſolutely, but only ſubmits it as a conjecture to the judgment of the learned. When St. Thomas Aquinas was born, continues that critic, it was about 400 years ſince the Arabians had been the only men of learning, who ſtudied Philoſophy, while it was not above 100 years ſince the ſtudy of literature had been revived in Europe. Thoſe people, whoſe Empire was as great as that of the Romans, at leaſt for the extent of their conqueſts, which reach'd from the Indies to Spain, impreſſed their genius and manners, not only upon their own ſubjects, but likewiſe upon all nations, with whom they had any commerce, that is, over all Europe. While their ſtudies were confined to their religion, and the Mathematicks and Philoſophy, without any regard to eloquence, or any of the politer arts, painting and ſculpture being prohibited them by their law; it is no wonder that they made ſo great a progreſs in Metaphyſics, Logic, and Phyſic. So that after three hundred years employed in the explication of Ariſtotle, they made that ſtudy and their commentaries neceſſary to the Chriſtians, who began to apply themſelves to learning in the Weſt, upon

(g) Oudin, Col. 256.
(b) P. 38. in the Compleat Hiſt. of England, vol. 2. London 1706.

caſioned by the barbarity of the age in which he lived (g). The Lord Herbert of Cherbury in his Life and Reign of King Henry VIII (b) tells us, that one of the principal reaſons which induced that King to write againſt Martin Luther, was, that the latter had ſpoken upon the revival of it about the end of the XIIth century, when Bagdat was taken by the Tartars. The Arabians being the only men of letters at that time, and having gained a great authority in the ſciences, had eſtabliſhed their manner of teaching in the ſchools. St. Thomas finding no other method, took them for his guide, and was afterwards followed by the ſcholaſticks. By this means thoſe barbarous terms, which had been made uſe of in the former Philoſophy without any ſcruple, were taken from Avicenna and the other Arabians, to whom they were very familiar and intelligible, and were introduced into the Latin tongue, which made an extravagant jargon. In this manner Philoſophy was corrupted by the commerce with thoſe, who were then maſters of it. Rapin obſerves likewiſe, that tho' St. Thomas had known any other manner of teaching Philoſophy, yet there was ſome reaſon for him to follow the Arabians in their particular ſcheme and method, in order to confound their pride, and to ſhew them, that the Chriſtian religion might eaſily be defended from their calumnies, even in their own way of teaching and following Ariſtotle, to whom they were ſo prodigiouſly attach'd.

It may not be improper here to give the reader an account of the origin and progreſs of School-Divinity, which owes ſo much to our Author. Dr. Cave has traced this very accurately in his Conſpectus ſæculi ſcholaſtici, in p. 615 of his Hiſtoria Literaria; wherein he obſerves that the School-Divinity, which had been introduced in the twelfth Century, received great improvements, and was univerſally followed in the thirteenth. The Chriſtian doctrines in the firſt Ages of the Goſpel were delivered in a clear and perſpicuous manner; and no ſubtle methods of diſpute were made uſe of but in oppoſition to the Pagans and Hereticks. The Catechumens were inſtructed in a ſhort Confeſſion of Faith, which contained the chief Articles of Religion, and was more fully explained in eaſy and obvious diſcourſes addreſſed to them. Of this kind are the Catecheſes ad Illuminatos of St. Cyril of Jeruſalem, and St. Gregory Nyſſen's Sermones Catechetici. The uſual Homilies to the people were an explication of ſome portion of Scripture, or an inforcement of ſome moral doctrine. But this plain and ſimple method of inſtruction fell afterwards into neglect, and a more ſubtle one was ſubſtituted in the room of it; as appears from the works of the pretended Dionyſius the Areopagite, which were forged in the fourth, or fifth, or ſixth Century. About the middle of the eighth Century John Damaſcenus was the firſt writer among the Greeks, who reduced Divinity to a more exact method, and divided its particular doctrines into their proper heads, in his four books concerning the orthodox Faith. In the Latin Church we find no writer attempted this deſign before Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury the Antagoniſt of Berengarius, who flouriſhed about the year 1070, and is ſaid to have put Divinity in a new form, tho' it is difficult to perceive this from thoſe works of his, which are now extant. In the beginning of the following Century Peter Abelard publiſhed three books of an Introduction to Divinity; by the aſſiſtance of which Peter Lombard about the middle of that Age compiled his four books of Sentences (from whence he is ſtiled the Maſter of Sentences) from the writings of the Fathers, and eſpecially of St. Auſtin. And now Divinity began to aſſume an entirely new form, and was reſolved into an infinite number of queſtions, which were debated in the moſt ſubtle manner imaginable. Lombard was followed in this by a variety of Authors, as Alexander Hales, Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, Albertus Magnus, and many others; and they were afterwards divided into different parties and ſects, as the Nominals and Reals, the Thomiſts and Scotiſts, the Sententiarians and Quodlibetarians, who had prodigious conteſts with each other. At length the ſimple and pure doctrine of the primitive Chriſtians being neglected, there was ſcarce any thing ſtudied but School-Divinity; for the improvement of which the Ariſtotelian Philoſophy was called in to aſſiſt; and this Philoſophy was not learned from the Greek originals, but collected from the corrupt accounts of the Arabians, and from tranſlations which were ill performed, and worſe underſtood. However this Philoſophy was introduced into the Divinity of that Age; and Ariſtotle held the chair of St. Paul for ſeveral Ages. How great a ſupport this School-Divinity was to many of the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome, is obvious to every perſon. The authority of the Pope was likewiſe greatly inlarged by the Canon-Law, which had its origin about that time, and was promoted in the ſame manner. Quantum ad plura Romanæ Eccleſiæ placita ſtabilienda contulerit nova hæc Scholaſtica Theologia, cæcus ſit oportet, qui non videt. Certè non minus quam Majeſtatis Pontificiæ auctoritatem longe lateque promoverit Jus Canonicum eodem ferè tempore natum, iiſdemque incrementis auctum (21). But let us ſee here the judgment of Mr. Du Pin, a candid Roman Catholick, upon the writers of the thirteenth Century, and his account of the riſe of School-Divinity. He informs us (22), that the moſt conſiderable Writers of that Age are the Commentators upon Peter Lombard, whoſe book of Sentences was become the only Divinity, which was taught and learned in the Schools. But inſtead of following his method, and determining the queſtions which he had propoſed, by paſſages from the Fathers, they only made uſe of philoſophical principles and metaphyſical ſubtleties. They were not ſatisfied with explaining the text of his work, but they ſelected only the queſtions, and treated them in a quite different manner. So that what was called a Commentary was very far from deſerving that title, ſince it was a quite different work. They added likewiſe a great many other queſtions to thoſe, which he had propounded, and they inſerted them in their Commentaries upon his books, and handled them in diſtinct works, which were very often intitled Quodlibetical Queſtions. Some Divines thinking themſelves too much confined by the plan of the Maſter of Sentences, and being willing to take a greater ſcope, neglected his method, and formed to themſelves another in their writings, to which they gave the title of the ſum of Divinity. In theſe works they diſcuſſed an infinite number of theological or philoſophical queſtions, propoſed the arguments on both ſides, and determined them generally by philoſophical reaſonings and analogy; making uſe very often of the authority of Ariſtotle, and ſometimes of that of the Fathers, the paſſages from whom they extracted from Peter Lombard, Gratian, or the common Gloſs; ſo that their quotations were frequently not exact, becauſe they were taken upon the credit of others, without having recourſe to the originals, and becauſe theſe Writers wanted judgment and a true critical taſte. The ſtyle of theſe books is generally dry and barbarous, and almoſt always attended with obſcurity. Their manner of preaching likewiſe had very much of this ſcholaſtick method. Their Sermons were full of diviſions, diſtinctions, and low compariſons. It was very rare to find any points of morality unfolded and explained in their proper extent, or eſtabliſhed upon ſolid principles, and urged with eloquence and ſpirit. They contented themſelves with propoſing and explaining them in the common manner, and confirming them by ſome paſſages of Scripture, which were applied in a different ſenſe from the natural and true one. The Commentaries upon the Scripture were of two kinds; the one intitled Poſtills were ſhort notes, in which there was very often only a grammatical explanation of the words, and nothing but the more minute Circumſtances inſiſted on; the other were more extenſive, and conſiſted of allegories and myſtical thoughts. There are ſome works of Devotion, which tho' written with great ſimplicity, have ſomething of ſolidity in them. But there are others, which are compoſed in ſo myſtical a ſtyle, that they are abſolutely unintelligible. The Authors who have written upon the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, employed themſelves only in ſeeking or inventing myſtical reaſons, which are the whole ſubject of their works. The Collections of and Commentaries upon the Decretals of the Popes engaged the application of thoſe,

(21) Cave, pag. 615, 616.

(22) Biblioth. tom. 10. cap. 4. pag. 57, 58. edit. Paris 1702.

ſpoken contemptuouſly of Aquinas. His authority has always been of great importance in the ſchools of the Roman Catholics; however it was not abſolutely deciſive in points of Divinity, but it has been lawful to recede from his opinions, as Dermicius Thaddæi (i) endeavours to prove in oppoſition to Bzovius. His chaſtity and other virtues were very remarkable

(i) In Nitelâ Franciſc. Relig. pag. 35, &c. apud Cave, ubi ſupra.

thoſe, who ſtudied Canon-Law. They found in this labyrinth, as Mr. Du Pin expreſſes it (23), ſufficient matter to employ their pen, and to compile very large works. Ancient Hiſtory and eſpecially that of the Church was extremely neglected in this Age. However ſome Authors undertook to give abridgments and indigeſted collections of an univerſal Hiſtory. Many of them wrote particular Chronicles of their churches and monaſteries, in which they introduced facts that did not deſerve to be mentioned. Others wrote the Hiſtory of the Croiſades of that time, or Relations of Voyages to the Holy Land; and of all the Hiſtorians of that age theſe latter are leaſt to be neglected. The Lives of Saints are rather Panegyricks upon them than hiſtorical Relations. We ſhall not inſiſt upon the prodigious number of Commentaries upon the books of Ariſtotle, and many other philoſophical writings, in which, as Mr. Du Pin obſerves, the greateſt men of that Age employed their time and labour to very little purpoſe. Theſe performances are now entirely neglected, and only to be found in the Libraries of old Monaſteries. There was a warm diſpute ſome years ago between two Members of the Romiſh Church concerning School-Divinity, an account of which may not be improper under this article. Father de Benedictis publick Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Jeſuits College at Naples, publiſhed in 1688 four volumes of Peripatetic Philoſophy, in which he undertook to eſtabliſh the principles of Ariſtotle. This work of his being univerſally exploded, he wrote an abuſive piece, intitled Lettere Apologetiche, or Apologetical Letters, under the feigned name of Benedetto Aletino. Conſtantino Grimaldi therefore thought himſelf obliged to anſwer this Libel, and publiſhed his firſt Anſwer in 1699, and the two others in 1702 and 1703. Aletino replied to the firſt Anſwer in 1703, and to the third in 1705. Aletino's firſt Reply was intitled Difeſa della Scholaſtica Teologia, or A Defence of School-Divinity; and the ſecond, Difeſa della terza Lettera di Benedetto Aletino, or, A Defence of Benedetto Aletino's third Letter. With regard to Mr. Grimaldi's ſecond anſwer, containing the many groſs errors which are to be met with in Ariſtotle's works, Aletino thought fit not to reply, ſuch errors being undeniable. Mr. Grimaldi's anſwer to the Apologetical Letters was received not only in Naples, but in all the Univerſities of Italy with uncommon applauſe. He was actually preparing an anſwer to Aletino's replies, but diſcontinued his deſign upon the news of his adverſary's death. However, in the ſecond edition of his book publiſhed at Lucca 1725, in eight volumes in 4to, under the title of Diſcuſſioni Iſtoriche, Teologiche, e Filoſofiche di Conſtantino Grimaldi, fatte per occaſione della Riſpoſta alle Lettere Apologetiche di Benedetto Aletino, &c. he has taken care to anſwer the chief difficulties which they contain. This gave occaſion to the Jeſuits to repreſent the author to Pope Benedict XIII, and to Cardinal d'Althan the Viceroy of Naples as an Heretick, and his work as containing doctrines contrary to the purity of the faith. Upon this the Pope by a particular Bull prohibited the reading, vending, or keeping of it under pain of excommunication, and the Cardinal cauſed all the copies which were found at the Author's houſe to be thrown into the Sea. Some copies however were not long after driven aſhore by a ſtorm, and falling into good hands were preſerved. The Jeſuits likewiſe entered an action againſt Mr. Grimaldi as an heretick and ſower of heretical opinions, and would have compleated his ruin, having the Cardinal on their ſide, if he had not as a Senator and a Magiſtrate appealed to the Emperor, who ordered the cauſe to be removed to one of the Courts of Vienna (24). In the firſt volume he anſwers the firſt of Benedetto Aletino's Apologetic Letters. The main deſign of that Letter was to convince the world, that the modern Philoſophers pay no manner of deference to, nay, ſhew on all occaſions the utmoſt contempt for School Divinity, which the Jeſuit extols as the only weapon that can be uſed with any ſucceſs againſt thoſe who deny or impugn the myſteries of the Catholick Church. To this charge Mr. Grimaldi anſwers, that the deſpiſing of what they call Scholaſtic Divinity, is ſo far from being any reproach to the modern Philoſophers, that on the contrary they deſerve upon that very account to be highly commended by all men of ſenſe. He endeavours to prove this aſſertion, 1. By enquiring into the firſt origin of School Divinity, and ſhewing that the Apoſtles and primitive Doctors of the Church were altogether ſtrangers to that method of teaching the myſteries of the Chriſtian religion, which is now uſed in the ſchools, and was borrowed about the middle of the eleventh Century from the Pagan Philoſophers. 2. He ſhews, that moſt of the hereſies, ſchiſms, and inteſtine diſſenſions, which have in ſo cruel a manner rent the church, were entirely owing to the impertinent and abſurd diſtinctions and quibbles of the Schoolmen. 3. He enumerates the many evils which are daily occaſioned by the School Divinity, which with its vain and chimerical ſpeculations calls in queſtion the plaineſt truths, wreſts the true meaning of the holy Scriptures, gives riſe and even ſome appearance of truth to the moſt ridiculous and monſtrous opinions, occaſions and foments continual diſputes among the members of one and the ſame church, and keeps men otherwiſe of good parts buſied all their life-time in running after trifles. 4. He aſcribes to it the decay of Chriſtian piety, and the loſs of that ſimplicity and deference to the Scripture, which was ſo commendable in the primitive Chriſtians. 5. He ſhews that School-Divinity is of no uſe to convince Hereticks, to inſtruct the Faithful, or to give any account of the myſteries of the Chriſtian belief. 6. He obſerves what trifling, irreverent, and ſcandalous queſtions have been ſtarted by St. Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus, and other Scholaſticks of great note. Such are, for inſtance, the following: Quare Chriſtus non fuerit hermaphroditus: Quare non aſſumpſit fœmineum ſexum (25): Utrum eſſent excrementa in paradiſo (26): Utrum ſancti reſurgent cum inteſtinis (27): Utrum Chriſtus cum felle & ipſius receptaculo à mortuis ſurrexerit (28): Albertus Magnus (29) employs no leſs than twenty four chapters in diſcuſſing the following queſtions, which ſtill afford great matter of debate to the Scholaſtics; Whether the Angel Gabriel appeared to the Virgin Mary in the ſhape of a Serpent, of a Dove, of a Man, or of a Woman? Did he ſeem to be young or old? In what dreſs was he? Was his garment white, or of two colours? Was his linnen clean or foul? When did he appear? In the morning, at noon, or in the evening? What was the colour of the Virgin Mary's hair? Was ſhe acquainted with the mechanick and liberal Arts? Had ſhe any skill in Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, Muſic, Aſtronomy, &c.? Had ſhe thorough knowledge of the Book of Sentences (which was compoſed twelve hundred years after her death) and of all the chapters it contains? St. Antoninus, another Schoolman of great eminence, propoſes the following queſtions (30): Utrum ſi Deipara fuiſſet vir, potuiſſet eſſe naturalis parens Chriſti: Utrum Maria gravida ſedente, Chriſtus ſederet, atque ipſa cubante cubaret. To theſe Mr. Grimaldi adds a great many other no leſs, if not more, impertinent queſtions, which the modern Divines treat of in the ſchools; ſuch are theſe: Utrum Verbum potuit hypoſtaticè uniri naturæ irrationali, putà Equi, Aſini, &c. Utrum potuit uniri hypoſtaticè naturæ diabolicæ, naturæ humanæ damnatæ, peccato, &c. In quo caſu veræ eſſent hæ propoſitiones, Deus eſt Equus, Aſinus, Diabolus, Damnatus, Peccatum, &c. Utrum Chriſtus reſurgendo reſumpſit præputium; ſi porro reſumpſit, quo pacto, quove modo ſervatur in terris? This relick is lodged in the church of St. John Lateran at Rome, and is yearly expoſed in Eaſter-week to publick adoration. But what moſt of all alarmed both the Jeſuits and the Court of Rome, was the anſwer which he gave to Benedetto Aletino, where that Jeſuit extols the Scholaſtic Divinity, and prefers it to any other faculty, on account of the value which the Popes have always ſhewn for it; ſince they, though inſpired by the Holy Ghoſt, never come to

(23) Pag. 58.

(24) See the Hiſtoria Literaria, or an exact and early account of the moſt valuable Books, &c. vol. 2. num. 12. Art. 55. pag. 526, & ſeq.

(25) S. Thomas in 3 diſtinctione 12. qu. 3. art. 1. Diſput. 1.

(26) Prima Part. qu. 98. & in 3 Geneſ.

(27) In 4 diſtinct. 44.

(28) Tertia Part. qu. 54. art. 2.

(29) In Lib. ſuper Miſſus eſt.

(30) In 4 Part. tit. 15.

markable [F]. He was canonized by Pope John XXII in the year 1323; and Pius V, who was of the ſame Order with him, gave him in 1567 the title of the Fifth Doctor of the Church, and appointed his Feſtival to be kept with the ſame ſolemnity as thoſe of the other four Doctors (k).

(k) Oudin, Col. 255.

to any deciſion in matters of faith without conſulting firſt the Schoolmen, whoſe opinions they commonly find entirely agreeable to the inſpirations of the Holy Ghoſt. To this Mr. Grimaldi anſwers, that ſome Popes indeed have adviſed with the Schoolmen; but that every good Catholick has great reaſon to wiſh they had never hearkened to their ſpeculations. He produces here ſeveral inſtances of Popes, who, notwithſtanding their boaſted infallibility, have erred, and taught not only falſe, but heretical opinions, being miſled by the Scholaſtics.

[F] His chaſtity and other virtues were very remarkable.] Nigronius in his oration upon St. Thomas quoted above, tells us (31), that he preſerved himſelf pure and untainted from the moſt diſtant approaches to incontinence or immodeſty amidſt all the heat and temptations of youth; and that when he was ſollicited by a woman of ill character, who employed all the arts imaginable to gain the aſcendant over his virtue, at a time when there was all the opportunity of concealment, he continued inflexible to the power of her charms; and when ſhe ſtill urged him in the moſt alluring manner to an unlawful gratification, he took up a brand out of the fire, and obliged her to leave his chamber. The learned reader will not perhaps be diſpleaſed to ſee this ſtory repreſented in the pompous language of our orator. Nam de virginali caſtitate nemo dubitat in eo, qui quâ ætate libidinis æſtus animum vehementius ad flagitia ſuccendit, & ingenita medullis voluptas ſenſus omnes appetitumque titillat; quo tempore fœmina petulans & procax habitu & affectu meretricio, Lenociniis oculorum, geſtuum illecebris, verborum blanditiis ad molliendum duriſſimum & conſtantiſſimum quemque hominem comparatis, adoleſcentulum aggreſſa, virginitatem ejus expugnatura, machinam blandiſſimæ perſuaſionis atque impuriſſimæ provocationis, ex opportunitate temporis, ſolitudine loci, jucundiſſimæ rei præſentia, validiſſimam admovebat; oppugnatus fortiter reſtitit; nihil labans ad impetum, nihil vacillans, ut ſcopulus immiſſis è ſævâ tempeſtate fluctibus verberatus, immobilis quoad pugnatum eſt, atque invictus ſtetit; tum generoſo animo non invictus modo, ſed etiam victor, in hoſtem convertens prælium, ad majorem ſui laudem, pro armis arrepto de cinctibus foci ſemiuſtulato ligno meretriculam conſcientiâ ſceleris confuſam, infelici præter opinionem eventu perturbatam, adoleſcentis modeſtiſſimi pudore conſtantiaque perterritam, abjectam, victam è cubiculo abegit, fugavit, ejecit. His modeſty was no leſs eminent, for he was not the leaſt elated in his opinion of himſelf notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of his genius, the nobility of his deſcent, and the reputation which he had for profound learning. He refus'd a great many opulent preferments in the church, which were offered him. He behaved with the utmoſt civility to the moſt inconſiderable perſons of his own order, and paid the utmoſt deference to his ſuperiors. And Nigronius the Jeſuit quoted above, extols him highly for that perfect obedience, which he tells us St. Bonaventure, Umbert, Anthony, Laurence, and Ignatius recommend ſo much after the antient Fathers, St. Jerom, Caſſian, Climacus, Gregory, Dorotheus, and Bernard, and repreſent under all the ſtrong terms of an unreſerved blind obedience: perfectioris illius obedientiæ, quam poſt veteres ſanctos patres Hieronymum, Caſſianum, Climacum, Gregorium, Dorotheum, Bernardum, Bonaventura, Umbertus, Antonius, Laurentius, Ignatius tantopere commendant, atque injudicatam, indiſcretam, indiſcuſſam & cæcam appellant, exempla daret interdum (32). He was indefatigable in his application to learning, by which he gained ſo extenſive a knowledge, that he was extremely converſant not only in the Scriptures and Philoſophy, but even in the Orators, Divines, and Fathers, and in ſhort in all the beſt authors in every branch of Literature (33). Nigronius informs us (34), that his countenance ſeem'd to be ſurrounded with rays of light; that a ſtar ſhone for ſome time over his head; and that a comet appeared before his death, which vaniſhed as ſoon as he expired. A viventis Thomæ vultu radii viſi ſunt elucere; ſtella ſuper caput aliquandiu ſplenduit; cometes ante mortem apparuit, qui ſtatim atque eſt mortuus evanuit.

(51) N. 25. pag. 686, 687.

(32) Idem, N. 26. p. 689.

(33) Idem, pag. 690.

(34) Idem, pag. 691.

T.

☞ARABELLA STUART. The ſtory of this Lady being commonly known, we ſhould not have given an article of her in this place, were it not for certain particulars relating to her, and to the hiſtory of England, which are not generally obſerved. She was daughter to Charles Stuart, younger brother to King James the Firſt's father, by Elizabeth Cavendiſh (a). In the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, the Pope (b) formed a deſign to raiſe Arabella to the throne of England [A], by marrying her to Cardinal

(a) Arthur Wilſon's Life of K. James, in the 2d vol. of the Compleat Hiſtory of England, pag. 702.

(b) Clement VIII.

[A] The Pope formed a deſign to raiſe Arabella to the throne of England.] None of the writers of the Hiſtory of England, not even Rapin, take notice of this particular: and I doubt whether it can be found any where but in the Letters of Cardinal d'Oſſat. But as he writes to the King of France (1), there is no reaſon to ſuſpect the truth of it. Here follows what he ſays (2): "The Pope thought firſt of the Duke of Parma, "as the eldeſt of the family, and related to himſelf. "His Holineſs will make intereſt firſt and only for "that Duke, if the Kingdom of England can be obtained without the means of Arabella. But if after "the deceaſe of the Queen, a party ſhould be formed "in favour of Arabella in England, and to render "the conqueſt of that Kingdom eaſier, it be found "neceſſary to join his forces to thoſe of that Lady, "the Pope would prefer Cardinal Farneſe, to the "Duke who was married; whereas the Cardinal be"ing a batchelor might be married to the Lady Ara"bella: and they thus uniting their intereſt would "ſooner and eaſier compaſs their deſign. And as in "every thing there muſt be ſome ſhew of juſtice, "it is pretended, that theſe two Princes are by their "mother's ſide deſcended from the true and lawful "Kings of England (3), and that for this reaſon they "have ſome right to the Crown of England; and I "think that without this pretence the Pope would "have had no thoughts of procuring that Crown "to them. Here your Majeſty will be pleaſed to "remember, that as early as the year 1591 there was "a book printed in Engliſh, and wrote by one "Pearſon *, an Engliſh Jeſuit, under the direction of "the Spaniards, which was diſpers'd thro' England, and "the Low Countries, and every where elſe, where they "thought it would be of ſervice. The intent of that "book was to perſuade the world, that for ſeveral "hundred years paſt there had been no lawful King or "Queen in England, the Author excluding them all "either as guilty of high treaſon, or diſinherited, or "baſtards, or hereticks, or for ſome other reaſon like "theſe. He alſo excluded of courſe all thoſe of the "royal blood, who were then living, all the near re"lations of the Queen, of the King of Scotland and "Arabella; and the Earls of Derby, Hertford, "Haſtings, &c. This he did to ſhew that the Crown "of England was devolved on the King of Spain "and his children." But as it was not probable that the other Princes of Europe ſhould connive at the ambitious deſigns of the King of Spain, d'Oſſat ſhews, that this King, ſeeing he could not ſucceed for himſelf, would willingly aſſiſt the Houſe of Farneſe to take poſſeſſion of the Crown of England; and to prove that there were great hopes of ſucceſs, he obſerves that his Holineſs had taken ſeveral ſteps, to ſupport the intereſt of Popery in this Kingdom. But by God's Providence, all the policy of the Court of Rome, and of the Spaniards was happily diſconcerted by the event (4). Upon which d'Oſſat ſays very juſtly (5): That

(1) Henry IV.

(2) Letter 299. pag. 45, &c.

(3) The Duke of Parma, and the Cardinal his brother, grounded their right to the ſucceſſion of England on their being deſcended from the daughter of a baſtard of King Edward IV. Embaſſade de Beaumont. tom. 2.

* The Cardinal means Father, Parſons.

(4) The Proclamation of King James.

(5) Tom. 5. Letter 342. p. 256.

Cardinal Farneſe, brother of the Duke of Parma (c). King Henry IV of France ſeemed inclined to enter into this project, becauſe he was apprehenſive leſt England ſhould become too powerful, if it was united with Scotland under the ſame King [B]. After the death of Queen Elizabeth ſome Engliſh Lords alſo concerted a ſcheme to make Arabella Queen of England, becauſe, ſays Thuanus (d), they were afraid leſt King James, being a foreigner, ſhould prefer the Scots before them, and confer all the poſts of honour and profit upon the former. They therefore conſpired to kill the King, and to crown Arabella. But this conſpiracy being detected, ſome of thoſe who were concerned in it, were capitally puniſhed, and the reſt obtained the King's pardon or a reprieve. This was perhaps the true reaſon why Arabella was confined to her houſe, though Arthur Wilſon (e) ſays, it was becauſe ſhe had been ſecretly married to Sir William Seymour [C] ſon to the Lord Beauchamp, and grandchild to Edward Earl of Hertford. Sir William, on account of the marriage, was committed to the Tower, and Arabella confined to her houſe at Highgate. But after they had ſuffered impriſonment for ſome time, they concluded to eſcape beyond Sea together, which proved very unfortunate to Arabella [D], who was taken and committed to the Tower, where ſhe died on the 17th of September 1615 (f). It was ſuſpected ſhe had been poiſoned [E]. After her death Sir William Seymour obtained leave to return home, and married the Lady Frances, daughter to the Earl of Eſſex (g).

(c) Lettres du Cardinal d'Oſſat tom 3. Letter 299. p. 45. edit. Amſt. 1732.

(d) Hiſt. l. 129. tom. 5. edit. 1620. p. 1056. fol.

(e) Ubi ſupra.

(f) Rapin, Hiſt. d'Angl. tom. 7. p. 102. Wilſon, ubi ſupra, places her death under the year 1616.

(g) Wilſon, ubi ſupra, p. 703.

That "the people of this Iſland have ſhewn that they "knew how to ſettle their own affairs ſecurely and with "diſpatch; by which the foreigners (6) have been "very much diſappointed in their hopes and deſigns; "and the Spaniards who are vexed at it more than "any body elſe, will be the moſt forward to congratu"late the King of Scotland."

(6) He means the Spaniards, the Pope, and the Houſe of Farneſe.

[B] Henry IV was apprehenſive leſt England ſhould become too powerful, if it was united with Scotland.] Henry had a great mind to prevent King James from obtaining the Crown of England, and for that reaſon he gave ſecret penſions to ſeveral perſons of Queen Elizabeth's Court (7). Cardinal d'Oſſat obſerves (8), that it would not be for the intereſt of France that the Kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhould be united under the ſame King. For, ſays he, ſince the Kings of England alone have formerly harraſſed France with greater terror and reſolution a longer time than any other King has done, what ſhould we not have to fear if to the power of England was added that of Scotland? Such an union is more formidable than ever in the perſon of the preſent King (James), ſince he is allied to one of the moſt potent Kings of the North (9); and beſides, he is nearly related to the Princes of Lorrain, who have cauſed lately ſo much trouble to our Kings, and occaſioned ſo much miſery and ſo many misfortunes to France, ſeeing that family is not yet extinct and is ſtill very powerful in the Kingdom (10).

(7) Ambaſſade de Beaumont, apud Oſſat, tom. 2. Lett. 49. pag. 58. note 11.

(8) Ib. in Textu.

(9) The King of Denmark, whoſe ſiſter he had married.

(10) He ſpeaks of the famous League, of which the Duke of Guiſe, a Prince of the Houſe of Lorrain, was the Head.

[C] She had been ſecretly married to William Seymour.] This is what Arthur Wilſon tells us, whoſe account is ſo particular on this occaſion, that there is no reaſon to doubt of it. Yet Thuanus a contemporary Author ſays (11), 1. that Arabella was married to the ſon of the Earl of Northumberland. 2. He places her marriage under Queen Elizabeth. Theſe two circumſtances cannot poſſibly be reconciled with Wilſon's account. Here follow Thuanus's own words; they contain alſo the proof of what we have ſaid in the text of this article (12), Angli quidam Proceres, & alii ab Elizabetha ad honores provecti, ſeu gratia ſeu meritis, cum viderent novum Regem è Scotia quaſi alienigenam cum ſuis Scotis venientem, ſperatas dignitates ereptum ſibi iri illa gentis mutatione indignati, conſilium inter ſe cœperant regis interficiendi, quo facto Arbelam, quæ olim ſub Elizabetha ob clandeſtinas cum Northumbrii Comitis filio nuptias in carcerem conjecta fuerat, & poſtea libertati reſtituta, funerali Pompæ Reginæ interfuerat, in Reginam ſumpturi erant, & cum bona Philippi gratia uxorem Sabaudiæ Duci daturi. i. e. "Some Engliſh Lords, and other perſons, on "whom Elizabeth had conferred honours either out "of favour or as a reward for their ſervices, ſeeing a "new King and a foreigner coming from Scotland, "and fearing that by this change they ſhould be de"prived of theſe dignities, which they expected, re"ſolved amongſt themſelves to kill the King. After "which Arabella, who during the reign of Queen "Elizabeth had been ſecretly married to the ſon "of the Earl of Northumberland, and was for that "reaſon put into priſon, and had been ſince ſet at "liberty, and was preſent at the Queen's funeral, was to be made Queen, and to be married "to the Duke of Savoy with the conſent of Philip" III King of Spain. Here we find another particular, namely, that Arabella was to be married to the Duke of Savoy with the King of Spain's conſent. This does not agree with what Cardinal d'Oſſat wrote to the King of France; but perhaps Thuanus was miſtaken, and wrote the Duke of Savoy inſtead of Cardinal Farneſe. Such differences and inconſiſtencies that we find in the account of contemporary writers, very much favour the ſyſtem of thoſe, who maintain that we muſt admit an hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm; ſince it is almoſt impoſſible to ſift out the truth amongſt the contradictory accounts of Hiſtorians. Mr. Amelot alſo differs from Thuanus with regard to the reaſons he aſſigns for the conſpiracy of the Engliſh Lords. He tells (13), "That in the Lady Arabella's party were "all thoſe Engliſh Lords, who had been the Judges "of Queen Mary, and who fearing, leſt the King "of Scotland her ſon ſhould revenge her death upon "them, if ever he acceded to the Crown of England, "intended to marry Arabella with the Earl of Hert"ford, to exclude King James from the ſucceſſion." This is probable enough, tho' Amelot quotes no authority for it.

(11) Hiſt. lib. 129. p. 1056.

(12) Quot. (c).

(13) Notes upon Cardinal d'Oſſat. Lett. tom. 5 Lett. 299. p. 45. not. 1.

[D] — Proved very unfortunate to Arabella.] She and her husband had "appointed to meet at a certain "place upon the Thames. Sir William, leaving his "man in his bed, to act his part with the keeper, "got out of the Tower in a diſguiſe, and came to "the place appointed. She dreſſed like a young gal"lant in man's attire followed him from her houſe, "but ſtaying long above the limited time, made him "ſuſpicious of her interception; ſo that he went "away, leaving notice, if ſhe came, that he was "gone away before to Dunkirk. She good Lady "fraught with more fears, and lagging in her "flight, was apprehended and brought back to the "Tower (14)."

(14) Wilſon, ubi ſupra.

[E] It was ſuſpected ſhe had been poiſoned.] Several perſons ſeeing, that the trial of thoſe, who had been concerned in the murther of Overbury, made people talk again of the death of Prince Henry, thought, that Arabella might alſo have been poiſoned (15); ſince as ſhe was nearly and her husband's family at ſome diſtance allied to the Crown, this might eaſily inſpire the King with a ſtate jealouſy againſt her. For, as Wilſon obſerves (16), "ſuch a conjunction (of "her with Seymour) would not be admitted in the "Royal Almanack, ſo dreadful is every apparition, "that comes near Princes titles."

(15) Rapin, tom. 7. p. 102.

(16) Ubi ſupra.

P.

☞ARAGON (BEATRIX OF) was the daughter of Ferdinand I King of Naples and Sicily, who betrothed her, when ſhe was but a child, to the ſon of Marino da Marciano Duke of Seſſa (a). But Ferdinand broke off that match before they were of age age to live together [A]. Beatrix was afterwards married to Matheo Corvino King of Hungary [B], and then to Ladiſlaus brother of the King of Poland, and who by her means became King of Hungary [C]. They lived ten years together; but Beatrix, on account of her age, being leſs agreeable, the King grew weary of her; the principal reaſon of which was perhaps, that he fell in love with Ann of Candale (b), a Lady famous for her beauty, and nearly related to Lewis XII King of France, with whom Ladiſlaus thought it his intereſt to enter into a ſtrict alliance, he therefore petitioned and obtained from Pope Alexander VI a ſentence by which his marriage was diſſolved (c) [D]. Mr. Bayle, who has copied (d) this account from Tomaſo de Tomaſi, alledges it as an inſtance to prove, that thoſe marriages are not always laſting, in which intereſt prevails, and that the great diſproportion of age in the married couple is an obſtacle to the gratification of the natural deſires in either ſex. Yet this is the misfortune of the widows of Kings and Princes, if they will marry again, that they are obliged either to diſgrace themſelves by an unequal match [E], or to marry ſuch perſons, whoſe age does not ſuit with

(a) A city with the title of Dukedom in the Terra di Lavoro in the Kingdom of Naples.

(b) She was the daughter of John de Foix, the ſecond of that name, and firſt couſin to Germain Foix.

(c) Tomaſo Tomaſi, Vie du Duc de Valentinois, p. 288. of the French tranſlation.

(c) Rep. aux Queſt. d'un Provincial, tom. 2. p. 271, &c.

[A] Ferdinand broke off that match, before the young couple were of age to live together.] The kingdom of Naples was at that time troubled by two factions, that of the houſe of Aragon, of which Ferdinand himſelf was, being the natural ſon of Alphonſus King of Aragon and Sicily; and that of the houſe of Anjou. One of the principal heads of this latter faction was the Duke of Seſſa. Ferdinand to amuſe him, and keep him from engaging any conſiderable enterprize, promiſed his daughter to the ſon of that Duke, and even ſent her to him. But as ſoon as the diſturbances of his Kingdom were ſettled, and he had no longer occaſion to fear the Duke, he broke off the match, and ſent for his daughter home (1). Mr. Bayle, from whom we have borrowed this, obſerves in a marginal note (2), that the French tranſlator of Cæſar Borgia's life has committed ſeveral egregious blunders in his verſion of the following paſſage. Era queſta Beatrice figlia di Ferdinandi il vecchio, Rè di Napoli, prima promeſſa in matrimonio all pacciolo figliolo di Marino da Marciano Duca di Seſſa, e poi par la ſconfitta di queſti, e di gli Angioini, ritoltagli e maritata in prime nozze à Mattia Corvino. That is, "This Beatrix was the daughter of Ferdi-" nand the old, King of Naples; ſhe was firſt pro-" miſed by her father to the ſon, yet a child, of " Marino da Marciano, Duke of Seſſa; but after the " defeat of that Duke, and of the Anjouines, her fa-" ther took her back, and married her firſt to Mat-" tia Corvino." The French tranſlator ſays, 1. ſhe was promiſed to the Grandſon of the Duke of Seſſa; 2. He did not underſtand the word ritoltagli, and tranſlates it the taking of that Duke by the Anjouines, which ſuppoſes that he was taken by thoſe of his own party. A ſtrange miſtake! This inſtance and a thouſand more, which could be alledged, ſhew how cautious we muſt be, when we read any tranſlation; ſince tranſlators are apt to commit ſo many errors.

(1) Jovian. Pontanus, Hiſt. Neapol. lib. 5. pag. 679, 686.

(2) Reponſe aux Queſt. d'un Provincial. tom. 2. p. 272.

[B] She was married to Matheo Corvino, and afterwards to Ladiſlaus &c.] Moreri ſays (3) that Corvino divorced her, and that ſhe was afterwards married to Ladiſlaus IV King of Bohemia. Here may be an error of the preſs, IV inſtead of VI, for this Ladiſlaus was the ſixth of that name both amongſt the Kings of Bohemia and thoſe of Hungary. But it does not appear that Corvino divorced his wife Beatrix; nay, it is probable he did not (4). This then is an error of Moreri. Another concerning Beatrix is to be found in his article of Ladiſlaus VI King of Hungary; where he tells us, that Beatrix, the widow of Mattheo Corvino, thought that Ladiſlaus would marry her, and that for this reaſon, ſhe ſupported his party; and then, at the end of the article he tells us, that Ladiſlaus was married to Anne de Foix (5); thus inſinuating that Beatrix was not married to him; tho' he had declared it expreſly in the article of CORVINO. Such is the inaccuracy and inconſiſtency of that Author.

(3) Article MATTHIAS CORVIN.

(4) See the remark [C].

(5) He ſhould have ſaid of Candale.

[C] Ladiſlaus —— by her means became King of Hungary.] This Princeſs (Beatrix) was endowed with ſo many eminent qualities, that by her virtues ſhe gained the hearts of all the Hungarians, and made them ſubmit with pleaſure to the authority of her former husband. This made Maximilian of Auſtria, and Ladiſlaus, two competitors for the Crown of Hungary think, that the beſt method to obtain it, was to marry Beatrix. The lot, or rather her choice fell upon Ladiſlaus, who was inaugurated King of Hungary, at Alba Regalis (6) in the year 1490. If Beatrix had gained the hearts of the Hungarians in ſuch a manner, that for her ſake they willingly obeyed her husband, it is probable, that he would have divorced her, as Moreri pretends.

(6) Tomaſo Tomaſi, ubi ſupra.

[D] A ſentence by which her marriage was diſſolved.] It was at that time ſo eaſy to obtain ſuch a ſentence from the Court of Rome, that Ladiſlaus reſolved to ſue for it; tho' this was a great blemiſh in his character, ſince he thus became guilty of the moſt heinous ingratitude. And as every thing was ſold at Rome for money, the Pope (7), without having any regard to the falſe pretences alledged by Ladiſlaus, nor to the honour and dignity of the Houſe of Aragon, pronounced in a full Conſiſtory a ſentence, by which he declared, that notwithſtanding the anſwers and proteſts of the Embaſſadors of Naples, the marriage of Ladiſlaus and Beatrix was null and void, commanding her to keep a perpetual ſilence, and to pay a fine of twenty five thouſand ducats: as tho' it had been treating her too favourably, to make her a preſent of ſo grievous a ſentence. This had been ſecretly conſented to by the King, who thus employed the dowry of his ſpouſe againſt herſelf, to make her fall a ſacrifice to the cruel treatment of an ungrateful husband, and of a Pope, who inſtead of being the Father of his whole flock, was the wicked Tyrant of the helpleſs and diſtreſſed (8).

(7) The famous Alexander VI.

(8) Tomaſo Tomaſi, ubi ſupra.

[E] The widows of Kings and Princes are often obliged to diſgrace themſelves with an unequal match &c.] Mr. Bayle's reflections upon this ſubject are ſo agreeable, that the reader will undoubtedly be pleaſed to find them here, tho' they may appear ſomewhat like a digreſſion. Mr. Bayle had ſaid (9), that ſeveral Queens had diſgraced themſelves, by marrying, after the death of their firſt husband, a perſon of a much lower rank. Upon which Bayle himſelf ſuppoſes, that the friend to whom he writes, had made the following obſervations. " It was thought very " ſtrange (10), that the widows of Princes ſhould be " treated with ſo much rigour, as tho' they ought to " be of the ſame humour with that King of Mace-" don (11), who would not enter the liſts, except " againſt a King. There are but few crowned Heads, " and it is very difficult for the widow of a King to " marry a King. Muſt they then defraud nature of " her due? And is not St. Paul's maxim (12), It " is better to marry than to burn, a rule for them as " well as for the reſt of mankind?" "But, anſwers " Mr. Bayle (13), this is altering the ſtate of the " queſtion. We don't pretend, that ſuch widow " Queens, who have not the gift of continence, and " cannot find an husband of the ſame rank with the " former, do commit a ſin, if they undermatch them-" ſelves; they are only accuſed of being of a conſti-" tution, which is ſo little commendable, that no " panegyriſt ſhould dare to mention it; nor would " any Poet venture to deſcribe it in an epitaph. " Whereas the contrary diſpoſition, the gift of con-" tinence, the power of reſiſting love, furniſh the " fineſt ſtrokes in the funeral oration of a Princeſs." " You know, that thoſe, who make the elogium of " Ann of Britany, never forget to obſerve, that when " the Ladies of her Court, who were moſt intimate " with her, pitied her, for that being the widow " of Charles VIII, it was very difficult for her to " riſe again to ſo high a ſtation; becauſe King Lewis " XII (14), was married with Joan of France; ſhe " uſed

(9) Rep. aux Queſt. d'un Provin. tom. 2. pag. 25.

(10) Ibid. pag. 266.

(11) Alexander. See Freinſhem. Supplem. in Curtium, lib. 1. cap. 2. fol. m. A. 3.

(12) 1 Cor. vii. 9.

(13) Ubi ſupra.

(14) The ſucceſſor of Charles VIII.

with theirs. Mr. Bayle mentions in the ſame place (d) another Princeſs of the houſe of Aragon [F], of whom we ſhall give a ſhort account in the laſt remark of this Article.

(d) Ibid. pag. 274.

" uſed to anſwer, that ſhe would rather remain all " her life time the widow of a King, than to diſ- " grace herſelf by marrying a perſon of a lower rank
(15) Brantome, Dames illuſtres, pag. 7. " (15). If the care of her ſalvation had obliged her " to make uſe of St. Paul's maxim, in an unequal " match, it might have been ſaid, that ſhe had leſs cou-
(16) Pag. 268. " rage and ſtrength of mind, than health and vigour. But " this very vigour would have been looked upon as a " weakneſs, and a very humbling and mortifying frailty." Your friends, adds Mr. Bayle (16), were conſtantly exclaiming againſt the injuſtice of thoſe who paſs ſuch different judgments on both ſexes; they condemn in the women, what they don't blame in the men. —— You might have anſwered, that the injuſtice they complained of, gives the women a fair opportunity of acquiring much glory. For ſince cuſtom has eſtabliſhed this decency or decorum, it is an honour for them to ſubmit to the yoke, and a ſhame to ſhake it off. But, added they, muſt a Widow-Queen have been ſo jealous of her rank, that to keep it, ſhe ought never to think of marrying below her dignity, but may gratify her appetites ſecretly with ſome of her ſervants? Is it not much better for them, to marry a private perſon, than to do, what Bonna Sforza Queen Dowager of Poland did (17)? No, Sir, we don't require any thing like this; we grant, that of two evils, we muſt always avoid the greateſt, and that it is much better to undermatch one's ſelf, than to make love in a criminal manner. I maintain only that when a perſon of high rank has recourſe to an unequal marriage, it ſhews ſhe wants a very good quality, and a very great and glorious perfection. The obſervation, which ſome of your friends made, that the widows of Kings have better opportunities to avoid unequal marriages, is very juſt. For it muſt be confeſſed, that a nation who labours to fill a vacant throne, will endeavour to chooſe ſuch a perſon, as may marry the widow of the deceaſed. Nor is the widow herſelf behind hand; ſhe has generally a ſtrong party, who for her ſake will ſupport the intereſt of the perſon, who is diſpoſed to take her for his ſpouſe. Several inſtances might be quoted to prove that in Poland and Hungary, a new Monarch ſucceeded to the bed as well as to the throne of his predeceſſor. Nay, ſometimes a brother has married the widow of his brother (18), as tho' we lived ſtill under the Moſaic Law (19)."

(17) See the remark [G] of the article ARAGON (ISABELLA OF).

(18) The King of Poland, John Caſimir, elected in 1649, married the widow of his brother Uladiſlaus.

(19) Bayle, ibid. p. 269, 271.

[F] Another Princeſs of the houſe of Aragon.] It is Sancia of Aragon daughter of Alphonſus II King of Naples, and daughter in law to Pope Alexander VI. The occaſion of her marrying a ſon of that Pope was as follows. " A confederacy was entered into " between the Pope and the King of Naples, for " defence of their reſpective territories, on condition, " that a determinate number of troops ſhould be " named for their mutual aſſiſtance, when either of the " parties ſhould be attacked; that his Holineſs ſhould " give Alphonſus the inveſtiture of the Kingdom of Na- " ples, and diminiſh the Tribute, which was uſually " paid on that account; that the Pope ſhould ſend an Apo- " ſtolick Legate to Naples, to aſſiſt at the corona- " tion of Alphonſus, and laſtly, that he ſhould pro- " mote Don Ludovic of Aragon, that King's Nephew, " to the Cardinalate (20). On the King's part it (20) Tom. Tomaſ. p. 49. Guicciard. lib. 1. pag. 15.
" was agreed; to pay his Holineſs immediately thirty " thouſand ducats (21), and that a marriage ſhould (21) Ibid.
" be concluded between the Lady Sancia, daughter " of Alphonſus, and Don Giaffre the Pope's young- " eſt ſon, which was to be conſummated as ſoon as " they were of age, giving Giaffre the title of Prince " of Squillace, and Count Cariati, to which he joined " a revenue of ten thouſand ducats a year; and his " perſon to be guarded by three hundred men at arms, " in the King's pay. Moreover, that the ſaid Gi- " affre ſhould have the Protonotarate of Naples given " him, which is one of the ſeven great offices of that " Kingdom; however, on this condition (by way of " pledge for his father's fidelity) that the ſaid Prince " Squillace ſhould reſide with Alphonſus at Naples " (22)." Lady Sancia, it ſeems, did not lead a ve- (22) Mr. A. Gordon's Life of Alexander VI. &c. p. 31.
ry regular life, as will appear by a paſſage from Tomaſo Tomaſi, who relates the ſtory of Beatrix of Aragon, only to cenſure Sancia, who had been extremely pleaſed, that a Frenchman had been killed in a duel by a Burgundian. To make her aſhamed of the delight ſhe took at ſo trifling an incident, the Hiſtorian ſets before her eyes, amongſt other misfortunes of her family, the divorce of Beatrix Queen of Hungary; then he adds (23), Lady Sancia ſhould read with tears in her eyes, the hiſtory of theſe misfortunes, which attended the alliance of her family with the Houſe of Borgia. But being well verſed in the infamous arts of that Houſe, ſhe is readily diſpoſed to redeem her life at the expence of her honour, as well as of her chaſtity. " This is an anecdote, adds (23) Vie du Duc du Valentinois, p. 290, of the French tranſlation.
" Mr. Bayle (24), of which I do not well know the (24) Ubi ſupra.
" particulars; however I underſtand by this, that La- " dy Sancia has made herſelf worthy of a place a- " mongſt the coquet Ladies, celebrated by Bran- " tome." She deſerved indeed to be placed there, but we don't find ſhe is mentioned by that Author; and as Mr. Bayle does not refer us to any particular paſſage, we may ſuppoſe, that ſhe is not amongſt thoſe perſons, of whom Brantome ſpeaks. The errors of Moreri will be more properly taken notice of under the article of BORGIA. In the mean time the reader may conſult the place referred to in the margin (25). (25) Mr. Gordon, ubi ſupra, in the Appendix, Art. 1. ſheet P. Ppppp.

ARAGON (ALPHONSUS V OF THE NAME, KING OF) look under the word NAPLES, ALPHONSUS I, of the name, KING OF NAPLES.

ARAGON (JANE OF) wife of Aſcanius Colonna, Prince of Tagliacozzi, was a very illuſtrious Lady in the ſixteenth Century. She was of Naples, and deſcended from the Kings of Aragon. The great wits of her time ſounded her praiſes in a very extraordinary manner [A]. The Philoſopher Auguſtin Niphus was not [A] The great Wits of her time ſounded her praiſes in a very extraordinary manner.] I have never met with any Dictionary which takes notice of this Lady. This is a very great omiſſion, ſeeing there has not been perhaps a ſingle man or woman in the world whoſe merit has been extolled, either by ſo many wits, or in ſo many languages, as was that of Jane of Aragon in the 16th Century. The Poems which were wrote in honour of her, have been collected by Jerom Ruſcelli, and publiſhed at Venice, 1555, under the title of TEMPIO ALLA DIVINA SIGNORA DONNA GIOVANNA D'ARRAGONA, fabricato da tutti i piu gentili ſpiriti, & in tutte le lingue principali del Mundo, i. e. " A TEMPLE TO THE DIVINE LADY " JANE OF ARAGON, erected to her honour by all " the fineſt Wits, and in all the principal languages of " the world." The poetical Apotheoſis of this Lady was performed almoſt in the ſame manner as the canonization of Saints, and immediately ſeveral great Wits took it in their heads of their own accord to give proof of their devotion to this new Divinity, and to build her a Temple; and afterwards it was confirmed by a Decree, in the year 1551, at Venice, in the Academy de Dubioſi. After ſeveral deliberations and conſultations upon a queſtion that was propoſed, whether this Temple did not jointly belong to Lady Jane of Aragon, and the Marchioneſs du Guaſt her ſiſter, the Decree gave it, that upon conſideration of the oppoſition which was formerly made by the Pontifs againſt Marcellus, when he had a deſign to dedicate the ſame Temple to Glory and to Virtue, the Marchioneſs du Guaſt could have no ſhare in her ſiſter's Temple, unleſs by the means of ſome particular interpretations. Not only the Poets whoſe verſes Ruſcelli collected, but alſo himſelf in his Epiſtle Dedicatory in proſe to the Cardinal of Trent, and alſo in the Preface, make uſe of terms of adoration, and ſuch as ought to be appropriated to the Deity. It is true he qualifies it thus, that the adoration paid to this Lady was indirectly, and to be referred to the Supreme not leſs earneſt to pay homage to her; he repreſented her ſo handſome, and he particulariſed the perfections of her body ſo much [B], that ſome Authors have ſaid that he has flattered her, and that love had thrown him into hyperboles [C]. They have even pretended that his quality of Phyſician had given him privileges, which had cauſed his paſſion

Poetical DEIFICATION of this Lady.

Supreme Being, who had bleſſed her with ſo many perfections. See his own words: Queſta conoſcenza .... ha fatto queſti anni a dietro che conoſcendoſi in univerſale & in particolare da ogni piu raro giudicio i grand meriti, & il ſummo valore & la bellezza infinita di corpo & d'anime della Illuſtriſſima & Excellentiſſima Signora DONNA GIOVANNA D'ARRAGONA, ſi ſieno tutti i piu begli ſpiriti di commune conſentimente poſti a ſacrarle un Tempio, come a Donna interamente divina, & la quale, come nobiliſſima fattura & ſembianza del ſommo Iddio, meriti veramente d'eſſer con la lingua & col cruore adorata per immenſo honore del fattor ſuo; potendoſi degnamente da ciaſcuno far giudicio, quanto ſia infinito il ſapere, il potere, & l'amor verſo di noi di chi coſi (alla capacita della mente noſtra) infinitamente bella & perfetta, & degna d'eſſer adorata creatura, habbia potuto, ſaputo, & degnatoſi di voler fare in queſta eta noſtra. i. e. "All perſons of "the moſt exquiſite taſte have for ſome years been ac- "quainted, either in whole or in part, with the great "merits, and the high value, and the infinite beauty "both of body and mind of the moſt illuſtrious and "moſt excellent Lady JANE D'ARAGONA, inſomuch "that all the great genius's were bent with one ac- "cord to conſecrate a Temple to her, as to a Lady "perfectly divine, who as the moſt noble fabrick and "form of Almighty God, truly deſerves to be adored "both with tongue and heart to the great honour of "her Maker: it being in the power of every one "to make a right judgment of the infinite greatneſs "of his wiſdom, power and love towards us, who "has been ſo powerful, wiſe and gracious, as to "make in this our age a creature (according to our "capacity) infinitely beautiful and perfect, and even "worthy of adoration." He ſays in the Preface, that the ſubſtance of all the pieces in his Collection is, Che queſta gran Donna, come perfettiſſima di corpo & d'animo, & come particolariſſima fattura del ſommo Iddio, meriti d'eſſere adorata ad honore del fattor ſuo. Overo che ciaſcuno partitamente l'offeriſce il ſuo voto, a la purita dell' affetto ſuo. i. e. "That this great Lady, "as being moſt perfect both in body and mind, and "a moſt ſingular fabrick of Almighty God, deſerves "to be adored to the honour of her Maker. And "every one ſhould offer his own vows in particular "to her, in the purity of his affections." The moſt harſh languages, and conſequently the moſt unfit for Poetry, as alſo thoſe which were the leaſt known, were all employed in the conſtruction of this Temple, as the Sclavonian, the Poliſh, the Hungarian, the Hebrew and the Chaldæan; and perhaps Mr. de Peireſc (1) is the only one, in honour of whom ſo great, if not a greater aſſemblage of languages was employed.

(1) See the remark [C] of his article.

[B] Niphus was too particular in his deſcription of this Lady's body.] Niphus dedicated to this Lady his treatiſe of Beauty; and in order to confute the opinion of the ancient Philoſophers, who maintained that there was no ſuch thing as perfect beauty in the univerſe, in his fifth chapter, he brings Jane of Aragon as an inſtance to prove the contrary. He enters into ſo particular a deſcription of parts in drawing the picture of this beautiful woman, that ſure nothing has paſſed ſo critical an examination in all that great number of portraitures which Mademoiſelle de Scuderi brought into faſhion by her Romances thirty or forty years ago (2). He is not content with deſcribing only thoſe beauties which were viſible, but he alſo proceeds on even to thoſe, quas ſinus abſcondit, and even to the proportion betwixt her thigh and her leg, and betwixt her leg and her arm. Ventre ſub pectore decente, & latere cui ſecretiora correſpondeant. Amplis atque perrotundis coxendicibus, coxâ ad tibiam, & tibiâ ad brachium ſeſquialterâ proportione ſe habente (3). There is prefixed to this treatiſe a letter of Cardinal Pompeius Colonna to Auguſtin Niphus, which gives teſtimony to the unparallel'd beauty and other excellent qualities of Jane of Aragon; and every body knows how competent a judge and critic a Cardinal of Quality is in theſe matters, quàm elegans formarum ſpectator ſiem. Read here the words of this letter: Non vulgò ſpecioſiſſima quæque exponit natura: noſtro tamen ævo parens officioſa ac liberalis veluti Divinitatis æmula, ut perfectum admirandumque aliquid, Diiſque immortalibus quam ſimillimum gentibus proferret, Joannem Aragoniam Columnam procreavit, atque ab incunabilis ad hanc uſque ætatem, in qua eſt florentiſſima, per omnes pulchritudinis & venuſtatis numeros provexit, ut facilè principem locum inter formoſiſſimas vindicaret. Animum præterea ſingularibus & dotibus & virtutibus inſignivit, &c. i. e. "It is not common for nature to diſ- "play all her beauties in the ſame ſubject; yet in "our age, like an indulgent and bountiful parent, "and as it were emulating Divinity itſelf, to give the "world a ſample of ſomething perfect, wonderful and "God-like, ſhe formed Jane of Aragon Columna; "and that ſhe might ſet her above competition even "with the handſomeſt of women, ſhe has led her "from the very cradle to her preſent prime of life "through all the different ſtages of comelineſs and "beauty; and has moreover endued her mind with "ſingular good qualities and virtues."

(2) This was written in 1692.

(3) Niphus, pag. 213. Opuſculorum, edit. Pariſ. 1645.

[C] Some Authors ſay that Niphus has flattered her.] Lewis Guyon could not believe that the Princeſs Jane of Aragon, of the illuſtrious Houſe of Columna, was poſſeſſed of all thoſe charms which Auguſtin Niphus has aſcribed to her: but it is my opinion, ſays he (4), that he fell in love with her upon his having touched and ſtroaked ſeveral parts of her naked body when ſhe was ſick, as is cuſtomary for Phyſicians to do by the privilege of their profeſſion; and that being deſirous to obtain her good graces he publiſhed this book and dedicated it to her, knowing that there is nothing which ſo engages a woman's heart, as to perſuade her that you are captivated by her beauty. After which he remarks, that if this be ſo, he did not conſider the oath which was adminiſtred to him upon taking his Degree in Phyſick, which, among other prohibitions, forbids him to luſt after ſuch maids or women, as ſhall be his patients. In the Table of Contents, he poſitively affirms, that Niphus the Phyſician fell in love with Princeſs Jane of Aragon, upon his having had her as his patient. This is going a little too faſt; he ought only to have given it as his conjecture. I confeſs that Niphus, who was one of the beſt Philoſophers of the laſt Age, was of a very amorous conſtitution; inſomuch that neither old age nor the gout could free him from this paſſion, which ſometimes cauſed him to act a very ridiculous part, even to that of dancing to the flute. Suſceptis liberis, & ſeneſcente uxore, ſeptuagenarius ſenex puellæ citra libidinem impotenti amore correptus eſt uſque ad inſaniam; ita ut plerique philoſophum ſenem atque podagricum ad tibiæ modos ſaltantem miſerabili cum pudore conſpexerint (5). i. e. "After hav- "ing had children of his own, his wife ſuperannuated, "and he himſelf ſeventy years of age, yet impotent "and old he doated to diſtraction on a young wo- "man; inſomuch that many, not without ſhame and "pity, have ſeen the old gouty Philoſopher dancing "to the pipe." I grant likewiſe that, being ſmitten with one of the maids of honour belonging to Jane of Aragon (6), he might have opportunities of being near this Lady, and warming himſelf before ſo great a fire; but it is no ways ſure that he forgot himſelf ſo far as to carry his views ſo high. Beſides as he did not practiſe Phyſick (7), tho' he had taken his Degree in it, it is not the leaſt probable that he was Phyſician to this Ducheſs; for perſons of her quality chooſe to apply, in caſe of ſickneſs, rather to a Phyſician of experience than one of ſpeculation, and who makes, as Niphus did, Philoſophy the chief of his profeſſion. So that I chuſe to ſay, that judgment not having been his prevailing talent, he took the liberty to ſpeak of things which he had never ſeen, and of applying his ideas to them. As to what Lewis Guyon obſerves, that this Princeſs was of the Houſe of Colonna, might be true on the mother's ſide, yet notwithſtanding he did not expreſs himſelf well. We have ſeen that Cardinal Pompeius Colonna calls her Joannam Aragoniam Columnam, probably becauſe ſhe was married to Aſcanio Colonna. Perhaps Auguſtin Niphus might

(4) Guyon, Diverſes Leçons, vol. 3. liv. 3. chap. 12.

(5) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 92.

(6) Naudæus, in Judicio de Auguſt. Nipho.

(7) Medicinam licet circitoris inſtar aut periodentæ nunquam exercuerit, optimè tamen callebat. Naudæus in Judicio de Nipho.

ſion for her [D]. Theſe thoughts appear to me very abſurd (a). It was not only her beauty that made her be admired: her courage, her prudence, and her capacity for great affairs diſtinguiſhed her extreamly from other women of quality (b). Under the Pontificate of Paul IV, ſhe had a ſhare in the reſolutions which were taken by the Colonna's againſt the intereſts of this Pope. She would have been impriſoned, if ſome regard had not been paid to her ſex; but on this conſideration they were contented with forbidding her to go out of Rome. However ſhe did not fail to contrive her eſcape very artfully (c) [E], that ſhe might be better able to favour the undertakings of her ſon, who was that Mark Anthony Colonna, who acquired afterwards ſo much glory at the battle of Lepanto. It does not appear that at that time ſhe agreed with her huſband; for ſhe was entirely in the intereſts of her ſon, when there was ſo great a miſunderſtanding between the father and ſon [F], that the latter contributed to the impriſonment of the former for a crime of ſtate. A ſad thing that a Lady of ſo great merit ſhould be very unhappy with (a) See the note [C].

(b) See the note [E].

(c) In 1556. See the Life of the Duke of Alva, and hereunder the note (I).

Niphus cenſured.

might be cenſured more juſtly on his ſixty eighth chapter of his treatiſe de Pulchro, (of Beauty), where after having ſaid that Jane of Aragon was the only woman in that Age who deſerved the name of happy, ſeeing ſhe poſſeſſed thoſe two conſtituent parts of woman's felicity, beauty and virtue; he preſently after ſpeaks of Victoria Colonna, Marchioneſs of Peſcara, as of a ſhining pattern of beauty united with chaſtity.

A Remark on the touchings of Phyſicians.

[D] It is ſaid of Niphus that his quality of Phyſician had intitled him to ſome priviledges with Jane of Aragon, which caus'd his paſſion for her.] The Poets as well as others have long ago made reflections on this privilege of Phyſicians. See what Ovid makes the amorous Acontius to ſay.

Me miſerum! quod non medicorum juſſa miniſtro,
Aſtringoque manus, infideoque thoro.
Et rurſus miſerum! quod me procul inde remoto,
Quem minime vellem, forſitan alter adeſt.
Ille manus iſtas aſtringit, & aſſidet ægræ.
Invifus ſuperis, cum ſuperiſque mihi.
Dumque ſuo tentat ſalientem pollice venam,
Candida per cauſam brachia ſæpe tenet,
Contrectatque ſinus, & forſitan oſcula jungit,
Officio merces plenior iſta ſuo eſt. (*)

That is,

" Why ſit not I by your bed-ſide all day
" My mournful head in your warm boſom lay,
" Till with my fears the inward fires decay?
" Why preſs not I your melting hand in mine,
" And from your pulſe of my own health divine?
" But oh! theſe wiſhes all are vain; and he " Whom moſt I fear, may now ſit cloſe by thee,
" Forgetful as thou art of heav'n and me.
" He that lov'd hand does preſs, and oft does feign
" Some new excuſe to feel thy beating vein.
" Then his bold hand up to your arm does ſlide,
" And in your panting breaſt itſelf does hide;
" Kiſſes ſometimes he ſnatches too from thee,
" For his officious care too great a fee." Duke.

(*) Ovid. Heroid. Epiſt. xx. ver. 133.

Remi Belleau in his Commentary on the ſecond book of Ronſard's Amours ſuppoſes that the 46th Sonnet was taken from this Epiſtle of Ovid. Here follow Ronſard's words:

Ha! que je porte & de haine & d'envie,
Au Medicin, qui vient ſoir & matin,
Sans nul propos taſtonner le tetin,
Le ſein, le ventre, & les flancs de m'amie.
Las! il n'eſt pas ſi ſoigneux de ma vie
Comme elle penſe, il eſt mechant & fin:
Cent fois le jour il la viſite, afin
De voir ſon ſein, qui d'aimer le convie.

But this difference is to be obſerved, that he whom Acontius complains of was betrothed to the ſick Lady, otherwiſe ſhe would not have had the aſſurance to confeſs, in her anſwer to Acontius, that this rival only kiſſed her now and then, oſcula rara accipit. Brantome quotes this Sonnet of Ronſard in ſome part of his Memoirs, and takes occaſion to be very witty upon it.

[E] She was forbid to go out of Rome. However ſhe did not fail to contrive her eſcape very artfully.] The paſſage I am going to cite from Anthony Maria Gratiani gives us, in elegant language, a full proof of this. Joanna Arragonia, Marci Antonii mater, virilis audaciæ fœmina, quæ virorum quoque conſiliis apud filium habitis interfuerat, continere ſe domi, neque pedem inde efferre fuerat juſſa; id enim ſic indulſerat dignitati ejus Pontifex, ne in carcerem duceretur. Ea cum rem ſpectare ad arma bellumque, & primum Pontificiorum impetum in oppida filii fore intelligeret, veſtibus manè ſummo commutatis, cum filiâ & nuru, corruptis aut deceptis portæ cuſtodibus, egreſſa urbe, conſcenſis quos ad id præparaverat equis, protinus Neapolim aufugit. Pontifex, quanquam deceptum ſe deluſumque à fœmina graviter ferebat, acerbius tamen Hiſpanis, quorum ea conſiliis adminiſtrarentur, iraſcebatur (8). i. e. " Jane of Aragon, the Mother of Marcus Antonius, a woman " of a maſculine courage, and who had borne a part in " the cabals of ſome men held at her ſon's houſe, was " ordered to confine herſelf to her houſe, and not ſo " much as to ſtir over the threſhold; for the Pope, " in regard to her dignity, had excuſed her from being ſent to priſon. But when ſhe ſaw the tendency " of affairs to arms and acts of hoſtility, and that the " firſt fury of the Pope's ſoldiers would be diſcharged " againſt the towns of her ſon, changing her cloaths " early in the morning, ſhe together with her daughter and ſon's wife, having either brib'd or paſſed " the watch, eſcaped out of the city, and getting on " horſe-back, having prepared ſome for that purpoſe, ſhe fled to Naples. The Pope, tho' he was " much chagrined to be overreach'd and outwitted " by a woman, yet was more incens'd againſt the " Spaniards, by whoſe contrivance theſe things were " managed." This eſcape and ſome other affronts put upon the Pope, ſo exaſperated him againſt the Colonna's, that he " diſpatched (9) a Mandate to Jane " of Aragon, by which he forbad her to marry any " one of her daughters, without his leave; thro' de- " fault of which, the marriage, tho' after conſumma- " tion, ſhould be void (10)."

(8) Gratianus, de Caſibus Virorum Illuſtrium, p. 322.

(9) Jan. 2. 1556.

(10) Fra. Paolo, Hiſt. of the Council of Trent, pag. 723. of Amelot's Tranſlation. Amſterdam edition, 1686.

[F] She was at variance with her huſband, who himſelf alſo had a very great miſunderſtanding with his ſon.] Cardinal Pallavicini remarks, that Aſcanius Colonna had behaved with ſo much inſolence towards his Creditors, that the Attorney Fiſcal cauſed him to be ſummoned to give an account of his conduct; and upon his not appearing, he was condemned for obſtinacy, and his lands confiſcated. Marcus Antonius his ſon, who had been at enmity with him a long time, took this opportunity to ſtrip his father, by poſſeſſing himſelf of his confiſcated lands, from which he drove away the Officers of juſtice, a little before the death of Julius III. In ipſâ rei confectione, Marcus Antonius ejus filius, cui cum parente veteres & nunquam ſatis compoſitæ controverſiæ intercedebant, vim interpoſuit, eodemque tempore patrem oppidis ſpoliavit, ab eiſque Fiſci miniſtros procul habuit (11). He went out of Rome contrary to the charge of Paul IV; which diſobedience joined to former provocations obliged this Pope to publiſh Manifeſto's both againſt the father and the ſon. The father pleaded his being kept priſoner at Naples as an argument that he could have no hand in plotting a rebellion: the ſon alledged that he had ſequeſtred the lands in the hands of Mendoza, who could not part with them without an order from the Emperor. Pallavicini makes no mention of the wife of Aſcanius Colonna, which I wonder at; but as we are aſſured from other hands that ſhe was engaged at Rome in the intrigues of her ſon, who was at variance with his father, we may make a ſhrew'd gueſs that ſhe was not upon the beſt terms with her husband. Gratiani ſpeaks in plainer terms of (11) Pallavic. Hiſt. Concil. Trident. lib. 13. cap. 14. num. 9.

with her husband. This does not happen so seldom as one could wish amongst persons of her sex who have such great qualities. She shewed much constancy, when she lost her eldest son in 1551. What Aretin wrote to her upon it is seasoned with great praises. See the sixth book of his Letters, page the fifth (d). She had a sister, who was very handsome even in her old age, and who had a very famous daughter-in-law [G].

(d) Paris edition in 1609, in 8vo.

There are very few remarks in her article, which may not be lengthened. For which reason I shall add here in this new edition, as a supplement to what I have said already of the shameful conduct of Marcus Antonius towards his father. Ante omnes (12) Colonniorum familia, magna in civitate pollensque pro illo (Cæsare) stabat, cujus princeps Martius Antonius, cum paulo antè Ascanium patrem, à quo hostili odio diffidebat, insimulatum majestatis in custodiam tradendum Neapoli curasset, aliquot oppidis intra fines Romanæ Ecclesiæ haud longè ab Urbe imperitabat. i. e. "Above all the family of Colonna, which was very powerful and bore great sway in the city, was on Cæsar's side. The principal of which family, Marcus Antonius (who bearing an inveterate hatred to his father, had a little before got him impeached of treason, and imprisoned at Naples) governed some towns within the territories of the Roman Church not far from the city."

(12) Gratian. de Casibus Viror. Illustrium, pag. 320.

[G] She had a sister, who was very handsome even in her old age, and who had a very famous daughter in law.] See what a Spanish author says of these three Ladies... Que cosas no podrian dezirse en laude y exaltation de la hermosissima Duquesa de Tallacoza, Donna Joanna de Aragon, muger de sangre real, y en summo grado casta, y buena? Y ansi de Donna Maria su Hermana, Marquesa del Vasto? Y de Donna Isabel de Gonzaga, su nuera (13)? i. e. "What things "may not be said in the praise and exaltation of "the most beautiful Duchess of Tallacoza, Donna "Joanna of Aragon, a woman of Royal Blood, and "excellently chaste and good? as also of Donna Maria her sister, Marchioness del Vasto? and of Donna Isabel de Gonzaga her daughter in law." Donna Maria of Aragon, sister of Jane, was the wife of Alfonso d'Avalos, Marquis of Guast, one of the bravest Captains of Charles V. Sorbiere calls her Marchioness de Vasco, and ranks her among the learned women (14). Brantome, who was very full in her praise, places her amongst the long-liv'd beauties; for after relating the compliments which the Grand Prior of France made her in a very numerous company, that her autumn surpassed all the springs and summers of those in the assembly, he adds, that she was in truth still a very handsome and amiable Lady, nay, even exceeded her two daughters, who were two very beautiful young Ladies, tho' she was at that time nigh sixty years of age (15). The Grand Prior (16) was smitten with her immediately; but tho' he was deeply in love with the mother, yet he made his addresses to the eldest daughter, por adombrar la cosa, i. e. "to conceal the matter." At the end of six years or more, Brantome being returned to Naples, he found her but very little altered, and still handsome enough, as he says, to make one break a commandment with her either in act or desire. She died at Chiaia, in the house of Don Garzias of Toledo, Nov. 9, 1568, (17). I do not remember Brantome any where to have made mention of the sister of this Lady. It is true he in one place speaks of the wife of one Ascanio Colonna, who passed for the greatest beauty of Italy, and whom Barbarossa attempted to steal away to make a present of her to the Grand Signior; but he calls her Signora Livia (18) Gonzaga (19); which proves that it is not her who is the subject of this article, tho' by the description which Augustin Niphus gives of her beauty, we must think her not less capable than the other of inspiring Barbarossa with so bold a design. Thuanus has spoken of this Mary of Aragon: he says that the island of Ischia was chiefly remarkable for having been the retreat of this Lady. Dragutes... Æuariam insulam arce munitissima, quæ inter duas terras saxo imposita est, sed maximè Mariæ Arragoniæ Alfonsi Avali Vastii viduæ secessu nobilem, petit (20). i. e. "Dragutes... "goes to the island Ænaria which is famous for a "strong fortified castle situated upon a rock betwixt "two plains, but most famous for having served Mary "of Aragon widow to Alfonsus Avalus Vastius for a "place of retirement." The same Jerom Ruscelli, whom I have mentioned above, who shewed so much zeal to immortalize Jane of Aragon, spared no pains to sound forth the praises of Mary. He did not content himself with using the strongest expressions that his imagination could furnish him with in describing the perfections of this Lady; but he also collected several pieces of poetry wherein she had been idolized by the greatest wits of the age, and caused them to be printed at the end of his commentary upon the Sonnet of John Baptist of Azzia, Marquis d'Ella Terza. This Sonnet was composed in praise of l'Illustrissima & excellentissima Signora la Signora Donna Maria d'Aragona, Marchesa del Vasto. This Commentary of Ruscelli was printed at Venice, 1552, in 4°, per Giovan Griffio, and contains seventy three pages. The Marchioness is there represented as the Archetype and Criterion of beauty; so that, to use the commentators words, the true way of knowing whether other women surpass each other in beauty, is to see how far they resemble her. Secondo che in altre vedra le fattezze del volto & di tutto il corpo che habbian somiglianza, ò s'avicino poco ò molto à quelle di lei, cosi giudicare, che le Bellezze di quelle tali, sieno piu ò meno perfette, come del Paragon dell' oro habbiam detto. Et da tale essempio, ò idea, ò piu tosto vero Archetipo qui in terra della vera Bellezza corporale, formar poi le regole, le ragioni, le misure, i gradi, & le proportioni della Bellezza intera & perfetta (21). i. e. We are to observe in other Ladies what similitude in the features of the face and the proportion of the body they bear to her, and as they more or less resemble her, we may judge their beauty to be more or less perfect, as gold is tried by the touch-stone. And from such a pattern, or idea, or rather Archetype of true personal beauty we may form afterwards the rule, the reason, the measure, the degree of the portion of intire and perfect beauty." He makes her no less beautiful in mind than in body; and says that Giraldi having had the honour to see her and hear her speak, continued for some time quite astonished, and uncertain, whether she was more to be admired for her beauty or adored for her wit. Al cospetto di questa divinissima Signora condottosi gia il Signor Giovan Battista Giraldi Cinthio, & contemplando attentissimamente l'una & l'altra Bellezza, che à gli occhi del corpo & à qui della mente gli si rappresentavano della vera Bellezza del volto dalla splendor de gli occhi, dalla soavità della favella, dalla leggiadria & maestà del sembiante, & dalla maraviglia dé modi & delle maniere veramente angeliche, stette lunga pezza tra se stesso attonito, & stupefatto, & dalla somma Bellezza del corpo, che primieramente s'offeriva à gli occhi suoi, dovea tosto resolversi, che questa fosse da lui da amarsi sopra ogn' altra cosa mortale. Poi passando subito col pensiero à quella dell' animo, che gli si rappresentava per quei modi & per quelle maniere gia dette, si mutava di opinione, & risolversi, che quella sola Bellezza dell' Animo, dovesse come cosa divina & celeste, con intera humilta & divotione adorarsi (22). i. e. "John "Baptista Giraldi Cinthio being on a time introduced to this most divine Lady, and contemplating "with the greatest attention, the beauty both of her "body and mind, that of her body appearing from "the lustre of her eyes, the sweetness of her speech, "the grace and majesty of her mein, and a truly angelical air and manner, stood a long time astonished and stupified, and was ready to determine "from the beauty of her person, which first presented it self to his eyes, that she was to be loved "by him above any other mortal. But afterwards "making a sudden transition in his thought to the "beauty of her mind, he changed his opinion, and "came to his resolution, that this alone ought, as "a divine and celestial thing, to be adored with "humility

(13) Joan. de Spinosa, Dialogo en laude de las Mugeres, folio 90 verso.

(14) Sorbiere, Lettre 15. p. 73.

(15) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 243, 245.

(16) It was Francis of Lorrain, General de Galeres, son of Claudius the first Duke of Guise. This journey to Naples was made in 1559.

(17) Tomaso Costo, Compendio dell' Istoria del Regno di Napoli, Part 3. folio 59.

(18) He should have called her Julia. We shall speak of her under the article of GONZAGA.

(19) Brantome, Dames Illust. pag. 283.

(20) Thuan. Hist. lib. 11. ad ann. 1552. pag. 222.

(21) Ruscelli, Lettura sopra uno Sonnetto dell' illustriss. Signor Marchese della Terza alla divina Signora Marchesa del Vasto, folio 57.

(22) Ruscelli, ibid.

of her Deification (e), that ſoon after her temple had been ſet out by the care of Jerom Ruſcelli, there was a gallant Author who dedicated many images to it [H]. The life of the Duke of Alva will furniſh me with new particulars concerning the broils, which obliged this Lady to fly from Rome in the year 1556 (f) [I]. She was then very old, according to the Hiſtorian of the Duke of Alva. She muſt then have enjoyed a very long life, for ſhe died in the month of October 1577 (g). She had given to the Capuchins of the holy Sacrament in 1575, the ground where they have built the Monaſtery they have at Rome (h). She was very liberal to the Jeſuits; for ſhe rebuilt the church of St. Andrew, which the Biſhop of Tivoli gave them in 1566 (i). Hitherto I have been ſilent as to her Genealogy; it is high time I ſhould obſerve that ſhe was daughter of Ferdinand of Aragon Duke of Montalto [K], third natural ſon of Ferdinand I King of Naples.

(e) Underneath, in the note [A].

(f) See the notes [E] and [F].

(g) Tomaſo Coſto, Compendio dell' Iſtoria di Napoli, Parte 3. folio 168.

(h) See the Ritratto di Roma Moderna, p. 541 of the Roman edition in 1653.

(i) Ibid. p. 540.

" humility and devotion." The Madrigal, which he compoſed upon this problem, is at the end of this paſſage.

[H] A gallant author .... dedicated ſeveral images to her temple.] This was Giuſeppe Betuſſi. He publiſhed at Florence, in 1566, a Dialogue intitled, le Imagini del Tempio della Signora Donna Giovanna Aragona. It is a Book of a hundred and twenty one pages, where the elogies of ſeveral perſons of the fair ſex are artfully interwoven with thoſe of the Goddeſs of the Temple.

[I] Here follow ſome new particulars concerning the broils which obliged her to flee from Rome in 1556.] This is what I find in the Hiſtory of the Duke of Alva printed in Latin at Salamanca, 1669, and in French at Paris, 1699. " Jane of Aragon, mother " of Marcus Antonius Colonna, Ducheſs Dowager of " Paſſiano, ... remained at Rome, being detained " by way of hoſtage, and kept a priſoner at ſight " by the Caraffes, who becoming more remiſs " by reaſon of the truce, and the ways being left " open, the Ducheſs went out of Rome on foot, " with her two daughters, pretending ſhe was going " to divert herſelf in a vineyard, lying at ſome di- " ſtance from the ramparts. Tho' ſhe was very old " yet ſhe kept walking on foot till ſhe was beyond " ſight of the watch and centinel; after which ſhe " got on horſeback and mounted her two daughters, " each with a Gentleman behind who held them in " their arms; and with this equipage, unworthy of " her, but ſuitable to her preſent condition, ſhe " made her eſcape to the camp. The Duke of Alva " received her there with inexpreſſible joy, and as " the great age of this Lady left no room for ſuſ- " picion, he embraced her, but contented himſelf with " ſaluting her two daughters, who out of reſpect to " the Duke unveiled themſelves. Methinks, ſays he, " coming up to her, I ſee the famous Clelia who fled, " not from the camp of the enemy into the city, " prompted thereto by the ſole love of her country, but " from the city into the camp, urged by the force of " maternal affection.... The Ducheſs was charmed " with the civilities of the Spaniſh General, and ex- " preſſed her gratitude in a thouſand thanks. How- " ever, ſhe could not be perſuaded to continue in " the camp in regard to the age of her daughters. " The Duke conſented to her deſire, and ſhe re- " tired into Campania, accompany'd by her ſon, " and eſcorted by a ſquadron of Horſe, which the " Vice-Roy allowed her, more to do her honour " than to ſerve any occaſion ſhe had for it (23)."

(23) Vie du Duc d'Albe, liv. 4. chap. 19. pag. 381. à l'année 1556.

It will be proper, before we conclude this article, to ſay ſomething of the misfortunes of her husband. He was priſoner in the New Caſtle at Naples, having been accuſed by his own ſon of hereſy, and conſpiring againſt his Catholick Majeſty (24); and when the Duke of Alva arrived at Naples, in the year 1556, he went to ſee him in his priſon (25), and heard all that he had to ſay to him, ... he comforted the good old man as much as he could, and gave him the whole caſtle for his priſon, having till that time been confined to a little cloſe Tower; he relieved the diſtreſſes he was reduced to, as well with money out of his own purſe, as by allotting him a penſion out of his ſon's eſtate... Notwithſtanding he did not reſtore him to his liberty, his accuſations being ſupported by too great a number of probable circumſtances, and believed by a great many people not to be without a ſtrong foundation. Beſides he would thereby have offended Philip, who kept Aſcanius priſoner the reſt of his days, tho' without depriving him of thoſe conveniences and advantages which the goodneſs of the Duke had indulged him.

(24) Ibid. chap. 2. pag. 341.

(25) Ibid. p. 342.

The Hiſtorian remarks that this fact (26) has never been thoroughly cleared up, and he blames Count Noel for accuſing the Duke of Alva of having behaved with too much rigour towards the father of Marcus Antonius Colonna.

(26) That is, the Accuſation of Aſcanio Colonna.

[K] She was daughter of Ferdinand of Aragon, Duke of Montalto.] Anthony his ſon ſucceeded him in the Duchy of Montalto and married Hippolita della Rovere, and afterwards Antoinette de Cardona, and was father of another Anthony. This laſt, being the fourth Duke of Montalto, was married to Mary de la Cerda, daughter to the Duke de Medina Celi, and afterwards to M. Louiſa de Luna. He had ſeveral children who all died young except one daughter named Mary, who was heireſs to the Duchy of Montalto, and married in Sicily to Don Francis de Moncade, Prince of Paterno (27).

(27) Taken from a Memoir communicated by Monſ. Minutoli.

ARAGON (ISABELLA OF) daughter of Alphonſus Duke of Calabria, ſon of Ferdinand King of Naples, was wife of John Galeas Sforza Duke of Milan. This Duke was under the tuition of Lewis Sforza his uncle, before his marriage, and was no leſs ſo after he had eſpouſed Iſabella of Aragon in the year 1489 (a) with much magnificence [A]. The counſels of this Princeſs, who was as ambitious as fair, gave him the courage to ſhew that he would fully enjoy all his rights (b), but he had to do with a ſtrong party; his tutor was the moſt intriguing man in the world, and the moſt capable of maintaining himſelf againſt the juſt pretenſions of his nephew. He fell in love with the Princeſs Iſabella the firſt time he ſaw her; and, as ſhe was at preſent no otherwiſe the wife of John Galeas than by proxy, he did not deſpair of marrying her, and excluding his nephew. He opened this deſign to the Princeſs, and aſſured her that ſhe ſhould more certainly command if ſhe married him, than if ſhe was the wife of John Galeas. This propoſal was ſtrongly rejected. The tutor was not diſheartened; he cauſed his nephew not to conſummate

(a) Corio, Hiſt. di Milano, Parte 6. p. 879. editione dell' an. 1646. in 4to.

(b) Varillas, Hiſtoire de Charles VIII. liv. 2. pag. 157.

[A] She was married to John Galeas Sforza Duke of Milan .... with much magnificence.] See Triſtan Calchus, an Author of that time (1), in Nuptiarum Mediolanenſium Deſcriptione. Father Menetrier quotes a pretty long paſſage out of him, which contains the Deſcription of the magnificent ſupper that Bergonce Botta, a Gentleman of Lombardy, gave Duke Galeas and his bride, when he received them in his houſe at Tortona. Each courſe was accompanied with a kind of Opera, which the reſtoring of theſe entertainments began to render agreeable, more by the grace of novelty, than by the other beauties, which have been given them ſince (2).

(1) Konig is groſsly miſtaken, in making him live in 1672.

(2) Menetrier, des Repreſentations en Muſique, pag. 157.

consummate the marriage; and it is said that he even made use of a magical girdle [B]. In the mean time he caused his own marriage with Isabella to be negotiated at the court of Naples. Ferdinand seemed to agree to it, but the Duke of Calabria would not consent to it (c). Lewis Sforza was therefore obliged to deliver up the prey to John Galeas, but he did not renounce his vengeance, and he destined Isabella of Aragon for a principal victim. He abridged her of several things which suited either with her taste or her diversion (d), and he married a Princess, who disputed every thing with her. The young Isabella had so many vexations to go through in this conflict, and in this faction, which well deserves to be described [C], that she gave her father and her grandfather to understand that if they did not take her out of that misery, she would attempt her own life (e). These Princes were in no condition to bring Lewis Sforza to reason; for he was one of the instruments of drawing the French into Italy, which ruined the whole house of Aragon that reigned at Naples. He carried his wickedness so far as to make away with his nephew (f) [D]. It would be in vain to say that John Galeas died of

(c) Ibid. liv. 3. p. 210, 211.

(d) Ibid. liv. 2. pag. 157.

(e) See the note [C].

(f) Conjuge Joanne Galeatio ordata est; eo quidem luctuosius ac miserius, quod is veneficio sublatus crederetur. Jovius, Elog. l. 5. p. 422. i. e. "She lost "her husband "John Galeas, "and what increased her "grief and misery was, that "he was thought "to be taken off "by poison.

[B] Her husband did not consummate the marriage, and it is said that use was made of a magical girdle.] Guiccardini says there was such a report, and that all Italy was persuaded of the truth of it. E manifesto, says he (3), che quando Isabella figliuola d'Alfonso andò a congiugnersi col marito, Lodovico come la vidde, inamorato di lei desidero ottenerla per moglie dal padre: è a questo effetto operò (così fu allhora creduto per tutta Italia) con incantamenti è con malie che Giovan Galeazzo fu per molti mesi impotente alla consummatione del Matrimonio: alla quel cosa Ferdinando harebbe acconsentito, ma Alfonso repugnò, onde Lodovico escluso di questa speranza, presa altra moglie & havutone figlivoli, voltò tutti i pensieri à trasferire in quegli il Ducato di Milano. i. e. "It is "certain, that when Isabella the daughter of Alphonsus went to be joined to her husband, as soon "as Lewis saw her, being enamoured with her, he was "desirous of obtaining her for his wife from her father; and to compass this the better (as was at that "time believed all over Italy) he made use of inchantment and witchcraft, so that John Galeas "was incapable of consummation for many months. "Ferdinand consented to his proposal, but Alphonsus refused; upon which Lewis being excluded "from any hope, took another wife and had children by her, and turned all his thoughts on transferring upon them the Dukedom of Milan." Mr. Varillas, as far as I have been able to observe, does not touch upon this particular: he contents himself with saying, that Lewis Sforza hindred the consummation of the marriage for above three months (4). He says plainly enough, that the hindrance came only from the two parties, being not suffered to come together; for he says the father of the bride thought his honour engaged . . . . not to suffer Lewis Sforza to separate the new married couple any longer; that he threatned to complain of it to all Europe, and to raise it up in arms to avenge his quarrel (5). This was a great piece of malice and a very insupportable violence of the Guardian.

(3) Guiccardini, lib. 1. pag. 15.

(4) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII. liv. 1. pag. 47.

(5) Varillas, Hist. de Charles VIII. liv. 3. pag. 211.

[C] The kind of faction, with which she had to deal, deserves to be described.] As Mr. Varillas seems to have succeeded in describing this, I believe the relation of his own words here will be thought a curious passage. It belongs so much the more necessarily to this article, as it serves to shew the humour, wit and qualities of the mind of Isabella of Aragon. "Lewis "Sforza gave up Isabella to his nephew . . . . and, "to procure her a rival who should controul her on "all occasions, he sought out the Princess Alphonsina, daughter of Hercules d'Este Duke of Ferrara. "Alphonsina was like Isabella in every thing, only "she was not so handsome. They were both full of "their birth to no purpose, seeing they had nothing "to reproach one another with in this point, and "that there was bastardy in both their Genealogies *. "They were excessively high-spirited, which arose "from a very great ambition. They were chaste "more out of glory than disposition. Isabella had "resolved upon marriage, and Alphonsina aspired to "it, with a greater desire of partaking of the power "of their husbands than of their beds. Both of "them were fond of luxury; and tho' they had "been brought up where nothing but parsimony was "esteemed, yet they were prodigal, and had a humour of spending as much as was in their power. "The Duke of Ferrara did not deliberate a moment, whether he should grant Alphonsina to Lewis "Sforza. He had no portion to give her, and besides there was room to hope that she would be "Duchess of Milan. She was therefore readily sent to "Lewis Sforza, who had two sons successively by "her. This fruitfulness gave her occasion to insult "Isabella, who had lain in the second time of a "daughter: but jealousy had already sown discord "between them. Alphonsina could not bear the "beauty of Isabella should be commended in her "presence, because she imagined that she was reproached at the same time with the want of it; "and Isabella was no less disgusted at the extraordinary honours which were paid to Alphonsina, because she thought they were due only to her. They "both lived in the same palace, and both eat at the "same table. Every day they had an infinite number of occasions to augment their aversion, and "the Courtiers furnished them with the greatest part. "They were very assiduous about Alphonsina, because "her husband distributed the favours; and went to "Isabelly only for form sake. She was quite in despair, and it was this neglect as well as the little "money that was afforded for her diversions, that "made her write to her father and grandfather, that "she would attempt her own life if they did not deliver her out of captivity. Alphonsina, for her "part, was so tired of Isabella, that to get rid of "her, she sollicited Lewis Sforza her husband to make "her Dutchess as he had promised her, and to add "the quality of Duke of Milan to that of Administrator of this Duchy (6)." Mr. Varillas had said in the same History (7), that Isabella had written to the Duke of Calabria her father, and to the King of Naples her grandfather, letters, of which the greater part are still remaining (8), wherein she complained of her misfortune in the most pathetic terms. She painted them in a manner so lively as was enough to draw tears from the most obdurate eyes: she pretended she had enslaved herself only out of obedience, and threatned to lay violent hands on herself, if she was not soon set at liberty.

(6) Varillas, Hist. de Charles VIII. liv. 3. p. 211.

(7) See p. 158.

(8) He quotes in the margin the History of Bernardin Corio.

[D] Lewis Sforza carried his wickedness so far as to make away with his nephew.] I shall make use again of Mr. Varillas's own words. This is what he says under the year 1494, after having conducted his King as far as Pavia. "Lewis Sforza, being persuaded "that it was time to get rid of his nephew Duke "John Galeas, had, as is said, given him some of "those slow poisons, which produce consumptive "symptoms in the human body; to give a greater "probability to the report which was spread at the "same time, that the disorder of this young Prince "came only from too great a fondness for the "beauty of his wife. The Physicians had no hopes "of his cure, when the King, as he passed through "Pavia, where he lay sick, could not forbear visiting him. His Majesty did not speak to him "about any business, because Lewis Sforza had made "such pressing instances to be present at this interview, which they did not dare to refuse him. He "only shewed his concern to see his cousin german * "in so miserable a condition, and endeavoured to "flatter him with some hopes of recovery; but "John Galeas, who found himself dying, and never "questioned its being thro' the wickedness of his "uncle,

* Borso d'Este, great grandfather to Alphonsina's father, and Ferdinand Isabella's grandfather by the father's side, were bastards.

* They were the sons of two sisters, Princesses of Savoy.

of being too fond of his wife; the tradition, which has imputed his death to the ambition of his uncle has prevailed [E]. The Princeſs Iſabella retired to Naples, after the French had taken Milan, and ſeemed the moſt afflicted of all the Princeſſes her relations, who were very numerous in the Iſle of Iſchia, when King Frederick was obliged to ſurrender at the diſcretion of Lewis XII, in 1501 (g). She did not go out of mourning for a long time; ſhe loſt within the ſpace of a few years her grandfather, her huſband, her father, her brother, her uncle, and her ſon [F]. The chief conſolation ſhe had left was to ſee that Lewis Sforza, her perſecutor, expiated his crimes in France, in a hard captivity, which ended only with his death. She had another conſolation, as ſenſible, or perhaps more ſenſible than this; that her only daughter, Bonna Sforza, was married to Sigiſmond King of Poland. She retired into a city of the Kingdom of Naples, which had been given her for her jointure (b), and lived there in ſuch a manner, as ſhewed that the reverſe of fortune had not abated that air of royal grandeur in which ſhe had been brought up. She died of a dropſy; but ſhe had time to go on a pilgrimage to Rome under the Popedom of Leo X. She went on foot to the Vatican, followed by a great number of Ladies dreſſed like brides. All the city ran to this ſight (i). It were to be wiſhed for her memory, that we could here finiſh her article, without adding a ſequel, which is a little diſagreeable, but we are not maſters of the facts. Her own Panegyriſts have concluded as follows. This Lady, whoſe conduct in her youth raiſed her a great reputation for virtue, gave room for ſlander, when ſhe was upon the decline, and admitted of the gallantries of Proſper Colonna, with very little regard for her reputation [G]. Her daughter, the Queen Dowager of Poland, being retired to the ſame part of the Kingdom

(g) Gratianus, de Caſibus Viror. illuſtrium, p. 41.

(b) At Bari: ſee the laſt note.

(i) Jovius, Elog. lib. 5. pag. 422.

" uncle, took advantage of this conjuncture. He " had now no longer any concern about himſelf, and " thinking only of his ſon and daughter whom he " was to leave in the world, he recommended them " to the King with abundance of tears, which ſhew- " ed ſufficiently, that if his Majeſty did not take par- " ticular care of them, he foreſaw that they would " be poiſoned as well as himſelf. The Ducheſs his " wife to compleat the tragedy, threw herſelf at the " King's feet, according to the Italian Authors, who " are in this point more to be credited than Commines, " who will have it to be at the feet of Lewis Sforza. " She was too haughty to ſtoop ſo low as that; and " if ſhe could have brought herſelf to it, ſhe was too " well convinced that her ſubmiſſion would be to no " purpoſe. She did not ſpeak of her children, be- " cauſe ſhe ſuppoſed the tears of her husband would " have their effect in this point: ſhe employed her's " for her father, and the King made her no other re- " ply, than that the expedition of Naples was too " far advanced, to be left unfiniſhed (9)."

(9) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles VIII. liv. 3. p. 253.

[E] It would be in vain to ſay that John Galeas died of being too fond of his wife: the tradition of his being poiſoned has prevailed.] Guiccardini acknowledges that the firſt was reported; but nevertheleſs he gives as the general opinion of all Italy, that this Prince died of the poiſon that Lewis Sforza had given him. Fu publicato da molti la morte di Giovan Galeazzo eſſere proceduta da coito immoderato; non dimeno ſi credette univerſalmente per tutta Italia, che e' fuſſe morto, non per infermita naturale ne per incontinentia, ma di veleno: e Teodoro da Pavia, uno de' Medici Regii, il quale era preſente quando Carlo lo viſitò, affermò haverne veduto ſegni manifeſtiſſimi. Ne fu alcuno, che dubitaſſe che ſe era ſtato veleno, non gli fuſſe ſtato dato per opera del zio (10). Jovianus Pontanus affirms, that every body ſpoke in plain terms of this abominable crime of Lewis Sforza. Ludovicum Sfortiam, qui pubeſcentem primo, dein adoleſcentem jam ætatem Joannis Galeatii fratris filii Mediolanenſis Ducis procuratione hactenus ac patrocinio tutatus eſt ſuo, veneno illum è medio ſuſtuliſſe cives, advenæ, peregrini, paſſim atque impune omnes prædicant. . . . . Fora, porticus, plateæ, circulique infimorum cujuſque generis hominum nefandi criminis accuſationibus . . . imprecationibus etiam maximè diris plena undique circumſonant (11). i. e. " Lewis Sforza, who was guardian and afterwards " patron to John Galeas his brother's ſon, is openly " and with impunity declared to have poiſoned him, " by citizens, ſtrangers and foreigners univerſally. " . . . . The market-places, porches, ſtreets, and cir- " cles of the very loweſt people reſound on all ſides " with accuſations of the moſt horrid crime . . . and " the moſt dreadful imprecations." The crowd of Hiſtorians run that way, Bernardin Corio (12), Peter Bembus (13), Vianoli (14), &c.

(10) Guicciardini lib. 1. pag. 27. ad ann. 1494.

(11) Jovian. Pontan. de Prudentiâ, lib. 4. initio.

(12) Corio, Hiſt. Mediolan. Part 7.

(13) Petr. Bembus, Hiſt. Venet. lib. 2. folio 30.

(14) Vianoli, Hiſt. Venet. Part 2. pag. 20.

[F] She loſt within the ſpace of ſome years her huſband, her father, her brother, her uncle, her ſon.] Paulus Jovius eloquently deſcribes this long ſeries of misfortunes, but he has not always obſerved the order of them: he has placed the death of the husband before that of the grandfather. As to the ſon of our Princeſs, he ſays the French took him away from his mother, and carried him to France, to make him a Monk, and that he died by a fall from his horſe. In venatione currentis equi lapſu in Heduis exanimatus eſſe nunciaretur. Hunc enim vel invita depoſcentibus Gallis tradiderat, à quibus cucullati ſacerdotii habitu in opulenti ſacerdotii cœnobium idcirco conjectus fuerat, ne Sforziani Regni legitimæ prolis hæres ſupereſſet (15). Bernardin Corio gives a moving deſcription of the grief into which this Princeſs was plunged, when ſhe ſaw at once her husband in the grave, her ſon excluded from the Duchy of Milan, and the wife of Lewis Sforza upon the throne. Li ſuoi fautori cridando Duca, viſito (Ludovico) il Tempio di Divo Ambroſio, e le campane in ſegno de letitia fece ſonare, il morto corpo di Giovanne Galeazo anchora eſſendo nel Domo ſcoperto, e quaſi univerſalmente da tutti pianto è condolato il miſerando e pietoſo caſo. Iſabella ſua mugliere a Pavia con li poveri figlioletti veſtiti de lugubre veſtimenti, come pregionera ſi recluſe entro una camera, e gran tempo ſtette giacendo ſopra la dura terra, che non vide aere. Doverebbe penſare ogni lettore l'acerbo caſo de la ſconſolata Duciſſa, e ſe piu duro il cuore haveſſe che diamante, piangerebbe a conſiderare qual doglia dovea eſſere quella de la ſciagurata e infelice mugliere, in uno punto vedere la morte del giovenetto e belliſſimo conſorte, la perdita de tutto lo imperio ſuo, e li figlioletti a canto orbati de ogni bene, il patre e fratello con la caſa ſua expulſi dal Neapolitano Reame, e Ludovica Sforza con Beatrice ſua mugliere nel modo dimoſtrato havergli occupata la Signoria. i. e. " Duke Lewis " viſited the church of St. Ambroſe, and cauſed " the bells to ring for joy, the corps of John Galeas " being ſtill in the Dome uncovered, and his piteous " caſe being as it were univerſally bewailed and la- " mented. Iſabella his wife being at Pavia with her " poor little children cloathed in mourning habits, " ſhut herſelf up in a chamber as a priſoner, and con- " tinued a long time lying on the hard ground, with- " out ſeeing the light. Every reader muſt needs " perceive the hard caſe of this diſconſolate Ducheſs, " and a heart harder than adamant will melt at the " conſideration of the anguiſh of this miſerable and " unhappy wife, who at the ſame time ſaw the death " of a young and moſt beautiful conſort, the loſs of " of all her dominions, and her children almoſt de- " prived of every thing, her father and brother with " their family driven out of the Kingdom of Na- " ples, and Lewis Sforza with his wife in the man- " ner we have ſhewn in poſſeſſion of the ſovereign- " ty."

(15) Jovius, Elogior. lib. 5. pag. 422.

[G] She gave room for ſlander when ſhe was upon the

6 the

Kingdom of Naples, there followed this example of her mother [H]; ſo true is it that it is the moſt common and the moſt inevitable ſtumbling block to the glory and merit of women, for them to live in a publick character. They are expoſed to go aſtray ſooner or later. Serius ocius ſors exitura.

Our Iſabella died the 11th of February 1524, as is mentioned in her epitaph, related by Mr. Miſſon, in the ſecond volume (k) of his Journey through Italy.

(k) Page 41 of the third edition.

the decline, and admitted the gallantries of Proſper Colonna, with very little regard for her reputation.] I learn this from Paulus Jovius, in the elogium he has made of this Princeſs. He concludes with a but, which contains the ſtory. Cæterum in hac eximiæ virtutis fœminâ improbæ plebis rumor non mediocriter pudoris decus perſtrinxit, ob id gravior, quod quum florente ætate impenetrabilem pudicitiam prætuliſſet, in ipſo demum ætatis flexu, Proſperum Columnam ſibi cultum & officium aſſiduè tribuentem, ſæpeque procacem ad urbaniores jocos admitteret (16).

(16) Jovius, Elogior. p. 424.

(17) Monſ. Varillas, in the Hiſtoire de Louis XII. lib. 1. pag. 47, ſays, that Louis Sforza finding himſelf compelled to go out of the Duchy of Milan, made over to the Ducheſs Iſabella the Duchy of Barri and the Principality of Roſſano, which had been given him as a recompence for having re-eſtabliſhed the houſe of Aragon on the throne of Naples.

[H] Bonna Sforza, her daughter, ... followed this example of her mother.] Thuanus tells us more ill of the daughter, than Paulus Jovius does of the mother. The reader may judge of it by comparing the paſſages: Eodem tempore, Bona Sforția, Sigiſmundi Auguſti Poloniæ Regis parens . . . . filii pertæſa, Sarmatiâ relictâ, in Italiam venit, & honorificè Venetiis excepta eſt . . . . unde paratam triremem conſcendens in Apuliam ad Barium navigavit, cujus urbis poſſeſſio gentilitio Aragoniæ gentis jure dotale & hæreditarium illi erat (17). Ibi ſolute & diſſentiente à priore vitæ ratione poſteà vixit, conſuetudine cujuſdam Papaciudæ non ſatis honeſtè uſa, cui & omnia bona teſtamento præteritis liberis reliquit, & fama ac bonis decoctis haud multo poſt in ſummâ egeſtate & infamiâ deceſſit (18). i. e. "At the ſame time, Bona Sforția, mother of "Sigiſmund Auguſtus King of Poland . . . . being "weary of her ſon, left Poland, came into Italy, "and was honourably received at Venice . . . whence "getting on board a galley, ſhe went into Apulia to "Barri, the poſſeſſion of which was the hereditary "eſtate of the Houſe of Aragon and her Dowry. "There ſhe afterwards lived in a looſe manner, and "differently from her former courſe of life, having "a diſhonourable familiarity with one Papacauda, to "whom ſhe gave all her goods by will, excluding her own children, and afterwards having deſtroyed both her reputation and fortune died not "long after in the greateſt want and infamy." Thus ſpeaks Thuanus of the Queen Dowager of Poland. He affirms, that after having ruined her fortune and reputation ſhe died in poverty and infamy. What can we add to this elogium?

(18) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 16. ad ann. 1555, pag. 326.

ARAGON (MARY OF) wife of the Emperor Otho III, and daughter of a King of Aragon, ſcandalized her character by her wantonneſs, which at laſt brought her to the puniſhment of being burnt by fire. She had the addreſs to procure for her waiting woman a young man, whom ſhe loved, and diſguiſed in a woman's habit (a). It muſt not be aſked whether ſhe uſed moderation; her conſtitution, and the conſtant opportunities tell ſufficiently that her pretended waiting woman did not want employment, and that ſhe attended all the motions of the Court. The Emperor having perceived this ſecret villany, was willing to lay the ſhame intirely on the Empreſs, and ſo in preſence of many witneſſes he made the young man be undreſt, and upon the diſcovery of his ſex, he condemned him to the fire. He was ſo good-natured as not to puniſh his wife, he hoped ſhe would reform her conduct for the future, but he was deceived: ſhe afterwards became deſperately in love with a young Count near Modena, and ſoon made her declaration to him; for ſhe was readier to court than be courted on ſuch occaſions. The Count being as chaſte as fair, withſtood all her advances, or rather the violent attacks that were made upon him, but if in that he imitated Joſeph, he had not the ſame good fortune to get rid of her for a priſon. The Empreſs complained to her huſband that this Count had ſpoken to her of love, and demanded that this preſumption ſhould not go unpuniſhed. The credulous Otho did not fail to behead the accuſed. But ſee how the accuſer had her turn. The Count ſeeing himſelf condemned, and hoping for no mercy, and being nevertheleſs unwilling to unravel the whole myſtery, had made his wife promiſe that ſhe would juſtify him to Otho as well as ſhe could. She kept her word to him, preſerved his head, and took an opportunity, when the Emperor was giving juſtice in a general Aſſembly, which he held in the midſt of a great plain near Placentia; ſhe took, I ſay, this time to demand that the murderer of her huſband ſhould be puniſhed. The Emperor, who did not know her, promiſed her juſtice, according to all the rigour of the Laws. Upon that the Counteſs ſhewed him the head of her huſband, and offered to juſtify his innocence by the proof of the fire. Her offers were accepted. A red hot iron was brought; ſhe took it, and held it as long as they demanded without being burnt, and then aſked boldly for the head of Otho, who was convicted of being the murderer of her huſband; laſt ſhe was contented with having the Empreſs puniſhed, whom Otho condemned to be burnt (b). This happened about the end of the tenth Century.

(a) Secum muliebri habitu circumduxit juvenem quo cum congrediebatur quotidie, quandoquidem eâ pro cubiculariâ utebatur: i. e. "She carried a "young man about with her diſguiſed in a "woman's habit, whom ſhe "enjoyed every "day, being taken for her "waiting woman." Munſteri Coſmographia, lib. 3.

(b) Gotfrid. Viterb Chronic. Part 17. Alb. Krantz. Cuſpinian. in Othone III. Sigonius, quoted by Maimbourg; Decadence de l'Empire, p. 118.

ARAMONT * (GABRIEL D') Ambaſſador of France to Conſtantinople, under the reign of Henry II, was a Gentleman of Gaſcoigne, who worthily acquitted himſelf of his employment. The Conſtable Montmorenci, examining the overture that Pope Paul III had made him, that the only way to take Placentia out of the hands of the Emperor was to bring the Turkiſh Fleet upon the coaſts of Naples and Sicily, obliged the King his Maſter to negotiate that affair with Soliman. They choſe Aramont for this buſineſs. He was neither leſs ſkilful nor leſs experienced then La Foret, Rincon, and Paulin, who had preceded him in this Embaſſy. He ſet him friends at the Port, who gained him free acceſs, and ſecret audiences; he knew how to turn things ſo well, that he reconciled Soliman, who had been prejudiced a little againſt the French. The only doubt that remained was to know about what the Fleet of his Highneſs ſhould be

* Arament. This Article is without any date. Mr. Bayle ſhould have obſerved, that the City of Tripoli was taken in September 1551. It appears that he returned to France in 1552. [CRIT. REM.]

be employed, for which reaſon Aramont returned quickly to France, to conſult with his Maſter how to employ uſefully the ſuccours of the Grand Seignior. The King and the Conſtable told him they had intelligence in the Iſland of Corſica, and that it would be eaſy to make themſelves maſters of it, provided the Turkiſh and French Fleets attacked them at the ſame time. He parted with this project to communicate it to the Grand Seignior, but as ſoon as he was landed at Malta, he was inſtantly deſired by the Grand Maſter (a) to go and find the Turkiſh Generals who had beſieged Tripoli in Barbary, and to employ his credit, and the authority of Henry II, to oblige them to raiſe the ſiege. He complied with this, and appeared at the camp of the Turks when their batteries began to play (b): He had many conferences with Sinan Baſſa, and with Dragut, in which he ſhewed them that they were engaged in an enterprize entirely oppoſite to the treaty which Soliman was going to conclude with France, ſince his Highneſs had agreed to attack only the Emperor, and that Tripoli belonged to the Order of Malta. They anſwered him that the Knights of Malta were perjured, who notwithſtanding the oath they had made to Soliman, when they were treated with ſo much honour upon their leaving Rhodes, inceſſantly made hoſtilities againſt the Turks. They added that they had orders to drive them out of Africa, and that they could not delay the execution of this order. Aramont did not want excuſes, nor replies; and ſeeing he could not gain any thing of Sinan Baſſa, he reſolved to ſet out in haſte for Conſtantinople, to obtain of Soliman, if it was poſſible, that they ſhould not take Tripoli. But as his credit and intrigues were not unknown to the Baſſa, he could not obtain leave to continue his journey till after the taking of Tripoli. He ſaved the life and liberty of the French that were in that place, and was alſo at a feaſt to which Sinan and Dragut invited him after their conqueſt. Charles the Fifth was too good a Politician not to make uſe of this event: he took occaſion from it to publiſh that France had contributed to the taking of Tripoli. Henry II did all he could to anſwer this complaint [A]. I have not had time to ſearch into the conſequence of the negotiations and adventures of Aramont. I know very well that ſometimes his diſpatches were intercepted, and that the Emperor made uſe of it to reproach the French with their intelligence with the Turks [B]. The relation of his Embaſſy is in manuſcript in the Library of Mr. de Lamoignon (c).

(a) He was a Spaniard named Omeda.

(b) See the judgment that has been made of this conduct by Mr. de Wicquefort, in his treatiſe of the Ambaſſador, Book 2. Sect. 30. pag. 110.

(c) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. pag. 200.

I have

[A] Henry II did all he could to anſwer the complaint of Charles V, that Aramont and the French had contributed to the taking of Tripoli (1).] The grand maſter of Malta accuſed our Aramont of having driven the Governor of Tripoli to capitulate. Thuanus, refuting this accuſation declares that the Conſtable under Montmorenci, who was very powerful at that time, had charged this Ambaſſador to teſtify to the Grand Maſter his particular attachment to him, and to the intereſts and proſperity of the Order. This Hiſtorian adds, that he has ſeen letters wherein the Conſtable ſhews a great deal of concern for the loſs of Tripoli, and that theſe letters cannot be ſuſpected of any diſſimulation, becauſe they were written to a perſon, to whom the Conſtable ſpoke his thoughts very freely (2). But when Henry II knew that the partiſans of the Emperor accuſed the French Ambaſſador of having contributed to this conqueſt of the Ottomans, he diſpatched a Gentleman to the Grand Maſter, to complain of the reports that were ſpread, and to aſk him how Aramont had conducted himſelf in this affair. He declared, he would cauſe him to be chaſtiſed, as the caſe required, if he was found in any fault; but hoped at the ſame time that if the Ambaſſador was innocent, the Grand Maſter would be pleaſed to give a public teſtimony of it. The Grand Maſter's anſwer fully acquitted Aramont. Quo in negotio nullum officium prætermiſiſſet ut ordini ea in re noſtro gratificaretur, hoc enim à V. M. enixe ac religioſe ſibi injunctum. Præterea ut quorum culpa ea clades accepta eſſet certò cunctis conſtaret, undique probationes collegimus, & inquiſitione diligenti ſuper ea re habitâ nihil comperimus quo Aramontium cladi cauſam dediſſe, aut deditionis auctorem, fuiſſe credi debeat. Quinimo ex equitibus captivis .... didicimus eum non ſolum omni culpa vacare, ſed multis beneſactis totum ordinem ſibi devinxiſſe, ac proinde non recte nec ſecundum rationem factum exiſtimamus ut is rumor ſparſus ſit (3); i. e. "In which buſineſs he omitted nothing "that might gratify our Order, as being earneſtly and "religiouſly enjoined him by your Majeſty. Beſides, "that it may appear manifeſtly to all who is to be "blamed for that misfortune, we have collected proofs "on all hands, and upon a diligent inquiry have found "no reaſon to lay any part of it on Aramont. We "have learned moreover from the captive Knights "that he is not only blameleſs, but that he has laid "the whole Order under obligations to him, and "therefore we are of opinion that this report is ſpread "without either juſtice or reaſon." The King of France did not fail to produce this anſwer in all the courts of Europe, to ſhew that his enemies vented wrongfully and without foundation every thing that might render him odious. Eas literas.... poſtea Rex per Oratores ſuos paſſim publicari juſſit, quâ publicatione compreſſis Cæſarianorum querelis ac rumoribus, evulgata in Gallici nominis invidiam fama pariter conquievit (4). That was ſufficient to ſhew that the partiſans of Charles V were miſtaken in this point; but thoſe who did not love France excuſed themſelves eaſily. We imagine without difficulty, when it ſuits with our inclinations, that we may interpret every thing in a certain ſenſe, according to the ſyſtem that has once been built upon very probable reaſons. It is in truth an inexhauſtible ſource of falſe judgments; but provided they ſerve our purpoſe, we are in no great pain about them.

(1) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 2. pag. 198, & ſeq. under the year 1551. See Thuanus alſo, lib. 7. pag. 155.

(2) To Briſſac, who commanded in Piedmont.

(3) Thuan. lib. 7. ſub fin.

(4) Idem, ibid.

[B] Aramont's intercepted letters were made uſe of to reproach the French with their intelligence with the Turks.] Charles V, in a letter which he wrote in 1552 to the Princes and States of the Empire, is aſtoniſhed that the French Ambaſſador ſhould think he had juſtified his maſter with regard to his correſpondence with Soliman: "Have I not, ſays he, he "Memoirs of Aramont drawn up at Conſtantinople "which confirm the truth of the alliance being ma-"naged againſt a Chriſtian Prince between the Port "and France." Jam quod de communicatis cum Turco conſiliis obiter perſtringit, quaſi abunde purgatum exiſtimet, qua fronte excuſare poteſt? atqui penes me habeo Aramontii Gallici legati commentarios Byzantii ſcriptos, & ad Regem per Coſtam Centurionem quendam miſſos, qui ſocietatis cum Turcis in Chriſtiani nominis Principem initæ plenam fidem faciunt (5). Mr. Varillas obſerves, that the Pope and the Emperor already deſigned to accuſe the King of France, in full council, of holding intelligence with the Infidels, and produce to that purpoſe ſome intercepted letters of Aramont, to which it was eaſy to give an ill ſenſe, becauſe the truth was explained in it but by halves (6). But what have we to do with an ill ſenſe, ſeeing it was paſt all doubt that Aramont negotiated a treaty between France and the Port againſt the Houſe of Auſtria? Was not that ſufficient to prove the intelligence of which they had a mind to accuſe Henry II? The beſt method that France could take was not to conteſt the fact, but to inſiſt

(5) Idem, lib. 10. pag. 213.

(6) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 2. pag. 202.

I have juſt read a thing which ought to ſerve as an addition to this Article. The Iſles d'Or in Provence, that is, the Iſles d'Hieres, were raiſed to a Marquiſate by letters from King Henry II, confirmed at the Parliament of Aix; and with this Marquiſate was inveſted and enſeiſined the Lord of Aramond, Ambaſſador from France to Conſtantinople, to keep it in fief of the King, at the expreſs charge of building in theſe Iſles, Caſtles, Towers and Fortreſſes, to the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns (d).

(d) St. Lazare, Hiſtoire des Dignitez Honoraires de France, pag. 400. edition de Paris, 1635, in 8vo.

inſiſt upon the equity of it, by ſhewing that when religion is not concerned, but only the oppoſing an invaſion of one's territories, one ought to be permitted to get allies whereever one is able. If Charles V had not always had a good ſupply of them amongſt the Chriſtian Princes, Papiſts or not Papiſts, he would have known well enough how to find them amongſt the Infidels, and to make more advantage of them than France did. He had much more addreſs than Francis. With him, the Turkiſh fleets would not have been uſeleſs, as they were with the French, who concerted things ſo ill, that we are either aſhamed of them or pity them, or make a jeſt of them when we read the Hiſtory of thoſe times. Integrity would not be unſerviceable on theſe occaſions. It would hinder us from reproaching our enemies with alliances with Hereticks, or Infidels, when we perceived our ſelves to be ready to make the ſame alliances, if the maxims of State requir'd it. Where then would be the perſons, who could make pathetic harangues, preſent fine memorials, and make a hundred fine common places? All that muſt be laid aſide; we ſhould do our ſelves a great prejudice: We ſhould throw no duſt in the eyes; we ſhould not ſtir up the people: we muſt renounce a thouſand exquiſite praiſes, and a hundred pompous titles.

Accuſat Manilia ſi rea non eſt (7).

(7) Juvenal. Sat. 6. verſu 243.

" ——— ———Manilia will,
" If not Defendant, be the Plantiff ſtill."
Sir Rob. Stapylton.

Uſually in this caſe we do not leave off reproaches, till we deſerve them ourſelves.

☞ARATUS a Greek Poet, was born at Soli or Solæ [A], a city in Cilicia, and flouriſhed about the beginning of the hundred and twenty fourth Olympiad, in the reign of Ptolomy Philadelphus King of Egypt, and Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, the ſon of Demetrius Poliorcetes. His father's name was Athenodorus, and his mother's Lenodata, or according to others Letophila. He ſtudied under Dionyſius Heracleotes, and was familiar with King Antigonus abovementioned and his wife Phila [B]. He had three brothers, Myris, Kalondas, and Athenodorus, who is ſaid to have been the firſt, that vindicated Homer's Poems againſt Zoilus. He was preſent at the marriage of Antigonus, and continued at his court the reſt of his life (a). His Phænomena, which are ſtill extant, might perhaps give him a title to the character of an Aſtronomer, as well as of a Poet. He wrote this Poem in Greek verſe, and it was tranſlated into Latin by Cicero, who tells us in his firſt book de Oratore, that the verſes of Aratus are very noble and beautiful, but that the Author did not underſtand Aſtronomy; and it is ſaid, that he borrowed his materials from Eudoxus. We ſhall give the judgment of Quintilian and other writers concerning this Poet in the note [C]. Cicero's tranſlation of his Poem is objected to by the Critics in ſeveral places; but theſe defects may ſufficiently be excuſed, by conſidering that he was very young when he made that verſion. Our Poet had the honour of being tranſlated into Latin by other hands beſides Cicero; for there is a tranſlation of him, which is publiſhed under the name of Germanicus Cæſar, and another under that of Feſtus Avienus. The Scholiaſt upon the ſixth Idyllium of Theocritus tells us, that he was an intimate friend of our Author. There is a good edition of his Poem publiſhed by Grotius at Leyden in 4to 1600, in Greek and Latin, in which we have the text of Aratus with the Fragments of Cicero's Latin Verſion, which Grotius has ſupplied where it was defective, and the tranſlations of Germanicus and Avienus; all which the editor has illuſtrated with curious

(a) See Baillet, Jugemens des Savans ſur les Poetes Grecs, tom. 3. Part 1. n. 1126. p. 427. edit. Amſterdam 1725.

[A] He was of Soli or Solæ.] The Greeks, who lived here amongſt the Cilicians, having corrupted their language, it came to paſs that thoſe who ſpoke barbarouſly were called Σολοικοι, i. e. dwellers at Solæ, and a corrupt dialect σολοικισμὸς, a ſolæciſm. This city was afterwards called Pompeiopolis from Pompey the Great, who tranſported ſome Pirates thither.

[B] He was familiar with King Antigonus abovementioned, and his wife Phila.] Suidas mentions an Epigram, that he wrote on this Phila, who was the daughter of Antipater. He went to Macedon at the time of the celebration of the nuptials of Antigonus and Phila, and was greatly careſſed by them, and lived in that court till the time of his death.

[C] We ſhall give the judgment of Quintilian and other Writers concerning this Poet in the Note.] Quintilian in the tenth Book of his Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ (1) obſerves, that his ſubject has nothing of the pathos, no variety, no fictitious perſons introduced ſpeaking, with the other ornaments, which have ſo great an effect in other kinds of Poetry; however, that he was very capable of executing the deſign which he undertook. Arati materia motu caret, ut in quâ nulla varietas, nullus affectus, nulla perſona, cui uſquam ſit oratio; ſufficit tamen operi, cui ſe parem credidit. Mr. Baillet in his Jugemens de Savans (2) has rendered this paſſage in this manner; " the Diction of Aratus " has no flowers nor ornaments, nor epiſodes, nor " poetical variety, nor any of the qualifications which " touch the minds of thoſe, who read Verſes; " but Quintilian adds, that he was very able to per- " form the task, which he had attempted." Cependant Quintilien écrit, que la diction d'Aratus n'a ni fleurs ni ornemens, ni epiſodes, ni varieté poetique, ni aucune de ces qualités, qui touchent le cœur de ceux qui liſent des vers; mais il ajoute qu'il étoit fort capable d'exécuter le deſſein qu'il avoit entrepis. This is undoubtedly a very inaccurate repreſentation of Quintilian's ſenſe; who, as it appears from the latter part of the paſſage quoted above, intimates that Aratus did not attempt to maintain the character of a Poet in the ſubject, which he treats of, and therefore confined himſelf only to the verſification, And therefore what Mr. Baillet ſays afterwards, that Quintilian is not very conſiſtent with Cicero, either with regard to his ſubject on the form and ſtructure of his Verſe, is a miſtake in that critic, ſince Quintilian is ſo far from cenſuring the verſification of Aratus, that on the contrary he confirms what Cicero ſays, that his Verſes are very beautiful and good; ornatiſſimos atque optimos. Mr. Baillet obſerves, that his ſubject was not well adapted for Poetry; which he ſuppoſes to be the reaſon why Ludovico Caſtelvetro in his Commentary upon Ariſtotle's Art of Poetry conſiders him rather as a Verſifier than as a real Poet.

(1) Cap. 1.

(2) Tom. 3. Part 1. n. 1126. pag. 428. edit. Amſterd. 1725.

curious notes. It is evident that this Poet was highly valued among the Antients, ſince we find ſo great a number of Scholiaſts and Commentators upon him [D], among whom are Ariſtarchus of Samos, the two Ariſtyllus's the Geometricians, the two Evænetus's, Crates, Numenius the Grammarian, Pyrrhus of Magneſia, one Thales, Zeno, and ſeveral others, whoſe works are loſt (b). There are ſeveral other works alſo aſcribed to him [E]. Virgil has tranſlated a great many entire lines from this Author [F]. St. Paul has given a kind of ſanction to our Poet by quoting him [G].

(b) Idem, pag. 429.

ARATUS

[D] Scholiaſts and Commentators upon him.] We have a catalogue of them at the end of the Iſagogical Treatiſe publiſhed under the fictitious name of Eratoſthenes or Hipparchus upon the Phænomena of Aratus. But we are not to imagine, as Mr. de la Monnoye obſerves in his Notes upon Mr. Baillet's Jugemens des Savans (3), that the Authors there mention'd to the number of thirty ſeven were all of them Commentators upon this Poet, ſince ſeveral of them only made ſhort remarks occaſionally upon ſome paſſages of his Poem; and Callimachus, who is ranked among thoſe that commented upon Aratus, only ſpeaks of him as an imitator of the Aſtronomics of Heſiod.

(3) Ubi ſupra, pag. 429.

[E] There are ſeveral other works aſcribed to him.] Suidas mentions Hymns to Pan, σποιδοφόροι, παίγνια, Aſtrology and Aſtrotheſy, a Compoſition of Antidotes, ἀνθρωπογονία,, an ἐπιθυτικὸν on Theopropus, an ἠθοποιία on Antigonus, an Epigram on Phila the daughter of Antipater and wife of Antigonus, an Anatomy on Pauſanias the Macedonian, an Epicedium of Cleombrotus, a Correction of the Odyſſey, and ſome Epiſtles in proſe.

[F] Virgil has tranſlated a great many entire lines from this Author.] I ſhall give a few inſtances.

Καί μιν πτιφαίνοι δύω πόλοι ἀμφοτέρωθεν·
Ἀλλ' ὁ μὲν ἐκ ἐπίοπτος, ὁ δ' ἀντίος ἐκ βορέαο
Ὑψόθεν ἀκρεμονῆος· δύω δέ μιν ἀμφὶς ἔχουσαι
Ἄρκτοι ἅμα τροχόωσι· ——————
Τὰς δὲ δ' ἀμφοτέρας οὐ ποταμοῖο ἀπόῤῥωξ,
Εἰλεῖται, μέγα θαῦμα, θράκων, περὶ τ' ἀμφὶς ἰαγὼς (4).

(4) Aratus in Phænomenis.

Mundus ut ad Scythiam Riphæaſque arduus arces
Conſurgit; premitur Libyæ devexus in Auſtros.
Hic vertex nobis ſemper ſublimis; at illum
Sub pedibus Styx atra videt, manesque profundi.
Maximus hic flexu ſinuoſo elabitur Anguis
Circum, perque duas in morem fluminis Arctos;
Arctos, Oceani metuentes æquore tingui (5).

(5) Virg. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 240.

" As, ſteep, to Scythian heights the world aſcends,
" Downwards the ball to Lybian tempeſts bends:
" This Cove to us is ſtill ſublimely high,
" And that below, Styx, and the Ghoſts deſcry:
" Here the vaſt Snake in winding circles glides,
" And either Arctos, like a ſtream, divides.

Σῆμα δέ τοι ἀνέμοιο καὶ οἰδαίνουσα θάλασσα
Γιγνέσθω καὶ μακρὸν ἐπ' αἰγιαλοὶ βοόωσιν,
Ἀκτή τ' εἰνάλιοι, ὁπότ' ἔνδοθι ἠχήσωσαι
Γίγνωνται, κορυφαί τε βοώμεναι οὔρεος ἄκραι (6).

(6) Aratus in Διοσημείοις.

Continuo ventis ſurgentibus, aut freta ponti
Incipiunt agitata tumeſcere, & aridus altis
Montibus audiri fragor: aut reſonantia longe
Litora miſceri, & nemorum increbeſcere murmur (7).

(7) Virg. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 356.

" For e'er the riſing winds begin to roar,
" The working Seas advance to waſh the ſhoar:
" Soft whiſpers run along the leafy woods,
" And mountains whiſtle to the murm'ring floods:
Dryden.

Ἡελίοιο δέ τοι μηλέτω ἐκάστιθεν ἰόντος,
Ἠελίῳ καὶ μᾶλλον ἐοικότα σήματα κεῖται,
Ἀμφότερον, δύνοντι, καὶ ἐκ πηράτης ἀνιόντι (8).

(8) Aratus in Διοσημείοις.

Sol quoque & exoriens, & cum ſe condet in undas;
Signa dabit (9).

(9) Virg. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 438.

" And thus the Sun, as riſing he appears,
" Or dipt in Ocean, various ſigns declares."

[G] St. Paul has given a kind of ſanction to our Poet by quoting him.] It is in his ſpeech to the Athenians (10), wherein he tells them that ſome of their own Poets have ſaid, τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος ἐσμὲν, i. e. " for we are " alſo his off-ſpring." Theſe words are the beginning of the fifth line of the Phænomena of Aratus. The uſe the Apoſtle makes of this quotation from our Poet is to urge that, ſeeing we are the off-ſpring of God, we ought to think more highly of the divine Nature, than to imagine it can be like gold or ſilver or any other human workmanſhip. The Poets were in a manner the Prophets of the Pagan Religion. They preſerved the Genealogies of the Gods and the chief ceremonies of their worſhip. St. Paul quotes Aratus here, who is his own countryman, they being both natives of Cilicia. The ſenſe of the whole paſſage, which the Apoſtle alludes to, is as follows: It is our duty to begin with Jupiter, whom it is not lawful to forget. Every thing is full of Jupiter; he fills the ſtreets, the publick places, and the aſſemblies of men. All the ſea and the heavens are full of him; and in every place we have all of us need of Jupiter. Father Calmet upon this paſſage of St. Paul obſerves, that he did not deſign to conſider Jupiter as a real Being; but only to aſſume his name as that of God, as it was underſtood by the Pagans, before whom he ſpoke; and he drew an argument againſt them from their own principles. If it be true that Jupiter or the Deity be every where, and that we have need of his continual influence and concurrence for our ſubſiſtence, God cannot certainly be corporeal, nor at a diſtance from us, nor unaffected by what we do. Lucan in the 9th book of his Pharſalia has a fine paſſage to this purpoſe:

(10) Acts, chap. xvii. ver. 28.

Jupiter eſt quodcunque vides, quocunque moveris.

" Jove is whate'er you ſee, wheree'er you move."

And again,

Jovis omnia plena.

" All things are full of Jove."

The Stoics and the Platoniſts were of opinion, that God was the Soul of the World, and that he gave life, and being, and motion to all creatures. This notion may be underſtood in a good ſenſe, ſince it is certain that God is the firſt principle of all things. But if it be taken in a corporeal ſenſe, ſo that God is ſuppoſed to exiſt in parts in different beings, as thoſe Philoſophers ſeem to inſinuate ſometimes, this is abſolutely inconſiſtent with the Nature of God. Virgil in his fourth book of Georgics ſays,

——— Deum namque ire per omneis
Terraſque tractuſque maris, cœlumque profundum;
Hinc pecudes, armenta, viros, genus omne ferarum,
Quemque ſibi tenues naſcentem arceſcere vitas.

" —— God the whole created maſs inſpires;
" Thro' heav'n and earth, and ocean's depth he " throws
" His influence round, and kindles as he goes.
" Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beaſts,
" and fowls
" With breath are quicken'd, and attract their
" ſouls." Dryden.

There is a very remarkable paſſage in Apuleius's tranſlation of the book De Mundo, wherein we are told, that it is an ancient opinion, and one, that has entirely poſſeſſed the minds of all mankind, that God is the original Author and Source of all being, and the Preſerver of thoſe things, which he created. Nor is there any thing endowed with ſuch an innate power as to be able to ſubſiſt by its own nature, ſeparate from the aſſiſtance of God. The Poets have followed

ARATUS of Sicyon was the ſon of Clinias [A] and Ariſtodama. His father having been killed by Abantidas, who had made himſelf the Tyrant of Sicyon, Aratus, then but ſeventeen years old, narrowly eſcaped with his life [B]. He was ſent ſecretly to Argos, where his father's death and his own misfortunes ſoon inſpired him with a great averſion for tyranny, which ſtill encreaſed as he grew up. In his younger years he took ſo much delight in exerciſes of his body [C], that he in a manner neglected the ſtudy of Eloquence, ſo neceſſary for a man who was once to be at the head of a powerful Commonwealth. Yet it appears by his Commentaries, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, that he was not entirely unacquainted with that art. As he advanced in years, his great virtues and ſhining qualifications drew upon him the eyes of all thoſe, who as well as himſelf were baniſhed their native country; and ſcarce was he twenty old, but he undertook to deliver Sicyon from tyranny, which he accompliſhed according to his wiſhes [D] (a). This happened in the fourth year of the hundred and thirty firſt Olympiad (b). A great many Citizens who had been baniſhed by the Tyrants, or who had voluntarily left the City, returned home upon the reſtoration of liberty. They immediately claimed their ed this opinion, and affirmed that "all things are "full of Jove," Jovis omnia plena, by means of whoſe preſence not only the thinking faculty, but even the eyes and ears and the ſenſible ſubſtance exert their power. Vetus opinio eſt, atque cogitationes omnium hominum penitus inſedit, Deum eſſe originis & haberi auctorem, Deumque ipſum ſalutem eſſe & perſeverantiam earum, quas effecerat, rerum. Neque ulla res eſt tam præſtantibus viribus, quæ viduata Dei auxilio ſui natura contenta ſit. Hanc opinionem vates ſequuti profiteri auſi ſunt omnia Jove plena eſſe, cujus præſentia non jam cogitatio ſola, ſed oculi & aures & ſenſibilis ſubſtantia comprehendit. We may obſerve here, with Father Calmet, that the example of St. Paul, who cites a Pagan Poet, may ſerve to juſtify thoſe, who make uſe of ſuch kind of teſtimonies in their diſcourſes. Clemens Alexandrinus tells us in the ſixth book of his Stromata, that St. Paul adviſed the Chriſtians to read ſometimes the writings of the Heathens, and among the reſt thoſe of the Sibyls and of Hyſtaſpes, and he gives an account of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe upon that ſubject. But it is very probable, that Clemens, who frequently paid regard to books of little or no authority, took this ſtory from ſome ſpurious writers; and that thoſe, who forged the pretended writings of the Sibyls and Hyſtaſpes, might have invented likewiſe this account in order to give a ſanction to their books.

(a) Plutarch, in Arato, Oper. tom. 1. p. 1020.

(b) 501 ſince the building of Rome, 253 before Chriſt. Petav. Rat. Temp. Part. 1. lib. 4. cap. 4. p. m. 130.

have paſſed for the moſt inconſiderate and imprudent man, if his undertaking had not been attended with ſucceſs. Aratus at firſt conſulted with ſome of his fellow exiles, what place it would be proper firſt to ſeize upon, whence they might make war againſt the tyrant. Whilſt they were debating this point, a priſoner, who had made his eſcape out of priſon, came to Argos, and ſhewed Aratus and his friends a place where it was eaſy to get over the wall of Sicyon, and ſo into the city. Aratus ſent immediately ſome perſons to enquire into this affair, who on their return confirmed the former account, but added that the only difficulty was to continue undiſcovered; becauſe there was a Gardiner, who lived juſt by the only place, where they could get into the city, and who had ſeveral little dogs, which would certainly diſcover them by their barking. To remove this difficulty, Aratus ſent five perſons before hand, who were to pretend they were travellers, and endeavour to get a lodging at the Gardiner's, in order to lock him up with his dogs. There was another difficulty to be removed. Nicocles the tyrant of Sicyon had ſome ſuſpicions againſt Aratus, and conſtantly kept ſpies at Argos, who narrowly watched all Aratus's actions. He therefore to amuſe and delude them, feigned to be entirely given up to pleaſure, which ſucceeded ſo happily that Nicocles's ſpies laugh'd at him, for being afraid of a young man, who in his baniſhment, thought of nothing, as they imagined, but his diverſions. But when the time appointed for the expedition came on, Aratus went immediately with his friends and as many perſons free or ſlaves as he could aſſemble, to that part of the wall which had been marked to them. It was not without difficulty that they got over it, having been very near diſcovered by a party of ſoldiers, who paſſed their rounds, and alſo by the Gardiner's dogs, and by a greyhound, who all fell a barking, and alarmed the watch; who asked what was the matter? But the perſon to whom the greyhound belonged, anſwered, that the dogs barked only at the patroll. Whether he thought ſo himſelf, or whether ſuſpecting Aratus's deſign, he had a mind to favour it, is not known; however this gave Aratus and his ſoldiers a great deal of courage, becauſe they thought that they ſhould find many perſons in the city, who would ſupport and aſſiſt them in their undertaking. After ſome difficulties they got over the walls, and went directly to Nicocles's houſe. They took them all priſoners without killing any of them. Aratus ſent immediately to all his friends, who were in the city. It began now to be day light; the people, without knowing what was the matter, aſſembled in the market place; whither he ſent a perſon to declare, that Aratus, the ſon of Clinias, exhorted all the citizens to aſſert their liberty. The people in hopes now, that this was the moment they had long wiſhed for, went in a body to Nicocles's houſe and ſet it on fire. The tyrant finding in what danger he was, made his eſcape through ſubterraneous paſſages. The people and ſoldiers knowing that he was gone away extinguiſhed the fire, and plunder'd his houſe, which Aratus did not think proper to prevent. Plutarch, who gives us this account obſerves (9), that the liberty of Sicyon was reſtored without bloodſhed; not one ſingle perſon having been killed or wounded on either ſide.

(9) Ibid. p. 1029, 1030, 1031.

(1) In Arato, Oper. tom. 1. pag. 1028.
(2) In Corinthiacis, ſive lib. 2. p. 99.

[A] The ſon of Clinias.] This is what Plutarch (1) and Pauſanias (2) tell us for fact. But as there muſt always be ſomething extraordinary in the birth of great men, and it is thought a conſiderable addition to their glory, to be deſcended from ſome God, the Sicyonians pretended that Aratus was the ſon of Æſculapius, who, as they ſaid, had lain with Aratus's mother under the ſhape of a dragon (3); and there was in Pauſanias's time in the Temple of Æſculapius at Sicyon the ſtatue of a woman ſitting upon a Dragon. The people ſaid this woman was Aratus's mother, the Dragon repreſenting Æſculapius, who was thought to be his father (4). We may obſerve by the way, that Clinias Aratus's father had been for ſome time the chief Magiſtrate of Sicyon (5).

(3) Pauſan. in Meſſen. ſive l. 4. p. 243.

(4) Pauſan. in Corinth. p. 103.

(5) Ibid. p. 99.

[B] Aratus—narrowly eſcaped with his life.] The tyrant was reſolved to kill the youth, who wandering up and down the city, without knowing whither to retire, or where to find any aſſiſtance, entered ſecretly into an houſe, in order to hide himſelf. It happened to be the houſe of Abantidas's own ſiſter, but ſhe was married to Prophantus the brother of Clinias, ſo that ſhe was Aratus's aunt. That generous Lady hid him in her houſe till night, and then ſent him ſafely to Argos (6).

(6) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

[C] He took much delight in exerciſes of his body.] Finding that as he grew up his body was ſtreight and well ſhaped, and his conſtitution ſtrong, he exerciſed himſelf in wreſtling. He engaged in what the Greeks called Pentathlon (πένταθλον), which conſiſted of five different exerciſes, boxing, running, leaping, wreſtling, and throwing of iron balls (7); and won the prize in thoſe games (8).

(7) The Greek word is δίσκος, which ſignifies a ball of iron, braſs, ſtone, or wood, which the Athletæ uſed to throw into the air, as high as they could, to exerciſe themſelves.

(8) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

[D] He undertook to deliver Sicyon, and accompliſhed it.] The manner in which he performed it is very ſurprizing. It appeared ſo chimerical to ſeveral of thoſe to whom Aratus propoſed his deſign, and who endeavoured to diſſuade him from it, that he would their former eſtates, which had been confiſcated by the Tyrants, and given to others. This threw Aratus into the utmoſt perplexity, becauſe it was like to occaſion a civil war. However, he found means to prevent this evil. He bought the eſtates of thoſe who were poſſeſſed of them, and returned them to their old proprietors (c) [E]. Sicyon being now free, Aratus thought that the beſt method to ſecure it againſt the power of the Macedonians, was to unite it to the Commonwealth of the Achæans, whoſe manners and laws he had always approved (d). Eight years after this, being appointed General of the Achæans for the ſecond time, he made himſelf maſter of the ſtrong Caſtle of Corinth (e), which had been truly called the fetters of Greece, becauſe it entirely commanded the paſſage from Peloponneſus into the other parts of Greece (f). It was therefore of great ſervice to all Greece when he took that Caſtle out of the hands of the Macedonians, tho' perhaps the means he employed cannot be excuſed but [F] by this maxim, that every artifice is honourable and lawful againſt thoſe, whoſe power is to be dreaded. The Corinthians having thus recovered their liberty through the ſurrender of their Caſtle by the Macedonians, united themſelves by Aratus's advice to the Commonwealth of the Achæans (g). This happened in the firſt year of the 134th Olympiad (h). The ſame year he took by ſtratagem the city of Megara, and ſubjected it to the Achæans. The ſucceſs which attended all his undertakings, gained him much credit amongſt the Achæans; and to ſupport his reputation, he directed all his views and deſigns to theſe ends only, the (c) Pauſanias in Corinthiac. p. 99.

(d) Pauſan. ibid. p. 100. Polyb. Hiſt. lib. 2. pag. 180. ed. Caſaubon, 8vo.

(e) Called in Greek Ἀκροκόρινθος.

(f) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, p. 1034.

(g) Polyb. lib. 2. p. 181.

(h) Ibid. Hiſt. Polyb. Syncpſ. Chronol. p. 1595. This was in the year of Rome 510, 243 before Chriſt.

[E] He bought the eſtates of thoſe, who were poſſeſſed of them, and returned them to their old proprietors.] Pauſanias relates this in a few words, and as he is very ſhort in his account of Aratus, he does not tell us, whence Aratus could get money enough to buy ſo many eſtates, ſince according to Plutarch (10), there were about five hundred and eighty perſons, who returned to Sicyon. But the laſt mentioned author tells us, that Aratus had received of Ptolomy, King of Egypt, a preſent of twenty five talents (11). This money he diſtributed amongſt the poor citizens, and employed alſo part of it to redeem ſuch as had been made ſlaves. But he wanted a much larger ſum to buy the eſtates of thoſe who had been baniſhed. He therefore reſolved to go himſelf into Egypt, where he more and more inſinuated himſelf into the friendſhip of Ptolomy, who promiſed him an hundred and fifty talents, of which he gave him immediately forty. Thoſe Aratus carried with him into Greece; the reſt of the money was ſent afterwards at different times, but very faithfully. Plutarch, who relates this, tells us, that one of the reaſons of Ptolomy's friendſhip for Aratus was, that he had made the King a preſent of ſeveral paintings and pictures from Greece, Aratus having a very good taſte for painting. What Plutarch adds, is ſtill more to the honour of Aratus, and ſhews his moderation, and the modeſt opinion he had of himſelf. He had been choſen judge to compoſe the difference, which had ariſen concerning the confiſcated eſtates of the exiles, with a full power to determine what he thought proper and convenient. But he was not ſo preſuming as to take upon him alone ſo great a truſt: he choſe fifteen citizens to aſſiſt him in the diſcharge of it; and with much care, prudence and labour reſtored a perfect friendſhip and harmony amonſt all the inhabitants; which gained him an univerſal love and eſteem, ſo that not only the whole commonwealth conferred great honours upon him, but even the exiles, to whom he had reſtored their ancient eſtates, erected at their own coſt a ſtatue to him, on which they engraved a very noble inſcription. Antigonus King of Macedon, ſeeing that Aratus had eſcaped the hatred and envy of his citizens, by his prudence, and that he was very much in favour with Ptolomy King of Egypt, reſolved to render him ſuſpicious to that King, or at leaſt to procure his friendſhip for himſelf; but finding that he was proof againſt his preſents, he ſent him part of the ſacrifice he had offered to the Gods of Corinth (12), which was a very great honour; and being at ſupper with a great many perſons, he ſpoke very much in praiſe of Aratus; "I thought, ſaid he, that this young "man was only of a generous temper, and zealous "for the good of his fellow citizens. But I find "that he is alſo a very good judge of the lives and "actions of Kings, and knows how to ſet a juſt va"lue upon them; for he deſpiſed us formerly (mean"ing himſelf and his Macedonians) all his hopes "and expectations being turned towards a foreign "aſſiſtance (that of King Ptolomy); and he was amaz'd "at the power of Egypt, when he heard of their "elephants, their fleets, their magnificent court. "But ſince he has conſidered all this more diſtinctly, "he has found, that it is nothing, but a mere ſhew "and ſhadow, and has entirely devoted himſelf to us. "I will therefore love this youth, and for the future "employ his aſſiſtance in every thing; and I com"mand you all to be his friends." Such a diſcourſe being ſpoken before a great many people, there were not wanting thoſe, who out of envy againſt Aratus, were very forward in writing it to Ptolomy, in order to render Aratus ſuſpicious to him: and indeed he ſucceeded ſo ar, that Ptolomy wrote expoſtulatory letters to Aratus (13), which Aratus could probably anſwer without much difficulty, tho' Plutarch does not ſpeak of his anſwer.

(10) Ibid.

(11) That is, 4687 pounds ten ſhillings, if meant of Attic money; or 11250 pounds of Alexandrian money, as we may ſuppoſe, ſince it was a preſent made by a King of Egypt. See Prideaux. Connex. vol. 1. Pref. p. 21. 8vo, edit.

(12) Then in the power of the Macedonians.

(13) Plutarch. ubi ſupra p. 1033.

[F] The means he employed cannot be excuſed, but &c.] We may obſerve in the firſt place, that the Achæans were in full peace with Antigonus, when Aratus made himſelf Maſter of Corinth; but it will perhaps be ſaid in his behalf, that to deliver a country from ſlavery is always a laudable action; that when a tyrant breaks thro' all the ties of ſociety, we are for that very reaſon diſengaged from all obligations, with regard to him; that the Macedonians having no right to rule over the Corinthians, Aratus or any other perſon might aſſiſt them and reſtore their liberty, without breaking thro' the rules of morality, or offending againſt the law of nature. We ſhall not therefore cenſure Aratus on that account. But the method he employed, to make himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Corinth, ſeems to have ſomething in it very mean, and below the dignity of a man of courage. The fact according to Plutarch is as follows (14). There were four brothers Syrians by birth; One of them, called Diocles, was a ſoldier of the garriſon in the caſtle; the three others having ſtolen the Kings money, were fled to Sicyon, and hid themſelves at a Silverſmith's, named Ægia, who ſometimes worked for Aratus. One of theſe Syrians ſpeaking often with Ægia happened to tell him, that going to his brother in the caſtle, he had perceived a place, whence it would not be very difficult to get into it. You fools, ſaid Ægia to him, you amuſe yourſelves with ſtealing a little of the King's money, which cannot much diſconcert his affairs, when it is in your power to ruin them intirely in an hour's time, and procure to yourſelves immenſe treaſures. Don't you know, that thieves are capitally puniſhed as well as traitors? Erginus, (this was the Syrian's name,) took the hint, and promiſed immediately that he would try to prevail upon his brother. He went to him directly, and returning ſoon after, he gave his word to Aratus that he would conduct him to a place, where the wall of the caſtle was not above fifteen feet high, and that his brother Diocles would do what lay in his power to aſſiſt him in the taking of the caſtle. Aratus agreed with him, that if the enterprize ſucceeded, he would give him ſixty talents; if they did not ſucceed, but eſcaped with their lives, he would make each of them a preſent of a horſe, and gave them one talent beſides. The traitors had bargained that the ſixty ta-

(14) Ibid. pag. 1035.

the expulſion of the Macedonians out of Peloponneſus, and the aſſerting of the common liberty of Greece (i). As he found that gold was a ſhorter method to win people than arms, he often made uſe of it. He gave an hundred and fifty talents to Diogenes, Governor of ſeveral cities (k) for the Macedonians, to ſurrender them to the Achæans, which he did. He alſo perſuaded Ariſtomachus the Tyrant of Argos to reſtore the liberty of that city [G], and to join it with the Achæans (l). But, as Pauſanias obſerves (m), things do not conſtantly happen according to men's wiſhes. Aratus, who had been labouring to diminiſh the power of the Macedonians, was at laſt obliged to have recourſe to Antigonus their King; for Cleomenes King of Lacedæmon having gained a complete victory over the Achæans, commanded by Aratus himſelf, this General began to be apprehenſive for the liberty of the Achæans and of Sicyon his own country. He had ſo much the more reaſon to dread the power of Cleomenes, that this King had entered into an alliance with the Ætolians [H] and with Antigonus, who after the death of Demetrius King of Macedon, was left by him Guardian of Philip his ſon, ſtill an infant (n). Aratus therefore thought it was neceſſary to diſengage Antigonus from the alliance, and to draw him over to the intereſt of the Achæans; and though this was for ſeveral reaſons a very difficult undertaking [I], yet Aratus, by his great prudence and wiſdom,

(i) Polyb. lib. 2. pag. 181.

(k) Pyræum, Munichia, Salamin, and Sunium.

(l) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 1043. Pauſan. in Corinth. pag. 100. Polyb. ubi ſupra. p. 183.

(m) Ubi ſupra, pag. 100, 101.

(n) Polyb. lib. 2. p. 183, &c.

lents ſhould be depoſited in Ægia hands; but Aratus had not the money ready, nor was he willing to borrow it, leſt it ſhould create ſome ſuſpicions of his deſign; ſo that he was obliged to pledge his plate, and his wife's jewels into Ægia's hands. This being done Aratus went to the caſtle in the night time, attended with all the people, whom he could conveniently bring with him, without being diſcovered, and by the aſſiſtance of Diocles made himſelf maſter of the place, not without the utmoſt danger of his life. Plutarch obſerves on this occaſion, that Aratus had a very elevated mind, and was ambitious of raiſing his reputation by the moſt glorious actions; ſo that knowing that Epaminondas and Phocion were conſidered as the beſt and moſt juſt men amongſt the Greeks, becauſe they deſpiſed the largeſt preſents, and would not recede in the leaſt from the ſtricteſt virtue for the ſake of money, he alſo would not ſcruple to ſacrifice immenſe ſums, even without the knowledge of his citizens, for the intereſt of his country. This indeed is a very glorious action. But it may be queſtioned, whether the treachery he employed, and the uſe he made of ſuch abandoned wretches, deſerve all the commendation Plutarch beſtows upon it.

[G] He perſuaded Ariſtomachus the Tyrant of Argos to reſtore the liberty of that city.] Plutarch's account is more full than that of Polybius and Pauſanias; therefore we think it proper to inſert it in this place. He tells us (15), that when Aratus ſaw all the countries near Sicyon enjoy their liberty, he grieved at the ſlavery under which thoſe of Argos ſtill lived, and reſolved to kill Ariſtomachus their Tyrant. He ſoon found people who entered into his deſign; they were headed by Æſchylus and Charimenes the Poet. But as they had no ſword, the Tyrant having prohibited all perſons under ſevere penalties to wear one, Aratus procured a great many ſmall daggers, which he ſent ſecretly to Argos. Charimenes having admitted into the conſpiracy a perſon, whom Æſchylus and his aſſociates did not approve of, they reſolved to perform their deſign without Cleomenes's aſſiſtance; who out of revenge diſcovered the whole plot to Ariſtomachus, which obliged the conſpirators with all ſpeed to take refuge at Corinth. However Ariſtomachus was ſoon after killed by his own ſlaves, and was ſucceeded by Ariſtippus, a more cruel and blood-thirſty Tyrant. Aratus having aſſembled as many men able to bear arms as he could, went immediately to Argos, in hopes that he ſhould find the people ready to ſhake off the yoke of ſlavery; but to his great diſappointment he perceived, that when men are once uſed to a baſe and ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion, they obey willingly, and don't feel the weight that oppreſſes them. Not one perſon ſtirred to ſecond Aratus, ſo that he was obliged to retire, leaving his Achæans the blame of having taken up arms in the midſt of peace. Antigonus accuſed them before the Mantineans, and Aratus not appearing to defend his cauſe, the Achæans were condemned to pay a fine of thirty Minæ, that is, about ninety three pound of our money (16). Ariſtippus alſo reſolved to kill Aratus, with the aſſiſtance of King Antigonus. Plutarch gives us afterwards a large account of a battle between the Achæans and thoſe of Argos, in which Aratus was wounded, but won the victory, and would in all probability have reſtored the Liberty of the Argives, had not Agias and Ariſtomachus the younger (probably the ſon of the former) entered the city with an army, and invaded the Government. It was this ſecond Ariſtomachus whom Aratus engaged to reſtore the liberty of Argos. It may perhaps ſeem unaccountable, how one man, or if you will one nation, could oblige ſo many Tyrants to abdicate the ſovereign power they had invaded. But Polybius, that judicious and accurate Hiſtorian, accounts for it in a very reaſonable manner. He tells us (17), that Demetrius, who had ſucceeded to Antigonus in the Kingdom of Macedon, ſupported the petty Tyrants of Peloponneſus by his forces and by his money; but Demetrius, who reigned but ten years, being dead, thoſe Tyrants being deprived of the aſſiſtance they uſed to receive, and fearing Aratus, who would abſolutely put an end to the ſlavery of all the Greeks; they were ſo much the more inclined to abdicate their power: That great rewards and honours were promiſed to thoſe, who did it voluntarily; whereas thoſe, who refuſed, were threatened with the utmoſt dangers from the Achæans, who were commanded by Aratus.

(15) Pag. 1038.

(16) According to Mr. Brerewood, apud Prideaux, ubi ſupra.

(17) Ubi ſupra, pag. 182.

[H] Cleomenes had entered into an alliance with the Ætolians.] The Achæans were grown ſo powerful by Aratus's prudent conduct, that the Ætolians naturally envious, and uſed to aggrandiſe themſelves by wicked practices, could not bear their proſperity. They reſolved to diſunite the Achæans, and knowing that Antigonus bore impatiently the loſs of Corinth, and was for that reaſon a ſecret enemy to the Achæans, they reſolved to enter into an alliance with him. They alſo thought that if they could draw the Lacedæmonians into the ſame deſign, it would be very eaſy to cruſh the power of the Achæans, if they were attacked at a proper time by all theſe forces at once. This would probably have ſucceeded, if the Ætolians had not omitted to take notice of one thing, which they ought above all others to have conſidered, I mean, that they were to contend with Aratus, a man who knew admirably well how to extricate his country out of the utmoſt difficulties; ſo that they not only failed of ſucceſs, but in the event their undertaking proved favourable to their enemy, and ſerved to ſtrengthen not only the authority of Aratus himſelf, but alſo the power of the Achæans (18). See the following remark.

(19) Ibid. pag. 183, 184.

[I] This was for ſeveral reaſons a very difficult undertaking.] Aratus knew that Antigonus had made an alliance with the Ætolians, but he was alſo perſuaded, that Kings don't look upon any one as naturally their friend or their enemy, but that their private intereſt is the only conſideration by which they judge with whom they are to enter into an alliance. He therefore reſolved to apply to Antigonus, to repreſent to him the conſequences of his alliance with the Ætolians and with Cleomenes, and to perſuade him to join his forces with thoſe of the Achæans. But he did not judge it proper to do this openly for ſeveral reaſons. For he was certain, that the Ætolians and Cleomenes would not fail to oppoſe his propoſal, and to defeat it if they had the leaſt hint of it. He was alſo ſen-wiſdom compaſſed his deſign, and drew Antigonus with his Macedonians into Greece, for which he is cenſured by Plutarch [K]. If Aratus was prudent in his reſolutions, and happy in thoſe enterpriſes, which could be executed by artifice, he was not ſo at the head of an army, as appears from the battle he loſt againſt the Ætolians (o), in which Polybius obſerves he committed a great many faults [L]. However he defended himſelf before the general Council of the Achæans in ſuch a manner, that he entirely appeaſed their anger, and gained their favour to ſuch a degree, that they reſolved to follow always his advice for the future (p). After Antigonus's death, Aratus and his ſon were in high eſteem with Philip II King of Macedon (q), who in a more particular manner diſtinguiſhed Aratus the father, not only becauſe he had been the friend of Antigonus, but alſo becauſe he was a man of a conſummate wiſdom and prudence, and had a very great authority amongſt the Achæans. But Apelles, who had great credit with the King, endeavoured more than once to raiſe ſuſpicions in his mind againſt Aratus, who being innocent, had not much trouble to defend himſelf; but the particulars of this, if inſerted here, would too much ſwell this article. We muſt however obſerve here, that Polybius tells (o) In the 4th year of the 139th Olympiad. See Polyb. lib. 4. p. 394. and Hiſt. Polyb. Synopſ. Chronol. p. 1595.

(p) Polyb. ibid.

(q) Ibid. p. 480.

ſible that the Achæans themſelves would be extremely diſcouraged, if they knew that their affairs were come to ſuch a deſperate ſtate, that he was obliged to court the aſſiſtance of an enemy, and did not think it ſafe to truſt to them alone. He reſolved then not to communicate his deſign to any perſon, but to tranſact that affair alone; which obliged him to ſay and do many things in publick, contrary to what he thought, in order to conceal his undertaking. This is alſo the reaſon, why he did not mention any thing of this in his Commentaries (19). The method he took to compaſs his deſign, was as follows: He knew that the Megalopolitans had always been very much attached to the Kings of Macedon, and did not doubt but that, if they were too cloſely preſſed by Cleomenes, they would implore Antigonus's aſſiſtance. There were two Citizens of Megalopolis, Nicophanes and Cercidas, between whom and Aratus's father there had been an intercourſe of hoſpitality. They were very proper perſons for Aratus's deſign; who having had a ſecret converſation with them, he engaged by their means the Council of Megalopolis to ſend Embaſſadors to the aſſembly of the Achæans, to conſult with them whether in the preſent conjuncture of affairs it was not proper to apply to Antigonus. Nicophanes and Cercidas were accordingly ſent to the Achæans, who having agreed to the propoſition of the Megalopolitans, the ſame Embaſſadors went directly to Antigonus, and gave him to underſtand that this propoſal, which they made to him, of entering into an alliance againſt Cleomenes and the Ætolians came originally from Aratus himſelf. Antigonus approving this prudent deſign of Aratus, wrote to the Megalopolitans that he would aſſiſt them, provided the Achæans conſented to it; upon which the former earneſtly deſired the Achæans to ſend for Antigonus. Aratus was extremely pleaſed at it; not only becauſe he found that Antigonus was well diſpoſed towards him, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the Ætolians, but alſo becauſe he ſaw that Antigonus was applied to by the general conſent of all the Achæans. For tho' he earneſtly wiſhed to defend them without any foreign aſſiſtance, yet in caſe they wanted it, he was very glad that Antigonus was called not by him alone, but by the whole body of Achæans; leſt if any misfortune ſhould be occaſioned to the Achæans by the Macedonians, the blame ſhould be laid upon him. The reſolution being then taken in the Council of the Achæans, to make uſe of Antigonus's aſſiſtance, Aratus ſtood up, and having firſt commended their reſolution, and ſaid a great many things in praiſe of Antigonus's readineſs to aſſiſt them, he repreſented to them, that they ought by all means to endeavour to defend themſelves without any aſſiſtance, which would not only be very advantageous to them, but alſo very glorious. But if their arms were not ſucceſsful, if fortune turned againſt their wiſhes, then, and then only they were to recur to their friend. This was generally approved of by the whole Aſſembly; but ſuch was the event of the war, that the Achæans had ſoon occaſion to apply to Antigonus. Aratus's own ſon (20) was ſent to him, to confirm the former agreement. But here was a difficulty, which could not eaſily be removed. The Achæans had formerly taken the caſtle of Corinth, which the Macedonians were poſſeſſed of, and made the Corinthians free. It was thought, that Antigonus would not come to their aſſiſtance, unleſs Corinth was reſtored to the Macedonians, which the Achæans could not deliver to them, without the conſent of the Corinthians. However that difficulty was ſoon after removed by Cleomenes himſelf, who had made himſelf maſter of Corinth; ſo that Aratus, who had given Antigonus ſome hopes, that Corinth would be reſtored to him, was now diſingaged, ſince that city with its caſtle was no longer in the power of the Achæans. Antigonus then came to their aſſiſtance, and gained a compleat victory over Cleomenes, who afterwards retired to Lacedæmon, and then into Egypt (21).

(19) Ibid. pag. 180.

(20) Called Aratus as well as his father.

(21) Polyb. ubi ſupra, p. 186—214.

[K] For which he is cenſured by Plutarch.] Cleomenes had endeavoured to make an alliance between the Lacedæmonians and the Achæans; but, ſays Plutarch (22), Aratus either becauſe he feared Cleomenes, or becauſe he was envious on account of his unexpected ſucceſs, and thought it was a diſhonour to him, that he, who had been thirty three years at the head of the Commonwealth, ſhould permit his fame and power to be invaded by a young man, as Cleomenes ſtill was, reſolved firſt to deter the Achæans from the propoſed alliance; which not ſucceeding, he took a reſolution ſhameful to every Greek, but more ſo to him, and abſolutely inconſiſtent with the great and glorious actions he had performed before. He invited Antigonus into Greece, and filled Peloponneſus with Macedonians, whom he had himſelf formerly driven out of it, when he took the caſtle of Corinth. Nay the ſame Antigonus, whom he now called to his aſſiſtance, he had formerly endeavoured to render odious to all Greece, and even in his Commentaries, he abuſes and gives the hardeſt epithets to him. I do not ſay this, adds Plutarch (23), to cenſure Aratus, for he was one of the moſt eminent men of his age, and deſerved the greateſt encomiums; but that we may pity the weakneſs of men, who notwithſtanding their moſt ſhining actions, and the glory they obtain, cannot arrive at a virtue entirely free from all blemiſh and imperfection. But if the aſſiſtance of Antigonus and the Macedonians was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſupport of the Achæans, as appears from Polybius's account (24), how can Aratus be blamed, for having employed their aſſiſtance in ſo urgent an occaſion?

(22) In Agid. & Cleomen. Op. tom. 1. p. m. 831, & ſeq.

(23) Ibid. pag. 832.

(24) See the remark [I].

[L] Polybius obſerves he committed a great many faults.] Aratus had undertaken the expedition againſt the Ætolians ſome time before the Prætorſhip of his predeceſſor was expired, and before he could lawfully enter upon that poſt. This fault was ſo much the more conſiderable, that it was attended with imprudence; for Aratus knew by experience, that he had not been happy in the command of armies. Another fault was that he engaged in battle without a ſufficient number of troops, when he could eaſily have avoided it, all the neighbouring cities being at his command, and open to receive him where he might have aſſembled a larger army. But the greateſt fault, which Polybius finds in his conduct was, that being reſolved to fight, he did it with the utmoſt raſhneſs and imprudence. It is impoſſible to give a more particular account of the faults, which Polybius (25) finds in Aratus's conduct on this occaſion, without deſcribing the whole battle, in which he engaged againſt the Ætolians; but this would carry us too far. However we muſt obſerve here, that before tells us, that as long as King Philip hearkened to the counſels of Aratus, he was ſo far from doing the leaſt injury, that he did not even offend one ſingle perſon, but kept his ſubjects faithful and obedient, and gained the love and eſteem of all the Greeks (r). Yet he was not always pleaſed with Aratus's advice, for the latter having cenſured Philip, becauſe he unjuſtly attacked the Macedonians, Philip poiſoned him [M]. Thus died that great man, the reſtorer of his country's liberty. He was then Prætor or General of the Achæans for the ſeventeenth time (s), having enjoyed that high poſt every ſecond year, becauſe according to law a man could not enjoy it two years ſucceſſively. He was about fifty ſeven years old when he died at Ægium, a city of Peloponneſus, the ſecond year of the 141ſt Olympiad (t); he was interred at Sicyon, and received the greateſt honours from his countrymen [N]. His ſon, who had alſo been Prætor, was poiſoned by King Philip in a miſerable manner [O]. His poſterity ſtill ſubſiſted in Plutarch's time at Sicyon and Pellene (u). We ſhall ſay ſomething of Aratus the Father's Commentaries in a remark [P].

(25) Hiſt. lib. 4. p. 393, & ſeq.

(r) Excerpt. ex Polyb. Hiſt. de Virtut. & Vitiis p. m. 1374.

(s) Plutarch in Arato, p. 1047.

(t) Compare Hiſt. Polyb. Synopſ. Chron. p. 1591, with p. 1604.

(u) Plutarch, p. 1052.

ARBAUD

fore Polybius gives an account of Aratus's errors, he beſtows a very great encomium upon him. "Aratus, ſays he (25), was perfectly well ſkilled in government: He was eminent for eloquence, judgment and ſecrecy; he knew how to ſoften by his mildneſs the civil diſcords amongſt his Citizens, and he had not his equal in forming friendſhip and alliances. Nor was any perſon more ſkilful in laying ſnares againſt the enemy; or in forming ſecret deſigns, which he uſed to perform with the utmoſt conſtancy and courage, as appears from the taking of Sicyon. But when he was at the head of an army, he was very ſlow in his reſolutions, and not very firm in the execution; nor could he bear the ſight of what is terrible. Hence it is that all Peloponneſus is full of the marks of the battels which he loſt. But ſuch is the fate of mankind; every virtue cannot be found in one and the ſame perſon, &c."

(23) Ibid. pag. 385.

[M] Philip poiſoned him.] The King employed for that purpoſe one Taurio, who governed under him in Peloponneſus. The poiſon, which Taurio gave Aratus, was ſuch, as did not kill him immediately, but threw him into a kind of a lingering conſumption. Aratus was not ignorant of it, but as the diſcovering of it would have been to no purpoſe, he diſſembled the fact, and feigned to be ſick (26). It was however diſcovered after the following manner. A ſervant of Aratus, called Cephalus, with whom he was very familiar, being in the room to attend him, perceived upon the ground ſome blood mixed with ſpittle. This, O Cephalus, ſaid Aratus, is the reward which I received from Philip for the conſtant friendſhip I have always had for him (27).

(26) Plutarch. in Arato, p. 1051.

(27) Polyb. lib. 8. p. 722.

[N] He received the greateſt honours from his countrymen.] The Achæans were reſolved to bury him in their own country, and to erect a ſumptuous monument to him. But the inhabitants of Sicyon thought it would be a very great diſhonour for them, if he was not buried in their own city, his native place. But as there was a law, very ſacred, by which it was prohibited to bury any perſon within the walls of the city, the Sicyonians ſent to conſult the Oracle of Delphi, and having received an anſwer according to their wiſhes, they brought the corps from Ægium, and with crowns on their heads, and dreſſed in white carried it to Sicyon dancing and ſinging all the while. They depoſited it in an elevated place, as a diſtinction worthy of the reſtorer of their liberty. His monument ſtill ſubſiſted in Plutarch's time, and was known by the name of Aratium (28). Pauſanias (29) ſays, that there was to be ſeen in his time at Sicyon a ſtatue of a man holding a ſhield in his hand, which ſtatue was ſaid to repreſent Aratus. This was not the only honour they did to his memory; they inſtituted a feaſt to him, and appointed ſacrifices to be offered up to him twice every year, firſt on the anniverſary of the day, in which he had delivered his country from ſlavery, ſecondly in the month in which he was born. The deſcription of the ceremonies performed on thoſe days may be read in Plutarch (30). In ſhort they neglected nothing that might ſerve to perpetuate his memory to the lateſt Ages, ſo that, as Polybius ſays, if the dead retain any ſenſe of what paſſes in this world, Aratus had reaſons to be thoroughly contented with the gratitude of his countrymen (31).

(28) Plutarch, ubi ſupra, pag. 1047.

(29) In Corinth. p. m. 98.

(30) Ubi ſupra, p. 1052.

(31) Polyb. lib. 8. p. 223.

[O] His ſon was poiſoned by King Philip in a miſerable manner.] Plutarch tells us (32) the poiſon, which Philip cauſed to be given to Aratus the younger, was ſuch, that it troubled his ſenſes and diſcompoſed his underſtanding in ſuch a manner, as to make him involve himſelf in the moſt ſhameful and abominable actions; ſo that, tho' he was ſtill young and in the flower of his age, yet death was to him not a misfortune but a remedy, and the end of all his woes. What theſe actions were, which Aratus in his madneſs did, we are not expreſly told; but Plutarch's expreſſions hint them ſufficiently; and therefore we ſhall tranſcribe here his own words, that the reader may examine, whether it be poſſible, that any poiſon whatſoever ſhould draw a man to ſuch kind of actions. Ὁ Φίλιππος ὑ θυμοειδους ἀλλὰ μανικὰς ἐξέστησε τοῦ λογισμοῦ φαρμάκοις, καὶ παρέτρεψεν εἰς δεινὰς καὶ ἀλλοκότους ἐπιφορὰς πράξεων ἀτόπων καὶ σὺν αἰσχύνῃ παθῶν ὀλεθρίων ἡγεμόνα. Let us obſerve here, that Philip had already before this diſhonoured Aratus, by debauching his wife (33).

(32) Ubi ſupra.

(33) Ibid. pag. 1050.

[P] We ſhall ſay ſomething of Aratus's Commentaries.] Polybius mentions them in ſeveral places (34), and even defends them againſt thoſe, who preferred Philarchus's Memoirs before thoſe of Aratus, who wrote the Hiſtory of his own time. Philarchus, according to Polybius, wrote rather like a Tragic Poet, than a judicious Hiſtorian; and endeavour'd by his deſcriptions to move the paſſions, and to excite the reader's indignation, or compaſſion. Whereas the duty of an Hiſtorian is not to fill the reader with admiration by new and ſurpriſing incidents, nor to invent ſuch diſcourſes and harangues, as the perſons introduced might probably have ſpoken; but to relate facts truly, and as they have really happened. But this is not ſufficient; an Hiſtorian muſt endeavour to find out the true cauſes and motives of men's actions; for if we are ignorant of theſe, we can neither blame nor praiſe them juſtly; nor will our compaſſion or indignation be reaſonable (35). Now it appears that Aratus's Hiſtory, which Polybius followed, was written in a very judicious manner, and that he did not barely content himſelf with relating facts, but alſo accounted for them by the real motives of thoſe perſons, to whom they related. Thus for inſtance, Philarchus, ſpeaking of Ariſtomachus, whom we have mentioned above (36), ſays, that this man, who was of a noble and ancient family, and who, if he had been the Tyrant of his country, it was to be excuſed, ſince the ſovereign power had been tranſmitted to him by his anceſtors, falling into the hands of Antigonus and of the Achæans, was carried to Cenchrea, and there put to death by ſuch terrible torments, that no man had ever ſuffered before the like cruelty. Upon this the Hiſtorian expatiates in ſo tragical a manner, as tho' he intended only to move the compaſſion and indignation of the reader. But he ought to have obſerved, that if Ariſtomachus was put to death in a cruel manner he had well deſerved it, ſince he had been a moſt cruel Tyrant. But after all, the only barbarous treatment he ſuffered was, that he was thrown into the ſea, for a puniſhment of what he had done at Cenchrea (37). Polybius alledges ſome other inſtances, by which it appears that Aratus's Hiſtory was written in a much more judicious manner, than that of Philarchus. The loſs of ſo valuable a work, highly eſteemed by a writer of ſo good judgment as Polybius, is certainly to be lamented. We ſhould find there a great many curious particulars, with which Aratus, writing what paſſed in a manner before his eyes, was perfectly acquainted, and which Polybius could not inſert in his Hiſtory, without tranſcribing entirely that of Aratus.

(34) Lib. 1. p. 3. lib. 2. p. 196. lib. 4. p. 376.

(35) Ib. p. 200.

(36) Remark [G].

(37) Polyb. ibid. p. 202, 203.

P.

☞ARBAUD (FRANCIS) Sieur de Porcheres, one of the firſt Members of the French Academy (a) in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in Provence, and was deſcended from the antient family of Porchéres [A]. He was the ſcholar and follower of Malherbe, and imitated him in the turn of his verſe. He was Tutor to the ſon of Mr. de Chenoiſe, and afterwards to the ſon of the Count Saint-Heran. The Abbé Bois-Robert, who was particularly eminent for the generous uſe which he made of his intereſt with Cardinal Richelieu, procured him a penſion of ſix hundred livres from that great man (b). In the year 1636, March 10, he ſpoke an Oration in the French Academy upon the Love of the Sciences (c). He retired at laſt into Burgundy, where he married, and died (d). He wrote a great number of verſes [B], which were never printed. But there are others, which were publiſhed, as particularly his Paraphraſe upon the Pſalms of Degrees, to which are added his Poems upon divers Subjects, Paris 1633 in 8vo (e). He had a brother, who had likewiſe a talent for Poetry [C].

(a) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. 200. edit. 2. de Paris 1730.

(b) Idem, pag. 244, 245.

(c) Idem, p. 99.

(d) Idem, p. 245.

(e) Ibid. p. 378.

[A] Deſcended from the ancient family of Porchéres.] Mr. Peliſſon tells us, that Arbaud claim'd this honour, as well as Mr. de Porchéres-Laugier, tho' they did not acknowledge one another for relations. But Monſr. de Mazauges, Preſident à Mortier in the parliament of Aix, informed the Abbé Olivet (1), that there never was a family of the name of Porchéres in Provence. "Porchéres, continues he, is a little village "near Forcalquier, of which Arbaud was owner of "one part, and Laugier of the other. The name of "the family of the former is Arbaud, and it is a "noble and ancient family, which is divided into "ſeveral branches, one of which is ſtill ſubſiſting, "and appears with great diſtinction in the parlia"ment of Aix. The family of the latter is Lau"gier, of the branch of the Lords of Verdaches, and "it is very noble and ancient in our province. And "therefore thoſe two Authors ought to be called Ar"baud de Porchéres, Laugier de Porchéres, which is di"rectly contrary to what Peliſſon has done." Olivet is of opinion, that the Preſident de Mazauges, who is undoubtedly well acquainted with the families in his own Province, as he is particularly converſant in all kinds of literature, is right in his obſervation; and conſequently that Peliſſon ſhould be corrected in that paſſage.

(1) See his Remarks upon Peliſſon's Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. 244, 245.

[B] He wrote a great number of verſes.] We find among Racan's Poems an Epigram in praiſe of Porchéres upon a Poem, which he wrote concerning Magdalen. The Abbé Olivet not being able to find it in the Libraries at Paris, wrote to the Preſident de Mazauges mentioned in the preceding note, whoſe anſwer contains ſeveral particulars relating to that Poem and the Author (2). "I have made a very "ſtrict enquiry after the Poem upon Magdalen. I "have even taken the pains to go to St. Maximin, "where our Poet was born. But my reſearches have "been in vain; and I have not been able to diſ"cover any of his compoſitions except a beautiful "Ode, which has a great deal of the manner of his "maſter Malherbe in it, and which he wrote in ho"nour of Cardinal Richelieu, in order to thank him "for the favour he had done him in giving him "a place in the Academy. This Ode very well de"ſerved to be mentioned by Peliſſon. I had ſome "account of a Sonnet (3) upon the eyes of the fair "Gabrielle d'Eſtrées, which gained him, as it is ſaid, "a penſion of fourteen hundred livres. But this ſto"ry ſeems to me a little doubtful, and is inconſi"ſtent with what he ſays himſelf in the preface "to his Pſalms, where he complains of the rigour "of his fortune." The Preſident then obſerves, that he was informed that Malherbe had educated him in his youth at Paris, and continued his affection for him as long as he lived, and left him half of his library in his will. That he married in Burgundy a young Lady of the family of la Chapelle Sénevois, by whom he had one ſon; and that he died there in the year 1640. But with regard to the Poem upon Magdalen, he is of opinion that it was never printed.

(2) Olivet, Remarques & Additions ſur l'Hiſtoire de l'Academie par Mr. Peliſſon, p. 246.

(3) This Ode is publiſhed in a Collection printed in 1607, intitled, Le Parnaſſe des plus excellens Poëtes de ce temps, ou les Muſes Françoiſes ralliées de diverſes parts, tom. 1. p. 286.

[C] He had a brother who had likewiſe a talent for poetry.] This appears from the letter of the Preſident de Mazauges to the Abbé Olivet quoted in the preceding note, in which he obſerves, that his name was JOHN ARBAUD, Sieur de Porchéres, and that he was Gentleman in ordinary to the King; but that his Poems were inferior to thoſe of his brother in point of judgment and correctneſs. He tranſlated alſo ſeveral of the Pſalms into French verſe, two editions of which have been publiſhed, the former at Grenoble in in 1651, and the latter more compleat at Marſeilles in 1684. T.

ARBRISSEL (ROBERT D') Founder of the Order of Fontevraud. See FONTEVRAUD.

☞ARBUTHNOT (ALEXANDER) was the brother of the Baron of Arbuthnot in the County or Shire of the Merns (a), a very antient and noble family [A]. He was born in the year 1538, and educated at the Univerſity of Aberdeen. Having finiſhed there the courſe of his ſtudies in polite Literature and Philoſophy, he was by his parents ſent over to France, where he ſtudied the Law for five years under the famous Cujacius, and having taken the degree of a Licentiate, he returned to Scotland in the year 1563. Finding upon his arrival that the Reformation prevailed, he declared himſelf for it, and was very inſtrumental in carrying on that glorious deſign. The Reformers prevailed with him to apply himſelf to Divinity, and to enter into Orders; but what ſort of Ordination he got we cannot learn. He was a Member of the general Aſſembly in the year 1568, and was ordered to reviſe a Book concerning the fall of the Church of Rome [B]. About

(a) See the Appendix to Spotſwood's Hiſtory, pag. 24.

[A] A very antient and noble family.] Sir George Mackenzie (1) tells us, that they had their firſt riſe from a Gentleman who came from the South, and married one of the daughters of Oloſard or Olyphant, Sheriff of the Merns, with whom he obtained the lands of Arbuthnot, from whence they had their ſirname. And he ſays, that he has ſeen a Charter granted by the Abbot and Convent of Kelſo in 1178, to Reginald, then elected to be Abbot of Arbroth, freeing him from his obedience and ſubjection to Kelſo; and amongſt the witneſſes is mentioned Richardus de Arbuthnot Clericus Regis; ſince which time they have had ſeveral honours conferred upon them, and about the year 1641 King Charles I. made (2) them Viſcounts of Arbuthnot (3).

(1) MS. Geneology of Scotland.

(2) Sir James Dalrymple's edit. of Camd. Deſc. of Scotland, p. 156.

(3) Mackenzie's Lives of the Scots Writ. tom. 3. p. 186.

[B] A book concerning the Fall of the Church of Rome.] In that book the King is called the Head of the Church. The Printer of that work had alſo printed a Pſalm-book with an obſcene Song at the end of it. The Printer was ordered by the Aſſembly (4) to call in theſe books, and to ſell no more of them, till ſuch time as he had changed the title of the one, and expunged the Song out of the other; and that for the future he ſhould not print any book without the Licence of the ſupreme Magiſtrate, nor any book concerning Religion, except it had been firſt reviſed by them (5). The Printer's name was Thomas Baſſanden (6).

(4) Petrie, Church Hiſt. p. 3. Cent. 16. pag. 359.

(5) I ſuppoſe the Author means the Aſſembly, though his words ſeem to relate to the Civil Magiſtrate.

(6) Mackenzie, ibid. p. 187.

About the ſame time he was appointed Miniſter of Arbuthnot, and Logy-Buchan, and ſoon after inſtalled Principal of the King's College at Aberdeen [C]. In the general Aſſembly held at St. Andrews in the year 1572 Arbuthnot was one of the Commiſſioners, who were appointed to meet at Mr. John Knox's houſe, to examine the new Book of Policy, and conſider what they could find therein, that was agreeable to God's Word, and for the advantage of the Kirk, and to report the ſame to the Aſſembly. But Petrie and Calderwood tell us (b); That they knew not what was done in this conference. But, ſays Calderwood, we may eaſily collect that the Book was not approved, by a new Commiſſion appointed in the next Aſſembly to reviſe it; or elſe that the conference was not held. Arbuthnot was choſen Moderator (c) in the Aſſembly which met at Edinburgh on the ſixth of Auguſt 1573, and in which ſeveral Biſhops were accuſed and condemned [D] for ſeveral offences either againſt morality, or againſt the laws and diſcipline of the Church. The next year in an Aſſembly held at Edinburgh in the month of March, George Douglas Biſhop of Murray being accuſed of fornication committed with the Lady Ardroſs (d), deſir'd leave to adviſe concerning his vindication

(b) See Calder, Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland, ad ann. 1572. p. 56.

(c) Petrie, pag. 379. Calder. pag. 63.

(d) Petrie, ubi ſupra, pag. 382. Calder. p. 64.

[C] He was inſtalled Principal of the King's College at Aberdeen.] The occaſion of it was as follows: Mr. John Erſkine Superintendant of Angus having got a Commiſſion from the Council and the general Aſſembly held at Edinburgh in July 1568, for viſiting the King's College at old Aberdeen, the Superintendant went thither in the month of June 1569, and having called the Maſters of the College before him, and they having refuſed, after two days conference with them, to ſubſcribe the Confeſſion of Faith, the following ſentence was pronounced againſt them (7): "I "John Erſkine Superintendant of Angus, Principal "of the King's College at Aberdeen and Merns, hav"ing Commiſſion of the Church, to viſit the Sheriff"doom of Aberdeen and Bamff, by the advice, "counſel, and conſent of the Miniſters, and Elders, "and Commiſſioners preſent, decern, conclude, and "for final ſentence, pronounce, that Mr. Alexander "Anderſon ſometimes Principal, Mr. Andrew Gal"loway ſometimes Sub-Principal, Mr. Andrew An"derſon, Mr. Thomas Auſtin, and Mr. Duncan No"ry, ſometime Regents in the College of old Aber"deen, are not to be reckoned Members of Chriſt's "Church; and therefore ſeclude them and every one "of them to teach privately or publickly in time "coming in that College, or any other part within "this realm, and decern them to remove forth of "the ſaid College with all diligence, that other godly "men may be placed there, for the upbringing "the youth in the fear of God, and good letters. "This our ſentence pronounced, we ordain to be pub"liſhed and intimated to the ſaid perſons, and to the "congregations of new and old Aberdeen, publickly "the next Sunday, the third of July inſtant." This ſentence was no ſooner put in execution, but Arbuthnot was inſtalled in the place of Anderſon (8).

(7) Petrie. ubi ſupra, p. 362.

(8) Mackenzie, ibid.

[D] Several Biſhops were accuſed and condemned.] The books of the Biſhops, Superintendants, and Commiſſioners of Viſitation were produced, and certain Miniſters appointed to examine them. Mr. John Douglas Archbiſhop of St. Andrews was accuſed of admitting a Popiſh Prieſt into the Miniſtry, to whom the Superintendant of Lothian had preſcribed certain injunctions, which he had not obeyed; for not viſiting his Dioceſe; not preaching for half a year before that time; for giving collation of a benefice, which was before beſtowed on a Miniſter, to another ſuſpected of Popery; for ſuffering the exerciſe to decay thro' his fault; for admitting ſome to functions in the Church, that were not ſufficiently qualified and examined; and laſtly that he viſited his Dioceſe by others and not himſelf. To the firſt of theſe the Archbiſhop anſwered, that he did not admit the Prieſt till he had openly recanted in the Church of St. Andrews. To the ſecond, he affirmed that he not only did viſit his Dioceſe, but preached perſonally to them, when either his health, or his ſtrength, which were much impaired by age, could permit him. The reſt he abſolutely denied. Whereupon the Aſſembly only ordered the Prieſt to ſatisfy the injunction preſcribed to him by the Superintendant of Lothian. Then Mr. James Paton Biſhop of Dunkell was accuſed, that tho' he was a Biſhop, yet he did not perform the office of a Biſhop; that he had not proceeded againſt Papiſts within his bounds; that he was ſuſpected of ſimony and perjury; for having made an agreement with the Earl of Argyle for the profits of the Biſhoprick, and accordingly at his admiſſion, contrary to his oath, had given acquittances, and the Earl had received the money. But it ſeems the Biſhop cleared himſelf ſo well, that they were found to be mere calumnies; for we do not find that the Aſſembly paſſed any cenſure upon him. Alexander Gordon, Biſhop of Galloway, was accuſed, that he intruded himſelf into the office of the Miniſtry within Edinburgh; that he enticed the people to rebellion againſt the King; that he refuſed to pray for him, and approved of the Queen's authority; that being diſcharged by the general Aſſembly from having any thing to do with the Pariſhioners of Holy-Rood Houſe, yet he compelled them to receive the Sacrament, and cauſed pretended bailiffs and ſoldiers to compel the people; that being ſworn to maintain the King's authority, and yield obedience to him, yet he had broken his oath, by ſitting in a Parliament for diſpoſſeſſing the King of his crown and authority; that he had given thanks publickly in the pulpit for the ſlaughter of Matthew Earl of Lennox, and exhorted the people to do the ſame; and laſtly, that he was a perverter of the people before and after the Reformation. The Biſhop could not deny his attachment to the Queen, and therefore he gave a general anſwer, that he was freed from all theſe things by the Act of Pacification agreed to between the Queen's and the King's friends. But the Aſſembly told him, that the States had not abſolved him as a Biſhop from the cenſure of the Church, ſo he was ordered, under the pain of excommunication, to do publick penance for three ſeveral Sundays, once in the Church of Edinburgh, another time in the Church of Holy-Rood-Houſe, and a third time in Queen's College Church. Calderwood ſays (9), "That ſeveral other enormities were laid to his "charge. He claimed the benefit of the Act of Pa"cification, agreed upon at Perth the 23d of Februa"ry, when the civil wars ended, to which Act the "reformed Biſhops, Abbots and Priors, having vote "in Parliament, condeſcended in the name of the "Kirk, and therefore alledged that he could not be "compelled to anſwer for any complaint given in "againſt him, for maintaining another authority, or "for any thing depending thereupon; and this an"ſwer he ſent to the Aſſembly by a ſervant. Where"upon the Aſſembly ſent one to the Regent and "Council, to aſk their advice. His Grace's anſwer "was, that he was willing to obſerve the heads of "the Pacification, but without prejudice to the diſci"pline of the Kirk, nor to the ſatisfaction to be made "for all notorious and open ſlanders. The Biſhop "being again ſummoned and not appearing, and in "reſpect his offences were notorious, it was con"cluded that he ſhould make his publick penance in "ſack-cloth three ſeveral ſabbath-days &c." Mr. Robert Pont was accuſed for non-reſidence in Murray, and for not viſiting the Kirks there; but he excuſed himſelf upon his being obliged to attend the Seſſion, being one of the Lords of the Seſſion. Whereupon the Superintendant of Lothian moved the queſtion, Whether it was lawful by the Word of God, that the adminiſtration of the Word and Sacraments, and the adminiſtration of criminal and civil juſtice ſhould be ſo confounded, that one man ſhould have both charges; and the Aſſembly agreed that it was neither agreeable to the Word of God, nor to the practice of the primitive Church (10).

(9) Hiſt. of the Church of Scotland, ad ann. 1572, p. 56.

(10) Mackenzie, ibid. p. 188-192.

tion till the tenth day of the month, and then refuſing to appear, the Aſſembly appointed Arbuthnot with others to call before them the Chapter of Murray, and to examine them, how they came to give the Biſhop their teſtimonial without juſt trial and due examination of his life, and qualifications in Literature. In the ſame Aſſembly Arbuthnot was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for drawing up the heads and articles concerning the juriſdiction of the Kirk. He was again choſen Moderator of the general Aſſembly held at Edinburgh in April 1577, in which there were many conferences and diſputes concerning the diſcipline of the Church [E]. That ſame year another Aſſembly met at Edinburgh, and a letter was preſented to them from Queen Elizabeth, acquainting them that a council of Proteſtants was to meet at Magdeburg, and deſiring them to ſend ſome of their members to it. Arbuthnot was one of thoſe whom they choſe, but the project having failed, none of them went. This ſhews however in what high eſteem he was, ſince ſo important a truſt was committed to him. The ſame Aſſembly having preſented the Regent with a copy of the Policy of the Church as approved by them, Arbuthnot was appointed, with ſeveral others, to wait upon the Regent, in order to ſolve his doubts, in caſe he ſhould have any concerning the new form of Policy. In a general Aſſembly held at Edinburgh April the 24th 1578 he was one of thoſe, who were appointed to wait upon the King and Council, and to reaſon with them concerning the ceremonies of the Church, and how far Miniſters may interpoſe in civil affairs, and whether they may vote in Council or Parliament. In the year 1582 Buchanan having committed the care of the reviſing and printing his hiſtory to Arbuthnot, he publiſhed it, which gave great offence, and expoſed not only the author, but even Arbuthnot to cenſure, at the ſame time that the latter was ordered by an act of the general Aſſembly to be removed from Aberdeen to St. Andrews. But the King prevented it [F]. Arbuthnot died ſoon after this in the forty ſixth year of his age, and was buried in the Collegiate Church of Aberdeen the 20th of October 1583. There is nothing extant of his compoſing, but ſome orations in praiſe of the law, and concerning its firſt riſe and origin; the Title is, Orationes de Origine & Dignitate Juris, printed at Edinburgh 1572, 4to. Upon which performance Mr. Thomas Maitland (e) has made an elegant encomium in Latin. Andrew Melvil compoſed his epitaph (f) in the ſame language. Both theſe pieces are to be found in the author, from whom we have borrowed this account (g). See the character of Arbuthnot in the remark [G].

(g) The Lives and Characters of the moſt eminent Writers of the Scots Nation, by George Mackenzie, vol. 3. pag. 186—194.

(e) Deliciæ Poetar. Scot. vol. 2. pag. 153.

(f) Ibid. pag. 120.

[E] Conferences and diſputes concerning the diſcipline of the Church.] The Aſſembly informed the Regent of their proceedings, and petitioned that proviſion might be made for viſitors; that perſons deprived of their office by the Church, might be deprived of their benefices; that he would take ſome courſe with thoſe, who ſell their benefices; and beſtow all vacant benefices upon perſons recommended by the Church. But the Brethren, who petitioned his Grace, having no written Commiſſion from the Aſſembly, after they had attended for ſome days, were diſmiſſed without any anſwer (12).

(12) Idem, ibid. pag. 191.

[F] Arbuthnot — was ordered — to be removed — to St. Andrews; the King prevented it.] In the beginning of the Aſſembly held in 1577, it was ordered that the Superintendant of Angus, and ſix other Miniſters ſhould attend Arbuthnot every morning from ſeven of the clock till the ſitting of the Aſſembly, for preparing ſuch things, as ſhould be brought before them. Upon which Mr. Petrie obſerves (13) that in all the following Aſſemblies theſe privy conferences, as they were called, were like that which in the Council of Trent was called the Congregation. For within ſome years all matters were debated and concluded in theſe privy Conferences, and the Aſſembly had little to do (14). Arbuthnot preſiding in theſe Conferences had no doubt a great influence in their reſolutions; we are not therefore to be ſurprized, if the King, ſuſpecting that the Aſſembly would have removed to St. Andrews, only to have his advice in their factious proceedings, St. Andrews being nearer the capital city, where they ordinarily met, than Aberdeen, forbad Arbuthnot to remove from the College of Aberdeen. The general Aſſembly, which met at Edinburgh in 1583, complained of this as of a grievance; but the King told them (15), that they had no reaſon, all things being well conſidered, to think, that this was either ſo proper for the Church, or ſo improper for the Civil State; for he and his Council had good reaſon to direct his Letters as he did (16).

(13) Calderwood, pag. 391.

(14) Mackenzie, ibid. p. 191.

(15) Petrie, Part 3. p. 441.

(16) Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, pag. 192.

[G] The Character of Arbuthnot.] He was, as we have obſerv'd, one of the great promoters of Reformation, and conſulted by all the general Aſſemblies of the Scots in the affairs of their Church. And tho' he was of the ſame principles with Buchanan and Andrew Melvil, yet he was much more moderate; and if he was not ſo good a Poet as Buchanan, or ſo great a maſter of the purity of the Roman Language, yet he was a more learned, and more univerſal Scholar. For Biſhop Spotſwood tells us (17), that "he was expert in all "Sciences; a good Poet, Mathematician, Philoſopher, "Theologue, Lawyer, and ſkilful in Medicine; ſo "that in every ſubject he could promptly diſcourſe, "and to good purpoſe." The ſame Prelate tells us, "that beſides theſe qualifications, by his diligent "teaching, and dextrous government, he not only "revived the ſtudy of good Letters, but gained many from the ſuperſtitions, to which they were "given. He was greatly loved of all men, hated of "none, and in ſuch account for his moderation with "the chief men of theſe parts, (meaning the North) "that without his advice they could almoſt do nothing, which put him to great fachery, whereof "he did often complain; yet he was very pleaſant "and jocund in converſation (18)."

(17) Lib. 6. pag. 335.

(18) Apud Mackenzie, ubi ſupra, pag. 192.

☞ARCADIUS, the Emperor of the Eaſt, was the eldeſt ſon to Theodoſius the Great by Flaccilla the Empreſs, and born in Spain about the year 377 (a). He was honoured with the Title of Auguſtus, the 16th or 19th of January 383 in the palace of Hebdomon, about ſeven miles from Conſtantinople (b). Themiſtius the Pagan Philoſopher had flattered himſelf, that he ſhould have the honour of educating this young Prince; but Theodoſius thought proper to place him under the care of Arſenius a Chriſtian Philoſopher, who had an abſolute authority over him, but retired from the Court about the year 390, or ſoon after (c). Upon the death of Theodoſius Arcadius ſucceeded in the Empire the 17th of January 395 (d). It appears from the general conſent of the Hiſtorians, that he was very much inferior to his father in the qualifications of his mind as (a) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 5. Part 2. pag. 446 and 827. edit. de Bruxelles 1710.

(b) Idem, pag. 492, 493, and 827.

(c) Idem, pag. 828.

(d) Idem, pag. 827.

as well as body [A]. Theodoſius left the Weſtern Empire to his ſon Honorius, as he had done that of the Eaſt to Arcadius, both of whom he recommended to Stilico, one of the greateſt Generals of his army, who had married Serena his niece. This was probably the ground of Stilico's pretence, that Theodoſius had upon his death-bed committed the care of theſe two Emperors and their dominions to him. But this was a point very difficult to execute; for though Arcadius had neither age nor capacity to govern himſelf, yet he was able enough to chooſe himſelf a Governor, or at leaſt to authorize ſome perſon, who could raiſe himſelf to that poſt by intereſt or intrigue (e). Oroſius tells us (f) that Theodoſius appointed Stilico to govern the Weſt, and Rufinus the Eaſt. It is agreed at leaſt, (g) that the affair was fixed in that manner (g). But this occaſioned a conteſt between Stilico and Rufinus [B], who being diſappointed in his deſign of marrying his daughter to Arcadius, involved the Eaſtern Empire in the utmoſt confuſion by bringing in the Barbarians [C], but (e) Idem, pag. 830.

(f) Lib. 7.
(g) Tillem. pag. 830.

[A] Very much inferior to his father in the qualifications of his mind as well as body.] It is ſaid, that his perſon was very indifferent, and that he was of a low ſtature. He had a remarkable ſlowneſs of ſpeech; his eyes had no manner of livelineſs, and generally appeared ſhut. He was extremely indolent in his diſpoſition, and incapable of forming or executing any ſcheme. In ſhort, he had not the leaſt ſhare of genius imaginable; and he learned nothing, notwithſtanding all the pains, which Arſenius took of his education, but to write a good hand. And accordingly it will appear from the ſequel of his hiſtory, that he ſuffered himſelf to be governed, or rather commanded like a mere brute, without knowing the leaſt of the ſtate of his own affairs. However, he had ſome kind of zeal for the orthodox faith (1); and it was even pretended, that ſome extraordinary events were to be aſcribed to the efficacy of his prayers and piety (2). We do not find, that he ever was accuſed of cruelty or any other vice; on the contrary we are aſſured, that he was of a very mild, humane, and peaceable temper. And indeed, if we judge from his conduct, we ſhall find him ſo to exceſs. And therefore, there ſeems to be great reaſon to doubt, whether we ought to credit what is related in the Chronicon of Marcellinus under the year 390, when Arcadius was but thirteen years of age, that he forced the Empreſs Galla his mother in law, from the palace at Conſtantinople. With reſpect to the ſtory, which is told of him, that having been ſtruck by Arſenius his tutor, he reſolved to kill him, it is very improbable, and atteſted by no Author except Metaphraſtes. However, it is a very inconſiderable advantage for a Prince to be exempt from vices, if he has not likewiſe eminent virtues; and it is certain that the weak and ſtupid mildneſs of temper in Arcadius occaſioned the greateſt calamities imaginable in the Empire (3).

(1) Tillem. tom. 5. Part 2. pag. 828.
(2) See Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 23.
(3) Tillem. pag. 829, 830.

[B] This occaſioned a conteſt between Stilico and Rufinus.] The latter was a Gaul by nation, and had been in great favour with Theodoſius, who raiſed him to ſome of the higheſt poſts of the Empire. We have different characters of him according to the prejudices of different writers; but it is certain, that a violent ambition was the governing principle of his actions. Stilico's pretences to a right of governing the Eaſt as well as the Weſt raiſed the jealouſy of Rufinus, who had the ſame ambitious views, tho' they both agreed in felling decrees and ruining the moſt wealthy families, by injuſtice and ſuborn'd accuſations, in order to enrich themſelves with their ſpoils (4); in which reſpect however Rufinus is ſaid to have proceeded to the greateſt exceſs (5). As Stilico had married a niece of Theodoſius, Rufinus, who had a daughter ready for marriage, reſolved to engage Arcadius to marry her; and it is ſaid, that he was determined to gain this point, if poſſible, as a ſtep for himſelf to obtain the Empire. He took the moſt ſecret methods imaginable to have this marriage propoſed to the Emperor. However, the people got intelligence of it very ſoon, and were extremely provoked at his pride and inſolence. This intrigue of his was interrupted by a journey which he was obliged to take into the Eaſt, in order to ſatisfy Arcadius and Eucherius his uncle, who complained of Lucian, Count of the Eaſt. Rufinus had procured that poſt for Lucian, who was ſon to Florentius preſect of Gaul in the latter part of Conſtantius's reign. It was upon this account therefore, that Arcadius on his uncle's complaint caſt the blame on Rufinus; who immediately departed with a very ſmall retinue, and without acquainting any perſon with his deſign, and went to Antioch. He entered the city in the night, and ordered Lucian to be ſeized and brought before his tribunal, and beat in ſuch a manner upon the neck, that he died ſoon after. Rufinus upon his return to Conſtantinople, uſed his utmoſt efforts to promote the marriage of his daughter (6); but Eutropius the Eunuch, who afterwards became ſo famous, had engaged Arcadius to marry Eudoxia, which he accordingly did the 27th of April 395. This Lady was not a Roman, but born in Gaul, and daughter of Count Bauto, a celebrated General, who had been Conſul in the year 385 (7).

(4) Zoſim. lib. 5. and Suidas apud Tillem. p. 834.
(5) Suidas, apud eundem, ibid.
(6) Zoſim. lib. 5.
(7) Tillem. pag. 835.

[C] Involved the Eaſtern Empire in the utmoſt confuſion, by bringing in the Barbarians.] Failing in his deſign of marrying his daughter to Arcadius, and being apprehenſive of the power of Stilico, who pretended, that Theodoſius had made him guardian of two ſons, and who was coming into the Eaſt to deprive him of the authority, which he exerciſed there, he reſolved to raiſe ſuch a ſcene of confuſion as ſhould prevent any attempts of that kind againſt him (8). Oroſius likewiſe informs us (9), that he was in hopes that the exigence of the Empire would cover and promote the ambitious deſigns, which he had of ſeizing the ſovereign power; or at leaſt, as Claudian obſerves (10), that he might have the cruel conſolation of not periſhing alone. With theſe views he procured a deſcent of the Huns, who ravaged all the Eaſt as far as Antioch. We may refer to theſe incurſions the accounts which we read in ſome Homilies of that time, concerning Martyrs, who were put to death by the Barbarians, and Captives, who were carried to Antioch, where they were ſold or redeemed. St. Jerom mentions very frequently theſe ravages of the Huns, who ſtruck a terror upon all the nations as far as Paleſtine, while the Roman armies were engaged, as he obſerves, in civil war; that is, before the armies, which were conducted againſt Eugenius, were returned from the Weſt (11). Philoſtorgius (12) likewiſe mentions this deſcent of the Huns; but he places it after the death of Rufinus, and even that of Eutropius; which is a great error with regard to Chronology. At the ſame time, that Rufinus brought the Huns into Aſia, he abandoned Europe to the Goths (13). Their chief Captain was Alaric, who afterwards became ſo famous for taking the city of Rome. Theodoſius had given him the command of a body of Goths, and he complained ſo highly, that he was not advanced to ſome greater poſt, that he threatned to revolt (14). Rufinus made uſe of this diſpoſition of Alaric, and encouraged him privately by preſents (15) to collect the whole force of the Barbarians, and ravage the Provinces of the Empire, aſſuring him, that he might eaſily march into Greece, without any fear of meeting with oppoſition (16). It is ſaid, that Rufinus had deſignedly made Antiochus Proconſul of Achaia, and given the command of the Troops and the defence of the Straits of Thermopylæ and the Iſthmus of Corinth to Gerontius; which two men were both of his own faction, whom he choſe for this purpoſe, that they might not oppoſe Alaric, but open the paſſages to him. This they executed but too faithfully (17). The Goths being armed by the Romans againſt themſelves (18), and aſſiſted by the Huns, who had paſſed over the Danube upon the ice the winter before (19), ravaged Mœſia, Thrace, and Pannonia, and paſſed from thence into Macedonia and Theſſalia (20), ſacking all the towns between Dalmatia, the Adriatic Gulph, and the Euxin Sea. The city of Conſtantinople was likewiſe

(8) Zoſim. lib. 5.
(9) Hiſt. lib. 7.
(10) In Rufin. lib. 2.
(11) Tillem. pag. 638, 639.
(12) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. c. 8.
(13) Claud. in Rufin. lib. 2.
(14) Zoſim. l. 5.
(15) Marcell. Chronic. ad ann. 395.
(16) Idem, ibid. and Zoſim. lib. 5.
(17) Zoſim. l. 5.
(18) Claudian. in Rufin. lib. 2.
(19) Philoſt. Hiſt. Eccleſ. ubi ſupra.
(20) Claud. and Zoſim. ubi ſupra.

but was at laſt killed at Conſtantinople [D]. His death was of great advantage to the Emperor, though it proved of little conſequence to his Empire, becauſe Eutropius the Eunuch was ſuffered to gain an abſolute aſcendant at the court of Arcadius [E]. However the Emperor, notwithſtanding all his defects, had a warm zeal for the Catholick faith, and was perſuaded, that God had granted his father the many illuſtrious victories which he had obtained on account of his piety. This induced him to confirm very readily thoſe Laws which Theodoſius had made in favour of the Church, and to appoint ſeveral new ones [F]. Stilico agreeably to Arcadius's orders had ſuffered Alaric and the Goths to continue iu Theſſalia; but they having ravaged that country paſſed the Straits of Thermopylæ, through the weakneſs or treachery of the General Gerontius, who had the command there, and the Proconſul Antiochus, and entered Achaia, and penetrated into Peloponneſus, where they made dreadful depredations. Stilico upon this reſolved wiſe in a manner beſieged by the Barbarians, who came up to the gates of it. Rufinus went out in a Gothic dreſs, to treat with them, as he pretended, about making peace, and was received with great civility by the Goths, which very much increaſed the ſuſpicion of his treachery. Stilico, who had performed a journey into Gaul in fifteen days, if we credit Claudian (22), to ſecure a peace with the Germans and Gauls, alledged that it was neceſſary for him upon this exigence to give his aſſiſtance to the Eaſtern Empire; which he was undoubtedly determined to the more readily by the proſpect of ruining Rufinus. He departed therefore at the latter end of the ſpring with all the Troops of the Empire, which had attended Theodoſius againſt Eugenius, and even thoſe of Eugenius, which had ſurrendred themſelves to Theodoſius. The Barbarians hearing of his coming, collected themſelves in a body in Theſſalia; and Stilico was very near them, when Rufinus obtained an order from Arcadius to command him to ſend him the army of the Eaſt, which Theodoſius had conducted againſt Eugenius. He immediately obeyed, and ſent Arcadius not only the Troops, which he demanded, but likewiſe half of the treaſure of Theodoſius (23). Claudian tells us (24), that if Stilico had not been prevented by Rufinus from attacking the Barbarians, he would have ſecured Athens, Corinth, Lacedæmon, and many other famous cities of Greece, from the deſtruction, which they afterwards ſuffered.

(22) De Stilic. lib. 1.

(23) Tillem. p. 840, 841.

(24) In Rufin. lib. 2.

[D] Was at laſt killed at Conſtantinople.] When Stilico ſent back the Army to Arcadius, he gave the command of it to a General, who was a Goth, and named Gainas (25), to whom he diſcovered his deſign of killing Rufinus (26); and Eutropius the Eunuch readily concurred in that reſolution (27). When the Army came to Conſtantinople, Arcadius went out to ſalute it according to cuſtom, being attended by Rufinus, who was in hopes, that upon the ſight of his perſon, which was very noble, eſpecially in compariſon with Arcadius, and by means of the intereſt, which he had made with ſeveral officers of the Army, he ſhould be immediately proclaimed Emperor upon the ſpot. But it was already diſcovered, that he had impoſed upon the Troops, and been the means of Alaric's revolt. So that when the Army had paid their compliments to Arcadius, they inſenſibly ſurrounded Rufinus, and upon a ſignal given by Gainas, fell upon him, and cut him to pieces at the feet of Arcadius himſelf, while he was urging that Prince to declare him his collegue (28). Claudian (29) deſcribes the ſituation of the place, where this happened. It was at the palace called Hebdomon, and the tribunal where the Emperors uſed to be crowned. His head was cut off, and a ſtone thruſt into his mouth to keep it open; then his head was fixed upon the top of a lance, and carried thro' all the city of Conſtantinople, attended with a greater crowd than he had ever ſeen in his life-time. They cut off likewiſe his right hand, which they carried about every where to beg alms for this inſatiable man; and a great ſum of money was collected among thoſe, who hated his avaricious temper (30). His goods were confiſcated, and an Edict was publiſhed for that purpoſe, which was carried as far as Rome, every perſon exulting at the puniſhment of this old robber, who had plundered the whole world, as Symmachus expreſſes it (31).

(25) Zoſim. l. 5. and Marcellin. Chron. ad ann. 395.

(26) Zoſim. ubi ſupra. Philoſtorg. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. c. 3.

(27) Zoſim. ubi ſupra.

(28) Tillem. pag. 841, 842.

(29) In Rufin. lib. 2.

(30) Tillem. p. 842.

(31) Epiſt. 15.

[E] Was ſuffered to gain an abſolute aſcendant at the Court of Arcadius.] It is ſuppoſed, that he was an Armenian; but it is univerſally agreed, that he had been a ſlave. He was made an eunuch ſoon after he was born, that he might be ſold for an higher price, and, as Claudian obſerves (32), that he might afterwards caſt the greater diſgrace upon the Empire. He had many maſters, who ſold him to others, or gave him away, not knowing what uſe to make of him. At laſt he was brought to Court, where he raiſed himſelf from one degree to another, till he was appointed Grand Chamberlain to the Emperor, and gained an abſolute authority over him. The world was extremely ſurprized to ſee the Empire governed by an eunuch, whoſe intereſt multiplied prodigiouſly ſuch kind of perſons. Eunapius (33) has given us a deſcription of him in the moſt odious colours imaginable; and yet we are aſſured, that he has not reached the full extent of his guilt, ſince there was no crime, which he did not commit. Claudian has likewiſe written a Poem in two books againſt him. We are particularly informed, that he ſurpaſſed even Rufinus himſelf in avarice (34). He ſold publickly all the poſts of the Empire. He maintained whole troops of informers, in order to baniſh perſons of the greateſt merit, that he might ſeize their eſtates; and he diſcovered by their means all thoſe, who were rich, to prevent any thing from eſcaping his rapine (35). He took poſſeſſion of all the wealth of Rufinus, at leaſt, what he thought worth his deſire, leaving the reſt to be plundered by others (36). His ambition of governing alone made him hate the Senate and all perſons of authority and intereſt, whom he uſed his utmoſt efforts to remove from the Court (37). Claudian tells us in general, that all the priſons and places of baniſhment were filled with Men of eminent Quality. Eutropius imagined, that this was the means to raiſe himſelf, and ſecure his power. Suidas aſſerts, that he maintained a correſpondence with the Barbarians, with a view either to protect himſelf from Stilico, with whom he had an open conteſt ſoon after (38), or to raiſe himſelf to the Empire (39), tho' his character as an eunuch ſeemed to exclude him entirely from ſuch a pretenſion.

(32) In Rufrcſt. lib. 1.

(33) In Excerpt. de Legation.

(34) Marcell. Chronic.

(35) Zoſim. l. 5. Claud. in Rufin. and Suidas.

(36) Zoſim. and Marcellin. Chron. ubi ſupra.

(37) Zoſim. Suidas and Claudian, ubi ſupra.

(38) Zoſim. ubi ſupra.

(39) Suidas.

[F] To confirm very readily thoſe laws which Theodoſius had made in favour of the Church, and to appoint ſeveral new ones.] On the third of March 395, he confirmed all that his father had decreed againſt Hereticks, and abrogated every thing that was granted in hopes of reducing them by mildneſs. He made a law expreſly againſt the Eunomians, depriving them of their right to poſts of honour and profit, or to give or receive any thing whatever by will, tho' Theodoſius had allowed them the right of making wills by his law of the 21ſt of June 394. Arcadius's law of the 29th of March 395 prohibits all hereticks to hold any publick or private aſſembly, and to aſſume to themſelves the title of Biſhop or of any eccleſiaſtical office. That of the third of September declares, that a pretended Biſhop named Eureſius ſhould be ranked in the number of hereticks, as well as all thoſe, who receded from the Catholick doctrine, tho' the difference was ever ſo ſmall and inconſiderable. On the 24th of November Arcadius ordered Marcellus Maſter of the Offices to enquire ſtrictly whether there were any hereticks among the inferior officers of the Court, and not only to remove them, but even to baniſh them the city, together with thoſe, by whoſe means they gained their poſts. The law of the 7th of Auguſt renews all that had been decreed before againſt the Pagans, as well as againſt hereticks, and particularly prohibits all perſons from going into any place deſigned for the worſhip of idols, or to offer any ſacrifice in any place whatſoever (40).

(40) See Cod. Theodoſian. ap. Tillem. p. 848, 849, 850. and Millar's Hiſtory of the Propagation of Chriſtianity, Vol. 1. c. 4. p. 444. 3d edit.

ſolved to ſtop theſe ravages, and paſſed over his army thither. He killed a great number of the enemies, and obliged them to retire to a mountain called Phloe, near Piſa in Arcadia, where he might eaſily have deſtroyed them, but ſuffered them to eſcape [G]. Eutropius ſtill continued his tyranny at the Court of the Emperor, and forced ſeveral perſons of eminence, whom he was jealous of, into baniſhment, and engaged Arcadius to aboliſh the uſe of Sanctuaries [H]. In the year 396 the Emperor made ſeveral Laws, which were for the intereſt of the Church and Empire [I]. We are informed by Claudian the Poet (b), that Eutropius endeavoured about that time to make a treaty with the Barbarians;

(b) In Eutrop. lib. 1.

[G] Where he might eaſily have deſtroyed them, but ſuffered them to eſcape.] Claudian, who was entirely devoted to Stilico's intereſt, tells us (41), that he would have ſoon reduced Alaric and all his Goths to any terms, which he thought proper, as he had before killed a great number of them upon the mountains of Arcadia, if the Court of the Eaſtern Empire had not taken them into their protection under pretence of the laws; becauſe as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (42), Greece belonged to Arcadia; and perhaps at the time, that Stilico was amuſing himſelf, according to Zoſimus, in diverſions inſtead of attacking the Barbarians. Arcadius made a treaty with them. For it appears, that not long after Alaric was made Governor or General of the Troops of Eaſtern Illyricum, which included Greece (43); and Claudian expreſly affirms in another place (44), that the Romans had made him General of the armies of Illyricum. That Poet's words in Eutrop. lib. 2. are as follow:

(41) De Bello Gothico.

(42) Pag. 854.

(43) Claud. in Eutrop. lib. 2.

(44) De Bello Gothico.

——— At nunc qui fœdera rumpit
Ditatur; qui ſervat eget. Vaſtator Achivæ
Gentis, & Epirum nuper populatus inultam,
Præſidet Illyrico. Jam quos obſedit, amicus,
Ingreditur muros, illis reſponſa daturus,
Quorum conjugibus potitur, natoſque peremit.
Sic hoſtes punire ſolent, hæc præmia ſolvunt Excidiis.

[H] Engaged Arcadius to aboliſh the uſe of Sanctuaries.] Sozomen tells us (45), that it was upon account of Pentadia, the wife of Timaſius, and ſeveral other perſons, whom he wanted to deſtroy, and in order to force them from the altars, to which they had fled, that Eutropius perſuaded the Emperor to make a law to prohibit any perſon from taking ſanctuary in the churches, to force thoſe away, who had fled thither, and to puniſh them with greater ſeverity. Mr. Tillemont obſerves (46) upon this occaſion, that it is very unreaſonable, that churches ſhould ſerve as ſanctuaries to protect the guilty; but that it is juſt on the other hand, that they ſhould be a refuge for the miſerable, till they are able to recollect themſelves, and the firſt fury of their enemies be calmed, and there be an opportunity of examining whether they have been guilty, or only unfortunate. And it is ſtrange, continues that author, that Chriſtians ſhould preſume to uſe violence at the foot of the altars of Chriſt, and have leſs reſpect for his Churches, than the Pagans had for their Idols of wood and ſtone. But the abuſes of thoſe ſanctuaries in Roman-Catholic countries are certainly the greateſt inconvenience imaginable, and an encouragement to the worſt of crimes. The law abovementioned render'd Eutropius extremely odious. And the Lawyers, tho' they had no very great zeal for the honour of the Church, conſidered it as one of the principal cauſes of the ruin of that Miniſter (47). They admired the juſtice of God, who a few years after reduced him to implore the aſſiſtance of the Church, which he endeavoured to deprive others of, and to confeſs, ſays St. Chryſoſtom, by his actions rather than by his words the injuſtice of his law (48). It was aboliſhed ſoon after his diſgrace, and torn out of all the public regiſters (49).

(45) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 8. c. 7.

(46) Pag. 859.

(47) See Socrat. lib. 6. cap. 5. and Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 7.

(48) Chryſoſt. in Eutrop. tom. 4. pag. 484. apud Tillem. pag. 859.

(49) Sozomen. ubi ſupra.

[I] Made ſeveral laws, which were for the intereſt of the Church and Empire.] That of the 3d of March addreſſed to Clearchus Prefect of Conſtantinople, ordains, that all the publick and private places held by the hereticks in that city, ſhould be confiſcated. This is ſuppoſed to ſignify thoſe places, where they kept their aſſemblies. That all their Clergy ſhould be baniſhed the city. That they ſhould not be permitted to aſſemble themſelves to perform their Litanies or proceſſions either in the night or day time. And that if the officers of the Pretorium ſuffered any of their aſſemblies, they ſhould be condemned in a body to pay a large fine. The two laws of the 21ſt and 22d of April are ſtill more ſevere againſt the Eunomians. They ordered Ceſarius Prefect of the Pretorium to make a ſtrict enquiry after their clergy, and to oblige them to quit the city. The law of the 23d of March againſt Apoſtates is more favourable to them than thoſe of the preceding Emperors. For it gives them the liberty at leaſt of beſtowing what they thought proper upon their children and grand-children, their parents, brothers and ſiſters. That of the 10th of December deprives thoſe, who have any concern in the Pagan idolatry, of the privileges, which had been granted them, ſince it was not reaſonable they ſhould enjoy thoſe privileges, whoſe very poſſeſſion was condemned by the laws. The law of the 5th of February addreſſed to Gennadius Prefect of Egypt decrees, according to the Code of Juſtinian, that none but Chriſtians ſhould be admitted into certain poſts at Alexandria. But in the Code of Theodoſius it has a quite different ſenſe, and makes no manner of mention of Chriſtians. The law of the 24th of March is a general Order to all Governors of Provinces to oblige the inhabitants of every city to repair their old walls, and to raiſe new ones, laying a tax upon private perſons for that purpoſe; and the Law gives ſeveral directions, that the tax might be levied in an equitable manner. It is ſuppoſed, that the late ravages of the Huns and Goths gave occaſion to this law. On the 26th of February, and 25th of April he made two laws in favour of the Jews. The latter prohibited any publick reproaches againſt the Patriarchs, who were the heads of their religion, and who had then the title of illuſtrious given them, as well as the principal officers of the Empire. The other law ordains, that the Jews themſelves ſhould commiſſion perſons to fix the price of the things, which they ſold, without the Governors interpoſing at all. It is ſuppoſed, that he granted them this favour, becauſe as they were univerſally hated, thoſe, who were not of their religion, rated their merchandize at too low a price. In a law of the 25th of April he gave leave for the celebration of a feaſt called Majumas, which was before prohibited, becauſe it was attended with great debauchery and licentiouſneſs, and a vaſt expence in banquets. He permitted it only on condition, that nothing ſhould be done contrary to decency and modeſty. But this being impoſſible to be reſtrained, he abſolutely forbad the celebration of it the 2d of October 399, and at the ſame time allowed other diverſions in the room of it, in order to relax the people's minds (50). Suidas tells us, that this feaſt of Majumas was originally obſerved at Rome upon the Tiber and the ſea ſhore; and that it took its name from the month of May, in which it was celebrated. Mr. Tillemont examines this conjecture in his 12th note upon the Emperor Arcadius (51). Others ſays that it was derived from water, which was called by that name in Syriac, becauſe it was performed at Daphne and other places, where there was plenty of water. The feaſt continued ſeven days. It is thought by ſome to have been that feaſt, which Libanius ſpeaks of with horror in ſeveral places of his writings; and againſt which St. Chryſoſtom preached frequently at Antioch; becauſe it was obſerved in a very licentious manner in the ſuburb of Daphne, from whence it introduced into the city an infinite deal of diſorder. Libanius tells us, that it had been prohibited by a wiſe Prince, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be Conſtantius, and was reſtored a long time after by others, who were fond of whatever bore an affinity with their own irregular manner of life. It is certain, that it was obſerved in the year 362 under Julian, and that after Libanius's time it was prohibited till this year;

(50) Tillem. p. 860, 861, 862, 863.

(51) Pag. 1041, 1042.

barians, but without ſucceſs. The ſame year Conſtantinople was threatened with immediate deſtruction by a cloud of fire which hung over it [K]. In 397 Arcadius made divers new laws [L], and in July went to Ancyra, from whence he returned at the latter end of September following, with the ſame pomp and magnificence, as if he had conquered the Perſians (i). Eutropius finding now that no perſon was capable of oppoſing him except Stilico, who pretended, according to Zoſimus (k), that he would come into the Eaſt and manage affairs there, he endeavoured to procure him to be aſſaſſinated; but this attempt being diſcovered, he engaged Arcadius to order the Senate of Conſtantinople to declare him a publick enemy, and to ſeize his poſſeſſions in the Eaſt (l). This was the means to raiſe a war between the two brothers Arcadius and Honorius. The ſame year the (i) Tillem. pag. 871.

(k) Lib. 5.
(l) Tillem. pag. 871.

which was undoubtedly done by the Emperor Theodoſius. We find, that there were ſome remains of it in the time of Leo the ſon of the Emperor Conſtantine Copronymus in the 9th Century (52). But to return to Arcadius's laws, that of the 3d of Auguſt commanded all the Magiſtrates to try immediately the cauſes of thoſe, who were detained in priſon, without ſuffering them to languiſh there for a long time either out of negligence, or to gain the empty character of mildneſs by a real inſtance of cruelty in their conduct. The law of the 26th of November confirmed that of Theodoſius againſt the marriage of Couſin-Germans, but moderated the penalty of it. The law of the 3d of Auguſt ordained that the wives and relations of thoſe, who were proſcrib'd, ſhould not be involv'd in their puniſhments, if they had no concern in their guilt; and conſequently, that their wives ſhould enjoy all the eſtates, which they brought to their husbands, and even what had been ſettled on them by the marriage-contract (53).

(52) Idem, pag. 862, 863.

(53) Idem, pag. 864.

[K] Conſtantinople was threatned with immediate deſtruction by a cloud of fire, which hung over it.] St. Proſper and Marcellinus in their Chronicles tell us, that in the year 396 there were earthquakes for ſeveral days together, and that the ſky appeared all on fire. Tiro Proſperus in his Chronicon publiſhed with that of Euſebius by Scaliger in his Theſaurus Temporum, Amſterdam Edition 1658, gives a more particular account of this, and informs us, that Conſtantinople by a ſudden and thorough repentance averted the wrath of God, which it was threatned with by a cloud of fire, that appeared in a dreadful manner over the city. St. Auſtin deſcribes it more fully in his piece De Urbis Romæ excidio. C. 6. a few years after, and tells us, that there were ſeveral among his people, and perhaps even among thoſe, who heard him preach upon that ſubject, who were eye-witneſſes of this prodigious Phænomenon. His account of it is as follows. While Arcadius was Emperor at Conſtantinople, God, in order to ſtrike a terror upon that city, and by that means to reform it, appeared (venit) by a Revelation to one of his faithful ſervants, who was a military perſon, and declared to him that the city would be deſtroyed upon a certain day by fire from Heaven, and commanded him to go and acquaint the Biſhop with it. The Biſhop Nectarius did not neglect this warning; but addreſſed himſelf to the people; who having immediate recourſe to tears and repentance, as Niniveh did anciently, obtained a revocation of the ſentence, which had been pronounced againſt them. But that the perſon, who gave this warning, might not be conſidered as an impoſtor, or as one, who had been deceived himſelf, when the day came, which he had fixed, and every one waited under the moſt dreadful apprehenſions for the accompliſhment of his prediction, they ſaw at the beginning of the night a little cloud of fire, which aroſe from the Eaſt. It enlarged itſelf as it came nearer, till at laſt it extended itſelf over the whole city, where it occaſioned the moſt aſtoniſhing horror imaginable. Every one ſaw the flame hang over his head; and at the ſame time was ſenſible of the ſmell of ſulphur. All people crowded to the Churches, which were not large enough to contain thoſe, who took ſanctuary there. Thoſe, who had not received baptiſm before, deſired it with the utmoſt impatience, not only in the Churches, but likewiſe in the houſes, publick places, and ſtreets, in order to eſcape, ſays St. Auſtin, not the fire, which they then ſaw themſelves threatned with, but that eternal one which they dreaded. At laſt, after God had ſtruck an univerſal terror upon this great people, and convinc'd them of the truth of what his ſervant had declared from him, the cloud began to leſſen, and by degrees was diſſipated entirely. This fear ſcarce began to abate, before a rumour ſpread itſelf among them, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to abandon the city, ſince it would infallibly be deſtroyed the Saturday following; and even the particular hour was mentioned. All the people, and the Emperor himſelf left the city. Whatever regard any perſon might have for their houſes and goods, no body ſtay'd behind; and St. Auſtin aſſures us, that they did not even ſhut their doors, they were ſeized with ſo prodigious a dread. All the inhabitants retir'd together ſome miles out of the city, where they employed themſelves in imploring the divine Mercy, when of a ſudden at the hour foretold they perceived a great ſmoke, ariſing over the city. Upon this diſcovery they redoubled their prayers with loud lamentations, till the ſky became clear again. They ſent perſons then to ſee what had happened, and found to their great ſatisfaction, that the city ſtill remained entire; ſo that they returned with thankſgiving to God. Every perſon found his houſe in the ſame ſtate, in which he had left it, without looſing any thing, tho' the doors were open.

[L] In 397 Arcadius made divers new laws.] The law of the 16th of February was addreſſed to Cæſarius, in which the Emperor decrees, that thoſe perſons ſhould ſuffer the confiſcation of their eſtates and baniſhment, who had obtained or endeavoured to obtain by money, poſts of honour or profit at Court, or any other poſts, which ought only to be beſtowed upon thoſe of approved merit; there being no difference between committing a crime, and only being prevented by an impoſſibility from committing it. The law of the 6th of March confirms one of Valentinian againſt the receivers of taxes, who exacted more than they had a right to claim; and appoints, that their injuſtice ſhould be capitally puniſhed, ſince ſo many repeated prohibitions had not been able to reſtrain their exorbitance. By that of the 1ſt of April, Arcadius orders, that the Doctors and Teachers of the Apollinarians ſhould be baniſhed immediately from Conſtantinople, and that the houſes, where they held their private Aſſemblies, ſhould be confiſcated. As the Jews were the objects of univerſal hatred and contempt, he made a law the 17th of June, addreſſed to Anatolius Preſect of Illyricum, by which he appointed that the Governors ſhould take care to prevent them from being inſulted and diſturbed in their Synagogues. But he decreed at the ſame time, that thoſe among them, who being proſecuted for any crime or for debt, ſhould take ſanctuary in the Church, and promiſe to become Chriſtians, ſhould not be received till after they had cleared themſelves, or been acquitted of the crimes objected to them. In another law of the 1ſt of July, he exempts the Miniſters of their religion from offices in the Courts, putting them upon an equality in that reſpect with the Chriſtian Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons. He followed in this point the decrees of Conſtantine, Conſtantius, Valentinian, and Valens. But it is ſuppoſed, that he receded from thoſe of Gratian, the younger Valentinian, and his own father Theodoſius, who had not treated the Jews in ſo favourable a manner. The law of the 30th of December 399, ſeems to revoke this; for it ſubjects to the offices of the Courts all the Jews, who could be proved to be obliged to them by their birth, as Mr. Tillemont obſerves. The 4th of September Arcadius made a ſevere law againſt all thoſe, who formed any conſpiracy to kill any of his officers, or who engaged in any of thoſe which had been concerted by others. He condemns them all to the confiſcation the Emperor had a daughter born, whom he named Flaccilla, by Eudoxia his Empreſs (m). In 398 he made ſeveral new laws [M], and in July the year following he ordered the temples in the country to be demoliſhed in ſuch a manner as would occaſion the leaſt confuſion, in order to deprive the Pagans of every thing which might afford matter for their ſuperſtition, their temples in the cities being probably deſtroyed before (n). Eutropius was now near his fall; which Zoſimus (o) aſcribes particularly to Gainas an Officer, who was a Goth and an Arian. He imagined, that he ſhould raiſe himſelf to the abſolute command of the Empire, if he could but deſtroy Eutropius. With this view he perſuaded Count Tarbigil or Tribigilde, a Goth, who commanded a great body of Oſtrogoths and Greuthonges at Nacolia in Phrygia, and was related to Gainas, according to Socrates (p), to revolt, and promiſed to ſupport him. Tribigilde accordingly took up arms, and ravaged Nacolia, and many other cities of Phrygia. Eutropius endeavoured to bribe him, but in vain, ſo that the Goth ſtruck a terror upon the whole Empire; and Gainas wrote to the Emperor, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to grant him his own terms, and particularly to give up Eutropius to him as the cauſe of all theſe misfortunes (q). This added to an inſult which he offered to the Empreſs Eudoxia, entirely ruined his intereſt with Arcadius [N], who baniſhed him to the Iſle of Cyprus, where he was beheaded (r). The deſtruction of Eutropius

(m) Idem, pag. 872.
(n) Idem, pag. 879.
(o) Lib. 5.
(p) Pag. 306. apud Tillem. p. 883.
(q) Tillem. p. 885.
(r) Idem, pag. 885-890.

confiſcation of their eſtates and death; and declares even their ſons to be infamous and incapable of ever poſſeſſing any eſtate, leaving but a very ſmall allowance to their daughters. Eutropius was undoubtedly the perſon, who procured this, in order to ſecure himſelf from the great number of enemies, whom he had raiſed himſelf by his injuſtice. This law is very famous; and Gothofredus has written a diſſertation upon it. Aſterius Count of the Eaſt having informed the Court, that he wanted materials to repair the roads, bridges, aqueducts, and walls of cities, Arcadius ordered him on the firſt of November to make uſe of thoſe, which were procured by the demoliſhing of divers Pagan Temples. The 8th of November Arcadius made a law to inflict death upon every domeſtic whether free or ſlave, who ſhould turn informer againſt his maſter. But he excepted the crime of Læſa Majeſtas, or high Treaſon; which render'd the law almoſt entirely uſeleſs (54).

(54) Tillem. p. 868-871.

[M] In 398 he made ſeveral other laws.] At the requeſt of St. Chryſoſtom he made a reſcript or order to ſhut up all the temples, which remained at Gaza, and to break the idols to pieces. Porphyrius, who was then Biſhop of Gaza, had deſired the Demolition of the Temples; but the Order which he had for that purpoſe, was defeated by the treachery of an officer named Hilarius, who was commiſſioned to execute it, but was bribed by the Pagans. The law of the 3d of February oblig'd the Jews to ſubmit to the Roman laws in thoſe things, which had no relation to their religion, permitting them only to make uſe of their Patriarchs or other perſons of their nation as arbitrators in their civil affairs, with an injunction to the Judges to ſee the execution of the ſentence of theſe arbitrators, as of thoſe whom they themſelves had authoriz'd. We find that the ſame conſtitution was made in favour of the Chriſtian Biſhops, in a law dated the 27th of July the ſame year. The law of the 4th of March was extremely rigorous againſt the Eunomians and Montaniſts. For it decrees, not only that they ſhould not only hold any Aſſembly even in the country, but that their clergy ſhould be baniſhed from the cities. That all thoſe, who ſhould be found there for the future, ſhould be puniſhed with death; and that all the houſes, in which they were entertained, ſhould be confiſcated, if they were not ſent away immediately. It ordains likewiſe, that a ſtrict ſearch ſhould be made after their Books in order to be burnt in the preſence of the Magiſtrates; and that if any perſon kept them, he ſhould be capitally puniſhed, in the ſame manner as if they were Books of Magic; becauſe in effect they taught all kinds of vice, and furniſhed matter for them. In the law of the 11th of the ſame month, the Emperor laid a large fine upon the officers of Simplicius, General of the army in the Eaſt, if their troops ſuffered their horſes to feed in the common paſtures of the city of Apamea in Syria, famous for its excellent paſturage, or in any of the lands near it, which belonged to private perſons in Antioch. There are ſeveral laws dated the 27th of July, addreſſed ſome of them to Cæſarius, and others to Eutychianus, but which are thought to be only fragments of one of thoſe laws, which Eutropius procured againſt ſanctuaries in Churches. It is decreed there, that if a ſlave, or any other perſon, who is accountable to, and dependent upon the publick or upon private perſons, takes refuge in a Church, the Eccleſiaſtics ſhall be obliged to ſurrender him up at the firſt ſummons, &c. That the Biſhops ſhall chooſe Monks to ordain them, as perſons of an approved virtue, rather than Laymen dependant upon others, the ordination of whom is very invidious. That the Clergy of the Churches in the country ſhould be obliged to the ſame tax, as formerly. That the Clergy and Monks may appeal to a ſuperior Judge in favour of criminals, but not take them out of the hands of the officers of juſtice; and that if they do ſo, an account ſhall be ſent to the Court, and the Biſhops ſhall be made reſponſible for them, ſince it is incumbent upon them to inſtruct others in their duty (55).

(55) Idem, pag. 873-876.

[N] This added to an inſult which he offered to the Empreſs Eudoxia, entirely ruined his intereſt with Arcadius.] He proceeded ſo far in his ill treatment of that Princeſs, that he threatned to baniſh her from the Palace. She ſeeing ſo favourable an opportunity upon this exigence of affairs to ruin him, took her two little daughters in her arms, and threw herſelf with tears at the feet of her husband to deſire juſtice of him. Arcadius being touched with the tears of his wife and children, and the neceſſity of affairs at that time, recollected at laſt that he was Emperor, and immediately ſending for Eutropius, reproached him in the ſevereſt terms imaginable, deprived him of all his offices and eſtate, and baniſhed him from the palace. Upon this all the imaginary grandeur of Eutropius vaniſhed in a moment. He ſaw every thing, which he had moſt lov'd and eſteemed, diſappear. All his adorers, friends, or rather flatterers, either abandoned him, or became his enemies. The Church, to which he had been before an enemy, was the only place, in which he found compaſſion or aſſiſtance. For perceiving, that even his life was in danger, he left the palace to take ſanctuary in the Church, with his head covered with duſt; and notwithſtanding the Law, which he had made to take away the right of aſſiſting the miſerable, he hung about the Altar for protection. Many perſons murmured againſt St. Chryſoſtom; but he repreſented to them, that nothing was more honourable to the Church, than to ſee the perſecutor of it obliged to have recourſe to its mercy; and that nothing was more worthy the Spouſe of Chriſt, than to forget every thing that he had done againſt her, and to aſſiſt him in his misfortunes. However there was an univerſal exclamation againſt Eutropius in the theatres, of which he had been ſo extremely fond. The City was all inraged againſt him. The ſoldiers demanded even his death; and Gainas urged very importunately, that he ſhould either be put to death or baniſhed, upon this pretence, that there was no other means to induce Tribigilde to lay down his arms. Some Perſons were ſent from the palace to force him from the Altar; and thoſe, who the evening before had kiſſed his hands with the utmoſt humility, took upon them this commiſſion. A body of ſoldiers came and ſurrounded the church with their ſwords drawn. Eutropius ſtruck with terror, hid himſelf in the ſacriſty, where the ſacred veſſels were repoſited. But St. Chryſoſtom went tropius was of no very conſiderable advantage to the Empire, for the ſame diſorders ſtill continued. Arcadius having neither ſenſe nor conduct, the whole authority fell into the hands of Eudoxia the Empreſs, who abuſed her power [O]. Gainas had no other view in removing Eutropius, but to proſecute his own intereſts, and committed a thouſand diſorders in Aſia in conjunction with Tribigilde, ſo that Arcadius having no army to oppoſe them, ſent to the former, and conſented to whatever terms he thought proper. He demanded that Aurelian, Saturninus, and John, men of the greateſt eminence in the Senate, ſhould be delivered up to him, and then ordered them into baniſhment (s). He afterwards deſigned to ſeize Conſtantinople, but being prevented, went to Thrace, and was defeated by Fravitus, and at laſt killed by the Huns (t). In the year 400 Eudoxia received the title of Auguſta, and ordered her ſtatues to be honoured (u). The year following Arcadius's ſon and ſucceſſor Theodoſius, was born (w). In 404 the Empreſs baniſhed St. John Chryſoſtom, and died the 30th of September following (x). About the ſame time the Empire was ravaged by the Huns and Iſaurians (y). In 406 he publiſhed a ſevere Law againſt thoſe who publiſhed Libels againſt their enemies, and even againſt thoſe who read them without tearing them to pieces or burning them, or did not inform againſt thoſe

(s) Idem, pag. 895, 896, 897.

(t) Idem, pag. 900—904.

(u) Idem, pag. 904, 905.

(w) Idem, pag. 909.

(x) Idem, pag. 916, 917, 918.

(y) Idem, pag. 919, &c.

out to the ſoldiers, who carried him to the palace, and threatned him with death, becauſe he would not deliver up the criminal. Arcadius was eaſily perſuaded, that he ought to ſuffer him to enjoy the protection of the Sanctuary in the Church; but the ſoldiers inſiſted upon his death (56). St. Chryſoſtom tells us (57), that the Emperor made a long Speech to them, but could not make any impreſſion upon them at firſt, becauſe they were ſo highly provoked againſt the crimes of this Miniſter; and forgot even the reſpect due to the Imperial Majeſty. However at laſt he moved them by his tears to have regard to the Altar, to which Eutropius had fled. The day following there was a great concourſe of the people at the Church to ſee Eutropius, to view the man, who had juſt before made the world tremble under him, trembling himſelf for fear of death, and reduced to the moſt dreadful diſtreſs imaginable. St. Chryſoſtom upon this occaſion mounted the pulpit, and made a Diſcourſe, which is extremely celebrated in the Hiſtorians (58), in which he ſhewed the uncertainty and vanity of all human grandeur, and how little reaſon the rich and powerful have to be elated. He repreſented likewiſe ſome of the faults of Eutropius in order to enhance the charity, with which the Church aſſiſted him; and he expatiated upon the greatneſs of his fall, not with a deſign to inſult his misfortunes, but to move the people to have compaſſion upon him. In ſhort, having drawn tears from the eyes of his audience, how enraged ſoever they were againſt Eutropius, he concluded with exhorting them to go in a body, and caſt themſelves at the feet of the Emperor, and deſire of him pardon, or at leaſt life, for that unfortunate man, out of regard to the Church and its holy Altar (59). We have no account whether the people did as St. Chryſoſtom deſired of them; but we are told, that ſome days after Eutropius leaving the Church, in hopes to eſcape ſecretly, was taken and baniſhed into the Iſle of Cyprus. It appears, that ſome perſons imagined, that he was delivered up to his enemies by the Church (60). Others have aſſerted (61), that he was drag'd from the Church by force. But St. Chryſoſtom expreſly affirms in a Diſcourſe (62), which he wrote not long after, when Eutropius was in baniſhment, that all this was falſe; and that the Church would not have abandoned him, if he had not abandoned her firſt. Zoſimus (63) tells us, that when he was baniſhed to Cyprus, he was aſſured with an oath, that his life ſhould not be taken away. Claudian (64), who wrote about the ſame time that he was carried into baniſhment, promiſed him in his Poem, that his head ſhould not be cut off, tho' himſelf had ordered an eunuch to be ſerved in that manner. But, as Mr. Tillemont obſerves, he was a Poet, and not a Prophet. We have a Law ſtill extant, by which Arcadius confiſcates all his eſtate, deprives him of the office of Grand Chamberlain and Patrician, with all the other inferior poſts, which he held; and decrees that his name ſhould be eraſed out of all places, in which he had been mentioned as Conſul; and that all his images and ſtatues ſhould be removed from all the places either publick or private, where they had been fixed; and commands Aurelian Prefect of the Pretorian to ſee him conveyed to Cyprus under a ſtrong guard, and to take particular care to keep a watch upon him, for fear of any tumult. This Law is dated the 17th of January 399. Claudian (65) and Socrates the Hiſtorian (66) mention that article of it, which relates to effacing of all the marks of his Conſulſhip; and we find in ſome of the Faſti, only the name of Manlius Theodorus his Collegue; and ſome Writers affirm, that Theodorus was Conſul alone. However the name of Eutropius is ſtill extant in Marcellinus's Chronicon and other Authors (67). Gainas could not be eaſy while Eutropius was living, and urged ſeveral perſons to inform againſt him; ſo that he was ordered to be ſent for from Cyprus, and Commiſſioners appointed to try his cauſe, the chief of whom was Aurelian Prefect of the Pretorium (68). They met for this purpoſe at a place called Pantichium between Chalcedon and Nicomedia (69). He was at laſt condemned, and his head cut off, becauſe, as it was alledged, he had during his Conſulſhip made uſe of the ornaments, which belonged only to the Emperor (70); from whence they without doubt inferred that he had a deſign to uſurp the Empire. Zoſimus (71), who aſſerts that he had his life promiſed him with a ſolemn oath, tells us, that this breach of it was covered by a pretence, that this oath was reſtrained entirely to Conſtantinople, and upon that account he was executed at Chalcedon. He was put to death in the night time (72).

(56) Idem, pag. 885, 886, 887.

(57) Apud Tillem. p. 887.

(58) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. c. 5. and Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 7.

(59) Chryſoſtomi in Eutropium Orat. Oper. tom. 4. p. 482-487. apud Tillem. p. 888.

(60) Tillem. p. 889.

(61) Zoſim. lib. 5. Suidas in Eutrop.

(62) In Pſalm. xliv. p. 667. ap. Tillem. p. 889.

(63) Lib. 5.

(64) In Eutrop. lib. 2.

(65) Ubi ſupra.

(66) Lib. 6. c. 5

(67) Tillem. p. 890.

(68) Zoſim. l. 5. Philoſtorg. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 6.

(69) Philoſtorg. ubi ſupra. Sozom. lib. 7. c. 21.

(70) Philoſt. ubi ſupra.

(71) Lib. 5.

(72) Tillem. p. 891.

[O] The whole authority fell into the hands of Eudoxia the Empreſs, who abuſed her power.] We are informed by Zoſimus (73), that ſhe was a woman of a very bold and enterprizing diſpoſition, who was not aſhamed to take a ſhare of the money, which the Officers had raiſed by betraying their own honour and the intereſt of the Empire, and then to protect them from the purſuit of juſtice. She was likewiſe accuſed of a great many other inſtances of injuſtice and violence, of which her avarice was the ſource; and her perſecution of St. Chryſoſtom alone, as Mr. Tillemont obſerves (74), would be ſufficient to render every thing credible, which could be ſaid of her. Beſides her own perſonal faults, ſhe was perpetually ſurrounded by a ſett of women, who entirely governed her, and a company of eunuchs, whoſe avarice was always inſatiable. There was no body to be ſeen at Court but informers, who upon the death of a rich man were begging for his eſtate, under pretence that he had left no heirs; and they immediately obtained it without any other enquiry, merely by the intereſt of the eunuchs; ſo that the children loſt their father and their eſtate at the ſame time. Zoſimus aſſures us, that ſuch flagrant inſtances of injuſtice were to be ſeen every where, which made thoſe, who had the leaſt reſolution or honour, wiſh for death (75). Palladius in his Dialogue concerning the Life of St. Chryſoſtom (76) tells us, that among the inſtruments of the perſecution of that Father, beſides thoſe women, who were generally known, there were three widows, who abuſed to their own deſtruction the vaſt riches left them by their husbands, and which were the fruits of rapine and violence. Theſe widows were Marſa, the widow of Promotus, Caſtricia, the widow of Saturninus, and Eugraphia, a Lady of the moſt violent paſſions and outragious conduct. Γυναικῶν δὲ πρὸς ταῖς φημιζομέναις, τρεῖς χῆραι μὲν, ἀνδρόπλουτοι δὲ, ἐπ' ὀλέθρῳ τῆς ἑαυτῶν σωτηρίας τὰ ἐξ ἁρπαγῆς χρήματα κεκλημέναι, ταραξάνδριαι καὶ ἀνασείριαι· Μάρσα Προμότου γυνὴ, καὶ Καστρίκια ἡ Σατορνίνου, καὶ Εὐγραφία, ἀμφιμανής τις. T.

(73) Lib. 5.

(74) Pag. 895.

(75) Zoſim. ubi ſupra.

(76) Pag. 35. edit. Paris 1680.

thoſe who had read them. The puniſhment, which he appointed in theſe caſes, was capital (z). Arcadius died the firſt of May 408, being thirty one years of age, having reigned twelve years in conjunction with his father, and fourteen years after his deceaſe. He left but one ſon, Theodoſius, then eight years of age, who ſucceeded him in the Empire. He had four daughters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina (aa).

(z) Idem, pag. 926.

(aa) Idem, pag. 931.

ARCERE (ANTHONY) one of the Fathers of the Oratory in the ſeventeenth Century, and celebrated for his attempt of compiling a Dictionary of the Turkiſh Language [A], was born at Marſeilles in the year 1664. He entered into the Congregation of the Oratory when he was eighteen years of age; and after he had ſtudied and taught polite Learning in that Society, he went to Paris, where he ſpent about a year in the Maiſon de St. Honore. He became acquainted there with ſeveral learned men who had a great eſteem for him, and particularly the Abbé Bignon; but his modeſty prevented him from ſhewing himſelf to advantage in publick, as his love of learning engaged him in a retired and ſtudious manner of life. He applied himſelf very early to the ſtudy of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Tongues, and afterwards to the Arabic, Turkiſh and Perſian Languages; and he was well ſkilled in the chief of the European Tongues. Upon his return to Marſeilles, he prevailed with his parents to ſupply him with the neceſſary expences for travelling in the Eaſt, in order to perfect himſelf in the knowledge of the Languages and manners of thoſe countries, and to purchaſe books and manuſcripts proper for his deſign. He performed this voyage with great ſucceſs, and upon his return, reſolved not to enter himſelf again in the Oratory, but to live privately among his relations, that he might purſue his ſtudies without any interruption. His application to the compiling of his Dictionary was ſo very intenſe, that he did not allow himſelf the relaxation which was neceſſary to preſerve his health, ſo that he fell into a ſlow fever and conſumption, which put an end to his life the 22d of January 1699, when he was but thirty nine years of age. He left behind him in manuſcript, Grammars of moſt Languages, eſpecially of the Oriental, which were an inconteſtable proof of his great induſtry and application (a).

(a) See the Paris edition of Moreri 1732. p. 589.

[A] Celebrated for his attempt of compiling a Dictionary of the Turkiſh language.] He employ'd eight years in forming this Dictionary, in the French and Turkiſh tongues, which would undoubtedly have been of prodigious uſe with regard both to religion and trade. It was not deſigned as a mere Vocabulary, as moſt other Dictionaries are. It would have been much more extenſive and curious, as well as more eaſy for uſe than that of Meninſki, which begins with the Turkiſh, which that Author tranſlates into Latin or High-Dutch. The Dictionary of Monſr. Arcere began with the French, and ſhewed the conformity between the Turkiſh Proverbs and the French, Latin, and Greek tongues, and the Scriptures. He would have inſerted a great number of curious obſervations upon the Turkiſh Hiſtory, Religion, Ceremonies, Offices, military Diſcipline, Cuſtoms, Habits, Geography, &c. becauſe the different phraſes of the Turks under the ſame word alluding very often to theſe things, made ſuch an explanation of them abſolutely neceſſary. T.

ARCESILAUS, one of the moſt celebrated Philoſophers of Antiquity, was born at Pitane, in Æolis [A]. He was a diſciple of Autolycus the Mathematician his countryman, and followed him to Sardes. After that he came to Athens, and was there a diſciple of Xanthus, and afterwards of Theophraſtus, and laſtly of Crantor [B]. He alſo learnt

[A] He was born at Pitane in Eolis.] Diogenes Laertius is not the only authority we have for this (1): read the words of Pomponius Mela in that Chapter where he gives a deſcription of the country of the Æolians. Caicus inter Elean decurrit & Pitanen illam quæ Arceſilam tulit, nihil affirmantis Academiæ clariſſimum Antiſtitem (2). i. e. "Caicus runs betwixt "Elea and the city Pitane which gave birth to Arce-"ſilaus, that famous Preſident of an Academy which "never affirmed any thing." See alſo Strabo. Πιτάνη πόλις Αἰολικὴ. . . . ἐκ δὲ τῆς Πιτανῆς ἦν Ἀρκεσίλαος (3), i. e. "Pitane a city of Æolia. . . . Pitane was the "country of Arceſilaus." We are not to regard Solinus, who makes Pitane, a city of Laconia, this Philoſopher's native place (4); for this has been confuted by Salmaſius (5), and Mr. Menage (6). He is called in Mr. Gaſſendi (7) Arceſilas Pritanæus, whereas it ſhould have been Pitanæus; but whether this was occaſioned thro' the negligence of the Author or Corrector I cannot ſay.

(1) Diogen. Laertius lib. 4. num. 20.

(2) Pomp. Mela, lib. 1. cap. 18. num. 20.

(3) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 422, in fine.

(4) Solin, cap. 7. pag. 22.

(5) Salmaſ. Exercitat. Plin. pag. 138.

(6) Menag. in Diogen. Laert. pag. 176.

(7) Gaſſendi, Operum, tom. 1. pag. 18.

[B] He was a diſciple of Theophraſtus, and at laſt of Crantor (8).] I am ſurprized that Diogenes Laertius, after having plainly inſinuated in other places that Arceſilaus was the Diſciple of Polemon, ſhould not make expreſs mention of this in the life of Arceſilaus. See the places wherein he intimates this. "Arceſilaus, "ſays he, having quitted the School of Theophra-"ſtus, in order to inliſt himſelf under Polemon and "Crates, declared that they were either Gods, or ſome "remains of the Golden Age." Ἔνθεν δ' Ἀρκεσίλαον μετελθόντα παρὰ Θεοφράστου πρὸς αὐλοὺς λέγειν, ὡς εἶεν θεοί τινες ἢ λείψανα τοῦ χρυσοῦ γένους (9). A little lower he obſerves that Crantor and Arceſilaus lodged together; and that Polemon and Crates, who had but one lodging betwixt them, in the houſe of one Lyſicles a citizen, often went to ſup with Crantor; and that Crates was the favourite of Polemon, as Arceſilaus was that of Crantor. The tranſlator of Diogenes Laertius has reverſed all this; for he makes Polemon to be the favourite of Crates, and Crantor that of Arceſilaus. Let us ſee how it ſtands in the Greek: Ἦν δὲ ἐρώμενος, Κράτης μὲν, ὡς προείρηται, Πολέμωνος. Ἀρκεσίλαος δὲ Κράντορος (10). The Latin verſion, which no commentator has found fault with, has amator, where it ſhould have been amaſius, the tranſlator having miſtaken the paſſive ſignification of the word ἐρώμενος; nor has he any better guarded againſt contradicting himſelf a little after, for, as the Greek directs, he has repreſented Arceſilaus as a paſſive character. Ἀρκεσίλαος θήλων ὑπ' αὐτῷ (Κράντορι) συσκιάζεται Πολέμωνι, καίπερ ἐρῶντος (11). "Arceſilaus being deſirous of being re-"commended by him, (Crantor) to Polemon, though "Crantor at the ſame time was a great lover of "him." Let us not here give way to thoſe filthy and obſcene ideas, which this author as well as ſeveral others would ſuggeſt from theſe expreſſions. It is common for them when they make mention of any great Philoſopher and his diſciples, to obſerve that he was a lover of ſuch or ſuch a one; which words I allow in ſome places are capable of being taken in an ill ſenſe; but it is alſo my opinion that upon a hundred different occaſions we ought to underſtand no more by them than a lawful tenderneſs and affection. Out of a great number of ſcholars there

(8) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 28, 29.

(9) Idem, in Cratete, lib. 4. pag. 240. num. 22.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, ibid.

learnt Geometry under Hipponicus (a). He had ſome inclination for Poetry, and was extreamly pleaſed with the reading of Homer [C]; but his deſire to be a Philoſopher was ſuperior to all the others. He ſucceeded Crates in the government of the Platonic School [D], and became an innovator there, for he founded a Sect, which they called the ſecond Academy, to diſtinguiſh it from that of Plato. He was very oppoſite to the Dogmatiſts; he affirmed nothing; he doubted of every thing; he diſcourſed for and againſt, and ſuſpended his judgment. It is, ſaid he, becauſe nothing is certain. He attacked very ſtrongly

(a) Diogen. Laert. lib. 4. num. 32.

there was always one who was the well-beloved and favourite of his maſter, and that upon account of his aptneſs at learning, his modeſty, or ſtrength of parts &c. and this was he whom he deſigned for his ſucceſſor, and diſtinguiſhed by the title of ἐράμενος. But let us come to the matter in hand. The laſt paſſage I quoted from Diogenes Laertius informs us that Arceſilaus deſired of Crantor a recommendation to Polemon. This Hiſtorian adds, that Crantor, who was at that time ſick, had no ill opinion of him, but on the contrary, when he was recovered, went himſelf to Polemon's lectures. Ἀλλὰ ἐ αὐτὸν ὑγιάναντα διακούειν Πολέμωνος (12). This is a proof that Arceſilaus was a hearer at leaſt, if not a Diſciple of this Philoſopher; but the latter is ſo plain that Cicero makes him to have had no other maſter. Arceſilas tuus, etſi fuit in diſſerendo pertinacior, tamen noſter fuit, erat enim Polemonis (13). i. e. "Your Arceſilaus, as "you call him, although he was ſomewhat poſitive "in diſputation, yet he was of our ſect, for he was "a Diſciple of Polemon." Numenius gives him ſeveral other maſters, and makes him ſucceſſively the ſcholar of Polemon, of Theophraſtus, of Diodorus, and laſt of all of Pyrrho (14). "Of Crantor he learned "eloquence, of Diodorus to be a Sophiſt, and of Pyr"rho to change to all ſides like a weather-cock, "and to be nothing at laſt. Ὧν ὑπὸ μὲν Κράντορος πιθανολόγικος, ὑπὸ Διοδώρου δὲ σοφιςὴς, ὑπὸ δὲ Πύρρωνος ἀγένητο παντοδαπὸς, καὶ ἴτης καὶ οὐδείς (15). He fixed at laſt in the uncertainty of Pyrrho, and was a Pyrrhonian in every thing but name: he retained indeed the name of an Academic, but this was only out of reſpect to the Philoſopher Crantor who was his maſter and lover. Πλὴν τῆς πρωτηγέτιδος ἐπέμεινε Πύρρωνι ὡς τῷ πάντων ἀναιρέσει. . . . αἰδεῖ τῷ ἐρωτὶ ὑπέμεινε λέγεσθαι Ἀκαδημαϊκὸς ἔτι. ἦν μὲν τοίνυν Πυρρώνειος πλὴν τοῦ ὀνόματος. Ἀκαδημαϊκὸς δ' οὐκ ἦν, πλὴν τοῦ λέγεσθαι (16). Numenius afterwards ſays that Arceſilaus being a handſome youth gained the love of Crantor the Academic, and gave himſelf up to him. Διὰ τὸ καλὸς εἶναι ἐπὶ ὧν ὡραῖος τυχὼν ἐράσθη Κράντορος τοῦ Ἀκαδημαϊκοῦ προσεχώρησε μὲν τούτῳ (17). He added that the lectures of Menedemus taught him to be a very warm diſputant, and for this he quotes Timon (18). Thus have I ſupplied the omiſſions in the liſt, which Diogenes Laertius has left us of the maſters of Arceſilaus.

(12) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 25.

(13) Cicero, de Finibus, lib. 4. cap. 31. See alſo his book de Oratore, lib. 3. c. 18.

(14) Numenius, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 5. pag. 729.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Idem, apud eundem, cap. 6. pag. 731.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) The two verſes of Timon, which he quotes, are more correct than in Diogenes Laertius.

[C] He took great delight in reading Homer.] He preferred this author to all others, and read ſome part of him every night before he went to ſleep; and alſo when he aroſe in the morning he uſed to ſay, I will go and make a viſit to my miſtreſs (19) meaning this Poet. Ἀπεδέχετο δὲ πάντων μᾶλλον Ὁμήρου, οὗ ἐ εἷς ὕπνος ἦν παύσας τὶ ἀνεγίνωσκεν. ἀλλὰ καὶ ὄρθρου λέγων ἐπὶ τὸν ἐράμενον ἀπίεναι, ὁπόθ' ἂν βούλοιτο ἀναγνῶναι (20).

(19) To accommodate myſelf to the ſtile of our time, I have avoided a literal tranſlation.

(20) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 31.

[D] He ſucceeded Crates in the government of the Platonick ſchool (21). A great many authors, without making any mention of Crates, place Arceſilaus immediately after Polemon. See the note of Aldobrandinus on a paſſage of Diogenes Laertius (22), where you will find that this learned Commentator had no where diſcovered that Crates ſucceeded Polemon. You will there likewiſe ſee the words of St. Auſtin, Moritur Polemo, ſuccedit ei Arceſilas, Zenonis quidem condiſcipulus, ſed ſub Polemonis magiſterio (23). i. e. "Polemon dies "and is ſucceeded by Arceſilaus, who was ſchool-fel"low with Zeno, in the ſchool of Polemon." To this paſſage may alſo be added that out of the LVI Letter. Idem quippe Academici qui Platonici, quod docet auditorum ipſa ſucceſſio. Arceſilas enim, qui primus occultata ſententia ſua nihil aliud iſtos quam refellere ſtatuit, quære cui ſucceſſerit; Polemonem invenies: quære cui Polemon; Xenocratem. Xenocrati autem diſcipulo Academiam ſcholam ſuam reliquit Plato (24). i. e. "For "the Academics are the ſame with the Platoniſts, "which the ſucceſſion of ſcholars plainly ſhews: for "if you ask who Arceſilaus ſucceeded, who was the "firſt that diſputed with them by only confuting their "opinions, without offering his own, I anſwer, Po"lemon: if who Polemon ſucceeded, I anſwer, Xe"nocrates. Now Plato left the Academy, which was "his ſchool, to his ſcholar Xenocrates. We muſt not rely upon the authority of St. Auſtin in this, for he has not taken care to be ſtrictly exact; and as he has paſt over one ſucceſſion betwixt Plato and Xenocrates (25), he may have done the ſame betwixt Polemon and Arceſilaus. But I forbear to inſiſt any longer upon his ſilence with regard to that famous (26) Academic Crantor, who plainly appears to have been the immediate ſucceſſor to Polemon, and who died before him and Crates (27); but leſt the word ſucceſſor be objected to, read thus, that Crantor taught during Polemon's life time. We are alſo aſſured that Crates did the ſame, and hence it happens that ſometimes Crantor, ſometimes Crates is ſaid to have ſucceeded him, and ſometimes both, tho' generally Crates is ſet after Crantor (28). Once more I do not object the omiſſion of Crantor to St. Auſtin, for I am of opinion that this Philoſopher is falſly ſuppoſed to be the ſucceſſor of Polemon, ſeeing he died before his maſter; and I find that Lacydes, ſucceſſor to Arceſilaus, was the firſt that reſigned his chair to a ſucceſſor during his own life (29). Let us then conclude that no other than Crates ſucceeded Polemon, and not regard that paragraph in Father Rapin, Crates and Crantor, who ſucceeded each other in the ſchool of Plato, made no alteration in his doctrine (30). His error had been leſs if he had put Crantor firſt, ſeeing he died before Crates. A famous Critic (31) in his correction on a paſſage of Nonius Marcellus (32) has furniſhed us with an authority which ſtrongly ſupports this remark. According to this correction theſe are the words of Lucilius, Polemon & amavit Cratem, & huic tranſmiſit ſuam ſcholam quam dicunt. i. e. "Po"lemon greatly loved Crates, and tranſmitted to him "his ſchool as they call it." The Greek of Dio"genes Laertius is to the ſame ſenſe. Κράτης. . . . καὶ ἀκροατὴς ἅμα καὶ ἐράμενος Πολέμωνος. ἀλλὰ καὶ διεδέξατο τὴν σχολὴν αὐτῷ (33). i. e. "Crates was a "hearer and alſo the favourite (34) of Polemon, and "ſucceeded him in his ſchool." I do not think any great weight is to be given to thoſe words of Cicero, Spenſippus autem & Xenocrates, qui primi Platonis rationem autoritatemque ſuſceperant, & poſt eos Polemo & Crates unaque Crantor, in Academiâ congregati diligenter eis, quæ à ſuperioribus acceperant, utebantur (35). i. e. "Spenſippus and Xenocrates, who firſt followed "the method and example of Plato; and after them "Polemon and Crates together with Crantor, when aſ"ſembled in the Academy carefully adhered to thoſe "rules, which they had received from their prede"ceſſors." They are neither ſo exact nor plain as that paſſage of Diogenes Laertius. Πλάτων ὁ τὴν ἀρχαίαν Ἀκαδημίαν συνεστάμενος ᾗ Σπεύσιππος καὶ Ξενοκράτης, οὗ Πολέμων, οὗ Κράντωρ καὶ Κράτης, οὗ Ἀρκεσίλαος, ὁ τὴν μέσην Ἀκαδημίαν εἰσηγησάμενος (36). i. e. "Plato, "who firſt inſtituted the ancient Academy, was ſuc"ceeded by Spenſippus and Xenocrates; they were "ſucceeded by Polemon. Crantor and Crates ſucceed"ed him; they were followed by Arceſilaus, who in"troduced the middle Academy." Caſaubon in his note upon this place, quotes Galen, who ſays that the old Academy ended in Crantes, and that Arceſilaus the diſciple of Crantes founded the middle Academy (37). This Commentator is ignorant who is the Crantes of Galen (38), but it is eaſy to ſee either that the Copyiſts have put Crantes for Crates, or elſe that Galen himſelf did not write the name of Arceſilaus's predeceſſor according to its orthography; and indeed we have frequent inſtances amongſt the moſt learned men, of adding to or leaving out a letter from the

(21) Idem, ibid. num. 32.

(22) At the beginning of the Life of Crates, lib. 4. num. 21.

(23) S. Auguſtinus, lib. 3. contra Academicos.

(24) Auguſt. Epiſt. lvi. pag. 267. Euſebius, Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. pag. 726 tells us, that Arceſilaus was ſaid to ſucceed Polemon.

(25) Spenſippus, ſon of a ſiſter of Plato, governed the ſchool before Xenocrates.

(26) Crantor ille, qui in noſtra Academia vel in primis fuit nobilis. Cic. Tuſc. Quæſt. lib. 3. cap. 6.

(27) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 27.

(28) See Gaſſendi, Operum tom. 1. pag. 18. and Jonſius de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 52. or rather Diog. Laert. quoted underneath in quotation (36).

(29) Diog. Laert. in Lacyde, lib. 4. num. 60.

(30) Rapin, Compar. de Platon & d'Ariſtote, 4 Part, ch. 1. pag. 365.

(31) Petrus Victorius. See the Notes of Joſias Mercerus upon Nonius Marcellus, p. 193.

(32) Nonius Marcellus, voce Tranſmittere, pag. 414. He quotes the 28th book of Lucilius.

(33) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 21.

(34) And not amator (the Lover) as the printed Latin verſion has it.

(35) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 1. cap. 9.

(36) Diog. Laert. in Proœmio, num. 14. p. 10.

(37) Galenus, in Hiſt. Philoſophorum.

(38) Ego quiſnam ſit Crantes Galleni plane ignoro. Caſaub. in Diog. Laertium, Proœm. num. 14.

ſtrongly all that the other Sects affirmed [E]; and it is for that reaſon they look upon him, in matters of Philoſophy, as a diſturber of the publick quiet (b). Some maintain, that finding no evidence to hinder him from floating equally between the affirmative and the negative, he would the names of the authors they quote, tho' at the ſame time they mean the ſame perſon whom others write more properly. I could produce a hundred examples to this purpoſe, which makes me wonder that Caſaubon ſhould raiſe ſuch difficulties about this place. It is alſo to be remembered that he wonders that Galen ſhould omit mentioning Crantor: Quis verò non miretur omiſſum a Galeno Crantorem (39)?

(b) See the note [E] quotation (49).

(39) Idem, ibid.

[E] He ſtrongly oppoſed every thing that the other Sects affirmed.] It is not to be denied but that he was juſtly called an Innovator, though Diogenes Laertius is miſtaken when he takes him to be the firſt, who introduced the cuſtom of diſputing on both ſides of the queſtion. Πρῶτος δὲ καὶ εἰς ἑκάτερον ἐπιχεῖρησε (40). This was alſo the manner of Socrates, and Plato continued it. We ſhall quote a paſſage out of Cicero, which informs us that the method which Arceſilaus uſed of diſputing againſt every thing propoſed to him, was the ſame that Socrates uſed, and that Arceſilaus was inſtructed in Pyrrhoniſm (41) from the books of Plato, and thoſe diſcourſes which go under the name of Socrates. Arceſilas primum, qui Polemonem audierat, ex variis Platonis libris, ſermonibuſque Socraticis hoc maximè arripuit, nihil eſſe certi, quod aut ſenſibus aut animo percipi poſſit: quem ferunt eximio quodam uſum lepore dicendi, aſpernatum eſſe omne animi ſenſuſque judicium, primumque inſtituiſſe (quanquam id fuit Socratium maximè) non quid ipſe ſentiret, oſtendere, ſed contra id quod quiſque ſe ſentire dixiſſet, diſputare (42). i. e. "Arceſilaus, who was a "Diſciple of Polemon, firſt took this notion from the "books of Plato, and particularly from the diſcourſes "of Socrates, that there is no certainty either in the "perceptions of the ſenſes or of the underſtanding: "who, they ſay, did with a great deal of wit ar"gue againſt the judgment of both, and that he did "firſt inſtitute that way of diſputing (tho' it is chief"ly the Socratic) by confuting the opinions of others, "without advancing any of his own." He ſays in another book, that the method of Socrates, which had been neglected, was reſtored by Arceſilaus; in this conſiſts the innovation of the latter, and therefore the expreſſions of Diogenes Laertius are not exactly true; for it is plain that a Philoſopher, who profeſſes to attack every thing, that is offered in anſwer to his queſtions, muſt practiſe diſſenting pro and con. Let us attend to the following words: Is (Socrates) percontando atque interrogando elicere ſolebat eorum opiniones quibuſcum differebat, ut ad ea quæ hi reſpondiſſent, ſi quid videretur, diceret. Qui mos quum à poſterioribus non eſſet retentus, Arceſilas eum revocavit, inſtituitque ut bi qui ſe audire vellent, non de ſe quærerent, ſed ipſi dicerent quid ſentirent. Quod quum dixiſſent, ille contra, ſed qui audiebant quoad poterant defendebant ſententiam ſuam: apud cæteros autem Philoſophos qui quæſivit aliquid tacet, quod quidem jam fit etiam in Academiâ (43). i. e. "He (Socrates) uſed to ſift out "the opinions of thoſe whom he diſputed with, by "aſking them and interrogating them in order to op"poſe what they thought fit to anſwer: which cu"ſtom being laid aſide by his ſucceſſors was revived "by Arceſilaus, who made it a rule that thoſe who "had a mind to hear him ſhould propoſe their opi"nions without aſking him any queſtions; which "when they had done, he uſed to take the contrary "ſide, and they who propoſed defended their opi"nions as well as they could: but amongſt other "Philoſophers he who aſked any queſtion was after"wards ſilent, which is obſerved at this time in the "Academy." If this is not proof ſufficiently plain, the following however is undeniably ſo, which aſſures us that the Academy of Arceſilaus was the very ſame with that of Plato. Hanc Academiam novam appellant, quæ mihi vetus videtur; ſiquidem Platonem ex illa vetere numeramus, cujus in libris nihil affirmatur, & in utramque partem multa diſſeruntur, de omnibus quæritur, nihil certi dicitur (44). i. e. "They call this the new "Academy, though in my opinion it is the old, if "we reckon Plato of the latter, in whoſe books no"thing is aſſirmed, and many points are diſcuſſed on "both ſides the queſtion, where every thing is propo"ſed by way of queſtion, without aſſerting any thing "for certain." I have quoted elſewhere (45) another paſſage no leſs ſtrong than this. There are various Greek quotations which evince the truth of this. I have ſomewhere read, that Epicurus could not without indignation ſee the glory of Arceſilaus, who was the moſt renowned Philoſopher of that time, and that he reproached him for having raiſed himſelf a reputation among the ignorant without advancing any thing of his own. Τοῦ δ' Ἀρκεσιλάου τὸν Ἐπίκηρον οὐ μετρίως ἔοικεν ἡ δόξα παραλυπεῖν, ἐν τοῖς τότε χρόνοις μάλιστα τῶν Φιλοσόφων ἀγαπωμένου (46). i. e. "Epi"curus did not ſeem a little diſturbed at the glory of "Arceſilaus, who was the moſt eſteemed of the Phi"loſophers of that time." Though it is certain that Arceſilaus did not take to himſelf the glory of being the inventor, but aſcribed the credit of the Epoche and Acatalepſy to Socrates, Plato, Parmenides and Heraclitus. Ὁ δ' Ἀρκεσίλαος τοσοῦτον ἀπέδει τοῦ καινοτομίας τινὰ δόξαν ἀγαπᾶν ἢ ὑποποιεῖσθαι τῶν παλαιῶν, ὥστε ἐγκαμεῖν τοῖς τότε σοφιζομένοις ὅτι προσγράφεται Σωκράτει καὶ Πλάτωνι καὶ Παρμενίδῃ καὶ Ἡρακλείτῳ τὰ περὶ τῆς ἐποχῆς δόγματα καὶ τῆς ἀκαταληψίας, οὐδὲν διόμενος, ἀλλὰ οἷον ἀναγωγὴν καὶ βεβαίωσιν αὐτῶν εἰς ἄνδρας ἐνδόξους ποιούμενος (47). i. e. "Arceſilaus was ſo far from affecting any glory "of innovation, and from aſcribing to himſelf the "invention of antiquity, that the Sophiſts of that "time blame him for fathering his opinions, con"cerning withholding the aſſent, and denying the "certainty of knowledge, upon Socrates, Plato, Par"menides, and Heraclitus; not that he was obliged "by any neceſſity to do it, but only to give a credit "and ſanction to them by the authority of ſuch fa"mous men." Take notice that, by the very confeſſion of Diogenes, our Arceſilaus only made the Platonic method more contentious. This was the only alteration he made in it. Πρῶτος τὸν λόγον ἐκίνησε τὸν ὑπὸ Πλάτωνος παραδεδομένον, καὶ ἐποίησε δ' ἐρωτήσεως καὶ ἀποκρίσεως ἐριστικώτερον (48). i. e. "He was the "firſt who ſtarted that way of diſcourſe, which Plato "had delivered to his Scholars, and by queſtion and "anſwer rendered it more contentious." However we may venture to ſay that he was the firſt that diſturbed the publick repoſe of the Philoſophers; for not to mention his reviving a form which was almoſt forgot, he carried on the principles of Socrates with more heat than ever was done before, and proved a more fiery, obſtinate wrangler than the firſt inventers, which gave occaſion to his being ſpoken of in the following manner: Nonne jam quum Philoſophorum diſciplinæ graviſſimæ conſtitiſſent, tum ut exortus eſt in optima Republica Tiberius Gracchus, qui otium perturbaret, ſic Arceſilas, qui conſtitutam Philoſophiam everteret, & in eorum autoritate deliteſceret, qui negaviſſent quicquam ſciri aut percipi poſſe (49). i. e. "When the doctrines of "the Philoſophers were maturely ſettled, as Tiberius "Gracchus ſtarted up to diſturb the peace of the beſt "Republick, in the ſame manner came Arceſilaus to "overthrow the eſtabliſhed Philoſophy, and to take "ſhelter under the authority of thoſe, who denied "that any thing could be known or underſtood."

(45) In the note [B] of the article CARNEADES, quotation (6). This paſſage is in the 1ſt book of Cicero de Natura Deorum, ch. 5.

(46) Plutarch. adv. Colotem, pag. 1121. E.

(47) Idem, ibid.

(48) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 28.

People have enquired into the reaſon of this conduct of Arceſilaus, and it has been imputed to a violent emulation which ſubſiſted between him and his ſchool-fellow Zeno, who were both Scholars of Polemon (50) and competitors with each other in fame (51). Zeno ſided with the Dogmatiſts and laid down definitions and axioms, which Arceſilaus vigorouſly encountered, and in order to ſucceed the better was content to overturn the foundation of ſcience, and to reduce every thing to uncertainty. The following paſſage evidences the truth of this, and at the ſame time the little ſucceſs which this enterprize met with (52), tho' ſupported by all the powerful charms of eloquence. Fuerint illa vetera, ſi vultis, incognita; nihilne eſt ergo actum quod inveſtigatum eſt poſteaquam Arceſilas Zenoni, ut putant, obtrectans, nihil novi reperienti, ſed emendanti ſuperiores immutatione verborum, dum hujus definitiones labefactare vult, conatus eſt clariſſimis rebus tenebras obducere? Cujus primum non admodum probata ratio, quanquam floruit, tum acumine ingenii, tum admirabili

(49) Cicero, Academ. Quæſtion. lib. 4. cap. 5.

(50) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. cap. 9. Numenius, apud Euſeb. Præp. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 6. pag. 729, 731.

(51) Numen. apud eundem. ibid.

(52) This does not agree with what will be related in the note [G].

(40) Diog. Laert. lib. 4 num. 28.

(41) I make uſe of this word without regarding the perſon of Pyrrho.

(42) Cicero de Oratore, lib. 3. cap. 18.

(43) Idem, de Finibus, lib. 2. cap. 1.

(44) Idem, Academ. Quæſtion. lib. 1. cap. ult.

would write no books (c); but others assure us that he wrote some, and afterwards they question whether he published any; for some affirm it, and others say that he threw what he had composed into the fire (d). They observe however that he dedicated some books to rabili quodam lepore dicendi, proxime a Lacyde solo retenta est (53). i. e. "But granting, if you desire it, "that those old things were not known; does it "therefore follow that there have no improvements "been made by invention, since the time that Ar"cesilaus, thro' spite, as is thought, to Zeno, (who "made no new discoveries, but only improved upon "his predecessors by altering of the words) that "he might overthrow his definitions, attempted to "obscure and perplex truths, which were as clear as "light itself? Whose method was not at first much "approved of, tho' set off with all the advantage of "wit and eloquence, and afterwards it was only follow"ed by Lacydes." Others say, that the fear of being overpowered by the objections of some people, who took a pleasure in tormenting the Philosophers, constrained Arcesilaus to affirm nothing. He entrenched himself behind the Epoche as behind a rampart. This was to him a shelter by which he hoped to skreen himself from the pursuit of the Sophist Bion and of the followers of Theodorus, who were perpetually cavilling at the Philosophers. Numenius makes light of this conjecture, which he observes was first started by Diocles the Cnidian, and I think not without reason; for tho' in deciding neither on the one side nor the other, we may guard against a thousand insnaring difficulties, yet we are sure to bring upon ourselves a great many others; and if on one hand we have less to fear from grave and serious objections, retortions and arguments ad hominem, which is the ordinary and almost inevitable rock that the Dogmatists split upon, yet on the other hand we lay ourselves much more open to the raillery and insults of banterers: and it is certain that Bion, the greatest sneerer of his age, was less terrible when he reasoned than when he bantered. Generally speaking it is a very troublesome post when one is easily turned into ridicule. Nay Arcesilaus himself made use of raillery against those who rejected the evidence of the senses (54). However let us see the words of Numenius: Οὐ γὰρ πείθομαι τοῦ Κνιδίου Διοκλέους φάσκοντος ἐν ταῖς ἐπιγραφομέναις Διατριβαῖς, Ἀρκεσίλαον φόβῳ τῶν Θεοδωρείων τε καὶ Βίωνος τοῦ Σοφιστοῦ, ἐπεισιόντων τοῖς φιλοσοφοῦσι καὶ οὐδὲν ὀκνούντων ἀπὸ παντὸς ἐλέγχειν, αὐτὸν ἐξυλαβηθέντα, ἵνα μὴ πράγματα ἔχῃ, μηδέν γε δόγμα ὑπειπεῖν φαινόμενον. ὥσπερ γὰρ τὸ μέλαν τὰς σηπίας, προβάλλεσθαι πρὸ ἑαυτοῦ τὴν ἐποχήν. Τοῦτ' οὖν ἐγὼ οὐ πείθομαι (55). i. e. "Nor can I agree with Diocles the Cnidian, "who in his writings entitled Diatribæ, says that Ar"cesilaus thro' fear of the Disciples of Theodorus, "and Bion the Sophist, (who were continually at"tacking the Philosophers, and spared no pains to "catch them in an error) in order to disarm their "malice, took care to affirm nothing, that, as the "cuttle-fish makes his escape by shedding its ink, so "he might secure himself by advancing his Epoche." Let it be noted that one of the interlocutors in Cicero has maintained, that Arcesilaus did not give in to the Epoche out of pure contradiction to Zeno, but only from a desire of coming at the truth. Arcesilam verò non obtrectandi causâ cum Zenone pugnavisse, sed verum invenire voluisse sic intelligitur (56). He pretends, that Arcesilaus was the first who discovered and stuck by this proposition; It is possible for a man neither to affirm nor deny in matters which are doubtful, and this a wise man ought to do. Nemo superiorum non modò expresserat, sed ne dixerat quidem posse hominem nihil opinari, nec solum posse, sed ita necesse esse sapienti, visa est Arcesilæ cum vera sententia, tum honesta & digna sapiente (57). He tells us that this Philosopher put this question to Zeno, What will be the case if the wise man should not be able to know any thing clearly, and if he must admit of any thing for true which is not clear and evident? and that Zeno answered, He will clearly comprehend some things, and therefore will admit of nothing which is obscure. He should afterwards have laid down a rule whereby to judge what things are clearly comprehended. That which Zeno gave was opposed by Arcesilaus, who urged to him, that falsehood may appear under the shape of truth, and that therefore one would be at a loss to distinguish the one from the other. Zeno granted that nothing could be comprehended, if that which does not exist can appear under the same form with that which does exist; but he denied that there could be that conformity of ideas betwixt that which is and that which is not. Arcesilaus on the other hand insisted upon this conformity. Incubuit in eas disputationes ut doceret nullum tale esse visum à vero, ut non ejusmodi etiam à falso possit (58). i. e. "He laboured "earnestly in disputation to shew that there was no "appearance of truth which could not also be put "on by falsehood." This is the hinge upon which their dispute turns; and it is probable, as has been already observed from Cicero, that the obscurity of things, and not obstinacy or a desire of victory, engaged Arcesilaus in a dispute with Zeno (59).

(c) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 32.

(d) Idem, ibid.

I have already said, and that not without good grounds, that he carried the hypothesis of uncertainty farther than Socrates; for he would not allow what Socrates did, even that he knew that he knew nothing. He suspended his assent to every thing, and only disputed to convince himself, that the reasons for affirming were no stronger than the reasons for denying. Arcesilas negabat esse quicquam quod sciri posset, ne illud quidem ipsum quod Socrates sibi reliquisset. Sic omnia latere censebant in occulto, neque esse quicquam quod cerni aut intelligi possit. Quibus de causis nihil oportere, neque profiteri neque affirmare quenquam, neque assertione approbare, cohibereque semper, & ab omni lapsu continere temeritatem, quæ tum esset insignis, quum aut falsa aut incognita res approbaretur, neque hoc quicquam esset turpius, quam cognitioni & perceptioni, assertionem approbationemque præcurrere. Huc (rationi quod erat consentaneum) faciebat, ut contra omnium sententias dies jam plerosque deduceret, ut quum in eadem re paria contrariis in partibus momenta rationum invenirentur, facilius ab utraque parte assertio sustineretur (60). i. e. "Arcesilaus denied that any thing could be known, "and even that very proposition which Socrates ad"mitted; so dark and occult did they think every "thing, that they imagined nothing could be under"stood; for which reasons no one ought to allow or "affirm any thing, but to keep back his assent, and "to guard against all errors proceeding from rashness, "which is in nothing more conspicuous than in giv"ing our assent to a thing which is either false or "not understood, for there is nothing more unseem"ly than to assert or approve any thing before we "have a knowledge and perception of it. To this "end Arcesilaus (as was agreeable to reason) conti"nued disputing many days against all opinions, that "upon its appearing that the arguments on contrary "sides of the same questions were of equal force, he "might more easily evince the reasonableness of with"holding our assent from either." It was this Arcesilaus who taught the acatalepsis or incomprehensibility of things in a stricter sense than had ever been done before; which he carried to such an extreme, that Carneades who was better able to have maintained this doctrine than he, thought himself obliged to soften and qualify it (61), tho' it is certain that Arcesilaus only explained with some inlargements what had been said before by the greatest masters. Cum Zenone . . . . . Arcesilas sibi omne certamen instituit . . . . . earum rerum obscuritate, quæ ad confessionem ignorationis adduxerant Socratem, & veluti amantes Socratem, Democritum, Anaxagoram, Empedoclem, omnes penè veteres, qui nihil cognosci, nihil percipi, nihil sciri posse dixerunt, angustos sensus, imbecillos animos, brevia curricula vitæ, & (ut Democritus) in profundo veritatem esse demersam, opinionibus & institutis omnia teneri, nihil teneri, nihil veritati relinqui, deinceps omnia tenebris circumfusa esse dixerunt (62). i. e. "Arcesilaus grounded his dispute with Zeno on "the obscurity of those things which had brought "Socrates and the admirers of Socrates, as Democritus, "Anaxagoras, Empedocles, and almost all the anci"ents, to a confession of their ignorance, who said "that nothing could be known, perceived, or under"stood; that the senses were very imperfect, the un"derstanding weak, life but a span, and (as Demo"critus

(53) Cicero Academic. Quæstion. lib. 4. cap. 6.

(54) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 34.

(55) Numenius, apud Eusebium. Præparat. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 6. pag. 731. C.

(56) Cicero, Academic. Quæstion. lib. 4. cap. 24.

(57) Idem, ibid.

(58) Idem, ibid.

(59) See hereunder the quotation (62).

(60) Cicero, Academ. Quæstion. lib. 1. cap. 12.

(61) See the article CARNEADES.

(62) Cicero, Acad. Quæstion. lib. 1. cap. 12.

(e) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 38.

to Eumenes Prince of Pergamus, and that he dedicated only to this Prince (e). We ſhall ſee how he has been combated by a Father of the Church [F]. As he had an eloquence that was very

" critus uſed to ſay) that truth was buried in a well ; " that every thing was known only by opinion and " hear-ſay, and not truly ; in ſhort that all things " were involved in obſcurity." It was by the authority of theſe great names that he attacked the Dogmatiſts (63), and indeed he might have confirmed it with a great many more, as may be ſeen in the ſecond book of Academy Queſtions (64). However Numenius, who handles him very ſeverely, expreſſes his greateſt indignation at his ſhifting and changing ſides, which he accuſes him of (65). His deſcription of this Philoſopher's inconſtancy affords us ſome marks of his reſentment. He was a man, ſays he, who denied and affirmed the ſame things : he went off indifferently to the right or to the left, and even gloried in being ignorant of the difference betwixt good and evil. He gave into the firſt whims that his capricious fancy ſuggeſted to him, and then all on a ſudden would refute them with more arguments than he had eſtabliſhed them. He was a Hydra which preyed upon and tore itſelf in pieces. The words of the original are ſtill more full and expreſſive. Ἐλεγε, καὶ ἀνήλιγε, καὶ μετεκυλινδεῖτο κ' ἀκινδύνως, κ' αὐτεῖθεν, ἐκατέρωθεν, ὁπόθεν τύχοι, παλιμπάγρητος, καὶ δύσκριτος, καὶ παλίμβολός τι ἄμμα, καὶ παμμαχικινδωνευμένος, ὁδόν τε εἰδὼς, ὡς αὐτὸς ἔφη, γενναῖος ὤν. . . . (66). Κατέχεσθαι τῷ ὀνείδει, καὶ ἠμφέσβητο θαυμαστῶς, ὅτι μήτε τὶ αἰσχρὸν ἢ καλὸν, μήτε ἀγαθὸν, μήτε αὖ κακόν ἐστι τὶ, ἤδει· ἀλλ' ὁπότερον εἰς τὰς ψυχὰς πίπτοι, τοῦτο εἰπὼν, αὖθις μεταβαλὼν, ἀντέτρεπεν ἂν πλειοναχῶς, ἢ δι' ὅσων κατεσκεύακεν. Ἦν οὖν ὕδρα τίμιων ἑαυτὸν, καὶ τεμνόμενος ὑφ' ἑαυτοῦ, ἀμφότερα ἀλλήλων δυσκρίτως, καὶ τοῦ θείους ἀσυκόφαντος (67). Nay he thought he ſaw the finger of God in the ignorance of man, and was a great admirer of that verſe in Heſiod, where it is ſaid, that the Gods keep the human mind behind a curtain. Ἐπήνει γοῦν Ἡσιόδου τετὶ τὸ ἀπόφθεγμα, (63) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. cap. 5. See above the quotation (49).

(64) Cap. 24.
(65) Numenius, apud Euſebium, Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 5. pag. 731.
(66) Idem, ibid. cap. 5. p. 730. A.
(67) Idem, ibid. cap. 6. p. 730. C.

Κρύψαντες γὰρ ἔχουσι θεοὶ νόον ἀνθρώποισι (68).

" The Gods in darkneſs keep the minds of men."

(68) Euſeb. ibid. cap. 4. pag. 726, D.

[F] See how he has been attacked by a Father of the Church.] I mean Lactantius, who undertakes to overthrow all Philoſophy by laying down with Socrates, that we know nothing, and with Zeno, that we are to believe nothing but what we know. His words are theſe : Si neque ſciri (69) quicquam poteſt, ut Socrates docuit, nec opinari oportet, ut Zeno, tota Philoſophia ſublata eſt. He founds this attempt on the great number of ſects, into which Philoſophy was divided. Each would confine truth and wiſdom to itſelf and charge all the reſt with error and folly. Therefore what particular ſect ſoever one ſhould condemn, one would have the Philoſophers of every other ſect on one's ſide ; and conſequently in condemning them all, one would have the ſuffrage of the majority, for each in particular would ſide with you againſt the others, and only oppoſe you in one vote for themſelves, which conſequently can have but little credit, as it is in favour of their own cauſe. See how Lactantius overthrows all the ſect of the ancient Philoſophy by the oppoſition they themſelves made againſt one another : Pereunt igitur univerſi hoc modo, & tanquam Spartiatæ illi Poetarum (70) ſic ſe invicem jugulant, ut nemo ex omnibus reſtet. Quod eo fit, quia gladium habent, ſcutum non habent. Si ergo ſingulæ ſectæ multarum ſectarum judicio ſtultitiæ convincuntur, omnes igitur vanæ atque inanes reperiuntur. Ita ſeipſam Philoſophia conſumit & conficit (71). i. e. " Thus are " they all deſtroyed, and like the Cadmeides of the " Poets cut one another's throats till they don't leave " one alive. The reaſon is this, they arm themſelves " with a ſword but not with a ſhield, and fight an of- " fenſive not a defenſive war. If therefore each par- " ticular ſect is proved guilty of abſurdity by the " judgment of many ſects, they will all equally be " found vain and fooliſh. Thus Philoſophy ſtabs it- " ſelf by its own weapons." " Arceſilaus, adds he, " who inſtituted an Academy, ſeeing this, armed " himſelf with their mutual accuſations, and the " confeſſion which the moſt famous Philoſophers had " made of their ignorance, and fought againſt them " all ; and ſo ſet up a new kind of Philoſophy, which " conſiſted in not philoſophizing at all." Quod cum intelligeret Arceſilas, Academiæ conditor, reprehenſiones omnium inter ſe collegit, confeſſionemque ignorantiæ clarorum Philoſophorum, armavitque ſe adverſus omnes. Ita conſtituit novam non philoſophandi philoſophiam (72). There ſubſiſted therefore from that time two parties ; the one ſtood up in defence of Science, the other to oppoſe it ; if the nature of things is not to be known, the former falls to the ground, if it is, the latter is ruined ; and if they both keep their ground, Philoſophy muſt inevitably periſh ſince it will be divided. " But if, as I have ſhewn, " through the weakneſs and infirmity of our na- " ture there is no ſcience in man properly ſo called, " Arceſilaus has won the day. But neither will he " ſtill be able to keep his ground long, becauſe it is " impoſſible but that ſomething muſt be known ; we " muſt of neceſſity periſh if we did not know what " is uſeful or deſtructive to life." Si autem, ut docui, nulla poteſt eſſe in homine interna & propria ſcientia, ob fragilitatem conditionis humanæ, Arceſilæ manus vicit : ſed ne ipſa quidem ſtabit, quia non poteſt omnino nihil ſciri : ſunt enim multa, quæ natura ipſa nos ſcire, & uſus frequens, & vitæ neceſſitas cogit. Itaque pereundum eſt niſi ſcias quæ ad vitam ſunt utilia, ut appetas, quæ periculoſa, ut fugias & vites (73). Afterwards Lactantius gives us a catalogue of ſeveral things, which are evidently known to men, and ridicules Arceſilaus, who expoſes his own ignorance at the ſame time that he reproaches others with it, and lays himſelf open to this anſwer, If you prove, that we know nothing, and conſequently are not Philoſophers, it alſo follows that you are not one, ſeeing by your own confeſſion you yourſelf know nothing. They cut their own throats with the ſame weapons, which they employ to kill others. Quid ergo promovit Arceſilas, niſi quod confectis omnibus Philoſophis ſeipſum quoque eodem mucrone transfixit (74) ? However, Lactantius does not blame him entirely, for he gives him the praiſe of having ſeen into the folly and arrogance of thoſe men, who thought to eſtabliſh ſcience upon mere conjectures. Rectè vidit Arceſilas arrogantes vel potius ſtultos eſſe qui putent ſcientiam veritatis conjecturâ poſſe comprehendi (75) ; but he is very moderate in his commendations of him, and goes on immediately to reproach him with that contradiction which the Pyrrhonians are ſo much charg'd with, " that by knowing that you know nothing, you know " one thing." Arceſilas . . . . introduxit genus Philoſophiæ ἀσύστατον, quod Latinè inſtabile ſive inconſtans poſſumus dicere. Ut enim nihil ſciri poſſe ſciendum ſit, aliquid ſciri neceſſe eſt, nam ſi omnino nihil ſcias, id ipſum nihil ſciri poſſe tolletur. Itaque, qui velut ſententiæ loco pronunciat nihil ſciri, tanquam præceptam profitetur, & cognitum, ergo aliquid ſciri poteſt. Huic ſimile eſt illud quod in ſcholis proponi ſolet in aſyſtati generis exemplum, ſomniaſſe quendam ne ſomniis crederet : ſi enim crediderit, tum ſequitur, ut credendum non ſit ; ſi autem non crediderit, tum ſequitur, ut credendum ſit : ita ſi nihil ſciri poteſt, neceſſe eſt id ipſum ſciri, quod nihil ſciatur. Si autem ſcitur poſſe nihil ſciri, falſum eſt ergo quod dicitur, nihil ſciri poſſe. Sic inducitur dogma ſibi ipſi repugnans, ſeque diſſolvens (76). i. e. " Ar- " ceſilaus introduced a contradictory kind of Philoſo- " phy : for in order to know that nothing can be " known, ſomething muſt neceſſarily be known, for " if we know nothing at all, the very maxim, that " nothing can be known, will be taken away. He " therefore that poſitively affirms that nothing is " known, profeſſes it as a maxim and known thing, " therefore ſomething can be known. Not unlike " to this is that example of the inconſiſtent kind, " which is often propoſed in the ſchools, that a cer- " tain perſon dreamed that he ought not to believe " dreams : for if he believes what he dreamed, then " it follows that his dream is not to be believed, " and if he does not believe it, then it follows that " it is not to be believed. So in like manner, if " nothing can be known, it neceſſarily follows, that " this very thing is known, that nothing is known ; " and if this is known, that nothing can be known, " then this propoſition, that nothing is to be known, " is falſe. So then a maxim is laid down, which " contradicts and deſtroys itſelf." Lactantius at laſt confeſſes

(69) Lactant. Divin. Inſtitut. lib. 3. cap. 4. pag. 153.
(70) The note of Thyſius upon this word is ridiculous. Qui ſe invicem conficiunt, ſays he, ſicut Cleomedes & Socii apud Spartanos, teſte Plutarcho. Does not he ſee that Lactantius ſpeaks not of the hiſtorical but of the mythological age, and of thoſe men that grew out of the teeth of a Serpent, ſown by Cadmus ?
(71) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 3. cap. 4. p. 154.
(72) Idem, ibid.
(73) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 3. cap. 4. p. 155.
(74) Idem, ibid. cap. 5. pag. 156.
(75) Idem, ibid. cap. 6. p. 157.
(76) Idem, ibid.

very perſuaſive, and returned always to his principal ſubject, and beſides anſwered objections ſubtilly and happily, he drew to his Auditory a great number of diſciples [G], although he was ſharp in his cenſures. At the bottom they were perſuaded of his goodneſs, and he filled his ſcholars with hopes, which kept them from being very angry with his reprimands, which were a little too ſevere (f). There are ſome who affirm, that he acted the Sceptic only to try his ſcholars, and after the proof he taught in another manner [H]. He was one of the moſt free men with his money in the world, and they relate many ſingular things of his liberality [I]. He was accuſed of being vain, and of labouring with too much earneſtneſs to pleaſe the people (g). The other Philoſophers delighted (f) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 37.

(g) Idem, lib. 4. num. 41.

conſeſſes that with reſpect to Natural Philoſophy there is no ſuch thing as certain knowledge, and that we are not to ſearch after it there. Quanto faceret ſapientiùs ac verius, ſi, exceptione facta, diceret cauſas, rationeſque duntaxat rerum cæleſtium, ſeu naturalium, quia ſunt abditæ, neſciri poſſe, quia nullus doceat, nec quæri oportère, quia inveniri quærendo non poſſunt (77).

(77) Idem, ibid. pag. 158.

i. e. "How much more conſiſtent had he been both "with Philoſophy and truth, if he had only aſſerted "that the cauſes and effects of the heavenly and "other natural bodies were hid from our knowledge, "ſeeing there is none to inſtruct us in them, "and ſince they ought not to be enquired into, "being unſearchable."

Let us make ſome ſmall remarks on this diſpute. I. The argument which he makes uſe of to overthrow all the ſects of Philoſophy by oppoſing them to one another, proves too much. Were an Atheiſt to make uſe of the ſame at this day, to overturn all Chriſtianity, he would reaſon very ill: the different ſects of Chriſtians condemn one another, I confeſs, but were you to condemn any one in every point of its doctrine, you would not gain the approbation of all the reſt. II. Lactantius contradicts himſelf in a moſt ſhameful manner. He allows if there is no ſuch thing as knowledge amongſt men, that Arceſilaus gains the victory; and at the ſame time he pretends that he has proved that thro' the weakneſs of our nature we are not capable of attaining to knowledge. Why then does he preſently after add, that Arceſilaus cannot maintain his ground, ſeeing there are ſeveral things which men attain to the knowledge of? III. The examples which he brings prove nothing, for in the ſenſe, in which the word ſcience is taken in this diſpute to diſtinguiſh betwixt wholſome and hurtful food, is not a ſcience; this kind of knowledge having never been queſtioned by the Acataleptics. IV. The ſelf contradiction which he reproaches him with carries with it more of a ſpecious appearance than ſolidity and truth, and favours more of ſophiſtry than reaſon, which common ſenſe will eaſily make appear. If I dream that I am not to believe dreams, I am caught in a very odd dilemma; for if I do not believe my dream I ſhall believe it, and if I do believe my dream, I ſhall not believe it. Who does not ſee that in this caſe we are to except from all other dreams that particular one, which cautions us againſt the belief of dreams? See in Sextus Empiricus the anſwer which the Scepticks make to this objection. V. The confeſſion of Lactantius with regard to Natural Philoſophy was very improper, and might give an advantage to his adverſary over him in the diſpute.

[G] He drew after him a great number of hearers.] To encounter with all ſciences, and to reject both the teſtimony of the ſenſes and of reaſon too, is the very boldeſt enterprize that can be taken in hand in all the republic of letters. It is like that of the Alexanders and other Conquerors, who undertook to ſubdue all nations. It requires a great deal of wit, of eloquence, of reading and meditation. Si ſingulas diſciplinas percipere magnum eſt, quanto majus omnes? quod facere iis neceſſe eſt quibus propoſitum eſt veri reperiendi cauſa, & contra omnes Philoſophos pro omnibus dicere (78). "If to underſtand any one diſtinct branch "of learning is very difficult, how much more is it to "underſtand all? which they needs muſt do who make "it their buſineſs to find out truth, and to diſpute "on every ſubject againſt all the Philoſophers." Arceſilaus was as well qualified for ſuch an enterprize as any man could be, both nature and art having jointly concurred to arm him thoroughly for the combat. He had naturally a happy, ready and lively genius (79); his perſon was very agreeable, and he ſpoke with a good grace. The charms of his face heightened thoſe of his voice, and he had learned from the beſt maſters every thing that could contribute to improve his natural endowments, or increaſe their power by uniting to them ſeveral additional qualifications. You will find this particular deſcription of him in Numenius, though at the ſame time ſet in an ill-natured light, for Numenius did not love Arceſilaus, tho' he could not forbear ſpeaking of him in the following words: Πλὴν τοῖς ἀκούουσιν ἤρκεσεν, ὁμοῦ τῇ ἀκροάσει ἱστρόσωπον ὄντα διαμένοις· ἦν δὲ οὐκ ἀκούοντας καὶ βλέποντας ἥδιστος, ἐπεὶ τοι καὶ προσεπιθῶσαν ἀποδέχεσθαι αὐτὸν τῆς λόγου ἕνεκα καὶ καλῆς προσόψεως τε & τόνου, ὡς ἄνευ τῆς ἐν τοῖς ὄμμασι φιλοφροσύνης (80). i. e. "However, he delighted his hearers, who were greatly "taken with the comelineſs of his aſpect; for whe-"ther heard or ſeen he charmed, and therefore en-"gaged their attention the more agreeably to his "words, which were ſet off with the great advan-"tages of a good pronunciation, a comely counte-"nance, and a native ſweetneſs of the eyes." He alſo ſays that Arceſilaus amazed the Stoicks by his different ways of confuting his antagoniſts. It will not be amiſs to give you the whole paſſage, as it acquaints us with the addreſs of our Philoſopher, and the great credit he acquired. Οἱ Στωικοὶ δὲ ὑπῆκουον ἐκπεπληγμένοι. ἠ μοῦσα γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἠδὴ τότε ἦν φιλολόγος, οὐδ' ἐργάτις χαρίτων, ὑφ' ὧν ὁ Ἀρκεσίλαος, τὰ μὲν περιεῖρεν, τὰ δὲ ὑπετίμων, ἀλλὰ δ' ὑπεσκελίζετο, κατεγελᾶτό τε αὐτὸς, & πιθανὸς ἦν. Τοιγαροῦν πρὸς οὓς μὲν ἀντέλεγεν, ἐτέρπετο, ἐν οἷς δὲ λέγων ἦν, κατεπεπληγμένον διετέλουν πᾶς τοῖς τότε ἀνθρώποις ὑπῆρχε, μηδὲν ἴδιον μήτ' οὖν ἦθος, μήτε πάθος, μήτε ἔργον ἐν βραχὺ, μηδὲ ἄλογον τοιοῦτον ὀφθῆναι ποτ' ἂν, ἢ τι μὴ Ἀρκεσιλάῳ δοκεῖ τῷ Πιτανάτῃ (81). i. e. "The Stoicks heard him with aſtoniſhment, for "their learning was as yet in its infancy, and not "improved in thoſe graces of eloquence and per-"ſuaſion, with which Arceſilaus ſilenced his adver-"ſaries, ſometimes ridiculing, ſometimes taking to "pieces, and ſometimes overturning their arguments. "Thus bearing down all that oppoſed him, and ex-"citing the wonder of all that heard him, the men "of that time took it for granted, that there was no "word, no paſſion, no little work, nor any thing "that could ſeem frivolous, unleſs it appeared ſuch "to Arceſilaus of Pitane." The foregoing remarks have furniſhed us with good authorities for atteſting the merit of Arceſilaus, to which I will add one more. A certain perſon ſays in Tully, that no one would ever have come into this Philoſopher's way of thinking, ſo manifeſtly abſurd and falſe, if the inconſiſtency of his opinions had not vaniſhed before the flowing eloquence of the teacher. Quis iſta tam apertè perſpicuèque & perverſa & falſa ſecutus eſſet, niſi tanta in Arceſila... & copia rerum & dicendi vis fuiſſet (82).

(80) Numenius, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. 14. cap. 6. p. 730, D.

(81) Ibid. pag. 733, C.

(82) Cicero, Academ. Quæſtion. lib. 4. cap. 18, fin.

[H] Some ſay he only put on the Sceptick to try his ſcholars.] Sextus Empiricus, after having told us that Arceſilaus does not ſeem to differ at all from the Pyrrhonians, adds, that if we are to believe certain reports, he was only a follower of Pyrrho in appearance, and that at the bottom he approved of the method of the Dogmatiſts. The doubts which he propoſed to his ſcholars, in order to diſcover if they had a ſufficient ſtrength of genius to comprehend the opinions of Plato, occaſioned his being looked upon as a Philoſopher who affirmed nothing; tho' he did not ſcruple to preach up ſtrongly the Platonic Philoſophy to thoſe, in whom he found a diſcerning judgment (83). It is a hard matter to decide whether or no this account is to be depended upon. See the diſſertations of Mr. Foucher upon the Academic Philoſophy (84), and the note of Thomas Aldobrandinus referred to in the margin (85).

(83) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. 1. cap. 33.

(84) Foucher, liv. 1, pag. 32; and liv. 3. pag. 154, & ſuiv.

(85) Th. Aldobrand. in Diogen. Laertium, lib. 4. num. 28.

[I] There are ſome very remarkable ſtories told of his liberality.] "He was very ready to confer a be-"nefit,

(78) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 5.

(79) Τὸν Θεόφραστον κινζόμενον φασὶν εἰπεῖν ὡς ἐυφυὴς καὶ εὐπαρακολούθητος ἀπαλλαγὴς τῆς διατριβῆς ἐκ γεγένηται. i. e. "They ſay that "Theophraſtus "bore his depar-"ture very ill "and ſaid, how "ingenious and "ready a youth "is gone out of "the ſchool?" Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 30. See alſo num. 37.

lighted in carping at him (b); but did they equal him in modeſty, and in exemption from jealouſy? Did they exhort their Diſciples to hear the other Profeſſors? This is what he did (i). He even carried one of his pupils, who gave him to underſtand that the ſchool of a Peripatetic would be more agreeable to him; he carried him, I ſay, to this Profeſſor, and recommended him to him (k). Another time, he baniſhed from his ſchool one of his diſciples, who had offended Cleanthes in a verſe of a Comedy, and did not receive him into favour, till the perſon offended had received ſatisfaction (l). The merit of this proceeding will be better known, when it is underſtood that Cleanthes was the ſucceſſor of Zeno, who had been the great adverſary of Arceſilaus. He had not the fault of the Plagiaries: he declared that he taught nothing but what he had found in books (m). He only uſed them in all probability to give more authority to his ſentiments, and to appeaſe the hatred that the name of Innovator drew on him. He did not love to meddle with political affairs (n): nevertheleſs when they choſe him to go and negotiate ſome affair at Demetria, in favour of his country, with King Antigonus, he accepted the deputation, but returned without ſucceſs; and it was perhaps, becauſe he would never pay his court to this Prince, nor go to him, nor write any conſolatory letter to him, after the loſs of a ſea-fight (o), as many others did (p). He had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of the Governor of the Piræum (q), and he received many fine preſents from Eumenes, Prince of Pergamus (r). He had a very good thought upon death; for he ſaid that of all the evils this is the only one whoſe preſence never incommoded any body, and which only gives concern in its abſence (s). His doctrines tend to the deſtruction of all the precepts of morality; and yet it is remarked, that he practiſed it. The teſtimony which was given him upon that account by Cleanthes the Stoic, and his Anſwer, with the Reply to it, are very curious particulars [K]. He was never married (t), tho' he was of an amorous conſtitution, and too ready to follow the inclinations of nature, even to a ſcandalous exceſs [L]. He flouriſhed about the 120th Olympiad (u), and died of drinking too plentifully, and in a delirium, when he was 75 years old (x), in the fourth year of the 134th Olympiad (y). He boaſted of having ſhewn a prodigious ſtrength of reſolution in the midſt of the pains of the gout [M]. Diogenes Laertius does not repreſent Bion as his ſucceſſor, as Father Rapin imagined without any foundation [N]. I have but one error to reproach Moreri with; and that is, for telling

(b) Idem, ibid.

(i) Idem, ibid. num. 42.

(k) Idem, ibid.

(l) Plut. de Diſcrim. Adulat. & Amici, p. 55, C.

(m) See the paſſage of Plutarch above, quotation (47).

(n) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 40.

(o) Idem, ibid. num. 39.

(p) Idem, ibid.

(q) Idem, ibid.

(r) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 38.

(s) Plutarch. de Conſolat. ad Apollonium, p. 110. A.

(t) Diogen. Laert. lib. 4. num. 43.

(u) Apollodor. apud Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 45.

(x) Idem, ibid. num. 44.

(y) Diog. Laertius, num. 61, tells us, that Lacydes, the ſucceſſor of Arceſilaus began that year to read Lectures to his diſciples.

" nefit, and at the ſame time ſtudious to conceal " the obligation." Εὐεργετῆσαι προχειρος ἦν, καὶ λαθεῖν τὴν χάριν ἀτυφότατος (86). This was practiſing Chriſtianity before the promulgation of it. Paying a viſit to Cteſibius, who was ſick and wanted neceſſaries, he put privately under his pillow a purſe of gold (87). Seneca tells us the following ſtory of him. " Arceſilaus went " one day to ſee a friend, who was both ſick and " in diſtreſs, but withal ſo modeſt as to conceal his " wants tho' for the neceſſaries of life. Wherefore " that he might relieve his neceſſities, without of- " fending his modeſty, he privately ſlipt a purſe of " money under his pillow, that he might ſeem ra- " ther to find than receive the ſum he wanted." Arceſilaus, ut aiunt, amico pauperi, & paupertatem ſuam diſſimulanti, ægro autem, & ne hoc quidem confitenti, deeſſe ſibi in ſumptum ad neceſſarios uſus, cum clam ſuccurrendum judicaſſet, pulvino ejus ignorantis ſacculum ſubjecit, ut homo inutiliter verecundus, quod deſiderabat, inveniret potius quam acciperet (88). Plutarch relates the ſame fact more at large; but he ſuppoſes that the ſick perſon was not Cteſibius, but calls him Apelles of Chios (89). It is further reported, that Arceſilaus having lent ſome plate to a friend, who was going to make a feaſt, did not demand it again, looking upon it as a gift, not as a loan; and ſome ſay, that out of regard to his friend's neceſſities he refuſed it when it was brought him again (90).

(86) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 37.

(87) Idem, ibid.

(88) Seneca, de Benef. lib. 2. cap. 10. p. 25.

(89) Plut. de Diſcrim. Amici & Adulator. p. 63.

(90) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 38.

[K] What Cleanthes reports in regard to the contrariety between his tenets and practice, is very curious.] To declare that there is nothing certain, and that every thing is incomprehenſible, is to deny that there is any ſuch thing certain as vice and virtue: now ſuch an aſſertion ſeems calculated to inſtill an indifference to honeſty and all the duties of life: for which reaſon the enemies of Arceſilaus took occaſion to reproach him with the neglect of all moral duties, pretending that he lived according to his principles. But Cleanthes, although of a Sect very oppoſite to this Philoſopher, took his part. " Hold your peace, " ſays he, to one that was cenſuring him, for if he " deſtroys morality in his words, yet he confirms it " in his actions. Παῦσαι, ἔφη, καὶ μὴ ψέγε, εἰ γὰρ καὶ λόγῳ τὸ καθῆκον ἀναιρεῖ, τοῖς γοῦν ἔργοις αὐτὸ τιθεῖ (91). Arceſilaus made anſwer to him that he did not love to be flattered. Is it flattering you, replied Cleanthes, to affirm you ſay one thing and do another (92)? There is a great deal of ſmartneſs in this repartee; for it ſeems to have carried in it an alluſion to thoſe verſes in Homer which import, that thoſe impoſtors and hypocrites who ſay one thing and mean the contrary ought to be deteſted as diabolical (93). For all this, Cleanthes at the bottom commended the good life which Arceſilaus led. We are to take notice by the way that the doctrine of the moſt rigid Pyrrhonians, was in its theory favourable to the cauſe of virtue; for they did not ſcruple to teach that let the reality of things be as it would, yet in our practice we ought to conform to appearances. However this be, the true principle of morality has ſo little to do with ſpeculative notions on the nature of things, that nothing is more common than for orthodox Chriſtians to live ill, and for libertines in principle to be virtuous in practice.

(91) Diog. Laertius, in Cleanthe, lib. 7. num. 171.

(92) Idem, ibid.

(93) Homerus, Iliad. lib. 9. ver. 312.

[L] He indulged his natural inclinations .... even to a ſcandalous exceſs.] The good qualities which I have mentioned of his in the text of this article and in the foregoing remark were ſully'd by the moſt criminal violation of chaſtity; ſo true is it that vice and virtue may meet together in the ſame perſon. " He uſed to viſit in a publick manner Theodota " and Phileta, two lewd women of Elis." Καὶ Θεοδότῃ τε καὶ Φιλαίτῃ Ἠλιαίαις ἑταίραις συνῆν φανερῶς (94). But what was ſtill worſe, he gave himſelf up to unnatural uncleanneſs. Φιλομειρακιός τε ἦν καὶ καταφιλής. ὅθεν οἱ περὶ Ἀρίστωνα τὸν Χῖον Στωϊκοὶ ἐπικαλοῦσιν αὐτὸν φθορέα τῶν νέων, καὶ κιναιδολόγον καὶ θρασὺν ἀποκαλοῦντες (95). i. e. " He was given to the love of young boys, and " of an amorous diſpoſition; for which reaſon the " Stoic Ariſto of Chios uſed to call him a corrupter " of youth, and an impure and impudent fellow."

(94) Diog. Laertius, lib. 4. num. 40.

(95) Idem, ibid.

[M] He gloried in ſhewing an invincible courage while afflicted with the gout.] " Carneades who was " an intimate friend of Epicurus, came once to ſee him " when he was labouring under a violent fit of the " gout; upon which he was going out of the room " full of concern: Stay, (ſays he,) friend Carneades, " this ſuffers nothing from thoſe; pointing at the ſame "time to his breaſt and his feet." Is quum arderet podagræ doloribus, viſitaſſetque hominem Carneades Epicuri perfamiliaris, & triſtis exiret, mane quæſo, (inquit,) Carneade noſter, nihil illinc huc pervenit, oſtendens pedes & pectus (96). This was ſpeaking in the language of a Stoic, tho' Arceſilaus was the antagoniſt of the founder of that Sect.

(96) Cicero, de Finibus, lib. 5. cap. 31. in fine.

[N] Diogenes Laertius does not repreſent Bion as his ſucceſſor, as Father Rapin imagines without reaſon.] See his telling us, that Arceſilaus ſtudied under Xanthus and Theophraſtus, before he came to Athens. I have remarked a very groſs miſtake in Sidonius Apollinaris [O].

his own words: "Cicero, who very well knew who "were the ſucceſſors of Plato, makes no mention of "this Bion, whom Diogenes Laertius repreſents as the "ſucceſſor of Arceſilaus, and who, according to Horace, "made himſelf famous by his ſevere Satyrs (97)." All the foundation that Father Rapin builds upon is, that the Life of Bion immediately follows that of Arceſilaus in the work of Diogenes Laertius; but this is no reaſon, ſince the Author expreſly ſays, that Lacydes was ſucceſſor to Arceſilaus (98); and that Bion, who was alſo a hearer of Crates, refuſed to embrace the principles of the Academy, and afterwards went over to another Sect (99).

(97) Rapin, Compar. de Platon & d'Ariſtote, Part 4. chap. 1. pag. 369.

(98) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 59. in Lacyde init.

(99) Idem, ibid. num. 51, 52, in Bione.

[O] I have diſcovered in Sidonius Apollinaris a very groſs fault with regard to him.] He pretends that according to Arceſilaus, whom he places prior to Socrates, God is the efficient Cauſe of the world, and that atoms are the conſtituent parts of it.

Conjicit hanc molem, confectam partibus illis,
Quas Atomos vocat ipſe leves. Socratica poſt hunc
Secta micat, quæ de naturæ pondere migrans
Ad mores hominum limandos tranſtulit uſum (100).

(100) Sidon. Apollinaris, Carm. 15. ver. 94. pag. 152.

"Of atoms next Arceſilas ſuppos'd
"This world's great fabrick was at firſt compos'd,
"Not by the careleſs hand of chance combin'd,
"But form'd and faſhion'd by th' Almighty Mind.
"Next Socrates a nobler ſcheme began,
"To mend the morals and improve the man."

Savaro, without taking notice of this anachroniſm, contents himſelf with obſerving that all the world aſcribes to Epicurus and Democritus the doctrine which Sidonius Apollinaris fathers upon Arceſilaus (101). This obſervation is falſe; for no body ever pretended that Democritus and Epicurus taught that the world was made by God.

(101) Savaro in hunc locum Sidonii Apollinar.

Poſt hos Arceſilas divina mente patratam

☞ ARCESILAUS. Four Kings of that name reigned at Cyrene [A]. The firſt was the ſon of Battus, the Founder of that Kingdom, who having reigned forty years left the Crown to Arceſilaus, who enjoyed it ſixteen (a). We know nothing of the two following Kings, except that the next was called Battus, and his ſucceſſor Arceſilaus. The latter was ſucceeded by Battus the third, ſurnamed the Fortunate, under whoſe reign a great number of Greeks went into Africa, and ſettled at Cyrene, being induced to it by an Oracle [B]. Apries was at that time King of Egypt (b). After the death of Battus the third of that name, his ſon Arceſilaus III aſcended the throne, tho' before he could enjoy it peaceably, he had a violent conteſt with his brothers [C]. Yet after all he did not eſcape the ſnares of one of them called Aliarchus, who ſtrangled him in his bed one day, when being indiſpoſed he had taken Phyſic. But Aliarchus did not reap any benefit by this murther; for he was himſelf put to death by Erixo the wife of Arceſilaus. After this King reigned his ſon Battus IV, who was lame, and had not the right uſe of his feet. The Cyrenians having had ſome misfortunes under his reign, they conſulted the Oracle of Delphos, to know how they might beſt regulate their ſtate. The Oracle commanded them to ſend for a perſon from Mantinea, and eſtabliſh ſuch orders amongſt them as that perſon ſhould think proper. Accordingly the Mantineans ſent them one Demonax, a man highly eſteemed amongſt his fellow-citizens. Amongſt other regulations which he made, he deprived the King of the ſacred lands, and of the Prieſthood, and of all the revenues that the former Kings had been poſſeſſed of, and gave them to the people. This regulation continued during the reign of Battus. But Arceſilaus, his ſon (c) and ſucceſſor, declared that he would not ſubmit to the regulations of Demonax, and claimed all the honours and privileges, which his anceſtors had enjoyed. This ſoon occaſioned a ſedition, which obliged Arceſilaus to fly to Samos, and his mother to Salamine, in the iſland of Cyprus [D]. Whilſt Arceſilaus was at Samos, he ſollicited as many

(a) Herodotus, lib. 4. cap. 159. p. m. 272, 273. ed. Gronovii, Lugd. Batav. 1715. fol.

(b) Idem, ibid. p. 273.

(c) By Pheretima.

[A] Cyrene.] A city in Lybia, the Capital of the Cyrenaïc Country, which on account of the five celebrated cities which it contained, was called the Lybian Pentapolis (1). Theſe cities were, Cyrene the capital city, Berenice, Arſinoe or Tenchira, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia. It is now the Weſtern part of the Kingdom of Barca, where the five ancient cities are ſtill ſeen, and known by the names of Çairoan, Bernicho, Trocara, Barca the capital city of the whole country, and Bonandrea, which is the ancient Apollonia (2).

(1) Uſher, Index Geograp. in Voce Cyrene.

(2) Baudrand, in Cyrenaique.

[B] A great number of Greeks ſettled at Cyrene — induced to it by an Oracle.] They were invited by the Cyrenians, who having land to ſpare, promiſed it to thoſe, who would come and ſettle amongſt them. The Oracle of Delphi was alſo an inducement to them. It declared that thoſe, who ſhould come too late into Lybia, and after the lands had been divided, would certainly repent it. The number of thoſe who came was ſo large, that the territories of Cyrene were not ſufficient for them. The Cyrenians therefore attacked their neighbours, and made themſelves maſters of part of their country. Whereupon theſe people with Adicra their King ſurrender'd themſelves to the Ægyptians, over whom Apries then reigned; who having raiſed a powerful army marched againſt the Cyrenians, and engaged in battle againſt them; but he found that the Greeks, whom he deſpiſed, were a brave people, ſince his Ægyptians were entirely routed by them (3).

(3) Herodot. lib. 4. cap. 159. p. m. 273.

[C] He had a violent conteſt with his brothers.] His brothers ſeeing that they could not get the Kingdom of Cyrene, went away and founded another city on the borders of the Cyrenaïc Country, and called it Barca. Whilſt they were building it, they invited the inhabitants of Cyrene to come over to them; which Arceſilaus ſo highly reſented, that he reſolved to attack them. Accordingly he marched againſt them with a powerful army; whereupon they fled, but he purſuing them they reſolved to try their fortune; and having engaged in battle againſt him, they were ſo fortunate as to gain the victory, having ſlain ſeven thouſand men of his army (4). Thus was eſtabliſhed the Kingdom of Barce, to the King of which one of this Arceſilaus's deſcendants and ſucceſſors fled for refuge (5).

(4) Idem, ibid. cap. 160. p. 173.

(5) See the text of this Article quotation (c).

[D] His mother fled to Salamine in the Iſland of Cyprus.] Euelthon was then King or Prince of that city. Pheretima the mother of Arceſilaus earneſtly deſired that Prince to reſtore her and her ſon to their Kingdom, or to give them an army, that they might themſelves recover it. Euelthon would have granted her any thing elſe but an army. He made her ſeveral preſents, at the receiving of which ſhe uſed to ſay, This indeed is good, but it is an army I want. This was the anſwer ſhe made at every gift ſhe received. Euelthon wearied at laſt with her importunities, ſent her a clew of golden thread, telling her, that was a proper preſent for a woman, and not an army (6).

(6) Ib. cap. 162.

By pag. 274.

many persons as he could, to assist him in the recovery of his Kingdom, and promised them lands, to persuade them to undertake it; and having by that means assembled a numerous army he sailed for Delphi to consult the Oracle. The answer he received was very clear, with regard to the time past, but with regard to what was to happen, the Oracle was so enigmatical, that it was impossible for Arcesilaus to understand it, before the event had put it out of his power to prevent the danger, that threatned him [E]. With such an answer he went to Cyrene, and recovered his Kingdom. He immediately resolved to revenge himself on those, who by their revolt had been, as he thought, the cause of his flight. Some of them went into a voluntary exile; others, who had been taken, he sent to Cyprus, in order that they might perish there; but they landing on the Island of Cnidus, were delivered by the inhabitants, and safely sent to Thera. Others had taken sanctuary in a large tower; those he burnt alive, having set fire to the tower. But then he began to understand the sense of the Oracle, which he had received at Delphi (d); whereupon he fled to Alazir, King of the Barcæi (e), his wife's father; but he was not safe there, for some of the Barcæi and some exiles of Cyrene having seen him in the market-place of Barce killed him there. In him ended the Kingdom of Cyrene; for he had given it to Cambyses King of Persia, and established a tribute to be paid to that King (f). We must not omit to observe, that this last Arcesilaus is celebrated by Pindar (g) for having carried a prize in the publick games of Greece, in the third year of the 79th Olympiad, according to Archbishop Usher (b), who also tells us (i) that the Kingdom of Cyrene lasted two hundred years. But that learned Author's assertion does not seem to be well grounded [F]. Moreri's account of Arcesilaus is proper only to lead the readers into a mistake [G].

(d) See the remark.

(e) They were a nation of Lybia; the country which they inhabited bordered upon that of the Cyrenians towards the North. Their capital city is by Ptolomy called Barce, and the inhabitants Barcitæ. Ptol. Geog. lib. 4. c. 4.

(f) Herodot. ubi supra. c. 160-164. pag. 173, 175.

(g) Ode 4 and 5.

(b) Annal. p. m. 113. ad ann. Mund. 3573.

(i) Ibid.

By which he seems to have shewn, that he had less generosity than that woman had courage, if she intended to head herself the army she desired; and if she desired him to assist her son by commanding his own army, his answer was a ridiculous expression without the least sense or reason, and in all probability Herodotus did not relate as a witty saying.

[E] The answer he received was &c.] The Priestess answered him, The God grants you to reign at Cyrene the space of eight generations, till four Battus's and four Arcesilaus's have been Kings; but advises you not so much as to venture to go beyond that term. Thus far the Oracle was very clear; Arcesilaus knew that he was the fourth of that name, and that four Battus's had reigned before him. And as to the prohibition not to extend the dominion of that family at Cyrene further, it related rather to Arcesilaus's children and descendants, than to himself. But the latter part of the Oracle was an absolute riddle. If thou findest, said the Oracle, a furnace full of bottles, beware not to burn them, but let them go out into the air. Or if thou hast set fire to the furnace, do not enter into the atmosphere of it, (or that which surrounds it,) otherwise thou shalt perish, thou and the bull that works well (7). The Greek words are (8) Ἢν δ᾽ τὴν καμίνου ἴδῃς πλέην ἀμφορέων, μὴ ἐξοπτήσῃς τοὺς ἀμφορέας, ἀλλ᾽ ἀσάμενος κατ᾽ ὄρεος· ἢν δὲ ἐξοπτήσῃς τὴν καμίνου, μὴ εἰσίλθῃς ἐς τὸν ἀμφίρυτον· εἰ δ᾽ μὴ, ἀποθανέεαι καὶ αὐτὸς, καὶ ταῦρος ὁ καλλιεύων. What man living could explain such an enigmatical and obscure sentence? Indeed Arcesilaus knew the meaning of it only by the event, and when he was ruined, for not having known it before. He understood then, that the tower, in which the Cyrenians took their refuge was the furnace, and the Cyrenians themselves the bottles meant by the Oracle. This made him think, that the atmosphere, or that which surrounded the furnace, must be the city which obliged him to fly out of it. If we consider the circumstances of this Oracle, it will not be difficult to conclude, that it was only an artifice of the Priestess, or of those under whose management she was. They express themselves plainly when the question is with regard to what they knew, the succession of the Kings of Cyrene; but are dark and enigmatical, when they come to futurity, in order that whatever the event should be, it might be in their power to explain their Oracle in what sense they please. It may also perhaps be thought, that this Oracle was framed after the event was passed; which is not at all improbable.

(7) Αμφίρυτον.

(8) Herodot. ubi supra, cap. 163, p. 274, 275.

[F] Usher's assertion does not seem to be well grounded.] He supposes that the Kingdom of Cyrene was founded the second year of the 37th Olympiad, that is, according to his account A. M. 3373, 631 before the Christian Æra, and ended A. M. 3573, 431 before Christ. He quotes Eusebius's Chronicon, and adds that under the third King of Cyrene, namely Battus the son of Arcesilaus, Apries reigned in Egypt (9). Now according to his account Apries began his reign A. M. 3410, and reigned twenty five years. His reign ended then A. M. 3435. Now if we add to the year of the world 3373, in which the Kingdom of Cyrene was founded, the forty years of Battus the first's reign, and the sixteen of Arcesilaus the first, the reign of the King, under whom the Greeks came to Cyrene, will fall between the years 3429, and 3435, in which Apries died. But this supposes, that the migration of the Greeks happened under Battus the second, whereas Herodotus expressly says that it was under Battus the third, ἐπὶ τρίτου Βάττου; and it appears by the sequel of his History that there was but one Battus, and two Arcesilaus's after the King, under whom the Greeks came to Cyrene. What then shall we do with Battus the second and Arcesilaus the second, whom Usher has omitted? If we say that they reigned in the interval between the death of Arcesilaus the first and that of Apries; we must ascribe but five years to them both, and suppose that the four last Kings of Cyrene reigned one hundred and thirty nine years, that is about thirty five years one with another; whereas the four first reigned but sixty one years. This, I own, is not impossible, but I think very improbable. I would therefore date the foundation of Cyrene somewhat sooner than Usher has done. Perhaps the whole story related by Herodotus will be called in question by those, who will imagine it to be improbable, that there should be eight Kings reigning successively, who were alternately called Battus and Arcesilaus.

(9) Usser. Ann. p. 64. ad ann. Mundi 3373, p. 113. ad ann. 4573.

[G] Moreri's account is proper only to lead the readers into a mistake.] The only thing he tells us, is that Arcesilaus the son of Battus the Founder of the Kingdom of Cyrene, succeeded his father in the year of the world 3414, and reigned sixteen years; whereupon he quotes Herodotus. Such a dry account does not in the least instruct the reader; but what is worse, such an inaccuracy will make the reader believe, that there was but one Battus, and one Arcesilaus Kings of Cyrene; whereas had Moreri, or his more modern continuators, looked into Herodotus, and not barely copied one passage of Usher, and that the only one referred to in the Index, they would have found four Arcesilaus's instead of one. But this instance and a thousand more shew, that Moreri's Dictionary was drawn up only by the help of Indexes, and that whatever was not found there, was left out of the work.

P.

ARCHELAUS. Diogenes Laertius mentions four persons of that name (a), who are as follows. ARCHELAUS the Philosopher (b), ARCHELAUS, the Author of a description of (b) It is the same person who is the subject of the following article.

(a) Diog. Laertius, lib. 2. in Archelao.

of all the countries into which Alexander carried his arms, ARCHELAUS, who wrote a Poem upon the wonderful properties of certain things (c), and ARCHELAUS the Orator, who wrote a Syſtem of Rhetoric. Mr. Menage adds to theſe four, ARCHELAUS King of Cappadocia, ARCHELAUS King of SPARTA, ARCHELAUS a General of Mithridates, ARCHELAUS the Dancer, ARCHELAUS the Muſician, and ARCHELAUS the Comedian (d). He obſerves, that Lucian mentions the latter in his Treatiſe de Conſcribendâ Hiſtoria; that Athenæus in his firſt book ſpeaks of the Muſician (e); and Clemens Alexandrinus in the 7th book of his Stromata, mentions the Dancer [A]. He forgot ARCHELAUS the Aſtrologer (f), and ſeveral other perſons of that name, whom I ſhall treat of in the following Articles.

(c) See the note [C] of the following article.

(d) Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 17.

(e) See the note [H] of the article ABDERA.

(f) Cicero de Divin. lib. 2. c. 42.

[A] Mr. Menage obſerves .... that Athenæus .... has ſpoken of Archelaus the Muſician, and that Clemens Alexandrinus .... ſpeaks of the Dancer.] Mr. Menage underſtood the rules of a good and learned manner of quoting, but he does not obſerve them here. He had better have quoted the firſt book of Athenæus, with regard to Archelaus the Dancer, than the ſeventh book of the Stromata of Clemens Alexandrinus; for beſides that the right of ſeniority does not belong to this laſt, we find ſome particulars in Athenæus, and none in the Stromata. Athenæus relates, that King Antiochus had no greater favourite than Archelaus the Dancer (1). This Author had obſerved in the ſame page, that the inhabitants of Miletus, dedicated a brazen ſtatue to Archelaus the Fidler: if I may ſo tranſlate Ἀρχελάου τοῦ κιθαριστοῦ.

(1) Athen. l. 1. cap. 16. p. 19.

ARCHELAUS, a Grecian Philoſopher, a Diſciple of Anaxagoras, was of Athens, according to ſome writers, or of Miletus according to ſome others (a). What we are certain of is that he read Lectures in Athens. It is likewiſe ſaid that he was the firſt who transferred Philoſophy thither [A]. He made but little alteration in Anaxagoras's doctrine (b). He admitted, like him, ſimilar parts to be the principal matter of all things, and

(a) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 16.

(b) See the note [C].

[A] It is ſaid that he was the firſt who transferred Philoſophy thither.] Several Critics have obſerved hereupon the diſagreement, which is betwixt Diogenes Laertius and Clemens Alexandrinus. The one attributes that firſt tranſlation to Archelaus, the other to Anaxagoras. Οὗτος (Ἀρχέλαος) πρῶτος ἐκ τῆς Ἰωνίας τὴν φυσικὴν φιλοσοφίαν μετήγαγεν Ἀθήναζε (1). i. e. "He (Archelaus) firſt brought Natural Philoſophy to Athens from Ionia." Theſe are the words of Diogenes Laertius, and the following of Clemens Alexandrinus. Οὗτος (Ἀναξαγόρας) μετήγαγε ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωνίας Ἀθήναζε τὴν διατριβήν (2). i. e. "He (Anaxagoras) tranſlated the School from Ionia to Athens." No body that I know of, has ſought out the means of reconciling theſe two notions, nor the riſe of that diverſity of opinions. And yet it ſeems to me eaſy enough to apprehend it from what I am going to ſay thereupon. Anaxagoras came a very young Philoſopher to Athens, and dwelt there thirty years (3). It is not impoſſible that his Maſter Anaximenes continued teaching Philoſophy in Ionia, during part of that time (4). It may likewiſe be ſuppoſed that Diogenes, his other diſciple, ſucceeded him. But if the chair of Thales was not vacant in Ionia, whilſt Anaxagoras taught Philoſophy at Athens, it is not true that he transferred the ſchool of Thales to that city. Such a tranſlation ſuppoſes that the ſucceſſion was at an end by Anaxagoras's journey. It could only be true, that before this Philoſopher had read Lectures in Athens, no ſcholar of the Ionian Sect had ever been a Profeſſor amongſt the Athenians. Perhaps Clemens Alexandrinus and the Authors that followed him meant nothing elſe, and did not take the pains to expreſs themſelves more exactly. However that be, aſking Mr. Caſaubon's pardon (5), Diogenes Laertius ſeems to me to have ſpoken with more exactneſs; for we muſt know that when Anaxagoras went from Athens he retired to Lampſacus, where he read Lectures till his death. His chair was filled at Lampſacus, by his diſciple Archelaus (6), who went afterwards to teach Philoſophy at Athens (7). It was therefore properly Archelaus, who tranſported from Ionia to Athens the School of Thales. That was a true tranſplantation; but before, it was not a real one, ſince probably that School was not empty during all the time that paſſed betwixt Anaxagoras's journey to Athens, and his retreat to Lampſacus; or that if it did ſuffer ſome interruption, it was ſoon repaired by that Philoſopher's return into Ionia. It would ſignify nothing to object to me that we have no writer remaining, that has aſſured us that Diogenes was the ſucceſſor of Anaximenes; for I can anſwer, I, that we have no exact Hiſtory of the ancient Philoſophers, and conſequently, that this ſilence does not take away the right of ſuppoſing as I do: II, That Anaxagoras having been more eminent than Diogenes, and having had a diſciple that continued the ſucceſſion, having even, as is very probable, ſurvived Diogenes, it is by him, rather than by the latter, that the ſucceſſions of the Ionian Sect are diſtinguiſhed. There is great probability that Sidonius Apollinaris aſſociates the two diſciples of Anaximenes, as two collegues, who were the ſupport of that School,

Quartus Anaxagoras Thaletica Dogmata ſervat:
Sed divinum animum ſentit, qui fecerit orbem.
Junior huic junctus reſidet Collega, ſed idem
Materiam cunctis creaturis aera credens
Judicat inde Deum, faceret quo cuncta (8), tuliſſe (9).

That is,

" The fourth of thoſe, who in the Grecian ſchools
" Succeeded Thales, and maintain'd his rules,
" Was Anaxagoras: and he could find
" The world was form'd by an Almighty Mind.
" Next him his Collegue ſits, who held the air
" Does fit materials for all things prepare.
" And prov'd th' Almighty did from thence provide " Such matter, as to form the world ſupply'd."

Here follow other conjectures. Our moſt learned men (10) take for the moſt certain rule to determine the age of Anaxagoras what Diogenes Laertius relates, that at the time of Xerxes's expedition, that Philoſopher was twenty years old. It is from thence that they take upon them to infer, that ſince he lived ſeventy two years he died in the 88th Olympiad. I do not care to raiſe a conteſt hereupon; but I have ſome difficulties to object againſt what this ſame Laertius ſays, that Anaxagoras took his journey to Athens at twenty years old, and that he dwelt there thirty years. It does not ſeem to me very probable, that he choſe for that journey the time of Xerxes's expedition, by which the People of Aſia did not doubt that the republic of Athens would be quite cruſhed to pieces. Let us not inſiſt upon that, but go on to ſome other and much ſtronger arguments. If Diogenes Laertius be in the right, it muſt be ſaid that Anaxagoras dwelt in Athens no longer than till the ſecond year of the 82d Olympiad; for the expedition of Xerxes fell out upon the laſt months of the 74th Olympiad, and on the firſt of the 75th; but does not Diodorus Siculus aſſure us that that Philoſopher was accuſed of impiety at Athens, in the ſecond year of the 87th Olympiad (11)? He therefore overturns the account of Diogenes Laertius: It is not without confounding himſelf on the other hand; for what will become of that which is related, that Socrates, after the condemnation of Anaxagoras, became the Diſciple of Archelaus (12)? What will become of that which others have told us, that Euripides quitted the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy

(1) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 16.

(2) Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 2. p. 301.

(3) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 7.

(4) That which Diogenes Laertius tells, book 2, num. 2. relating to the time of Anaximenes's death, is ridiculous.

(5) Caſaubon, upon this paſſage of D. Laertius, cenſures him, and declares himſelf for Clemens Alexandrinus. Mr. Menage does the ſame.

(6) Euſeb. Præparat. lib. 10. ult. p. 504.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) That compared with what Cicero de Naturâ Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 11, & ſeq. and St. Auguſtin de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. ſay of Diogenes of Apollonia, demonſtrates that he there treats of this Diogenes.

(9) Sidon. Apollinar. Carm. 15. ver. 89.

(10) Scalig. in Euſeb. num. 1554. p. 103; Petavius, Rationar. Temporis, Part 1. lib. 3. cap. 8. p. 140; Voſſius, de Scientiis Mathem. cap. 37. num. 4. pag. 148.

(11) Diod. Siculus, lib. 12. cap. 39. p. 433.

(12) Diog. Laertius, l. 2. num. 19.

and a Divine intellect for the cauſe of the orderly diſpoſal of bodies; and he taught, like him, that animals, men not excepted, were produced of a terreſtrial matter, hot and moiſt [B]. He made natural Philoſophy his chief ſtudy, as did his predeceſſors, but he engaged in moral Philoſophy a little more than they had done. He was not at all Orthodox, for he maintained that human Laws were the ſource of moral good and evil; that is to ſay, he did not admit ſuch a thing as the Law of Nature, but only poſitive Laws; and by conſequence he believed that all kinds of actions were indifferent in their nature, and that they became good or bad, according as it had pleaſed men to eſtabliſh certain phy and applied himſelf wholly to the ſtage, by reaſon of the proceedings againſt Anaxagoras (13)? Could Socrates, who was near forty years old, at the time of that proceſs, according to the Chronology of Diodorus Siculus, have occaſion to ſtudy under another Maſter? And obſerve, that according to Porphyry, he betook himſelf to the Philoſopher Archelaus (14), at about ſeventeen years old. Did Euripides, who at the time of the ſame Proceſs was above fifty years of age, wait till then before he compoſed his tragedies? He was ſo far from delaying it ſo long, that he wrote one when he was but eighteen years old (15). To clear up this confuſion a little, and to find out ſome means to make theſe accounts agree, we muſt return to Diogenes Laertius, and lay aſide Diodorus Siculus; for by ſuppoſing that Anaxagoras was accuſed in the 82d Olympiad, we ſhall find the conſequence very poſſible, which it is ſaid that proceſs produced with regard to Euripides and Socrates. We ſhall be able to ſuppoſe that the Poet, having joined the ſtudy of Natural Philoſophy with the compoſing of tragedies, till he ſaw the danger of Anaxagoras, applied himſelf from that time only to the theatre. But what ſhall we do with Euſebius, who has told us that Archelaus was the ſucceſſor of Anaxagoras in Lampſacus before he came to teach Philoſophy at Athens? That cannot be true, if Anaxagoras lived till the 88th Olympiad; a time when Socrates, a much greater maſter than Archelaus, had no manner of occaſion to put himſelf under his diſcipline. It might perhaps be proper to ſuppoſe, I. that Archelaus, having ſtudied ſome years under Anaxagoras at Athens, took there the office of Profeſſor, when his maſter had retired: II. that after a while he rejoined him at Lampſacus, and was there made his ſucceſſor, from whence he afterwards returned to Athens, and tranſplanted thither entirely the chair of Thales. It might not perhaps be amiſs to ſuppoſe likewiſe, that Anaxagoras was accuſed more than once at Athens, and that having retired into Ionia at the time of the firſt proceſs, he was recalled ſome years after by Pericles, and underwent a freſh accuſation after he had been there ſome years. We have ſeen (16) that certain Authors have ſaid, that he was accuſed by Thucydides, the adverſary of Pericles, and condemned to death as an outlaw. But after the baniſhment of Thucydides, the authority was in the hands of Pericles for fifteen years (17): which imports that Thucydides was driven out fifteen years before the death of Pericles. It ſhould follow from thence that Anaxagoras had been outlawed fifteen or ſixteen years at leaſt before Pericles died: but according to Diodorus Siculus (18), and Plutarch (19), he was accuſed a little before the beginning of the Peloponneſian war, that is to ſay, two or three years before Pericles's death. One may therefore ſuppoſe, that he was accuſed twice, and place his return into Ionia and his ſecond return to Athens in the interval of the two accuſations; and by that means a great difficulty may be reſolved. Socrates was never a diſciple of Anaxagoras, although Diogenes Laertius affirms it (20). I have proved that (21) by a very ſtrong argument; and I can ſtrengthen it, not only by the ſilence of Plato and Xenophon, when the circumſtances of the ſubject could no ways oblige them to it; but likewiſe by the ſilence of Socrates's accuſers, and the anſwer that Socrates gave them. Would they have forborn to reproach him with being inſtructed by a Philoſopher that had been condemned for his impiety? Would not that have been the way to have rendered him more ſuſpected? Would they have forgot that aggravation? Would they have contented themſelves with reproaching him in general that his Philoſophy was of a piece with that impious man? And if he had had him for his maſter, would he have dared to anſwer as he did (22)? Let us conclude that he never was the Diſciple of Anaxagoras. But how ſhall we imagine that he was not, if we ſuppoſe that Anaxagoras did not go from Athens till the time that Diodorus Siculus and Plutarch have aſſigned? On that ſuppoſition did not Anaxagoras flouriſh in Athens, when Socrates had the moſt occaſion to chuſe him for his tutor? and allowing that, can one well believe that Socrates did not go to that Philoſopher's lectures, but to thoſe of Archelaus? It is probable that this latter ſet up a ſchool in Athens, during the time that Anaxagoras flouriſhed in the ſame city? or that if he did, his lectures were preferred by Socrates to thoſe of Anaxagoras? Theſe are difficulties which may be reſolved, by ſuppoſing that the latter was expelled, and that in the time that paſſed betwixt the two ſentences, Archelaus taught Philoſophy in Athens.

It remains for me to make an obſervation againſt Plutarch. We muſt not imagine that he believed that Anaxagoras died in the 88th Olympiad; for when he relates the prodigies that preceded the defeat of the Athenians at the river Ægos (23), he ſays that according to the prediction of that Philoſopher, there fell from Heaven a great ſtone. The overthrow of the Athenians fell out in the fourth year of the 93d Olympiad. It would be abſurd to ſuppoſe that Plutarch meant that Anaxagoras predicted that fall of the ſtone twenty years beforehand. He believed therefore that that Philoſopher lived to the 93d Olympiad. But that is a great miſtake. I ſuſpect him very much of falſe Chronology, in placing the fall of that ſtone under the 93d Olympiad. Pliny, Euſebius, and the Arundelian Marbles contradict it. They place that event under the 78th (24). In ſuch a lamentable ſtate as this, have the ancients, that are ſo much boaſted of, left the hiſtory of the Philoſophers. A thouſand contradictions throughout, a thouſand incompatible facts, a thouſand falſe dates. Obſerve that I have not ſeen any modern, who refutes thoſe which place the death of Anaxagoras in the 78th Olympiad (25); who refutes them, I ſay, by Diodorus Siculus and Plutarch, who aſſure us that that Philoſopher was accuſed a little before the firſt year of the Peloponneſian war (26).

[B] He taught that animals, men not excepted, were produced of a material matter, hot and moiſt.] What we have left of his ſentiments, in the Authors that relate them, is ſo ſhort, that a man cannot form a juſt notion thereof. Γινεσθαι δὲ φησι τὰ ζῶα ἐκ θερμῆς τῆς γῆς, ἓν ἰλὺν παραπλησίαν γάλακτι, εἶτα τροφὴν αὐτίσης. Οὕτω δὲ καὶ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους ποιῆσαι (27). i. e. "But "that animals are generated from the heat of the earth, "which hath melted down the mud into the form of "milk as food. So likewiſe are men produced." It is thus that Diogenes Laertius expreſſes himſelf. He had juſt been ſaying, that according to that Philoſopher, the cauſes of generation were heat and moiſture (28). He had likewiſe ſaid juſt before how that water, air, earth, and fire had their riſe from thoſe two principles; but I own that as I do not underſtand the meaning of his words, I will not take the pains to tranſcribe them. Mr. Menage, who has inſerted them in his commentary, without making any remark thereon, did not in all likelihood know what was their ſignification. The other commentators have not ſucceeded better. They have left them to their obſcurity; let us do the ſame, and have recourſe to Plutarch, who has ſaid that according to Archelaus, the unbounded air, the condenſation and rarefaction of the air, the one being fire, and the other water, were the principles of all things (29). Juſtin Martyr attributes very near the ſame opinion to him (30). The meaning of this, as I take it, is, that he admitted the air for the firſt matter, and fire and water for the elements. But that was not his opinion, if St. Auſtin's word may be taken on the occaſion; for that Father attributes to him the opinion of Anaxagoras with

(13) See the article of EURIPIDES, in the text.

(14) See the Life of Socrates, written by Mr. Charpentier, p. 5.

(15) Aulus Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 20.

(16) Above, citation (147) of the article of ANAXAGORAS.

(17) Plutarch. in Pericle, p. 161. E.

(18) Lib. 12. cap. 39. p. 433.

(19) Plutarch. in Pericle, p. 169.

(20) Diogen. Laert. in Socrate, lib. 2. num. 19, and 45.

(21) Above, at the end of the note [R] of the article of ANAXAGORAS.

(22) See the citation (29) of the article of ANAXAGORAS.

(23) See the citation (136) of the article of ANAXAGORAS.

(24) Pliny places it at the 2d year; ſee above citation (138) of the article of ANAXAGORAS; Euſebius at the 4th year; the Marmora Arundeliana at the 1ſt year. See Hardouin on Pliny, tom. 1. pag. 275.

(25) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 7. does it; Euſebius places it at the 4th year of the 79th Olympiad.

(26) That is to ſay, at the 2d year of the 87th Olympiad.

(26) That is to ſay, at the 2d year of the 87th Olympiad.

(27) Diogen. Laertius, lib. 2. num. 17.

(28) Inſtead of ψυχρὸν frigidum, it ſhould be read ὑγρὸν, humidum. See Mr. Menage upon that paſſage. But note that Hermias in Philoſophorum Deriſione, pag. 177, aſſures us that Archelaus gave out as the principles of all things θερμὸν καὶ ψυχρὸν, heat and cold.

(29) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. 1. cap. 3. pag. 876.

(30) Juſt. Martyr. Admonit. ad Græcos, pag. 4.

(d) Plut. in Cimone, p. 481.
(e) Cicero, Tusculan. l. 5. Diog. Laert. l. 2. n. 16. Clem. Alexand. Strom. l. 1. pag. 301. Aug. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2.

certain Laws (e). He compoſed a work of natural Philoſophy, according to Suidas, and he was conſidered as the Author of certain Elegies which were deſigned for the conſolation of Cimon, who was very much grieved at the loſs of his wife (d). Socrates, the moſt illuſtrious of his diſciples, was his ſucceſſor (e). It will be proper to ſay ſomething of a Poet that was called ARCHELAUS [C]. Diogenes Laertius ſpeaks of (e) Τὸ δίκαιον εἶναι, καὶ τὸ αἰσχρὸν οὐ φύσει ἀλλὰ νόμῳ. i. e. "That right and "wrong did not "conſiſt in na- "ture, but in "law." Diog. Laertius, lib. 2. num. 16.

with regard to ſimilar ſubſtances and touching the intellect, that united them together. Anaxagoræ ſucceſſit auditor ejus Archelaus; etiam ipſe de particulis inter ſe diſſimilibus, quibus ſingula quæque fierent, ita omnia conſtare putavit, ut ineſſe etiam mentem diceret, quæ corpora diſſimilia, id eſt illas particulas conjungendo & diſſipando ageret omnia (31). i. e. "To Anaxagoras ſuc-(31) Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. See alſo Clem. Alexand. in Protr. p. 43.
"ceeded his Diſciple Archelaus: he likewiſe thought that "every thing conſiſted of particles diſagreeing amongſt "themſelves, of which all things were made, in ſuch "a manner that he ſaid there was in them a mind "which actuated the diſſimilar bodies, that is by "conjoining and ſeparating thoſe particles." I believe St. Auſtin is in the right; for Simplicius obſerves, that Archelaus, endeavouring to clear up ſomething that was particular to him, made no ſcruple to advance the ſame principles with Anaxagoras, namely,
(32) Simpl. in Librum Phyſic. Ariſtot. an infinity of ſimilar particles (32). There is great probability that with regard to the firſt formation of animals they followed the ſame Hypotheſis. We have ſeen what was the ſentiment of Archelaus, and this is the opinion of Anaxagoras: ζῶα γενέσθαι ἐξ ὑγροῦ καὶ θερμοῦ καὶ γαίας, ὕστερον δὲ ἐξ ἀλλήλων (33); i. e. "That
(53) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 9.
"animals firſt aroſe from moiſture and heat and earth, "and that afterwards they were generated out of one "another." Since they admitted an intelligence, which drew theſe Homœomeriæ from the confuſion in which they were, we muſt believe that they made it preſide over the production of animals; for if there be any creature whoſe formation has need to be directed by a ſpirit, it is certainly the machine of an animal. If they did what I am ſuppoſing, they have advanced nothing on this head, which may not be reconciled with the Holy Scripture; but if they believed, as many others, that in the beginning men were born of the earth, by the ſole power of moiſture and heat, &c. they have advanced the moſt ridiculous piece of abſurdity in the world, and would be at a loſs how to get clear of this queſtion; how comes it to paſs that in ſucceeding times there have been no inſtances of men being born in the ſame manner? That queſtion would not embarraſs them at all in the other caſe, becauſe they might anſwer, as Chriſtians would do, that the intelligence having once formed animals, endowed with organs or parts neceſſary for propagation, would produce no more itſelf, the conſervation of the ſpecies being ſufficiently provided for by that deſire of coition, which is implanted both in the males and females.

[C] It will be proper to ſay ſomething of a Poet that was called ARCHELAUS.] He wrote a treatiſe on the particular Nature of things; that is to ſay, their particularities, or the properties which diſtinguiſh them. The quotation we have of it does not ſuffer us to doubt that this was the true character of that writing. Diogenes Laertius has deſcribed it in theſe words, ὁ τὰ ἰδιοφυῆ ποιήσας (34), qui quæ cuique rei natura ſunt
(34) Diog. Laertius, l. 2. n. 17.
propria, verſu prodidit; i. e. "who has explained in "verſe thoſe properties, that are naturally peculiar to "any thing." Caſaubon ſhould not have cenſured that Latin tranſlation, under a pretence, that according to the teſtimony of Antigonus Caryſtius, this book of Archelaus was a collection of Epigrams, wherein the extraordinary and marvellous qualities of things were (35) Caſaub. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 17.
related, τὰ παράδοξα, τὰ θαυμάσια (35); for that may agree with the title that is given by Diogenes Laertius; and upon the whole, the tranſlator ought not to have given that title a leſs general ſignification than what the Greek term imports. Voſſius was not of the ſame mind with Caſaubon, ſince he has tranſlated the words of Diogenes Laertius, by qui carmen fecit (36) Voſſius, de Hiſtoricis Græcis, lib. 3. p. 329.
de propriâ cujuſque rei naturâ (36). The ſenſe which he gives theſe words ſeems to me very juſt: he underſtands thereby that Archelaus had made an enquiry into ſuch things as had ſome peculiarity in their nature, quæ propriæ ac ſingularis naturæ ſunt, as that Goats are never free from a fever, and that they breathe by the ears, and not by the noſtrils. Auribus capras ſpirare, non naribus, nec unquam febri carere, Archelaus auctor eſt (37). Athenæus has quoted one Archelaus ἐν τοῖς ἰδιοφύοις, and has given him the ſurname of the Cherſoneſian (38). Dalechampius has very ill tranſlated that Greek by ſua propriaque ſtirpe genitis (39); and I am ſurprized that Voſſius has not uſed in this paſſage the ſame words that he did in Diogenes Laertius: he makes uſe of theſe de proprietate naturæ (40); and yet he is of opinion that Athenæus and Diogenes Laertius ſpoke of the ſame Author. That is very probable, although Antigonus Caryſtius gives out Egypt to be the country of that Archelaus, who made the Epigrams upon the extraordinary properties of certain things, and who addreſſed them to Ptolemy. It is very poſſible that one Archelaus a native of Cherſoneſus paſſed for an Egyptian: It is ſufficient for it, that he reſided a long time in Egypt (41). Mr. Menage, who maintains that inſtead of ἰδιοφυῆ it ſhould be read in Diogenes Laertius διφυῆ (42) does not ſeem to me to be in the right. He builds upon this, that the Scholiaſt of Nicander cites Archelaus ἐν τοῖς Διφυέσι, that is to ſay, in his book upon thoſe things, that are of a doubtful nature. The foundation is not good; for as the work of Archelaus was not confined to that kind of ſingularities, which diſtinguiſh amphibious animals, or thoſe animals which are produced from the copulation of a male and female of different ſpecies, it would be unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that the Author made uſe of a title too determinate. It would be much better, either to correct the Scholiaſt by Diogenes Laertius, or to ſay that Archelaus, having divided his work into ſeveral treatiſes, gave a particular treatiſe; that of διφυῆ, for example, to the Epigrams where he ſpoke of amphibious creatures. Upon the ſame foot, one might believe, that they who quote Archelaus lib. 1. περὶ ποταμῶν, of Rivers (43), lib. 1. περὶ λίθων, of Stones (44), quote the parts of that work, whoſe general title was ἰδιοφυῆ; but I ſhould be more inclinable to ſay that it relates to quite another Archelaus. I do not paſs the ſame judgment upon the quotations of Artemidorus (45). I am perſuaded that they belong to the Author of ἰδιοφυῆ.

(37) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 50.
(38) Athen. l. 9. cap. ult. p. 409.
(39) Dalechamp, Annot. in Athen. p. 766. Father Hardouin in his Index Auctor. Plinii, p. 97. tranſlates the words of Athenæus by de rebus quæ ſingulis in locis propria gignuntur.
(40) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 3. pag. 319.
(41) There have been inſtances of ſuch things. See Strabo, book 14. pag. 451.
(42) Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 17.

Let us here admire the inconſtancy of the memory. Voſſius, in his work of the Greek Hiſtorians, ſpeaks learnedly of this Author: he tells us what he has found of him in Varro, in Pliny, in Athenæus, in Artemidorus, in Antigonus Caryſtius, &c. but he remembred no more of that when he afterward compoſed his treatiſe on the Greek Poets. One may there read thus: Idem (Archelaus Phyſicus) aut ait Suidas, συνίταξε φυσιολογίαν *. Id ſic Lilius Gyraldus vertit in tertio Dialogo de Poetis †: quæ naturæ propria ſunt, multis verſibus collegit. Itaque & Archelaum inter Poetas recenſet. Sed addit Poetam Phyſicum eſſe alium ab Socratis magiſtro. At unde adſtruat non video. Nam Suidas clarè ait φυσιολογίαν conſcriptam ab Archelao Phyſico, Socratis magiſtro. Imò nec video, unde colligat, quempiam Archelaum carmine ſcripſiſſe de rerum natura. Saltem ex verbo συνέταξεν, quo Suidas utitur, id colligi nequit. Et Laertius cum dicat tres præterea Archelaos fuiſſe, non tamen Poetam in iis memorat (46). i. e. "The ſame per-(46) Voſſ. de Poet. Græcis, pag. 34.
"ſon (Archelaus the Naturaliſt) as Suidas ſays, συνέταξε φυσιολογίαν. Lilius Gyraldus tranſlates that "paſſage in the third Dialogue concerning the Poets "thus: He comprized in a great many verſes, ſuch "things as are proper to nature. He therefore reckons "Archelaus amongſt the Poets. But he adds, that "the philoſophical Poet was a different perſon from "him that was the maſter of Socrates. But I don't "ſee from whence he infers that. For Suidas plainly "ſays, that the φυσιολογία was written by Archelaus "the Naturaliſt, who was Socrates's maſter. Nor do "I ſee, from whence he gathers, that any Archelaus "wrote in verſe upon the Nature of things. At "leaſt it cannot be gathered from the word συνέτα-"ξεν, which Suidas makes uſe of. And tho' Laer-"tius ſays that there were beſides three Archelaus's, "yet he does not reckon a Poet among them."

(43) Stobæus does it Serm. I. de Morbis, & moleſtiarum in eis Solutione. Plut. de Flumin. pag. 1148, quotes the 13th book of Archelaus περὶ ποταμῶν.
(44) Plutarch does it, de Flumin. p. 1153.
(45) Artemidorus, de Somn. lib. 4. cap. 24.
* Compoſuit Philoſophiam; i. e. Compoſed a Treatiſe of Philoſophy.
† Pag. 108.

Obſerve

of him, but he contents himſelf with preſerving to us the title of a work of his compoſing.

(47) Giraldus has tranſlated them, Quæ naturæ propria ſunt, multis verſibus collegit. That verſion is not at all better than thoſe that have been above recited, citation (39).

(48) Colomeſius, Not. in Gyrald. de Poetis, pag. 147. edit. Operum Gyraldi, ann. 1696.

Obſerve here a very learned man, who imagines, I, that Giraldus had in his eye the Greek words of Suidas, and not thoſe of Diogenes Laertius, ὁ τὰ ἰδιοφυῆ ποιήσας (47): II, That there was no occaſion to acknowledge a Poet Archelaus, who was a different perſon from the Naturaliſt: III, nor to ſuppoſe that one Archelaus made verſes upon the Nature of things: IV, that Diogenes Laertius has made no mention of one Archelaus that did make verſes. All this is enough to ſurprize one, to conſider it ſimply; but it is ten times worſe when one compares it with page 329 of the book de Hiſtoricis Græcis. Colomeſius has ſet right the firſt of Voſſius's four miſtakes, and has ſaid ſeveral good things beſide (48); but he is miſtaken in ſuppoſing that the words of Plutarch in the Life of Cimon relate to Archelaus the Poet: they mean the Naturaliſt, whoſe diſciple Socrates was. He might have criticiſed Giraldus, who believed that Archelaus, Author of the ἰδιοφυῆ, was a Philoſopher. Moreri ſays ſo too. It is without foundation; for one that makes collections of the ſingular and wonderful properties of animals, or metals, &c. may well enough be called a Natural Hiſtorian; but not a Natural Philoſopher, at leaſt if he does not join to the facts the reaſon of thoſe facts, and the diſcuſſion of their cauſes. That is a thing that the Poet Archelaus is not found to have practiſed. Moreri tells us, that Diogenes Laertius quotes him often. We ought rather to ſay that he does not quote him at all.

ARCHELAUS I (a), King of Macedon, natural ſon of King Perdiccas, aſcended the throne, and maintained himſelf in it, by great crimes. His mother was ſervant to Alcetas, the brother of Perdiccas [A]; ſo that according to the Laws (b), he ought to have been a ſervant of Alcetas; but inſtead of the ſubmiſſion which he owed him, he cauſed him to be treacherouſly murdered. He enticed him to his houſe, and promiſed to reſtore to him the crown that Perdiccas had deprived him of; he gave him a great entertainment; and having made him drunk, he got him carried by night out of the city in a chariot, and gave orders to have him ſlain. Alexander, the ſon of Alcetas, was ſerved in the ſame manner; he was put into the ſame chariot drunk as his father, and killed with him. A little while after, Archelaus had his brother murdered, who was but ſeven years old, and was the legitimate ſon of Perdiccas and Cleopatra. He threw him into a well, and made Cleopatra believe that the child fell into it, as he was chaſing a gooſe (c). He applied himſelf carefully to ſuch things as might make Macedon formidable; for he fortified ſeveral places, he made great roads, he collected great ſtores of arms and horſes, and every thing neceſſary for war; and in all the preparations of that kind he ſurpaſs'd the Kings his predeceſſors (d). He bethought himſelf of one thing which they had never practiſed; which is that he equipped fleets, and fought ſea-fights (e). He was a lover of Letters and the polite Sciences [B]; and he had in his houſe the greateſt Poets, the moſt famous Painters, and the beſt Muſicians (f). He was at a great expence to have his houſe painted by Zeuxis [C]; and without doubt it vexed him that Socrates, whom he endeavoured to get to his court, would not go thither [D]. The latter could have taught him not to be afraid of Eclipſes; and he had great need to be ſet right upon that head (g). We have (a) Note there are ſome people, who acknowledge but one Archelaus among the Kings of Macedon.

(b) See the note [A].

(c) Extracted from the Gorgias of Plato, p. 321.

(d) Thucydides, lib. 2. p. 142.

(e) Solinus, c. 9.

(f) See the note [C].

(g) See the note [D].

[A] His mother was ſervant to Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas (1).] Ælian calls her Simicha (2): but, ſince Archelaus was the ſon of the King of Macedon, it ſhould not be ſaid, that he was raiſed to the throne from the condition of a goat-herd. And yet Diogenes the Cynic tells us that in a ſpeech of Dion Chryſoſtom. Αἰτώλος ἦν Ἀρχέλαος (3). i. e. "Archelaus was a Goat-herd." Obſerve theſe words of Plato, which tell us what Archelaus ought to have been according to the Laws: Κατὰ μὲν τὸ δίκαιον δοῦλος ἦν Ἀλκέτᾳ, καὶ εἰ ἐβούλετο τὰ δίκαια ποιῶν ἐδούλευσεν ἂν Ἀλκέτᾳ (4). i. e. "By the courſe of law he was ſervant to Alcetas, and "on that ſcore if he had acted juſtly he would have "ſerved Alcetas.

(1) Plato, in Gorgia, p. 321.
(2) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 43.
(3) Dio Chryſoſt. Orat. 4. de Regno.
(4) Plato in Gorgia, p. 321.

[B] He was a lover of Letters and polite Sciences.] Solinus ſays ſo (5). I have cited his words in the note [N] on the article of EURIPIDES, at the beginning. Add to it this paſſage of Ælian. Ἦν δὲ ἅμα ὁ Ἀρχέλαος ἐρωτικὸς οὐχ ἧττον ἢ καὶ φιλόμουσος (6). i. e. "But Archelaus was not leſs ſtudious of Love "than he was of Letters."

(5) Solinus, c. 9.
(6) Ælian, Var. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 21.

[C] He had his houſe painted by Zeuxis.] Socrates took occaſion to cenſure that: he ſaid that the Prince, who had been at ſuch expences to embelliſh his palace, had taken no pains to adorn his mind. We know well enough, adds he, what numbers of ſtrangers are fond of taking a journey into Macedonia, to ſee the Prince's houſe; but that no body goes thither to ſee him, except ſuch as he engages by preſents. But that is a thing that has no effect upon good men (7). I believe that he did not take much pains to cure himſelf of his lewdneſs by cultivating the Muſes; but I am ſure that with regard to the ornaments of the mind, his progreſs was very conſiderable. It ſhould ſeem likewiſe, from a witty ſaying of his, that he may be concluded to have made ſome progreſs in practical Morality. He was one day inſtigated againſt a perſon, who had thrown ſome water upon him. It is not me, that he has wetted, anſwered Archelaus, he has wetted the perſon that he took me for (8). No Philoſopher reaſoning upon the allowances of a miſtaken conſcience, ever ſaid any thing more rational. All Princes ſhould thus treat involuntary faults, if themſelves were reaſonable, or if the publick intereſt could allow, that in practice things might be regulated according to the dictates of reaſon (9). Let us drop that, and return to Socrates. By the words, which I quoted, he declared ſeveral perſons of genius to be diſhoneſt men, who would not have gone to Macedonia but for the ſake of Archelaus. Did Euripides go thither for any other reaſon (10)? The famous Agathon, that illuſtrious Poet, and his admirer Pauſanias and ſo many others, did not they go thither merely on the ſame account? Οὗτος ὁ Ἀγάθων —— Ἀρχελάῳ τῷ βασιλεῖ μέχρι τελευτῆς μετὰ ἄλλων πολλῶν συνῆν ἐν Μακεδονίᾳ (11). i. e. "This "Agathon —— was with Archelaus King of Mace-"donia, as were ſeveral others, as long as he lived."

(7) Ex Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 14. cap. 17.

(8) Plutarch. in Apophthegmat. p. 177.

(9) See in the New Letters againſt the Hiſtory of Calviniſm by Maimbourg thoſe which treat of a miſtaken conſcience.

(10) Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 21.

(11) Schol. Ariſtoph. in Ranas.

[D] Socrates, whom he endeavoured to get to his court, would not go thither.] There were two other perſons whom that Philoſopher treated after the ſame manner: he would neither go to ſee them nor accept of their preſents. Ὑπερεφρόνησε δὲ καὶ Ἀρχελάου τοῦ Μακεδόνος, καὶ Σκόπα τοῦ Κρανωνίου καὶ Εὐρυλόχου τοῦ Λαρισσαίου μήτε χρήματα προσίμενος αὐτῶν, μήτε παρ' αὐτοὺς ἀπιὼν (12). i. e. "He moreover deſpiſed "Archelaus the Macedonian, and Scopas the Crannonian, and Eurylochus the Lariſſean, with great cou-"rage, ſince he neither accepted of the money, "which they ſent him, nor would go to them." Seneca has preſerved to us the excuſe that Socrates made uſe of to Archelaus: "I will not, ſays he, go "ſee a man from whom I might receive favours, with-"out being able to return the like." Archelaus rex Socratem rogavit ut ad ſe veniret; dixiſſe Socrates traditur,

(12) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 25.

have elſewhere (b) taken notice of the regard he had for Euripides. His liberality to perſons of abilities was moderate; but that might be occaſioned by his finding them too forward in aſking [E]. He inſtituted ſacrifices and ſtage-plays in honour of Jupiter and the Muſes; the celebration of them laſted nine days, a day being allotted to each Muſe (i). He ſent chariots with four horſes, which bore away the prize at the Olympic and the Pythian Games (k). It is agreed that he was ſlain; but the circumſtances of his death, and the duration of his reign are not ſettled [F]. Scaliger himſelf has found ſo much obſcurity

(b) In the article of EURIPIDES, notes [N], [O], [P], &c.

(i) Diod. Siculus, lib. 17. cap. 16.

(k) Solin. cap. 9.

ditur, 'nolle ſe ad eum venire, à quo acciperet beneficia, cum reddere illi paria non poſſet (13). That anſwer of Socrates has been related by Marcus Aurelius, according to the ſame meaning (14); but Ariſtotle relates it in terms that are not at all philoſophical. He ſuppoſes that Socrates anſwered, that they, who cannot return a favour, receive as great an affront as they that cannot return an injury. Ὑβρει ἔφη εἶναι τὸ μὴ δύνασθαι ἀμύνασθαι ὁμοίως, ᾧ παθόντα ὥσπερ καὶ κακῶς (15). That maxim ſuppoſes that we ought to revenge our ſelves of thoſe that injure us: it therefore is not worthy the morality of a Philoſopher, eſpecially ſuch a Philoſopher as Socrates. Seneca has expatiated very much to demonſtrate that it was eaſy for that Philoſopher thoroughly to repay Archelaus. He has ſaid, amongſt other things, that the favours of that Monarch would not have been equal in value to the inſtruction he would have received about the cauſe of eclipſes, and which would have prevented his relapſing into that terror which was obſerved in him one day when the Sun was eclipſed. He had ſhut up his palace cloſe; he had cauſed his ſon to be ſhaved. Quid tantum erat accepturus (Socrates) quantum dabat, ſi — regem in luce media errantem, ad rerum naturam admiſiſſet, uſque eo ejus ignarum, ut quo die ſolis defectio fuit regiam clauderet, & filium (quod in luctu ac rebus adverſis moris eſt) tonderet? Quantum fuiſſet beneficium, ſi timentem è latebris ſuis extraxiſſet, & bonam animum habere juſſiſſet, dicens: "Non eſt iſta "ſolis defectio, ſed deorum ſiderum coitus, cum luna hu-" miliore currens via, infra ipſum ſolem, orbem ſuum po-" ſuit, & illum objectu ſui abſcondit (16)." i. e. "What "thing ſo great could he (Socrates) receive as he gave, "if he had unfolded the nature of things to the King, "who was wandring by day-light, and to that de-"gree ignorant, that on a certain day, when there "was an eclipſe of the Sun, he ſhut up the palace, "and (which is the cuſtom in times of great trouble "and adverſity) he ſhaved his ſon? How great a "benefit would it have been, if he had drawn him "frighted from his lurking place, and had bid him "be of good courage, ſaying: "That is no defect "of the Sun, but only the conjunction of the two "heavenly bodies, when the Moon, paſſing in a "lower ſphere, places her orb beneath the Sun, "and hides him by her interpoſition." Seneca pretends, that Socrates only made uſe of that excuſe by way of Irony (17), and that in reality he refuſed to go to the Macedonian court, only becauſe he was willing fully to preſerve his liberty. Vis ſcire quid verè noluerit? Noluit ire ad voluntariam ſervitutem is, cujus libertatem civitas libera ferre non potuit (18). i. e. "Would you know why he really "refuſed? He, whoſe liberty a free city could not "bear, refuſed to go into voluntary ſlavery." Some ſay that Ariſtophanes wrote his comedy of the Clouds, to gratify a pique that he had againſt Socrates, becauſe Archelaus King of Macedon took more notice of that Philoſopher than of him (19). Note that there is another turn given to the anſwer of Socrates. It is ſaid that he excuſed himſelf from going to the court of Archelaus, becauſe bread was ſo cheap in Athens, and there was plenty of water there (20).

(13) Senec. de Benef. lib. 5. cap. 6. pag. 96.

(14) Marcus Antoninus, τῶν εἰς ἑαυτὸν, lib. 11. Sect. 25. Note he ſuppoſes that it was made to Perdiccas.

(15) Ariſtoteles, Rhetor. lib. 2. cap. 23. p. 445, A.

(16) Senec. de Benef. lib. 5. cap. 6. pag. 96.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) Idem, ibid. p. 95.

(19) Charpentier's Life of Socrates, p. 57. He quotes the tranſlators of Ariſtophanes in Argumento illius Comœdiæ.

(20) Vide Stobæum, Serm. 237.

[E] His liberality to perſons of abilities was moderate—perhaps becauſe they were too forward in aſking.] "Archelaus the King of Macedon ſeemed to be a "little niggardly with regard to gifts and making "preſents, of which Timotheus the Muſician, as he "was ſinging to his lyre, gave him a hint, by re-"peating and dwelling upon this little ſneer, That "paltry pelf too highly you commend: But Archelaus "ſmartly and with a good grace inſtantly replied to "him, But you of asking for it know no end." This ſtory is related by Plutarch (21). In another book he gives us likewiſe the following account. There was formerly a certain perſon, who fancying that nothing was ſo honourable as to aſk and receive, aſked one day at ſupper, of Archelaus the King of Macedon, a golden cup out of which he was drinking. The King commanded his page to carry and give it to Euripides, who was at the table; and turning to the perſon that had asked it, ſaid to him, "For your part you deſerve to ask "and to be refuſed, becauſe you ask; but Euripides is "worthy of the preſent, becauſe he asks for nothing (22)." Perhaps he ſet bounds to his liberality from a principle like that of Charles the ninth (23). But it is more probable that he had the ſame taſte which was remarked in Cardinal Richelieu, who never did any thing for the Poet Mainard, and it was partly becauſe he did not love to be asked for any thing, but was deſirous that he might have the glory of giving from his own meer motion (24).

(21) Plutarch. de Fortunâ Alexandri, lib. 2. pag. 334. I make uſe of Amiot's verſion.

(22) Plut. de Vitioſo Pudore, pag. 531. I make uſe of the ſame tranſlation.

(23) See the article DAURAT, note [F].

(24) Peliſſon, Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. pag. 278.

[F] The circumſtances of his death, and the duration of his reign are not ſettled.] Some ſay that being a hunting he was wounded by his favourite Craterus, and that he died of that wound; and they add that Craterus did it innocently and by accident (25). Others ſay that he was ſlain by ſome conſpirators whom Decamnichus prompted to that parricide (26). Quintus Curtius favours the latter opinion. Quis proavum hujus Alexandrum, ſays he (27), quis deinde Archelaum, quis Perdiccam, occiſos ultus eſt? i. e. "Who hath re-"venged the death of his great grandfather Alex-"ander, or of Archelaus, or Perdiccas, that have been "ſlain?" I ſhall ſay ſomething further on this head in the following note. As to the duration of his reign, ſome writers make it twenty four years (28), others ſixteen (29), others fourteen (30), and ſome others but ſeven (31). The latter opinion ſeems to me to be right: it is that of Diodorus Siculus; and I am aſtoniſhed that Calviſius quotes that hiſtorian, after having ſaid that Archelaus reigned ſixteen years (32). A paſſage of Athenæus wrong underſtood has occaſioned a thouſand diſagreements. We read in the editions of that author, that Pericles and Perdiccas died in the third year of the Peloponneſian war, and that Archelaus immediately aſcended the throne (33). It is impoſſible for Athenæus to ſay ſo; for his deſign is to convict Plato of having committed a blunder; Plato, I ſay, who in the ſame dialogue where he ſuppoſes Archelaus to be King, aſſerts that Pericles had been dead but a little while. It is plain, that he who cenſures him makes himſelf ridiculous, and does not know what he ſays, if he advances what we read in his printed books. Caſaubon is not in the leaſt wrong to think it ſtrange that they who tranſlated Athenæus, did not obſerve ſo viſible an abſurdity, and that they were able to digeſt ſo hard a morſel. Cum hæc clariſſime diſputentur ab Athenæo, quis interpretum ſtomacho non invideat, qui vulgatam loci hujus ſcripturam adeo ὐστομάχως tulerint (34)? i. e. "As theſe things "are very clearly diſcuſſed by Athenæus, who can "help envying the goodneſs of the Tranſlators Sto-"machs, which could digeſt the common reading of "this place ſo eaſily?" For his own part he owns himſelf not able to do it; and notwithſtanding all the manuſcripts, he maintains the tranſcribers of Athenæus have left out a period. He ſeems to me to have hit very happily upon what the author did ſay; which is, that Alexander King of Macedon, who died about the ſame time with Pericles, was ſucceeded by Perdiccas, who reigned till the Archonſhip of Callias, and that Perdiccas dying under that Archonſhip, his throne was filled by Archelaus. Suppoſing that, Athenæus does not criticize Plato's diſcourſe without reaſon; for there was a conſiderable interval betwixt the death of Pericles, and the reign of Archelaus. Obſerve by the by, that Caſaubon has anſwered that cenſure (35); but above all take ſpecial notice that Diodorus Siculus, allowing ſeven years for the reign of Archelaus, places his death under the Archonſhip of Ariſtocrates, the ſecond year of the 95th

(25) Diod. Sicul. lib. 14. cap. 38. I ſhall quote his words in the laſt note.

(26) Ariſt. de Repub. lib. 5. cap. 10. I have quoted his words in the note [N] of the article of EURIPIDES.

(27) Quint. Curtius, lib. 6. cap. 11.

(28) Euſeb. in Chron. num. 1585. Helvicus embraces that opinion.

(29) Calviſius, ad ann. Mundi 3534.

(30) Petav. Rationar. Tempor. Part 2. lib. 2. ſub finem ex Dexippo.

(31) Diod. Sicul. lib. 14. cap. 38.

(32) Calviſ. ad ann. Mundi 3550 p. 156. col. 2.

(33) Athen. lib. 5. cap. 18. pag. 217.

(34) Caſaub. in Athen. pag. 384.

(35) Idem, ibid. pag. 385.

obſcurity thereupon as has led him into groſs errors (l). It is probable that Archelaus had led a laſcivious life, which occaſioned his deſtruction [G]. I ſhall

(l) See the note [F].

95th Olympiad. His reign therefore commenc'd the third year of the 93d Olympiad, when Callias was Archon. It muſt be allowed then that Perdiccas died in the time of the ſame Archon. But amongſt the various opinions, which had prevailed about the duration of Perdiccas's reign, that of Marſyas and Philocorus, which fixed it to three and twenty years, was made choice of by Athenæus in arguing againſt Plato. Therefore he muſt needs have ſuppoſed, that this Perdiccas aſcended the Throne the ſame year that Pericles died, that is to ſay, in the fourth year of the 87th Olympiad. All this ſo ſtrongly confirms the ſentiment of Caſaubon, that inſtead of ſaying his conjecture is probable, it ſhould be aſſerted without ſcruple, that the period which he reſtores was really written by Athenæus: and as it contains twice or thrice the ſame words at the end of a compleat ſentence, it is eaſy to imagine that the tranſcribers omitted it, and that the Readers did not perceive any thing to be wanting. The generality of people only read to be inſtructed without fatiguing themſelves: it is on that account that they are but little ſenſible of faults in reaſoning, when they require ſome attention, or taking a review of what preceded. Upon the whole they content themſelves with ſaying, This is obſcure, I don't underſtand it; but that does not mend the matter, the fault ſtill continues as it was. Critics, and eſpecially critical tranſlators, do not proceed after that faſhion. They take notice of faults in the ſenſe, and conſider how to correct them: they compare the manuſcripts together, they make the beſt uſe they can of their own conjectures. But in this paſſage of Athenæus, as Caſaubon lays it to their charge, they proved very dull.

Scaliger's Mistakes.

Here the great Scaliger will be an inſtance, that the penetration of the moſt learned perſons is ſometimes very much confined. He did not obſerve a viſible error of an author, whom he commented and critiſcized upon, and has uſed that very miſtake for the grounds of a cenſure againſt Diodorus Siculus, on whom he charges words which are only to be found in Athenæus. To make the matter clear; Euſebius has placed three things under the firſt year of the the 87th Olympiad; the death of Perdiccas, the beginning of the reign of Archelaus, and the commencement of the Peloponneſian war. Scaliger lets that paſs, and only obſerves that the firſt year of that war is generally ſuppoſed to be the ſecond year of the 87th Olympiad, becauſe that rupture happening towards the end of Pythodorus's Archonſhip, it had been thought beſt to date it from the Archonſhip of Euthydemus (36) who was Pythodorus's ſucceſſor (37). In obſervance of that method, he allows that the year in which Pericles died was the fourth of the 87th Olympiad, and the third of the Peloponneſian war; and quotes a Greek paſſage, which ſays, that in the ſame year that Pericles died, Perdiccas King of Macedon died, and Archelaus aſcended the throne. He aſcribes this paſſage to Diodorus Siculus; and, upon that foot, he cenſures him for an Anachroniſm of three years. That is by ſuppoſing that Euſebius was neither miſtaken with regard to the death of Perdiccas, nor to the coronation of Archelaus: ſo that he did not know that Thucydides has expreſly remarked, that King Perdiccas was alive in the ſixteenth year of the Peloponneſian war (38). But, further, he did not know that the words which he aſcribes to Diodorus Siculus, are Athenæus's: he did not know that thoſe words of Athenæus are corrupted; he was not aware that they are curtailed, and that they ought to be adjuſted after the manner that Caſaubon has ſettled them. It may be obſerved that Salmaſius took for good chronology, that which places the death of Perdiccas, and the beginning of Archelaus's reign, at the fourth year of the 87th Olympiad (39): he therefore was unacquainted with certain things that Caſaubon could have furniſhed him with; but it is worth the taking particular notice, that one might elude, or even confute, by a favourable interpretation, one point of my criticiſm upon Scaliger. I ſaid that he cenſured Diodorus Siculus, and the reaſon of my ſaying ſo is built upon theſe words of his: Diodoro ergo prochroniſmus fuerit triennii (40). i. e. "Diodorus therefore has made a miſtake of three "years." They follow the Greek paſſage, which is falſly attributed by Scaliger to that Author, and where it is to be found that Perdiccas dying in the third year of the Peloponneſian war, Archelaus ſucceeded him. But becauſe Euſebius aſſerts that Archelaus aſcended the throne the firſt year of the Peloponneſian war, it might be pretended that Scaliger would not ſay any thing elſe, only that the doctrine of Euſebius contains an anachroniſm of the anticipation of three years, according to Diodorus Siculus. If this be his true meaning, he has not blamed the latter hiſtorian; he has been content to keep himſelf in ſuſpence, determining nothing either in the favour of him or of Euſebius. I ſhall be glad to have this kind of recantation obſerved. A Critic who takes the advantage of a doubtful expreſſion, ought not to omit its favourable meaning. He ſhews by that means what can be ſaid for and againſt Authors. He ſupports ſucceſſively the character of an advocate, both for the Plantiff and Defendant.

(36) It anſwers to the 2d year of the 87th Olympiad.

(37) Scaliger, Animadv. in Euſebium, num. 1585, pag. 106.

(38) Thucydides, lib. 6. pag. 341.

(39) Salmaſius, Exercitat. Plin. pag. 156, 157.

(40) Scaliger, Animadv. in Euſebium, num. 1585. p. 106.

[G] It is probable that Archelaus had led a laſcivious life, which occaſioned his deſtruction.] Ariſtotle having ſaid that ſeveral conſpiracies had been formed againſt Kings, on account of their debaucheries, inſtances immediately in the attempt of Crateus (41). That man was not able to bear the diſhonour that Archelaus had done him, in ſatisfying his bruiſh luſt upon him. So that upon occaſion of another offence, which alone would not have been a juſt ground for a conſpiracy, he reſolved to deſtroy his maſter. That other offence was that the King having promiſed him one of his daughters, yet notwithſtanding married the elder to the King of Elimeus, and the younger to the ſon of Amyntas. A political conſideration occaſioned this breach of his word. Finding himſelf embarraſſed with a war that he had made upon Sirras and Arrhabæus, he was deſirous of gaining over the King of Elimeus. And being afraid that the ſon of Amyntas might create him ſome diſturbance, he made him his ſon in law, in hopes that that alliance would preſerve an union betwixt them, and have the ſame effect upon the ſon of Cleopatra. Crateus publickly ſhewed then his reſentment; but the ſource of his hatred aroſe from the injury he received in his perſon. Ἀλλὰ τῆς γὲ ἀλλοτριότητος ὑπῆρχεν ἀρχὴ τὸ βαρέως φέρειν πρὸς τὴν ἀφροδισιαστικὴν χάριν (42). i. e. "But the original "cauſe of his ill will was, that he took heinouſly his "being made ſubſervient to his luſt." Hellanocrates of Lariſſa joined him in this conſpiracy from the like motives; for having given up the flower of his youth to the paſſion of Archelaus, and not finding that it procured him to be recalled from his exile, as that Prince had given him room to hope, he concluded that his perſon had been made uſe of, not from any motives of love, but with deſign to diſgrace him. Διὶ ὕβριν καὶ οὐ δι' ἐρωτικὴν ἐπιθυμίαν φάντο εἶναι τὴν γεγενημένην ὁμιλίαν (43). Obſerve, that Plutarch tells us that Crateus the minion of Archelaus, ſlew that Prince (44). Plato tells us the ſame thing, but without naming that Aſſaſſin and Catamite; but he ſays that the murderer had not made the attempt but to poſſeſs himſelf of the crown, and that it was taken from him three or four days afterwards, by ſome other conſpirators (45). I wonder that Diodorus Siculus has related, in a manner ſo different from this, the death of the King of Macedon, and its conſequences. It is probable that Plato and Ariſtotle, who lived nearer the time and place, where thoſe things happened, knew more of them than he.

(41) Arist. de Repub. lib. 5. cap. 10. p. 305.

(42) Arist. de Repub. lib. 5. cap. 10. p. 305.

(43) Idem, ibid.

(44) Plutarch. in Amatorio, pag. 768, F.

(45) Plato, in Alcibiade poſteriore, p. 453, 454. Æliani Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 9.

I have obſerved ſome faults in Giſanius's commentary on this paſſage of Ariſtotle. I. That writer affirms that Suidas has related in the article of Euripides that Cratevas took away the life of King Archelaus his lover (46). That is not true: Suidas only ſpeaks of Cratevas as of a Poet, who, in concert with Arrideus, another Poet, contrived the death of Euripides. II. Inſtead of ſaying that Plutarch in Alcibiade poſteriore, & Plato in Commentario de rebus amatoriis, have ſpoken of the murder of Archelaus (47), he ſhould aſcribe to Plato the Alcibiades poſterior, and to Plutarch the Commentary de rebus amatoriis. III. It is not true, (46) Obertus Giſan. in cap. 10. lib. 5. Politic. Ariſtot. p. 669.

(47) Idem, ibid.

ſhall have ſome obſervations to make againſt Moreri [H].

true, that Thucydides, in the IVth Book, mentions the war of Archelaus againſt Sirras and Arrhibæus (48): He only ſpeaks of a war which King Perdiccas and Braſidas made with Arrhibæus King of the Lynceſtian Macedonians. IV. It is falſe that Suidas has placed Arrhabæus in the number of the conſpirators againſt the life of Archelaus; he only ſays that the Poet Crateyas was ſeconded by another Poet called Arrideus to deſtroy Euripides. V. He ſhould not ſay the King of Elibeus (49), but the King of Elimeus, Archelaus's firſt ſon in law.

(48) De hoc bello Archelai adverſum Sirram & Arribæum. videatur Thucyd. lib. 4. i. e. "Concerning this "war of Archelaus againſt "Sirras and Arribæus" ſee Thucydides B. 4. Giſanius in Politic. Ariſtot. lib. 5. cap. 10. pag. 669.

(49) Idem, ibid.

[H] Here are ſome obſervations againſt Moreri.] I. It is falſe that Archelaus ſucceeded Perdiccas in the year of the world 3641; for, according to Moreri, that year of the world anſwers to the 351 year of Rome. But that year of Rome anſwers to the ſecond year of the 94th Olympiad; and we have ſeen above, that, according to Diodorus Siculus, Archelaus muſt have begun to reign the third year of the 93d Olympiad. II. It is not true that Juſtin ſpeaks of our Archelaus. He of whom he ſpeaks was the uncle of Alexander the Great, and had never been King. There is no occaſion therefore to be ſurprized, that he ſays nothing about the time of his reign. III. It is not true, that he places him amongſt the ſons which Perdiccas had by Euridice: he places him amongſt the ſons of Amyntas and Gygea; of Amyntas, I ſay, the father of Philip, and grandfather of Alexander the Great. IV. Neither what Juſtin has ſaid, nor what he has forgot, are ſigns that Archelaus the grandfather has been confounded with Archelaus, the grandſon; for he only ſpeaks of one Archelaus who was not the grandſon of ours. V. It is a ſtrange blunder, to place the death of our Archelaus under the 117th Olympiad, and to make that Olympiad agree with the 363d year of Rome. VI. He ſhould not have aſſerted that the Archelaus, who reigned after Oreſtes, was his ſon, and the grandſon of Archelaus; for beſides that Euſebius is but little followed with regard to that ſecond Archelaus, he does not ſet down any degree of kindred. What follows, concerns Moreri's ſupplement. It is there found that Socrates would not come near Archelaus, becauſe of his tyranny and inhumanity. Let us reckon that for a VIIth overſight; for we have ſeen before (50), that that was not the reaſon which prevented that Philoſopher from going to the Macedonian Court. The VIII fault is the charging Thucydides, and Diodorus Siculus, with having ſaid, that Euripides being deſired to compoſe a tragedy upon the ſubject of Archelaus, excuſed himſelf from it, that he might not repreſent the cruelties of that tyrant. It is very certain that neither Thucydides, nor Diodorus Siculus ſay any thing like it; and I am of opinion that no good Author amongſt the Ancients has mentioned it. Does a Prince deſire to be the ſubject of tragedies himſelf? Cannot a Court Poet write ſuch tragedies as are agreeable to his maſter, by paſſing over the cruelties of that maſter? IX. The favourite, who ſlew Archelaus, is called Craterus in Diodorus Siculus (51): he ought therefore to call him by that name, and not by Crateus or Cratevas, ſince no body but Diodorus Siculus is quoted for it. X. The ſame reaſon makes me maintain that it ſhould not be declared that he formed a conſpiracy againſt Archelaus, and ſlew him, to be revenged of him for the breach of his word. The continuator of Moreri ſays, that Archelaus promiſed his daughter to that favourite, and gave her to another. Since he only quotes Thucydides, and Diodorus Siculus, the former of whom has not ſaid a word about that, and the latter has related that the favourite wounded his maſter by miſchance (52), he deſerves a little cenſure; for I agree that if he had quoted Ariſtotle, he had been right enough. See the preceding note. XI. Diodorus, whom he quotes, calls him, who reign'd after Archelaus, Oreſtes (53): Why then are we juſt now told that this Prince had a ſon of the ſame name who ſucceeded him? XII. This Hiſtorian adds, that Oreſtes was ſtill a child, and that he was ſlain by his tutor Æropes, who reigned afterwards ſix years. Why then is he made to ſay that Archelaus the ſecond, ſon of Archelaus the firſt, ſucceeded his father, and reigned but four years, and was ſlain in hunting by Craterus one of his confidents, who afterwards ſeized upon the crown, but enjoyed it but three days? As many faults as words.

(50) In the note [G].

(51) Lib. 14. cap. 38.

(52) Ἀρχέλαος ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐν τινι κυνηγίᾳ ἀκουσίως ὑπὸ Κρατεροῦ τοῦ ἡρωμένου. i. e. "King Archelaus being a "hunting was "undeſignedly "wounded by "Craterus, "whom he "highly eſteem-"ed." Diod. Siculus, lib. 14. cap. 38.

(53) Idem, ibid.

ARCHELAUS King of Cappadocia, in the time of Auguſtus, was the great grandſon of ARCHELAUS, a Cappadocian by country (a), General of Mithridates's army in Greece againſt Sylla. That General, who had ſo much ſignalized himſelf at the defence of the Pireum (b), in the ſecond war left Mithridates's party, and took that of the Romans. He left a ſon called as well as himſelf ARCHELAUS, who, upon the news that the Romans were going to attack the Parthians, joined Gabinius Governor of Syria, to take part in that expedition (c). The Senate altered their reſolution: Gabinius's army was deſtined to the reſtoration of the King of Egypt (d), who had implored the aſſiſtance of the Romans, to recover his crown from his own daughter Berenice. Archelaus accompanied Gabinius in that war, but left him to go into Alexandria, where he married Berenice [A]. He did not long poſſeſs the crown which he got by that marriage; for he loſt his life ſix months after (e), in a battle againſt the forces of Gabinius, in the year of Rome 698 [B]. He had obtained of Pompey a very honourable poſt [C]; it was the Pontificate of Comana in Cappadocia (f). His ſon Archelaus poſſeſſed it after him (g), till Cæſar took it from him in the year of Rome 707, to give it to another [D]. We

(a) Plutarch. in Sylla, p. 466. C.

(b) Appian in Mithridat. See the laſt note.

(c) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 384; and lib. 17. pag. 547. Dion, l. 39.

(d) His name was Ptolomæus Auletes.

(e) Strabo, l. 17. p. 547.

(f) Idem, lib. 12. pag. 384.

(g) Idem, ibid.

[A] He married Berenice.] We ſhall make an article of this Princeſs, where we ſhall examine whether Father Noris ought to have ſaid that ſhe drew in Archelaus by promiſing him marriage.

[B] He loſt his life in a battle againſt the forces of Gabinius, in the year of Rome 698.] This does not agree with the 17th book of Strabo, where we read, that Ptolemy having been reſettled in his Kingdom, put to death his daughter and ſon-in-law Archelaus. I ſhall demonſtrate in the article of BERENICE, that Strabo is miſtaken there, and that he has even contradicted himſelf. We may take it for a certainty, that theſe words of Moreri are a miſtake: Ptolemy having been re-eſtabliſhed in 699, put to death Archelaus and Berenice.

[C] He obtained of Pompey a very honourable poſt.] Father Noris pretends that the Pontiff of Comana was Sovereign of the place. Hunc Archelaum, ſays he (1), Pompeius ſacerdotem Bellonæ ac Comanorum Principem (utraque enim dignitas unà eidemque conferebatur) conſtituerat, cuivis Dynaſtæ parem opibus, ex Appione in Mithridat. p. 252. i. e. "Pompey conſtituted this "Archelaus, who was equal in wealth to any Prince, "Prieſt of Bellona and Prince of the Comani; for both "the dignities were conferred together upon the ſame "perſon." Appian. Mithr. p. 252. We ſhall examine in another place if he be in the right.

(1) Noris, Cenotaph. Piſana, pag. 255.

(2) In the article COMANA.

[D] Cæſar took that dignity from the ſon of Archelaus, to give it to another.] Hirtius relates that Cæſar diſpoſed of this benefice in favour of Nicomedes, who alledged very juſt pretenſions. Id homini nobiliſſimo Nicomedi Bithynio adjudicavit, qui regio Cappadocum genere ortus, propter adverſam fortunam majorum ſuorum mutationemque generis jure minimè dubio, vetuſtate tamen intermiſſo, ſacerdotium id repetebat (3). i. e. "He adjudged it to Nicomedes a noble Bythinian, "who being ſprung from the royal family of Cappadocia, endeavoured to recover that Prieſthood, "having

(3) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandrino, p. 416.

We are in the dark as to the reſt of his adventures; but it appears that he married a very fine woman, named Glaphyra, and that he had by her two ſons, whereof one was called Siſinna, and the other Archelaus. The former diſputed the Kingdom of Cappadocia with Ariarathes, who was in poſſeſſion of it. Mark Anthony was the arbitrator of this difference, in the year of Rome 713, and decided it agreeably to the wiſhes of Siſinna (b). The fair ſex had too ſo much power over him, and Glaphyra was ſo very fine a woman, that the proceſs could not but take ſuch a turn. There are ſome Hiſtorians who treat her as a courtezan (i); that is a way to give us a good notion why Mark Anthony paſſed ſo favourable a judgment for Siſinna; but whatever probability there may be in this ſcandal, it might not be impoſſible but that the friendſhip of Mark Anthony for this Archelaus, who married Berenice (k), was his motive. It is not known what became of Siſinna; we only know that Ariarathes reaſcended the throne of Cappadocia; for Mark Anthony was obliged to drive him thence in the 718th year of Rome, and then he conferred that Kingdom upon Archelaus the other ſon of Glaphyra (l). This is he who appears at the head of this article. He became very powerful (m), and he teſtified his gratitude to Mark Anthony his benefactor, by furniſhing him with good troops during the war at Actium (n). He was ſo happy, that it occaſioned no reſentment from Auguſtus againſt him; he was left in the poſſeſſion of Cappadocia, and he was almoſt the only one that received the like favour (o). He aſſiſted Tiberius in the year 734, to reeſtabliſh Tigranes in Armenia (p), and he obtained of Auguſtus the Leſſer Armenia, and good part of Cilicia (q). He fixed his reſidence in the Iſland of Eleuſa [E], near the coaſt of Cilicia; and having married Pythodoris, the widow of Polemon King of Pontus, he conſiderably encreaſed his power; for the ſons of Polemon being but children, he had undoubtedly the adminiſtration of their Kingdom jointly with their mother [F]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a ſignal manner in making his court to Caius Cæſar, who was ſent into the Eaſt by his grandfather Auguſtus (r). That proved very fatal to him in the conſequence [G]; for Tiberius remembring that he had received no civility from him during his ſtay at Rhodes, and that on the contrary Caius Cæſar had received a great many honours from him, was reſolved to be revenged as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf maſter of Rome;

(b) Appian. lib. 5. Belli Civilis, pag. 675.

(i) See the article GLAPHYRA.

(k) Plutarchus, in Antonio, pag. 917.

(l) Dio, lib. 49. p. 469.

(m) See the note [L] towards the end.

(n) Plutarch. in Antonio, p. 944.

(o) Dio, lib. 51. initio.

(p) Joſeph. Ant. lib. 15. cap. 5.

(q) Dio, lib. 54. ad annum 734. See alſo Strabo, lib. 12. p. 368, and 382; and lib. 14. p. 461.

(r) In the year of Rome 753.

" having a title no ways dubious, tho' on account " of the ill fortune of his anceſtors and his change of " country, it had been a conſiderable time diſconti- " nued." Father Noris aſſerts, that Cæſar conferred that dignity upon Lycomedes, after having vanquiſhed Pharnaces; but all who ſhall conſult Hirtius will eaſily ſee that it was before the battle. As to the name of Lycomedes, it may be ſeen in the editions of Strabo (4). It is likewiſe certain that we find in Dion, that one Lycomedes was ſtript of his poſſeſſions by Auguſtus after the defeat of Mark Anthony (5), and that he might very well be the perſon whom Cæſar raiſed to the Pontificate of Comana; for he reigned in part of Cappadocia. Every one muſt do as he pleaſes in this caſe. The epithet of Bithynian, which Hirtius has made uſe of, favours rather the reading of Nicomedes (6), than that of Lycomedes.

(4) Lib. 12. pag. 384.

(5) Dion, lib. 51. init.

(6) It is that of the editions of Appian in Mithridat. towards the end.

[E] He fixed his reſidence in the Iſland of Eleuſa.] That is what Strabo and Joſephus tells. Poſt Corycum Eleuſa inſula eſt continenti propinqua. Eam Archelaus condidit, ac regiam ſibi fecit, cum totam aſperam Ciliciam excepta Seleucia eſſet nactus. i. e. " Beyond " Corycus lies Eleuſa, an iſland near the continent. " Archelaus built it and made himſelf a palace, when " he had got all the rocky Cilicia except Seleucia (7)." Joſephus remarks that Herod, having arrived at Eleuſa in Cilicia, found there Archelaus King of Cappadocia (8). It was thither that the Meſſengers of Herod were ordered to carry the letter, which he wrote to Archelaus (9). That Hiſtorian obſerves that Eleuſa was called Sebaſte (10). Might it not be Archelaus, who, to make his court to Auguſtus, had made that alteration of the name?

(7) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 461.

(8) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 16. c. 8.

(9) Idem, ibid. cap. 16.

(10) Idem, ibid. cap 8.

[F] He had undoubtedly the adminiſtration of the Kingdom of Pontus.] Father Noris poſitively affirms it (11). I chuſe rather to make uſe of an expreſſion, that ſignified, not that it was found to have been ſo in ancient books; but that it was agreeable to reaſon to ſuppoſe it probable. What inclined me to make uſe of this little caution was, that I obſerve that Strabo ſays nothing farther about it than that Pithodoris dwelt with her huſband Archelaus as long as he lived. Αὐτὴ δὲ συνώκησεν Ἀρχελάῳ, καὶ συνέμεινεν ἐκείνῳ μέχρι τέλους (12). She underſtood the art of government: therefore it might not be impoſſible that ſhe determined to rule alone the Dominions of her children. Γύνη σώφρων καὶ δυναμένη προϊσασθαι πραγμάτων (13). i. e. " A prudent woman and one that " knew how to preſide over affairs."

(11) Noris, Cenotaph. Piſana, p. 227. He quotes no body.

(12) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 383.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 388.

[G] The pains he took about C. Cæſar became very fatal to him in the conſequence.] I have already remarked more than once, that ſuch a perſon as we deſpiſe is deſtined by Providence to great fortune (14). Unhappy thoſe then, who formerly have deſpiſed him. There are few perſons ſo equitable as Lewis XII, who uſed to ſay that the King of France ought not to revenge the injuries done to the Duke of Orleans. Our Archelaus acted ſuitably to the rules of Politicks; he knew that Auguſtus tenderly loved his grandſon, and that in all likelihood that young Prince was to ſucceed his grandfather. Tiberius, in the Iſland of Rhodes, was in a kind of diſgrace, which no ways promiſed him the Empire. Archelaus thought that he ſhould run no riſque in neglecting him, and it was even hinted to him that he would expoſe himſelf by cultivating his acquaintance. He believed that all the honours which he paid to Caius Cæſar, would be a certain baſis for rewards and kindneſſes during his whole life. He was miſtaken: he was not ſufficiently aware of the ability of Livia to clear the way for her ſon to the throne. Caius and his brother did not live long; of which in all appearance ſhe knew the reaſon. After all, it is the beſt politicks generally to be complaiſant, even when they are in diſgrace, to all ſuch as one ſees in a way of coming to great power (15). Let us produce our authorities, which tell us of Tiberius's reſentment. Rex Archelaus, ſays Tacitus (16), quinquageſimum annum Cappadocia potiebatur, inviſus Tiberio, quod eum Rhodi agentem nullo officio coluiſſet: nec id Archelaus per ſuperbiam omiſerat, ſed ab intimis Auguſti monitus, quia florente Caio Cæſare, miſſoque ad res Orientis intuta Tiberii amicitia credebatur. i. e. " King Archelaus enjoyed Cappadocia fifty years, hated by Ti- " berius, becauſe he had taken no notice of him " during his reſidence at Rhodes: nor had Archelaus " omitted it through pride, but by the admonition " of Auguſtus's particular friends, becauſe Caius Cæ- " ſar flouriſhing at that time, and being ſent to take " care of the affairs of the Eaſt, the friendſhip of " Tiberius was deemed unſafe." Dio ſays almoſt the ſame thing: Tiberius Cappadociæ Regem Archelaum, infenſus ei, quia cum olim ſibi is ſupplicâſſet, ſuoque patrocinio uſus, cum at incolis apud Auguſtum accuſaretur, fuiſſet, Rhodi ſe neglexiſſet, at Caium in Aſiam venientem officioſe coluiſſet; inſimulatum quaſi novis rebus ſtuderet, evocavit Romam (17). i. e. " Tiberius " being offended at Archelaus King of Cappadocia, " becauſe

(14) See the end of the text, and the note [B] of the article of APOLLODORUS the Architect.

(15) POMPONIUS ATTICUS found great advantage by ſuch a conduct. See the note [A] on his Article.

(16) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 42.

(17) Dio, l. 57.

Rome; and to that purpoſe he ſummoned him, and gave him up to the judgment of the Senate [H] on ſuch accuſations as ſhould be brought againſt him. Old age, the gout, and above all the indignity of his treatment ſoon brought him to his end [I], although the Senate had pronounced nothing againſt him. It is thought that he avoided the ſentence of the Senate by counterfeiting madneſs [K]. He died in the year of Rome 770, the 52d of his reign, after which Cappadocia was reduced into a Province [L]. His " becauſe though he himſelf had formerly been a " ſupplicant to him, and had uſed his good offices, " when he was accuſed by the inhabitants to Augu- " ſtus, yet he had neglected him at Rhodes, and paid an " extraordinary deference to Caius, when he came " into Aſia, ſummoned him to Rome as a perſon " who aimed at innovations." We learn from this paſſage, that Tiberius not only complained of the incivility of Archelaus, but likewiſe of his ingratitude. The circumſtance of the place might farther provoke the Emperor; for the Iſland of Eleuſa, where Archelaus reſided, was but 15 miles diſtant from Rhodes (18).

(18) Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 448.

[H] Tiberius ſummoned him, and gave him up to the judgment of the Senate.] Dio relates, Inſimulatum quaſi novis rebus ſtuderet, evocavit Romam, ac Senatus judicio tradidit (19). i. e. " He cited him to Rome " as a perſon who aimed at innovations, and deliver- " ed him up to the judgment of the Senate." It was therefore a ſtate crime of which he was accuſed. Tacitus does not ſeem to grant that; he inſinuates very plainly, that Tiberius had the ſincerity to complain of nothing, but the incivility of Archelaus, and that he gave him room to hope that by his preſence and entreaties he might obtain pardon. Ut verſa Cæſarum ſobole imperium adeptus eſt, elicit Archelaum matris literis, quæ non diſſimulatis offenſionibus clementiam offerebat, ſi ad precandum veniret (20). i. e. " As " ſoon as the Cæſarean race being removed, he had " got poſſeſſion of the Empire, he engaged Archelaus " to come to him by his mother's letters, who offered " mercy, tho' he did not diſſemble his offences, if he " would come to beg it." That ſincerity about the article of perſonal offences concealed a very dangerous trap. The King of Cappadocia did not perceive it, or dared not act as one that did perceive it. He ſet out forthwith to make his appearance at Rome, was very ill received by Tiberius, and ſoon found himſelf delivered over to juſtice. Ille ignarus doli, vel ſi intelligere crederetur vim metuens, in urbem properat, exceptuſque immiti à principe, & mox accuſatus in Senatu (21). Suetonius only mentions in a general manner this action of Tiberius. Reges infeſtos ſuſpectoſque comminationibus magis & querelis quam vi repreſſit; quoſdam per blanditias atque promiſſa extractos ad ſe non remiſit, ut . . . . . Archelaum Cappadocem (22). i. e. " He repreſſed troubleſome and ſuſpected Kings more " by threatnings and complaints than force; ſome " whom he had drawn out by good words and pro- " miſes, he never ſent back again as . . . . Archelaus " the Cappadocian." I don't know whether Archelaus, notwithſtanding his age, was not engaged in ſome attempt after the death of Auguſtus; for there is mention of one of his plots (23), which can relate to no time but that.

(19) Dio, lib. 57.

(20) Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 42.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 37. See alſo Eutropii lib. 7.

(23) Philoſt. in Vitâ Apoll. lib. 2. cap. 7.

[I] Old age, the gout . . . . brought him to his end.] Let us go on to conſult Tacitus. Mox accuſatus in Senatu non ob crimina quæ fingebantur, ſed angore, ſimul feſſus ſenio, & quia regibus æqua nedum infima inſolita ſunt, finem vitæ ſponte an fato implevit. i. e. " Be- " ing afterwards accuſed in the Senate, either his own " choice, or fate put an end to his life, not on " account of the crimes which were found againſt " him, but becauſe he was worn out by pain attended " with old age, and by reaſon that forms of judica- " ture, much leſs thoſe of a low kind are unuſual to " Princes." This Hiſtorian does not know whether Archelaus ſlew himſelf, or whether he ſunk under the weight of his misfortunes; but one may infer from his account, that this Prince was not condemned, much leſs puniſhed with death. Dio will furniſh us with more circumſtances.

(24) Mr. Tillemont, Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 1. p. 107, falſly charges Dio with having ſaid that Archelaus was acquitted by the Senate by pretending to be mad.

[K] It is thought that he avoided the ſentence of the Senate by counterfeiting madneſs.] Dio aſſures us that Archelaus overburdened with age was looked upon as one who doated; that he nevertheleſs had his perfect ſenſes, but counterfeited madneſs, becauſe he ſaw no other way to ſave his life (24); that after all, he would have ſuffered death, if he had not been accuſed by a falſe witneſs of having uttered threatning expreſſions, and of having ſaid, that when ſhe ſhould be got back to his Kingdom, he would ſhew Tiberius that he did not want ſtrength. That occaſioned a laughter, and diverted Tiberius's deſign of putting him to death. He was ſo weak and feeble, that he was obliged to be carried to the Senate in a litter. Dio adds, that at that juncture, Archelaus eſcaped death; but that he died ſoon after. The text of my remark is not contradicted by Dio; for if the falſe witneſs ſaved the life of Archelaus, it was only becauſe it was judged that the threats of a man ſo reduced as he, were a certain proof of his being diſtracted, of doating, of being relapſed into a ſtate of childhood, &c. From this one may be ſatisfied, that Xiphilinus had no great judgment. He has ſuppreſſed the pretended madneſs of Archelaus. But that is a fact which he ought to have kept, whatever brevity he aimed to obſerve. David, Brutus and ſome others have made an excellent uſe of that contrivance. I agree to it; but theſe are however remarkable adventures, and which ought to be retained by an abbreviator. Let us not forget that Dio obſerves that at another time Archelaus had been really mad, which appeared by ſuch marks, that Auguſtus had appointed him a Governor, who was Regent of the Kingdom. I do not know whether it might not be upon that occaſion that he had recourſe to the protection of Tiberius. He had recourſe thither finding himſelf accuſed by his ſubjects; but might he not have been accuſed of madneſs, at a time when he had reaſon enough left to wiſh not to be put under guardianſhip, and to maintain that his ſubjects through mere malice wanted to have him thought incapable of the government? It would be difficult to clear that up. The ancient Hiſtorians kept ſo to their maxim of relating only the main ſubſtance of things, that they have given us no light with regard to certain little particulars. Their maxim is a very good one; but there is an art of ſpecifying facts in few words as one goes along, that would be of great uſe, if people either would, or knew how to practiſe it. An Hiſtory in folio, by means of that art, might remove a thouſand diſputes, and clear up a variety of particulars, without being for all this above fifty pages longer.

[L] After his death Cappadocia was reduced into a province.] Velleius Paterculus, Tacitus, Dio, and ſeveral others expreſly aſſert it (25). Here are the very words of the three firſt. Tib. Cæſar . . . . ut has armis, ita auctoritate Cappadociam populo R. fecit ſtipendiariam (26). Regnum in provinciam redactum eſt (27). Paulo poſt obiit (Archelaus) ac inde Cappadocia quoque Romanorum juris effecta, equitique regenda data (28). i. e. " As Tiberius Cæſar rendered theſe tribu- " tary to the people of Rome by his arms, ſo did " he Cappadocia by his authority . . . . The King- " dom was reduced into a Province . . . . A little af- " ter he (Archelaus) died, and from that time Cappa- " docia likewiſe was made a Province of the Romans, " and the government of it given to a Knight." It was Germanicus, who executed that order (29). Appian therefore is highly miſtaken, in ſaying that the Kingdom of Cappadocia was reduced to a Province under Auguſtus (30). Father Noris, who has obſerved that fault of Appian, has found two very conſiderable ones in Riccioli, the one relating to Genealogy, and the other to Chronology (31). The words which he produces of that Author are theſe: Summoto Mithridate, creatus eſt Cappadocum conſenſu à Romanis Ariobarzanes; tandem Archelao pronepote mortuo Romæ Conſulibus C. Cælio Ruſo & L. Pompeio, ut ait Tacitus, id eſt anno 84 ante Chriſtum, deſiit regnare in Cappadocia *. i. e. " Mithridates being removed, Ario- " barzanes was created by the Romans with the con- " ſent of the Cappadocians; at length Archelaus his " great grandchild being dead at Rome when C. Cæ- " lius (25) Strabo, lib. 12. p. 368. Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 37. Eutrop. lib. 7. cap. 6.

(26) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 39.

(27) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 42.

(28) Dio, lib. 57. p. 614.

(29) Suet. in Calig. cap. 1. Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 56.

(30) Appianus, in Mithridaticis, pag. 244. apud Noris, Cenot. Piſan. pag. 241.

(31) Noris, Cenot. Piſan. pag. 226.

* Riccioli, Chron. Reformat. tom. 1. lib. 5. cap. 9. num. 5.

His family boasted of a very ancient and illustrious descent [M]. We shall say some thing of his descendants in the Article of GLAPHYRA. There is a probability that he wrote some books [N]. The address which he made use of to appease the fierce indignation of Herod against his son Alexander, testifies, that he knew how to give things a masterly turn (s). Some people have confounded him with Archelaus the son of Herod [O]. I have never found that Eutropius says what a modern author imputes to him; viz. that Archelaus bequeathed his Kingdom at his death to the people of Rome, and that it was upon that title that Cappadocia became a Province (t). Mr. de Tillemont might be very well assured of a thing of which he is in doubt (u); which is that the same Archelaus, who was King of Cappadocia, obtained by the favour of Augustus a part of Cilicia, and the lesser Armenia. Moreri has committed several faults of omission in this Article. His Continuator has been guilty only of one fault of commission; but it is such an enormous one that it is as bad as four [P]. We shall see what it is in the last note on this Article.

(s) Joseph. Antiquit. lib. 16. cap. 12; and de Bello Judaico. lib. 1. cap. 17.

(t) Noldius, de Vitâ & Gestis Herodum, pag. 194.

(u) Histoire des Empereurs, tom. 1. pag. 33.

ARCHELAUS

"lius Rufus and L. Pomponius were Consuls, as Ta-
"citus says, that is, in the year 84 before Christ, he "ceased to reign in Cappadocia." These words have perfectly the air of a mutilated passage: it is not an uncommon thing for Printers to skip over whole lines. However, Archelaus did not descend from Ariobarzanes; which is the genealogical error of Ricciolus; and the Consulship of C. Cælius Rufus and L. Pomponius, under which he died at Rome, fell out on the 17th year of Jesus Christ; which is the chronological error. Strabo declares in express terms, that Archelaus was not a relation of Ariobarzanes. Ita Rex ab iis factus est Ariobarzanes, cujus in tertia stirpe genus defecit. Exinde Archelaus ab Antonio Rex est constitutus NULLA AFFINITATE ipsis conjunctus (32). i. e. "Thus was "Ariobarzanes made King by them, whose race was "extinct in the third generation. Then Archelaus
"was appointed King by Anthony, being not in the "least allied to them." The error which Noldius imputes to Jornandes is very different from that of Appian. He will have it that Cappadocia became a Province under the Emperor Claudius, and that, by Archelaus's will (33). The revenues of Cappadocia were so considerable when Archelaus died, that Tiberius thought himself able, by the acquisition thereof, to support himself without the moiety of a tax, which he had caused to be levied. Regnum (Archelai) in provinciam redactum est, fructibusque ejus levari posse centesimæ vectigal professus Cæsar, ducentesimam in posterum statuit (34). i. e. "The Kingdom (of Archelaus) was "reduced into a Province; and Cæsar professed that
"by the product thereof the tax of the hundredth part
"might be mitigated, and ordered that for the fu"ture it should be only of the two hundredth part."
He eased even that Province, and would not draw from thence so much as it had furnished to the last King (35).

(32) Sttabo, lib. 12. p. 273.

(33) Jornand. de Regnor. & Tempor. Successione. p. 645. apud Noldium de Vitâ Herod. p. 194.

(43) Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. c. 42.

(35) Idem, ibid. cap. 56.

[M] His family boasted of a very ancient and illustrious descent.] Glaphyra, daughter of the last Archelaus, and wife of Alexander the son of Herod, often talked of the nobility of her family, and boasted that she was descended from Temenus, by the father's side, and from Darius the son of Hystaspes, by the mother's side (36).

(36) Joseph. de Bello Jud. lib. 1. cap. 17.

[N] There is some probability that he wrote some books.] Pliny furnishes all that probability. He several times quotes Archelaus, and it is judged that in two places he means Archelaus King of Cappadocia. He gives him that title in one of the two citations, Archelaus qui regnavit in Cappadocia, says he (37); and as he treats there of certain particulars relating to Amber, Father Hardouin does not doubt but that he ought to understand the same Archelaus in the 7th chapter of the 37th book of Pliny, where one Archelaus is quoted about the properties of a kind of precious stones (38). He no more doubts, that it was extracted from the book de Lapidibus cited by Plutarch (39). I shall leave that undetermined; and to say something more certain, I shall point out a passage of Pliny, where Archelaus is reckoned amongst the Kings that have written on Agriculture (40). I have spoken above (41) of another Archelaus, whom Pliny often quotes.

(37) Plinius, lib. 37. cap. 3. pag. 371.

(38) Hardouin. in Indice Autor. Plinii. See also Malincrot, Paralipom. p. 60.

(39) Plut. de Fluviis, p. 1153.

(40) Plinius, lib. 18. cap. 3. pag. 440.

(41) In the note [C] of the article of ARCHELAUS the Philosopher.

[O] He has been confounded with Archelaus the son of Herod.] Father Noris has convicted Ricciolus of that fault (42). The last named Author has pretended, that Tiberius pleaded for Archelaus before Augustus, in the process which Archelaus had with his brothers, relating to the succession of Herod, and he pretends to prove it by this passage of Suetonius: Civilium officiorum rudimentis Archelaum Trallianos, & Thessalos, varia quosque de causa, Augusto cognoscente defendit (43). i. e. "At his first engaging in civil "offices he defended Archelaus, the Trallians, and "Thessalians, each having different causes, before Au-
"gustus." And as Velleius Paterculus tells him, that Tiberius quitted Rhodes, to return to Rome, in the year 755, he concludes that in that very year, and not in 751 or sooner, Archelaus was made Ethnarch. Father Noris shews him from the passage of Dio above cited (44), that the words of Suetonius ought to be understood of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. He might have added a circumstance, which overturns Ricciolí's hypothesis; viz. that Tiberius defended the cause of Archelaus before he went to Rhodes. That is plain from the words of Dio, and may evidently be inferred from those of Suetonius, who ranks the defence of Archelaus in the front of all the causes undertaken by Tiberius, when he made, if I may be allowed the expression, his first campaign of the long Robe, civilium officiorum rudimenta. Torrrentius understood the thing like Ricciolus, that Suetonius meant to speak of the great process of Archelaus the son of Herod, and he refers us to Josephus (45). How came he not to see that Josephus could not have been ignorant of that good office of Tiberius, and that he would have spoke of it if he had known it? I have been surprized, that Father Noris, who has made such frequent and so vigorous sallies upon the Jesuit Salian, has spared him on this occasion. That Jesuit has fallen into the same mistake as Riccioli: he has censured Casaubon for having applied (46) the passage of Suetonius to Archelaus King of Cappadocia; he has represented to him that that Prince's cause was transacted under the reign of Tiberius; he has maintained, that therefore we should understand here Archelaus the son of Herod; and he has proved it by this supposition that Jesus Christ dwelt two years in Egypt: for, says he, Tiberius was not yet returned to Rome in the second year of Jesus Christ: nevertheless he was at Rome, when Archelaus disputed with his brethren about the succession of Herod, since he honoured him with his protection (47). See how a man heaps one fault upon another, when he lays a wrong foundation. It is as clear as the noon-day, that the King of Cappadocia had a process before Augustus, before Tiberius retired into the Island of Rhodes (48).

(42) Noris, Cen. Pisan. pag. 148.

(43) Suet. in Tiberio, cap. 8.

(44) Citation (17).

(45) Torrent. in Sueton. Tiber. cap. 8. he refers us to Euseb. in Chron. & Eccles. Hist. lib. 1. and to Joseph. Antiq. lib. 17. cap. 11.

(46) Comment. in Sueton.

(47) Saliani Annales, in Scholiis, ad ann. 3. Christi, num. 7.

(48) See Noldius de Vitâ & Gestis Herodum, p 194, & seq.

[P] The continuator of Moreri has made an enormous blunder about Archelaus.] He says, that Scylla (as he spells it) after having taken the city of Athens, with his own hand slew Archelaus General of Mithridates's forces, at the foot of the altar, where he had taken sanctuary. Then quotes Aulus Gellius, l. 14. It is certain, that Aulus Gellius in chap. 1, of the 15th book, speaks of a thing, which the continuator has mentioned, I mean of an expedient made use of by Archelaus to prevent the Romans from burning a wooden tower, which defended the Piræum. We shall see below how that is; but it is utterly false that he says, that Archelaus took refuge in a temple, and that Sylla himself slew him at the foot of the altar. I do not think any Author of credit has said that; for it is a notorious fact, that Archelaus, having forced Sylla to give over the attacks of the Piræum, and only to attack

ARCHELAUS the ſon of Herod the Great, King of Judea, was by his father's will declared his ſucceſſor [A], and immediately after Herod's death (a) took upon him the power and authority, tho' not the name of a King, becauſe it was neceſſary for him to be confirmed by the Emperor (b). Having performed the funeral of his father, and mourned over him ſeven days, according to the cuſtom of the Jews, he went into the Temple dreſſed in a white garment, and ſeated himſelf upon a high Throne of Gold. In his march to the Temple he was attended with a multitude of people, who gave him a thouſand bleſſings, and wiſhed him a proſperous reign; he in return gave them great hopes that they ſhould be much happier under his government, than they had been under that of his father [B]. The people, who generally believe that Princes are very ſincere in the promiſes they make at their acceſſion to the crown, received with great acclamations the aſſurance which Archelaus gave them; and took that opportunity to beg ſeveral favours of him. Archelaus, whoſe only deſign was to ſecure the crown to himſelf, did not think proper in this conjuncture to refuſe any thing to the people. He made them the faireſt promiſes, but he ſoon ſhewed that he would be as great a tyrant as his father had been. For even before he had been confirmed by Auguſtus, he gave a terrible inſtance of his cruel and tyrannical temper. He put to death three thouſand perſons, who had formed a deſign to revenge the death of ſome perſons, who as they thought had been unjuſtly puniſhed by Herod [C] (c). Archelaus went afterwards

(a) He died about the 25th of November in the firſt year of Chriſt, the fourth before our vulgar Æra. Clericus, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Sæc. 1. p. 215.

(b) Joſeph. de Bello Judaic. lib. 1. cap. 21. and Antiquit. lib. 17. cap. 10.

(c) Idem, De Bello Judaic. lib. 2. cap. 2. and Antiq. lib. 17. cap. 11.

tack the city, had time to retire when he knew that it was taken by ſtorm (49). Sylla purſued him, and gained great victories over him, and obliged him to make peace upon diſadvantageous terms. Archelaus finding himſelf ſuſpected of ill practices (50), durſt not truſt himſelf with Mithridates, and went to find out Murena, who commanded the Romans. He was received honourably, as Strabo has obſerved in more places than one. Ἦν ὁ οὗτος Ἀρχέλαος υἱὸς μὲν τοῦ ὑπὸ Σύλλᾳ καὶ τῆς συγκλήτου τιμηθέντος (51). i. e. "This "Archelaus was the ſon of him, who received honour "from Sylla and the Senate." The ſecret of preſerving the wooden tower conſiſted in rubbing it well over with allum. I fancy Quadrigarius is the only Hiſtorian who has mentioned it. The others ſay that the towers and machines were deſtroyed by the beſiegers. It is very certain that allum has not the quality, that Quadrigarius ſpeaks of. Theſe are his words: Tum Sulla conatus eſt & tempore magno eduxit copias, ut Archelai turrim unam, quam ille interpoſuit, ligneam incenderet. Venit, acceſſit, ligna ſubdidit, ſubmovit Græcos, ignem admovit, ſatis ſunt diu conati, nunquam quiverunt incendere: ita Archelaus omnem materiam obleverat alumine, quod Sulla atque milites mirabantur: & poſtquam non ſuccendit, reduxit copias (52). i. e. "Then Sylla endeavoured, and for a great while "drew out his forces, to burn one of Archelaus's "wooden towers, which he placed betwixt them. "He came, he drew near, he put billets under it, "he drove away the Greeks, he put fire to it, they "laboured a long while, but could not make it "kindle. Archelaus had ſo ſmeared over the whole "ſubſtance thereof with allum, that Sylla and his ſol-"diers were aſtoniſhed, and after that it did not burn, "he withdrew his forces." If Mr. l'Abbé de la Roque had known of this paſſage of Aulus Gellius, he would not have ſaid, that "Hiſtory remarks that "Sylla ſeveral times attempted to burn a wooden "tower, which one of Mithridates's Lieutenants de-"fended, and that he could never accompliſh his de-"ſign, becauſe it was ſmeared over with a certain "drug, WHOSE NAME WE HAVE NOT COME TO "THE KNOWLEDGE OF, which had a property of "repreſſing the activity of fire (53)." Two things aſtoniſh me: the one, that ſince Quadrigarius has mentioned ſo extraordinary an accident, all the other Hiſtorians have taken no notice of it; the other, that ſince ſo many Hiſtorians have not ſaid a word about it, Quadrigarius has deſcribed it in ſo particular a manner. Theſe kinds of facts ſtrike the imagination ſo forcibly, that an incombuſtible wooden tower muſt have been the laſt thing that their accounts could have omitted. Sylla would have infallibly inſerted it in his Memoirs. Plutarch, who quotes them ſo often (54), would have ſeen it there, and would not have failed to mention it. Let us conclude from his ſilence and that of the other Hiſtorians, that the fact is not true. But from whence has Quadrigarius taken it? I believe it is not poſſible to determine the origin of his error. It is true enough that the feathered allum does reſiſt fire, and cannot be conſumed; but to rub a wooden tower over therewith, and by that means to render it incombuſtible, is, as I take it, a thing impracticable.

(49) Vide Appian. in Mithridat.

(50) The Epitome of Titus Livius obſerves, that Archelaus delivered up the fleet of Mithridates to the Romans. Aurelius Victor ſays that Sylla Claſſem Mithridatis proditione Archelai intercepit. i. e. "In-"tercepted Mi-"thridates's "fleet through "the treachery "of Archelaus.

(51) Strabo, lib. 12. p. 384. See alſo lib. 17. pag. 547.

WHETHER Archelaus knew how to make wood incombuſtible.

(52) Apud Aul. Gell. lib. 15. cap. 1.

(53) Journal des Savans of the 15th of Feb. 1677. p. 54.

(54) Plutarch. in vit. Syllæ.

[A] He was by his father's will declared his ſucceſſor.] He had made another will before, by which he left the Kingdom to his ſon Antipas (1); but he altered his mind, and leaving now the Kingdom to Archelaus, he gave Antipas only the Tetrarchate of Galilee and Perea; and to Philip his brother the Provinces of Traconitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanea, which he erected into a Tetrarchate; to Salome his ſiſter the cities of Jamnia, Azot, and Phazaelis, with fifty thouſand pieces of ſilver; beſides ſeveral other legacies to his friends, and to the Emperor (2), to whom he left entirely the diſpoſal of this Teſtament, declaring expreſly that it ſhould have no force, till it was confirmed by Auguſtus (3). We may obſerve here, that Archelaus was older than Antipas, but the reaſon why Herod did not mention him was, that Antipater another ſon of Herod, had rendered Archelaus ſuſpected to his father (4), who when he diſcovered the traiterous deſigns of Antipater, found that he had been miſinformed concerning Archelaus, and accordingly declared him his ſucceſſor.

(1) By the ſame wife as Archelaus.

(2) Joſeph. Ant. lib. 17. cap. 10.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, de Bello Judaico, lib. 1. cap. 20.

[B] He gave them great hopes, that they ſhould be much happier under his government, than they had been under that of his father.] He told the people that he was very thankful for the loyalty and affection they ſhewed him, and ſo much the more as he perceived that the tyranny of the King his father, and the hardſhips they had ſuffered under his government, had not diminiſhed their love for him. He promiſed that he would ſoon give them proofs of his gratitude; but that he could not yet take upon him the title of King, till his father's Teſtament had been approved and confirmed by the Emperor: but that as ſoon as he ſhould have received the crown from the hands of his Sovereign, he would ſhew by his actions, and by the whole courſe of his life, that they had good reaſons to love him (5). Theſe promiſes of Archelaus would afford us ſeveral reflections, if it were proper to inſert them here; but, not to give offence, we muſt leave the ingenious reader to make them himſelf.

(5) Idem, Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 10.

[C] To revenge the death of ſome perſons, who had been unjuſtly puniſhed by Herod.] The fact as related by Joſephus (6) is as follows. Herod had cauſed a golden eagle of an extraordinary bulk and very great price to be placed over the porch of the Temple, tho' the Jewiſh laws expreſly forbid the making of any images of animals. There were at that time in Jeruſalem two men called Judas and Matthias, who were extremely beloved by the people, not only for their eloquence, and becauſe they were perfectly well skilled in the law, but alſo becauſe they inſtructed the youth, and endeavoured to perſuade them to be virtuous. Theſe men hearing that King could not recover of his illneſs, exhorted all young people, who revered them as their maſters, to deſtroy whatever had been raiſed againſt the laws and cuſtoms of their anceſtors. They repreſented to them, that nothing could

(6) Ibid. cap. 8.

wards to Rome, leaving the care of his family, and the government of his Kingdom to Philip his brother. In his voyage he was attended by his mother (d) and by ſeveral of his friends. Salome his aunt did alſo accompany him with all her family, under pretence of uſing her intereſt with Auguſtus in his favour; but in reality to obſtruct his meaſures, and particularly to accuſe him before the Emperor, for having cauſed ſo many perſons to be killed in the Temple. Antipas, whom Herod in a former will had made his ſucceſſor, went alſo to Rome by Salome's advice, and pretended that Herod's laſt will was not to be regarded, as having been made at a time when Herod was not in ſound health. This cauſe was pleaded before Auguſtus [D]. Antipater the ſon of Salome, a very eloquent man, who hated Archelaus, ſpoke for Antipas; and one Nicholas, who had been employed by Herod in ſeveral affairs, defended the cauſe of Archelaus could be more glorious, than to declare themſelves the reſtorers and defenders of religion; and tho' the undertaking was full of dangers, yet thoſe very dangers ought to inſpire them with zeal and ardour, ſince an honourable death is preferable to a life, how eaſy ſoever, when a man dies to maintain the laws of his country, which procures him an immortal glory. Such a diſcourſe fired the breaſt of thoſe to whom it was addreſſed, and a falſe report being then ſpread, that Herod was dead, they went immediately to the Temple, pulled down the Eagle, and with hammers and axes broke it to pieces before a multitude of people, who were at that time aſſembled in the Temple. The Officer, who commanded the King's garriſon at Jeruſalem, went immediately with a great number of ſoldiers to the Temple, where finding no reſiſtance, he ſoon diſſipated the multitude. Four only of the young men, who had broken down the Eagle, made ſome reſiſtance; but they were ſoon taken priſoners and carried before the King, with Judas and Matthias, their leaders, who thought it would be a ſhame for them to run away. Herod asked them, how they came to be ſo bold, as to pull down an image that was conſecrated. They anſwered, "It is a long time ſince "we have taken this reſolution; and it would have "been baſe for us not to have put it in execution. "We have avenged the injury done to God, and "maintained the honour of his law. What! do you "imagine it ſtrange, that we, who have received that "law from Moſes, to whom God himſelf gave it, "ſhould prefer it before your orders and commands? "Or, do you think we are afraid of death? No; "Whatever torments you will make us ſuffer, death "will not be to us the puniſhment for a crime, but "the reward of our virtue and piety." Theſe words they pronounced with ſo much courage, that there was no reaſon to doubt but their hearts agreed with their mouth, and that they would not be leſs conſtant in their ſufferings, than they had been bold in their enterprize. They had ſoon an opportunity to ſhew whether they were ſincere; for Herod condemned Matthias, and all thoſe who were taken with him, to be burnt alive. Another Matthias, who was then High-Prieſt, and who was thought to have been concerned in this affair, was deprived of his office, which was conferred on Soazar his brother in-law. This was highly reſented by a great number of Jews. They kept quiet during Herod's life, being awed by him; but as ſoon as they heard that he was dead, they began to aſſemble in a tumultuous manner, and to deplore the cruel condemnation of Matthias, and of thoſe who had been put to death with him. They preſſed Archelaus to revenge ſo great an injuſtice, by the death of ſome of Herod's friends and counſellors, who, they ſaid had prompted him to that unjuſt condemnation. Archelaus thought at firſt, that gentle meaſures were the moſt proper to appeaſe this tumult. He ſent one of the principal Officers of his army to repreſent to the rioters, as Joſephus calls them, "That they ſhould "not indulge themſelves in this deſire of revenge; "but conſider, that the puniſhment they complained "of, had been inflicted according to law. That their "petition was an high offence againſt his authority. "That this was not a proper time to make ſuch "complaints. That for the preſent they ſhould en"deavour only to maintain the publick peace and tran"quillity, till Archelaus being confirmed on the throne "by Auguſtus, ſhould return from Rome. That then "he would endeavour to regulate every thing after a "mature deliberation with a general conſent, but "till then they ſhould be quiet, without involving "themſelves in the guilt of rebellion." This was not capable of aſſwaging the fury of the rebels; they ſhewed by their repeated clamours, that it was impoſſible for any perſon to endeavour to bring them back to their duty and allegiance, without running the hazard of his life. They thought it was inſufferable, that even after Herod's death, the blood of their friends, which had been ſo unjuſtly ſpilt, ſhould not be revenged. They became more and more enraged, and as the feaſt of the Paſſover drew near, at which a vaſt number of people uſed to reſort to Jeruſalem, there was reaſon to fear, that the ſedition would become more terrible. And indeed, during the feaſt, thoſe rebels, who lamented the death of Judas and Matthias, did not ſtir out of the Temple, and choſe rather to beg for their daily ſuſtenance, than to depart from the Temple. Archelaus fearing, leſt they ſhould carry their revolt ſtill farther, ſent an Officer with ſome ſoldiers to them, in order to ſuppreſs the tumult, before they had inſpired the reſt of the people with the ſame ſpirit of rebellion. But the ſeditious having notice of it, did by their clamours and exhortations inflame the people to ſuch a degree, that they fell upon the ſoldiers, and killed almoſt all of them; and the Officer himſelf who commanded them, hardly eſcaped with his life. The King judging it would be of a very dangerous conſequence, to ſuffer ſuch a rebellion to continue unpuniſhed, ſent his whole army againſt them, with orders for the cavalry to kill all thoſe, who ſhould endeavour to eſcape out of the Temple; and not to ſuffer thoſe from without to aſſiſt them. Upon this occaſion Archelaus's army killed three thouſand of thoſe rebels; the reſt eſcaped into the mountains. This is Joſephus's account (7), who, tho' a Jew, does not ſcruple to call them rebels, and to condemn thoſe who ſtood up in defence of their religion and their laws. But we leave our readers to judge whether Archelaus, who had but lately promiſed, that his government ſhould be milder and juſter than that of his father, ought not to have prevented the rebellion, not by the ſword, but by bringing to condign puniſhment thoſe, who had been concerned in the death of Matthias and his unfortunate companions, and even thoſe, who had adviſed Herod to do an action ſo very contrary to the law of Moſes, as was the erecting an image in the entrance of a Temple conſecrated to God alone.

(d) She was a Samaritan woman, named Malthace. Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 17, cap. 1. and 12.

(7) Ibid. cap. 12.

[D] This cauſe was pleaded before Auguſtus] Antipater, who pleaded againſt Archelaus, opened the cauſe; and ſaid, that "It was only out of formality that Ar"chelaus asked the Emperor's conſent, ſince without "waiting till he knew what would be the Emperor's "pleaſure, he had taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdom "in a very terrible manner, by putting to death on "a ſacred day a vaſt number of Jews. That indeed they "deſerved it, but he ought not to have puniſhed them, "till he had been lawfully empower'd to do it. That "if he had done it as a King, without waiting for the "Emperor's confirmation, it was an high offence againſt "him; but if he had acted in his private character, it "was ſtill a greater crime. How then could he ex"pect, that the Emperor would confer upon him a "crown, which he thought, as he had ſhewed by "his conduct, the Emperor had no right to diſpoſe "of?" Antipater afterwards accuſed Archelaus of having by his own private authority removed ſeveral Officers of the army; of having ſeated himſelf on the throne; of having heard cauſes pleaded before him; of having granted to the people the favours they had asked; in a word, of having done whatever he could have done, if he had been already confirmed by the Emperor. He laid ſeveral other things

Archelaus. The Emperor did not determine this affair immediately (e); and whilſt the cauſe was ſtill depending, there aroſe another obſtacle againſt Archelaus's ambition: The Jews ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy to Auguſtus [E], praying him to alter the form of their government, and not to ſubject them any longer to Kings, but to unite their country to Syria, that they might be ſubject only to the governor of that Province. Notwithſtanding this petition of the Jews, Auguſtus granted to Archelaus, not indeed the whole Kingdom of Judea, but half of it [F] under the title of Ethnarchate, and promiſed to make him King, when by his wiſdom and virtue he ſhould deſerve it (f). Archelaus returned then into Judea, and having taken poſſeſſion of his Ethnarchate, began to exert his authority by depriving Joazar the ſon of Boethus of the High-Prieſthood, pretending that he had favoured and ſupported the party of thoſe, who had raiſed a ſedition in revenge for the perſons, who had been put to death by Herod. He repaired afterwards in a very ſumptuous manner the Palace of Jericho; he built a town, which from his own name he called Archelais; and what very much exaſperated the Jews againſt him, was, that he did not ſcruple to tranſgreſs the laws of Moſes, by marrying Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, tho' ſhe was the widow of Alexander, his brother, and had children by him. In the tenth year of Archelaus's reign, the Jews not being able to bear any longer his tyrannical government, accuſed him before the Emperor. What encouraged them the more to it, was, that they knew, that Auguſtus had expreſly recommended to him, to govern his ſubjects with moderation and juſtice. Theſe complaints provoked the Emperor againſt him to ſuch a degree, that he did not condeſcend to write to him, but only ſent the agent he had at Rome, to conduct him thither. Archelaus accordingly went to Rome, where Auguſtus having heard his charge and his defence, confiſcated all the money he had, and ſent him into baniſhment to Vienne (g) in Gaul. He and his wife had ſome warning of this misfortune in a dream [G]. The countries, over which Archelaus had reigned, were united to

(e) Idem, ibid. cap. 11.

(f) Ibid. cap. 12 and 13.

(g) The chief town of the Viennois, a county in the Lower Dauphiné, which is a Province of France.

things to his charge, ſome of which were true, and ſome very probable, conſidering the ambition, which muſt be natural to a man ſtill young, and lately raiſed to the ſovereign power. He afterwards inſiſted very ſtrongly upon that horrid and impious murther, committed in the temple, where in one ſolemn day had been ſeen ſo many innocent victims ſlain, of citizens as well as of ſtrangers, who had been cruelly butchered, not by a foreign Prince, or by an enemy, but by one, who made uſe of the venerable name of a lawful King, to ſatisfy his tyrannical paſſions and ſanguinary temper. Antipater added, that Herod, who knew the ill inclinations of that man, had, when in health, ſo little thoughts of leaving him the Kingdom, that by his former Will, which was much more authentick than the latter, he had choſenfor his ſucceſſor Antipas, whoſe manners were intirely the reverſe of thoſe of Archelaus. This Will was made at a time, when it could not yet be ſaid, as it had been afterwards, that Herod's mind was dead before his body, but when the ſtrength of both were ſtill full and entire. Laſtly, ſaid Antipater, ſuppoſe that Herod was in health when he made his laſt will, yet he did not know what manner of King Archelaus would be, who ſhewed himſelf unworthy of the crown, by diſdaining to receive it from the Emperor's hands, and by putting to death ſo many citizens when he himſelf was ſtill but a private man. Nicholas, who pleaded Archelaus's cauſe, anſwered, that the blood ſpilt about the temple muſt be aſcribed only to the inſolence and obſtinacy of the rebels, who had obliged Archelaus againſt his will to have recourſe to arms in order to repreſs their inſolence; and that though they ſeemed to revolt againſt Archelaus only, yet it was evident, that they intended to rebel even againſt the Emperor himſelf. Antipater, added he, ſhould be aſhamed to be carried ſo far by his hatred againſt Archelaus, as to excuſe the rebels; whereas he ought to own, that they only were guilty, who had been killed, ſince they were the aggreſſors, and had forced the ſoldiers to uſe againſt them thoſe arms, which they had carried with them to defend themſelves. With regard to Herod's laſt Will, he maintained that the King had perfectly the uſe of his ſenſes when he made it; and added, that this Teſtament was ſo much the more to be looked upon as authentick, as Herod left the execution of it entirely to the diſpoſal of the Emperor. The plea concluded with ſome compliments beſtowed both upon Auguſtus and Archelaus (8). We ſhall only obſerve here, that Archelaus's cruelty with regard to the perſons killed in or about the temple, would not have been a proper motive to Auguſtus to refuſe him the crown; ſince that Emperor did not eſtabliſh himſelf on the throne, but by ſhedding a prodigious quantity of blood.

(8) Idem, ibid.

[E] The Jews ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy to Auguſtus.] The Embaſſy conſiſted of fifty perſons, who upon their arrival at Rome were joined by above two thouſand Jews, all inhabitants of that city. They were admitted to the Emperor's audience, and there, in preſence of Archelaus, the firſt made very great complaints againſt the government of Herod their late King. Then they added, that "they hoped his ſon would "take a quite different courſe; that for this reaſon "they had not ſcrupled to acknowledge him for their "King: But that he, as tho' he had been afraid of "not being thought Herod's ſon, had ſoon diſcovered "his real character." They then enlarged upon what happened near the temple, and added, "We leave "you to judge, whether after ſo abominable an ac"tion, we are not in the right to hate that man, "who tho' guilty himſelf of ſuch a crime, dares to re"preſent us as rebels and traitors." Nicholas under took the defence of Archelaus (9), of which it is ſuperfluous to give an account here, ſince it is almoſt the ſame with that he ſpoke before, and which the reader has ſeen in the preceding remark.

(9) Ibid. cap. 12.

[F] Auguſtus granted to Archelaus half the Kingdom of Judea.] By Judea muſt here be underſtood the whole country inhabited by the Jews, and over which Herod had been King. For Joſephus tells us afterwards, that Auguſtus gave Archelaus Judea, Idumea, and Samaria (10); where by Judea can be meant only Judea properly ſo called, that is, the country of which Jeruſalem was the capital city. Antipas had for his ſhare Galilee with the country beyond the river. This produced him a yearly revenue of two hundred talents. But the revenue of Archelaus was ſix hundred talents; which I ſuppoſe muſt be underſtood of Alexandrian talents, one of which made 450 pounds ſterling money (11).

(10) Ibid. cap. 13.

(11) Prideaux, Preface to his Connex. p. xxi.

[G] He and his wife had ſome warning of this misfortune in a dream.] Archelaus dreamt that he ſaw ten ears of corn, very ripe and extremely full, and that ſome oxen came and devoured them. Being awaked out of his ſleep, he thought ſuch a dream was not to be neglected, and ſent for thoſe perſons, who were eſteemed the beſt interpreters; but as they did not agree amongſt themſelves concerning the meaning of this dream, an Eſſene called Simon ſtood up, and begged the King's leave to interpret his dream. "It "ſignifies, ſaid he, a change in your affairs, which "will be no ways happy for you; becauſe oxen are "animals, which paſs their lives in an uninterrupted "labour, to Syria by Auguſtus, who charged Cyrenius or Quirinus, who had been Conſul, to take an exact account of the inhabitants, and to ſell the Palace of Archelaus (b), who in all probability died in his baniſhment.

(b) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 17. cap. 15.

" labour, and which by tilling the ground turn up " the earth, and alter its place and ſituation. The " ten ears of corn ſignify ten years, becauſe the earth " produces ſome every year. Therefore, ſaid he to " Archelaus, the tenth year of your reign will be alſo " the laſt." Glaphyra his wife, who was the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, had been firſt married to Alexander the ſon of King Herod, and after his death to Juba King of Mauritania; who alſo dying, ſhe returned to her father. Archelaus the Ethnarch having ſeen her, fell ſo paſſionately in love with her, that he divorced Mariamne his wife to marry Glaphyra. The dream ſhe had was as follows; ſhe thought that ſhe ſaw Alexander her firſt huſband, and being overjoyed ſhe ran to embrace him; but he received her with a reproachful air, telling her, " You " have ſhewn by your behaviour, that thoſe are in " the right, who believe, that women are never to " be truſted; ſince having been married to me, when " you was a pure virgin, and having children by me, " the deſire of marrying a ſecond time, made you " forget the love, which you owed to me, and ought " to have kept inviolably: and not contented to have " done that firſt injury to me, you have not been " aſhamed to take a third huſband, and to enter a- " gain into my family by marrying my own bro- " ther. But I will not forget you, as you have for- " gotten me, I will take you to me again, as my " own property, and thus deliver you from the infa- " my in which you live." Glaphyra related this dream to ſome of her friends, and died a few days after (12). Joſephus tells us, that he mentioned thoſe dreams, becauſe they ſerved as a proof of the Immortality of the Soul and a Divine Providence. If any man, ſays he, thinks theſe facts incredible, let him enjoy his opinion to himſelf; but let him not endeavour to diſturb the belief of others, who by inſtances of this nature are excited to the ſtudy of virtue. This is related in the Spectator (13), not ſo much for the ſake of the ſtory itſelf, as the ingenious writer obſerves, as for the moral reflections, with which the Author concludes it. But with regard to dreams in general, no regard is to be paid to them; ſince if one of them happens to be prophetical, there are ten thouſand that have no meaning at all. So that whatever dream we have, we cannot conclude, that it ſignifies ſomething real, till the event has ſhewed it; which renders a dream, if conſidered as a warning, entirely uſeleſs; ſince like the Oracles of Delphi, it is enigmatical, and capable of being explained in ſeveral different, nay oppoſite ſenſes. But it will be ſaid, that ſometimes what we have dreamt comes to paſs. But is there any man, how unſkilful ſoever, who, if he ſhoots all day long, will not once or twice hit the mark? We dream almoſt every night. Why then ſhould we be ſurprized, that what we dream ſometimes happens to be true. Quid eſt, ſays Cicero (14), qui totum diem jaculans non aliquando tollineet (15)? Totâs noctes dormimus, neque ulla fere eſt, quâ non ſomniemus, & miramur, aliquando id, quod ſomniamus, evadere? I would not aſcribe to mere chance thoſe dreams, which happen to be true. Chance is a word invented to conceal our ignorance, when we cannot explain the cauſes of ſome phænomena. Dreams, like all other events, have natural cauſes; they are generally occaſioned by what moſt employs our thoughts in the day-time; and as what we hope or fear makes very deep impreſſions upon our minds, and comes ſometimes to paſs, we are not to be ſurprized, if our dreams happen now and then to be confirmed by the event. P.

(12) Idem, ibid. cap. 15.

(13) Num. 110. Vol. 2.

(14) De Divinat. lib. 2.

(15) I follow Lambinus's correction, who reads collineet inſtead of collimet.

(a) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 22.

☞ARCHELAUS, a Biſhop of Caſchara (a), or Carrhæ (b) in Meſapotamia, was famous for his two diſputes with the Hereſiarch Manes [A], who having eſcaped out of priſon, fled to Meſopotamia, where he propagated his doctrine; to prevent the progreſs of which, Archelaus invited him to a conference before a great number of Pagans, and appointed the Philoſophers to be judges of the cauſe. Manes being confounded, retired

(b) See Zacagnius in his Collectanea Monumentor. Veterum Eccleſ. Græc. & Latin. edit. Rom. 1698, in 4to; apud Bernard, Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Fevrier 1700, Article 1. p. 127.

[A] Famous for his two diſputes with the Hereſiarch Manes.] The Acts of theſe two Diſputes were publiſhed by Laurence Alexander Zacagni, Keeper of the Vatican Library at Rome in his Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum Eccleſiæ Græcæ ac Latinæ under the title of Archelai Epiſcopi Acta Diſputationis cum Manete Hæreſiarcha Latine ex antiquâ verſione. Epiphanius (1), St. Jerom (2), and Heraclianus Biſhop of Chalcedon (3) mention theſe Acts; but they do not agree in the name of the perſon, who reduced them into writing. The two firſt are of opinion, that it was Archelaus himſelf; but Heraclianus aſcribes them to one Hegemonius. Zacagni thinks, that theſe two opinions may be reconciled by ſuppoſing, that Archelaus wrote at firſt in Syriac what he had ſaid in the conference, which he had with Manes before the Judges, who were expreſly choſen for that purpoſe; and that Hegemonius afterwards put in order what Archelaus had written, and added a Preface, and a Concluſion, and every thing neceſſary to make the work compleat. St. Jerom (4) informs us, that this account of the Diſpute was written at firſt by Archelaus in Syriac: Librum diſputationis ſuæ, quam habuit adverſum Manichæum, exeuntem de Perſide, Syro ſermone compoſuit. Zacagni confirms this by an argument drawn from the work itſelf. We cannot learn who it was, that tranſlated it into Greek; but it is ſuppoſed to have been Hegemonius abovementioned. With regard to the Latin Tranſlator, all that can be affirmed is, that he lived after the time of St. Jerom, and before the ſeventh Century. It is extremely probable, that his verſion was made from the Greek, and not from the Syriac. Zacagni having examined with great accuracy into the time, when Manes began to publiſh his hereſies, and conſidered what the Ancients and Epiphanius in particular have ſaid upon this ſubject, concludes, that the conference of Archelaus with that Hereſiarch was held between the months of July and December 277. He ſhews then, that no manner of doubt can be raiſed againſt the antiquity and truth of theſe Acts. However he acknowledges, that they have not come down entire to us; but that ſome ancient copier has retrenched ſeveral paſſages; ſince Cyrill of Jeruſalem in his ſixth Catechefis mentions divers arguments of Manes, with Archelaus's anſwers to them, which are not to be found in theſe Acts. Henry Valeſius at the end of his Notes upon Socrates's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory has publiſhed a conſiderable Fragment of theſe Acts, with an entire Epiſtle of Archelaus to Diodorus from a MS. which had been communicated to him by Emeric Bigot, who at the end of his Preface to Palladius's Life of St. Chryſoſtom tells us, that by comparing the Greek paſſages, which Epiphanius has given us from Archelaus, he had corrected many places in the Greek, and more in the Latin verſion, and that he had deſigned to publiſh theſe Acts in Greek and Latin, that it might appear from the compariſon, how much the ancient verſions are to be eſteemed, and what advantage may be gained from them; but that he afterwards thought proper to leave this taſk to thoſe, who ſhall undertake a new edition of Epiphanius or Socrates. The MS. from whence Bigot communicated the Fragments above mentioned to Valeſius was afterwards preſerved in the Ambroſian Library at Milan (5). Zacagni collated theſe Fragments with the MS. he made uſe of, and has accurately mark'd the various readings in his Critical Notes. This MS. was procured from the Abbey of Mount Caſſino, and it is above ſix hundred years old; but there are ſeveral errors in it, which exerciſed the critical ſkill of Zacagni; who intimated, that he deſigned to publiſh that work more correct at the end of his Hiſtory of Manicheiſm, in which he was then engaged, if he could find any other MS. of it in the other Libraries of Europe. He reſolved likewiſe to join to it the other works, which the Ancients wrote againſt

(1) Hæreſ. 66.
(2) De Viris Illuſtrib. cap. 72.
(3) Apud Bernard, Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lett. Fevrier 1700, pag. 127. and Photii Biblieth. Cod. 85.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

(5) J. Albert. Fabricii Not. in S. Hieron. de Viris Illuſt. c. 72.

tired to an obſcure village, where he challenged the Prieſt of that place, whom Epiphanius calls Trypho, to a diſputation, but was followed thither by our Biſhop, who again ſilenced him; and as Manes was preparing to fly from hence, he was ſeized by the King's guards and committed to priſon (c). Dr. Cave gives Archelaus the character of a man of quick and lively genius, and tells us that he flouriſhed about the year 278. Socrates in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (d) has given us an account of this diſpute of his with Manes. He was eminent for his piety and learning, and his name is inſerted in the Roman Martyrology under the 26th of December.

(c) Cave, Hiſt. Literaria, p. 93. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(d) Ubi ſupra.

againſt that Sect. The learned John Albert Fabricius of Hamburgh publiſhed theſe Acts from Zacagni's edition in his Spicilegium of the Fathers of the third Century, which he ſubjoined to the ſecond volume of the works of St. Hippolytus, printed at Hamburgh in 1718 in fol. But, as he obſerves (6), tho' this edition is much more perfect than that of Valeſius, yet theſe Acts ſeem to be mutilated at the end, and retrenched in many other places by the tranſcriber or epitomizer of them. Quanquam verò longe, ut dixi, integriara hæc Acta ſunt quam Valeſius ediderat, tamen & ipſa in fine mutila, & vel librarii vel epitomatoris faſtidio ſubinde decurtata eſſe videntur. It appears from this conference, that the reaſons, upon which Manes defended his opinions, had much more ſubtilty than ſolidity in them. They are ſometimes ſo very abſtruſe, that they are ſcarce intelligible, and it is probable, that this Hereſiarch hardly underſtood himſelf. Archelaus ſoon ſilenced him; and then uſed the ſevereſt terms of reproach to him. Manes's opinions irritated his auditors ſo highly againſt him, that they would have torn him to pieces, if the authority of the Biſhop, who had ſufficient advantage over him in the argument, had not prevented them from this outrage. We ſhall not enter particularly into an account of this Diſpute, but only obſerve, that Archelaus affirms there, that it was not the Iſraelites, who made the golden calf in the wilderneſs, but the Egyptians, who mixed themſelves among them, and were companions in their flight (7). T.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) See Bernard, Nouvelles &c. pag. 130.

ARCHILOCHUS a Greek Poet, native of the Iſle of Paros (a), ſon of Teleſicles [A], flouriſhed in the 29th Olympiad [B]. The character of his Poetry was an extraordinary overflowing of ſlander [C]. The terrible effects of it may be ſeen by Lycambes hanging himſelf, after the violent Satyr that Archilochus had made againſt him. The indignation

(a) Herod. l. 1. cap. 12. Lucianus, in Pſeudol.

[A] He was the ſon of Teleſicles.] We find this not only in Suidas, but alſo in Oenomaus, quoted by Euſebius (1).

(1) Euſeb. lib. 6. cap. 7. Præparat. Evangel. p. 256. item lib. 5. cap. 33. p. 227.

[B] He flouriſhed in the 29th Olympiad.] Authors differ about this. Tatian and St. Cyril have placed Archilochus under the 23d Olympiad (2). Clemens Alexandrinus has placed him under the 20th: another under the 15th, the 18th, and the 19th (3). Cicero makes him to have lived under the reign of Romulus (4). Cornelius Nepos places him in the time of Tullus Hoſtilius (5). Herodotus does not only aſſert that he made verſes on the adventure of Gyges and Candaules, but alſo that he lived at that time (6). Euſebius makes him flouriſh in the 29th Olympiad. It is eaſy to reconcile ſome of theſe Authors: but one cannot do ſo with them all; for the revolution that was made in Lydia, by the death of Candaules, and the inſtallation of Gyges, falls under the 17th Olympiad (7). The death of Romulus belongs to the foregoing Olympiad. The reign of Tullus Hoſtilius is contained between the firſt years of the 27th and 25th Olympiads. Salmaſius who was very happy in correcting a groſs blunder of Solinus has however fallen into a miſtake himſelf. Solinus was ſo negligent as to place in the ſame Age the three Orators of the family of Curio, and Archilochus and Sophocles. Plurimi, ſays he (8), inter Romanos eloquentiâ floruerunt, ſed hoc bonum hereditarium nunquam fuit niſi in familia Curionum, in qua tres ſerie continua oratores fuere: magnum hoc habitum eſt ſanè eo ſæculo quo facundiam præcipue & humana & divina mirata ſunt: quippe tunc percuſſores Archilochi poetæ Apollo prodidit, & latronum facinus Deo coarguente detectum; cumque Lyſander Lacedæmonius Athenas obſideret, ubi Sophoclis tragici inhumatum corpus jacebat; identidem Liber Pater ducem monuit per quietem ſepeliri delicias ſuas ſineret, nec prius deſtitit, &c. i. e. "Many have excelled in "eloquence amongſt the Romans, but this excellence was never hereditary except in the family "of the Curio's, in which there were three Orators "ſucceſſively. This was accounted a great thing in "that Age, when eloquence was admired both by "Gods and men; for at that time Apollo diſcovered "the aſſaſſins of the Poet Archilochus, and the fact "of the villains was revealed by a God; and when "Lyſander the Lacedæmonian beſieged Athens, "where the body of Sophocles the Tragedian lay "unburied, Bacchus admoniſhed the General in "a dream to ſuffer his favourite to be buried." Salmaſius obſerves, that one of theſe Curio's lived in the reign of Julius Cæſar, that Archilochus lived in the time of Tarquinius Superbus, and that Sophocles lived above two Ages after Archilochus (9). He is in the right then to laugh at Solinus; but he is in the wrong to place Archilochus in the time of Tarquinius Superbus, who reigned from the third year of the 61ſt Olympiad, to the laſt year of the 67th. He is in the wrong, I ſay, to place him there, ſince in another place he fixes him about the 29th Olympiad. Circiter vigeſimam nonam Olympiadem inclaruit Archilochus (10). Having committed the fault of making Archilochus and the laſt King of Rome contemporary, he ought not to have imagined that there were 200 years between Archilochus and Sophocles; for the death of the laſt happened about the 92d Olympiad. Another great man (11) ſuffered himſelf to be carried too far with the deſire of cenſuring, when he imputed to Herodotus, the having made uſe of a pitiful reaſon to prove that Archilochus lived under Gyges, namely, that Archilochus has made mention of this King. I confeſs this reaſoning would be abſurd; but it is not true that Herodotus has made uſe of it: he has only ſuppoſed it, he has drawn no conſequence from it. Τοῦ δ' Ἀρχίλοχος ὁ Πάριος κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν χρόνον γενόμενος ἐν ἰάμβοισι τριμέτρου ἐπεμνήσθη (12). i. e. "Of which "Archilochus the Parian, who lived at the ſame time, "has made mention in his Iambicks."

(2) See Voſſius, de Poët. Græcis, pag. 14.

(3) Anonymus in Deſcrip. Olymp. apud Voſſium, de Poet. Græcis, pag. 14.

(4) Cicero, Tuſculan. 1. cap. 1.

(5) Cornel. Nepos, apud Gellium, lib. 17. cap. 21.

(6) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 13.

(7) See Sethus Calviſius, ad ann. Mundi 3239, p. 65.

(8) Solinus, cap. 2. ſub fin.

(9) Salmaſ. Plin. Exerc. p. 52.

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 854.

(11) Scaliger in Euſeb. p. 57, 58, edit. ann. 1658.

(12) Herod. lib. 1. cap. 12.

[C] The character of his Poetry was an extraordinary overflowing of ſlander.] Hence it comes that Horace has conſidered Archilochus as a man full of rage, Archilochum proprio rabies armavit iambo (13).

That is,

"Rage with Iambicks arm'd Archilochus."
Ld. Roſcommon.

(13) Horat. de Arte Poetica, ver. 79.

And when any one had a mind to give an idea of a Satyr ſuperlatively ſevere, he ſaid it reſembled thoſe of Archilochus:

In malos aſperrimos
Parata tollo cornua,
Qualis Lycambe ſpretus infido gener (14).

That is,

"I'm ſtill prepar'd to ſtrike the blow,
"As ſharp as fierce Archilochus's ſong." Creech.

(14) Idem, Epod. 6, ver. 13.

Ovid, in the ſame ſpirit, has uſed this menace:

Poſtmodo ſi pergas, in te mihi liber iambus
Tincta Lycambeo ſanguine tela dabit.

That is,

"Stain'd with Lycambes blood my arrows fly,
"Which free Iambics to my rage ſupply.

It

indignation of this Poet aroſe from his not keeping his word. Lycambes had promiſed him his daughter, and had afterwards refuſed her to him. Archilochus took the thing ſo to heart, whether he loved the Fair one, or whether ſome particular contempt had been added to the refuſal, ſo that he collected all the fury of his ſpleen to defame Lycambes. It is probable that he involved all the family under theſe paſquinades; for they pretend that the daughter followed the example of her father; and there are ſome who affirm that three of Lycambes's daughters died of deſpair at the ſame time [D]. He publiſhed adventures perhaps equally defaming and diſtant from the knowledge of the publick. At leaſt there ſeem to have been very ſmutty paſſages in this Poem; for it was on account of this Satyr that the Lacedæmonians prohibited the verſes of Archilochus [E], after having conſidered that ſuch reading was very little agreeable to modeſty. Some have ſaid that he himſelf was baniſhed from Lacedæmon (b); but the maxim that he had inſerted in his verſes, is aſſigned for the reaſon of it, that it was better to fling down one's arms, than to loſe one's life. He had written that for his juſtification (c). His abuſiveneſs, which ſometimes injured him in his own circumſtances [F], and extended even to his own perſon [G], (b) Plutarch. Inſtit. Lacon. p. 239.

(c) See the note [C].

It is in his Poem in Ibin, Verſ. 51. a work ſo full of railing, that thoſe who have thought it was made in imitation of Archilochus (15), would be excuſable, if it was not eaſy to know by theſe two verſes, Verſ. 53.

Nunc quo Battiades inimicum devovet Ibin,
Hoc ego devovco teque tuoſque modo,

That is,

"What fate Battiades on Ibis ſends,
"The ſame ſhall fall on thee and all thy friends," that Ovid propoſed to himſelf the imitation of the Poet Callimachus. There are I know not how many proverbs, that eterniſe the railing humour of our Poet: Archilochia edicta, Ἀρχίλοχοι πατεῖν, Archilochum teris, &c. We find the firſt in Cicero, who intends by it the Edicts that the Conſul Bibulus publiſhed. This poor Conſul, not daring to go out of his houſe, retained no other ſhadow of authority, than the revenging himſelf by ſome Paſquinades, wherein he diſplayed the moſt infamous debauches of Cæſar, and abuſed his enemies. In eam coëgit deſperationem, ut quoad poteſtate abiret, domo abditus, nihil aliud quam per edicta nunciaret (16). This is what Cicero called Archilochia edicta, which pleaſed the people ſo much, that there was no getting thro' the crowds in the ſtreets, where they were fixt up; for they thronged ſo to read them, that Pompey was ready to burſt with vexation. Archilochia in illum Bibuli edicta ita populo ſunt jucunda, ut eum locum ubi proponuntur præ multitudine eorum qui legunt præterire nequeamus, ita ipſi acerba ut tabeſcat dolore, mihi mehercule moleſta, quod & eum quem ſemper dilexi nimis excruciant (17). Plutarch ſpeaks thus of theſe Edicts of Bibulus: Βίβλος μὲν εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν κατακλεισάμενος οὐδὲν μηνῶν ὃ προῆλθεν ὑπατεύων, ἀλλ' ἐξέπεμψε διαγράμματα βλασφημίας ἐμφορῆ ἔχοντα καὶ κατηγορίας (18). i. e. "Bibulus being "ſhut up in his houſe did not go out for eight months "during his Conſulſhip, but only put forth Edicts "full of reproaches and accuſations againſt both of "them," (Pompey and Cæſar). As for the proverb Archilochum teris, I do not believe it ſignifies, as Eraſmus has imagined, a Railer that treads in the ſteps of Archilochus, or that ſtudies his books; but a man, that having offended an Archilochus, ought to fear the fate of him that treads on a ſerpent, and immediately receives a mortal wound. See what Lucian puts in the mouth of Archilochus againſt one that had ſlandered him, Alis cicadam comprehendiſti (19), and you will not queſtion but Eraſmus's explication, how conformable ſo ever it may be to Suidas, is wrong. I do not deny however, that πατεῖν is ſometimes taken as terere for lectitare: ὁδ' Αἴσωπος πεπάτηκας, ſays Ariſtophanes in his Birds (20). There are ſome Epigrams in the Anthologia, which give us a ſtrong idea of the abuſive temper of this man. Cerberus is adviſed to be more watchful than ever, and to take care that he is not bitten, becauſe Archilochus is gone down to hell (21). We ſhall ſee in the note [G], that he ſlandered himſelf.

(15) Johannes Tortellius Aretinus, in Commentariis de Ortbographid, and Jacobus Lannius, Subſecivar. Lect. lib. 2. cap. 4. apud Dionyſ. Salvagnium Boeſſium, Comment. in Ibin, p. 25.

(16) Sueton. in Cæſar. cap. 20. Vide etiam cap. 49.

(17) Cicer. ad Attic. Epiſt. 21. lib. 2.

(18) Plut. in Pomp. p. 644.

(19) Lucian. in Pſeudol. tom. 2. pag. 548. See the Article of TETTIX.

(20) This was communicated to me by Mr. de la Monnoie.

(21) Anth. lib. 3. cap. 25. See alſo Salmaſ. Exercitat. Plinian. p. 394, 395.

[D] It is probable, ... that the three daughters of Lycambes died of deſpair at the ſame time.] I have ſaid, that Archilochus took the thing much to heart; but that was nothing in compariſon of his father-in-law, and his miſtreſs. He contented himſelf with a cruel Satyr; but Lycambes and his daughters found their conſolation only at the end of a halter. Horace ſpeaks of the hanging only of the father and of the daughter, who had been promiſed to Archilochus:

. . . . . Non res & agentia verba Lycamben.
. . . . . .
Nec ſocerum quærit, quem verſibus obliuat atris;
Nec ſponſæ laqueum famoſo carmine nectit (22).

That is,

"My muſe denounces not Lycambes fate,
"I with black lines aſperſe not thoſe I hate,
"No ſpouſe or father's death I meditate.

(22) Horat. Ep. 19. lib. 1. ver. 25, 30, 31.

It is in the Athologia, that the two and even the three daughters of Lycambes are ſaid to have hanged themſelves (23). See in the article of HIPPONAX (24) ſome inſtances of the fatal effects of Satyr. Let us not forget what one of the Scholiaſts of Horace has obſerved; that Neobule (ſo he names Archelaus's ſpouſe) did not hang herſelf becauſe of the Satyrs of her gallant, but for the regret ſhe conceived for the deplorable end of her father (25). Moſt readers will join with the Anthologia, where Archilochus is repreſented as the immediate cauſe.

(23) Anth. l. 3. cap. 25.

(24) Note [F].

(25) Scholiaſt. in Horatii, Epod. 6.

[E] It was on account of this Satyr, that the Lacedæmonians interdicted the verſes of Archilochus.] Valerius Maximus affirms this in expreſs terms. Lacedæmonii libros Archilochi è civitate ſua exportari juſſerunt, quod eorum parum verecundam ac pudicam lectionem arbitrabantur. Noluerunt enim ea liberorum ſuorum animos imbui, ne plus moribus noceret quam ingeniis prodeſſet. Itaque maximum poetam, aut certè ſummo proximum, quia domum ſibi inviſam obſcœnis maledictis laceraverat, carminum exilio multarunt (26). i. e. "The Lacedæmonians commanded the books of "Archilochus to be carried out of their city, becauſe "they thought the reading of them not to be very mo-"deſt or chaſte. For they were unwilling the minds "of their children ſhould be tinctured with them, "for fear they ſhould do more harm to their manners "than ſervice to their genius. And ſo they baniſhed "the verſes of the greateſt or at leaſt next to the "greateſt Poet, becauſe he had fallen upon a family "that was odious to him with obſcene abuſes.

(26) Val. Max. lib. 6. cap. 3.

[F] His abuſiveneſs ſometimes injured him in his own circumſtances.] I learn this particular from Pindar, for he affirms that Archilochus, tho' fattened with ſlander, yet was often reduced to great ſtraits.

Εἶδεν μὲν ἐκεῖνος ἐὼν τὰ πολλ'
ἐν ἀμαχανίᾳ
Φεύγοντ' Ἀρχίλοχον, βαιτυλόγοις ἔκθυσιν πιαινόμενον (27).

(27) Pindar. Pythior. Od. 2.

Aretius did not underſtand this paſſage, when he found this meaning in it, that Archilochus gained conſiderably by his ſlanders, and that they had raiſed him from a low condition to eminence and riches (28). The word πιαίνω, to fatten, was the cauſe of his miſtake: he ſhould have known that to fatten upon any thing, ſignifies literally to take a great delight in it. No doubt Ovid had his eye upon this paſſage of Pindar, when he ſaid in his Poem againſt Ibis, ver. 521.

Utque repertori nocuit pugnacis Iambi,
Sic ſit in exitium lingua proterva tuum.

(28) See Benedictus in Pindar. Od. 2. Pythior.

That

perſon [G], did not deprive him of the favour of Apollo, for when he had been killed in a combat, the Oracle of Delphi drove the murderer out of the temple [H], and was not appeaſed without a multitude of excuſes and prayers; and even after that he ordered him to go to a certain houſe, there to pacify the ghoſt of Archilochus (d). However he was fairly killed [I]. It was in Iambic verſes that this Poet excelled; he was the inventor of them [K], and one of the three Poets whom Ariſtarchus approved

(d) See the article TETTIX.

That is,

" May thy vile tongue in the ſame trap be caught
" With his, who firſt the keen Iambic taught.

We ſhall ſee in the note [H] that thoſe who ſay Archilochus's abuſiveneſs coſt him his life are miſtaken (29).

(29) Leſcalopier in Ciceron. de Nat. Deor. lib. 3. p. 703. Boeſſius, in Indice Comment. in Ibin.

[G] He extended his ſlanders even to his own perſon.] This Poet was ſo delighted with ſlander, that not content with reviling his neighbour, he ſpoke evil of himſelf too (30). This is what Critias blames him for (31): We ſhould not have known if it had not been for him, ſays Critias, that his mother Enipone was a ſlave; that he was forced by his miſerable condition to quit the iſle of Paros, and go from thence to Thaſus; that he made himſelf hated there, that he abuſed both friends and enemies; that he was extremely given to the debauching of women, and very inſolent; and, what is worſe than all (32) that he had thrown away his ſhield. The ſcholiaſt of Ariſtophanes informs us, that it was in the war againſt the Saïans, a people of Thrace, that Archilochus, to ſave his life, threw away his arms and fled (33). Ariſtophanes had made two verſes upon this Poet, on occaſion of this adventure (34), and upon this it is that his Scholiaſt has given us this information. Plutarch relates the ſame verſes, and ſomething more.

(30) See the paſſage of Plutarch, quoted in the note [M], citation (55).

(31) Apud Ælianum, Var. Hiſt. lib. 10. cap. 13.

(32) It is Critas that ſpeaks.

(33) Schol. Ariſtoph. in Comœd. de Pace. See alſo Strabo lib. 12. pag. 378.

(34) In Comœd. de Pace, circa fin.

Ἀσπὶδι μὲν Σαίων τις ἀγαλλεται ἣν παρὰ θάμνῳ
Ἔμπης ἀμώμητον κάλλιπον οὐκ ἐθέλων.
——————— Ἀσπὶς ἐκείνη
Ἐρρέτω· ἐξαῦθις κτήσομαι οὐ κακίω (35).

That is,

" Rejoice ſome Saïan, who my ſhield may find,
" Which in ſome hedge unhurt, I left behind.
" Farewell my ſhield: Now I my ſelf am free,
" I'll buy another full as good as thee.

(35) Plutarch. in Inſtitut. Lacon. pag. 239.

Notwithſtanding this, our run-away valued himſelf more as a ſoldier than as a Poet.

Εἰμὶ δ' ἐγὼ θεράπων μὲν Ἐνυαλίοιο ἄνακτος
Καὶ μουσέων ἐρατὸν δῶρον ἐπιστάμενος (36).

That is,

" I bow to royal Mars's mighty reign,
" And the ſweet doctrines of the muſe obtain.

(36) Athen. lib. 14. cap. 6. pag. 627, C.

Alcæus placed his qualifications after the ſame manner: he gave the firſt place to arms; and when he deſcribes his houſe (37), he does not ſpeak of books, but of helmets and bucklers: the whole ſavours of the arſenal, and not at all of the library. It is known however that he eſcaped out of a battle, not by means of his arms, but of his heels. See the note [B] of his Article.

(37) Ap. Athen. lib. 14. cap. 5.

[H] Apollo drove the murderer of Archilochus out of the temple of Delphi (38).] The name of him, who ſlew Archilochus, was Callondas Corax (39), and he was of the iſland Naxos. The Prieſteſs of Delphi drove him out of the temple, becauſe he had killed a man conſecrated to the muſes. Ἐκβλητὶς ὑπὸ τῆς Πυθίας ὡς ἱερὸν ἄνδρα τῶν μουσῶν ἀνηκόν (40). He had killed him however in the war, and fairly too, as we learn from Suidas more clearly than from Plutarch. Hence we muſt not be too fond of thinking Pliny very exact, when he tells us in the plural number, Archilochi Poetæ interfectores Apollo arguit Delphis (41). i. e. " Apollo called the murderers of Archilochus to ac" count at Delphi." Solinus his copyiſt, having a mind to paraphraſe, put himſelf quite out of reach of being excuſed: he has had the aſſurance to ſpecify that this Poet was killed by robbers. Percuſſores Archilochi Poëtæ Apollo prodidit, & latronum facinus Deo coarguente detectum (42). Euſebius quotes a Greek author, named Oenomaüs, who gives the name of Archias to the murderer of Archilochus. Quare, ſays he (43), qui Archilochum occidit Archias à templo quaſi ſceleſtus exire ab Apolline juſſus eſt: Muſarum enim ami-

(38) Plut. de iis qui ſerò a Numine puniuntur, p. 560; and fuſe Suidas in Ἀρχίλοχος.

(39) Iidem, ibid. vide etiam Plutarch. in Numa, pag. 62.

(40) Plutarch. de iis qui ſerò puniuntur, p. 560.

(41) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 29.

(42) Solin. cap. 1. pag. 11.

(43) Euſeb. Præpar. Evangel. lib. 5. cap. 23. quoted by F. Hardouin upon Pliny, tom. 2. pag. 124. Theſe are not the very words of Oenomaüs, it is only his thought.

cum occiderat: i. e. " Wherefore Archias, who ſlew
" Archilochus, was commanded by Apollo, to go out
" of the temple: for he had killed a friend of the
" Muſes." Galen has related the words of the oracle.

Μυσάων θεράποντα κατίκτανες· ἔξιθι νηοῦ (44).

That is,

" Thou murderer of the Muſes ſervant get thee out of " the Temple.

(44) Galen. in Suaſoria, tom. 2. cap. 9. pag. 10. apud Hardouin, ibid.

Apollo has been very much blamed for acknowledging him as a client of the Muſes, and for having highly praiſed a Poet who had written ſo many ſmutty things. Oenomaüs reproaches this God (45). Origen and Euſebius made uſe of it as a ſcandal to the Heathens. Τούτοις προσθῶμεν, ſays Euſebius (46), ὅσῳ δὲ ἂν ἄνδρα ὁ Ἀπόλλων θαυμαζοι τὸν Ἀρχίλοχον, ἀνδρα παντοίαις κατὰ γυναικῶν αἰσχρορρημοσύναις καὶ ἀῤῥητολογίαις ἀς οὐδ' ἀκοῦσαι τὶς σώφρων ἀνὴρ ὑπομείνειεν, ἐν τοῖς οἰκείοις ποιήμασι κεχρημένον. i. e. " Let us add to this how great" ly Apollo admires Archilochus, a man that has uſed
" ſuch ſhameful and obſcene expreſſions in his works
" againſt women, as a modeſt man cannot bear to
" hear." I do not tranſcribe the paſſage of Origen; it may be found in the third Book againſt Celſus, in the 125 page of the Cambridge Edition, in 1677.

(45) Oenomaüs, apud Origen. & Euſebium, Præpar. Evangel. lib. 5. c. 33.

(46) Ibid. cap. 32. p. 227.

[I] Archilochus was fairly killed in battle.] I have already ſaid that Suidas relates this more clearly than Plutarch; but I have ſomething more to ſay that is worth relating. There is a little treatiſe of Commonwealths, aſcribed to Heraclides: wherein is the order of the Prieſteſs of Delphi to the murderer of Archilochus, to go out of the Temple, with the anſwer of the murderer. This anſwer is an impenetrable Enigma in the Latin tranſlation. The tranſlator ſuppoſes this murderer to anſwer, I am innocent; for I killed him at a diſtance, as the law commands. I will ſet down the Greek and the Latin (47). Ἀρχίλοχον τὸν ποιητὴν Κόραξ ὄνομα ἔκτεινε, πρὸς ὃν φασιν εἶπειν τὴν Πυθίαν, ἔξιθι νηοῦ. τοῦτον δὲ εἶπειν, ἀλλὰ καθαρός εἰμι ἄναξ. ἐκ χειρῶν γὰρ νόμῳ ἔκτεινα. Quidam Corax dictus Archilochum Poetam interfecit. Itaque Pithi ad eum aiebat, exi Templo. Cui is reſpondit, at purus ſum, Rex, eminus enim, ut lex jubet, interfeci (Archilochum). One of my friends who is greatly skilled in polite literature (48), confeſſed to me, that he never heard any more than my ſelf, of an edict that excuſed murderers who killed at a diſtance, and that he did not think any more than my ſelf, that ἐκ χειρῶν ſignified eminus. As he is an intimate friend of Gronovius, he conſulted him upon this difficulty, and this is the anſwer of that learned profeſſor: ἐκ χειρῶν νόμῳ, locutio eſt propria in prælis occiſorum & occidentium. Quem in illo fervore vel gladius, vel alia machina, vel bellua deprehendens ad Orcum mittit, is trucidatur ἐκ χειρῶν νόμῳ. Ita omnes Græci & præſertim Polybius, ut libro 1. cap. 34. Καταπατήσωσι σαφῶς ἐν χειρῶν νόμῳ διαφθείροντο. Ὁ πάνυ (49) illic pugnantes: quod quidem non ſufficit, nam & in prælio multi poſſunt non pugnantes occidi, & tamen ἐν χειρῶν νόμῳ. Rurſus eodem libro cap. 57. Τοῦτους γὰρ αὐτοὺς ἄλλοι συνέκαιον διαφθείρειαν κατὰ τὰς συμπλοκὰς τοὺς ἐν χειρῶν νόμῳ πεπτωκότας. There remains no difficulty, after this learned anſwer: we ſay that Corax meant only that Archilochus was killed in fight, according to the laws of war.

(47) Juxta editionem Nicolai Cragii ad calcem Tractatus de Republica Lacedæmonior. pag. 19.

(48) Mr. Henricius, whoſe elogium may be ſeen in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Treatiſe that Mr. Gronovius publiſhed at Leyden in 1693, under the title of Diſquiſitio de Icuncula Smetiana, quam Harpocraten indigitarunt. I am glad of this opportunity of making a publick acknowledgment of Mr. Henricius's ſingular goodneſs in lending me the books of his excellent Library.

(49) That is Caſaubon.

[K] He excelled in Iambic verſes, of which he was the inventor.] This appears from theſe verſes of Horace in the XIXth Epiſtle of the 1ſt Book, ver. 23.

Parios ego primus Iambos
Oſtendi Latio, numeros animoſque ſecutus Archilochi:

That is,

" I firſt the Romans keen Iambics taught,
" In numerous ſmoothneſs, and in height of thought,
" I match'd Archilochus." Creech.

But

proved in this kind of Poetry (e). Quintilian puts him in ſome reſpect below the other two. Ariſtophanes the Grammarian, thought that the longer the Iambic Poems of Archilochus were, the finer they were [L]. The Hymn that he made upon Hercules and Iolaüs had this advantage, that they uſed to ſing it three times to the honour of thoſe, who had gained the victory at the Olympick games (f). There are very few of his works preſerved; which is rather a gain than a loſs, with regard to morality [M]. Thoſe who ſpeak of ſeveral Archilochus's, multiply beings without neceſſity [N]. If we had the dialogue compoſed by Heraclides upon the life of this Poet (g) we ſhould probably learn many particulars, and without doubt we ſhould find there how he led into the iſle of Thaſus a Colony of Parians (h). It was an honour to be choſen for ſuch an employment.

(e) See the note [K].

(f) Pindar Olympic. Od. 9. & ibi Joh. Benedictus. See alſo in the Chiliads of Eraſmus, Archilochi melos.

(g) Diogen. Laert. in Heraclid.

(h) Oenomaüs, apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evang. l. 6. c. 7. Vide etiam Perizon. in Ælian. lib. 10. c. 13.

But ſtill more clearly from this paſſage of Paterculus, Neque quemquam alium, cujus operis primus Auctor fuerit, in eo perfectiſſimum præter Homerum & Archilochum reperiemus (50). i. e. "Nor ſhall we find any one "to be abſolutely perfect in that ſort of work, of "which he is the Author, except Homer and Archi-"lochus." It is manifeſt that this Poet's ſtrength lay in Iambics. Ex tribus receptis Ariſtarchi judicio ſcriptoribus Iamborum ad illa maxime pertinebit unus Archilochus. Summa in hoc vis elocutionis, cum validæ tum breves vibranteſque ſententiæ, plurimum ſanguinis atque nervorum, adeò ut videatur quibuſdam quod quoquam minor eſt, materiæ eſſe non ingenii vitium (51). i. e. "Of the three received writers of Iambics in Ari-"ſtarchus's judgment the chief is Archilochus. He "has the greateſt force of elocution, his ſentences are "ſtrong, ſhort, piercing and nervous, ſo that in the opi-"nion of ſome, when he falls below any other, it is the "fault of the ſubject not of his genius." It is of this then that Paterculus has made him the inventor. He would have been the inventor alſo of Epick Poeſy, if what has been imputed to Terentianus was true: Doctrinæ laudem ei Terentianus tribuit, ut & Epicorum verſuum inventionem, lib. de metris pag. 86. i. e. "Te-"rentianus aſcribes the praiſe of learning to him, "and alſo the invention of Epic verſe." It is thus that Faber ſpeaks in his Theſaurus, in the Article of Archilochus; but it is eaſy to ſee, when one conſults the paſſage of Terentianus Maurus, that he ſpeaks of the Epode and not of Epick verſes. Beſides, it would not be certain that the place which concerns Archilochus made him the inventor of the Epode, if we did not learn this truth elſewhere (52). This place might appear a quotation, alledged as an example of the Epode ſpoken of in this place, which is an Hexameter verſe, followed with a half Pentameter;

Hoc doctum Archilochum tradunt genuiſſe Magiſtri
Tu mihi Flacce ſat es.

Lorenzo Fabri obſerves, that the Greeks had been ſix hundred years without any other verſes than Hexameters, till Archilochus produced others with ſo much ſucceſs, that every one attempted a different meaſure, whence the Greek Poeſy became ſo beautiful by this variety of verſification (53).

(50) Paterc. lib. 1. cap. 5.

(51) Cicero, Epiſt. 11. lib. 16. ad Attic.

(52) Of Marius Victorinus, Art. Grammat. lib. 3.

(53) Menetrier, Repreſentat. en Muſique, p. 245.

[L] The longer his Iambic Poems were, the better they were eſteemed.] Cicero informs us of this particular, by ſaying the very ſame thing of his friend Atticus's Epiſtles; Ut Ariſtophani Archilochi Iambus, ſic Epiſtola longiſſima quæque optima videtur (54). i. e. "The "longeſt of your Epiſtles ſeems to me the beſt, as "the Iambics of Archilochus did to Ariſtophanes." The ſame judgment has been made of the orations of Demoſthenes.

(54) Cicero, Epiſt. 11. lib. 16. ad Attic.

[M] There are very few of his works preſerved; which is rather a gain than a loſs, with regard to morality.] We ſhould find but very ill examples in the verſes of Archilochus. He had expreſſed a very violent concern for the loſs of his ſiſter's husband, who died at ſea. Here was a tenderneſs, that might have been rendred uſeful; but he made it degenerate into a pernicious maxim, namely, that he would ſeek for conſolation in wine, and other ſenſual pleaſures, ſeeing his tears could do no good to his brother-in-law, and his diverſions could not injure him.

Οὔτε τι τὸν κλαίων ἱκέσθαι, οὔτε κλαύσω
Θάψω, τέρπωλας δ' ἄλλοις ἰφθίμοις (55):

That is,

"For my dead brother tears would flow in vain;
"Nor can my pleaſures give him any pain."

(55) Plutarch. de audiend. Poetis, p. 33.

The worſt of all is that he made no difficulty of diſgracing himſelf, by ſtuffing his Poems with a thouſand filthy reflections upon the fair ſex. Τῶν ὑπ' Ἀρχιλόχῳ πρὸς τὰς γυναῖκας ἀκρήτως & ἀκολάστως ἰαμβίων, ἑαυτὸν παραδειγματίζοντος (56). See the uſe that Theodore Beza has made of this laſt word in his notes on the 1ſt Chapter of St. Matthew.

(56) Plut. de Curioſit. p. 520.

[N] Thoſe who ſpeak of ſeveral Archilochus's, multiply beings without neceſſity.] A paſſage of Euſebius wrong underſtood is the cauſe of mention being made of one Archilochus an Hiſtorian and Chronologer, to whom the impoſtor of Viterbo has had the aſſurance falſly to aſcribe a little book. Thus it ſtands in Euſebius, according to the Latin verſion, Licet Archilochus viceſimam tertiam Olympiadem . . . . . ſupputet (57). It is pretended by this means, that Archilochus computed time ſo as to place Homer in the 23d Olympiad. But Scaliger has ſhewn that Euſebius's Greek means only that there are ſome Authors who have made Homer and Archilochus flouriſh at the ſame time. Goropius Becanus had already cleared this up in the large and curious collection he had made upon Archilochus, in order to give a full confutation of the forgeries of Annius of Viterbo (58). Here then is Archilochus the pretended Chronologer reduced to nothing. Voſſius had better have followed this correction, than have put Archilochus among the Greek Hiſtorians (59). He adds that Scaliger places him under the reign of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes (60), without mentioning any further proof. I have not been able to find this in Scaliger's notes, which are quoted by Voſſius, and I believe it is not there. Voſſius, in another Book (61), having ſpoken of our Poet Archilochus under the 29th Olympiad, promiſes another under the 94th; but when we go to look for him, we only find one Antilochus. Charles Stephens, and Lloyd, and Hofman have given us an Archilochus a Lacedæmonian Poet, flouriſhing at Rome under Tullus Hoſtilius, and another Antilochus ſon of Neſtor, ſlain at the ſiege of Troy by Memnon. Theſe are all chimæra's: the laſt was named Archilochus: and a ſmall degree of attention would make one recollect that the court of the firſt Kings of Rome was no proper Theatre for Greek Poets. The greateſt part of theſe laſt faults are in Calepin.

(57) Euſeb. in Chron. ad ann. 908.

(58) Corop. Becanus, Origin. Antwerp. lib. 4. What he ſays thereupon, is to be found in the Biblioth. Hiſpanica of Schottus, pag. 375, &c.

(59) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 5.

(60) He mounted the throne in the 3d year of the 64th Olympiad. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 6.

(61) Voſſius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 14.

☞ ARCHIMEDES, a celebrated Geometrician, was born at Syracuſe, a city of great note in the iſland of Sicily. He was a relation and friend of Hiero, the King of that city (a). His ſkill in mechanicks has rendered him famous in hiſtory: for, by the engines he invented, Syracuſe was a long time defended when it was beſieged by Marcellus (b). At the taking of that city, this noble General commanded his ſoldiers to have a particular regard to the ſafety of Archimedes. But this care was in vain, for he was ſlain by a ſoldier, who did not know him [A]. He is ſaid to have formed

(a) Plutarch. in Marcello.

(b) See Livy, lib. 24. cap. 34. and Plutarch, in Marcello.

[A] He was ſlain by a ſoldier, who did not know him.] Plutarch (1) is very particular in the relation of this circumſtance. "What gave Marcellus, ſays "he (2), the greateſt concern, was the unhappy fate "of

(1) In Marcello.

(2) We make uſe of the tranſlation printed at London in 3 vol. 8vo 1727. vol. 3. pag. 227.

formed a glaſs ſphere, with a ſurprizing workmanſhip, wherein the motions of the heavenly bodies were ſhewn [B]. He was remarkable for an extraordinary cloſe attention to Mathematical ſtudies, and a ſingular delight in them [C]. We have ſeveral of his works preſerved, though many are loſt [D]. His monument

" of Archimedes, who was at that time in his Muſæ-
" um, and his mind, as well as eyes, ſo fixed and " intent upon ſome geometrical figures, that he nei" ther heard the noiſe and hurry of the Romans, nor " perceived that the city was taken. In this tranſport
" of ſtudy and contemplation, a ſoldier came ſudden-
" ly upon him, and commanded him to follow him
" to Marcellus; which he refuſing to do till he had
" finiſhed his Problem, and fitted it for demonſtration;
" the ſoldier, in a rage, drew his ſword and ran him
" through. Others write, that Archimedes ſeeing a
" ſoldier come with a drawn ſword to kill him, en-
" treated him to hold his hand one moment, that he " might not die with the regret of having left his
" Problem unfiniſhed, and the demonſtration imper-
" fect; but that the ſoldier, without any regard, either
" to his Problem or Demonſtration, killed him im" mediately. Others again write, that as Archime-
" des was carrying ſome mathematical inſtruments in
" a box to Marcellus, as ſun-dials, ſpheres, and an" gles, with which the eye might meaſure the mag" nitude of the Sun's body, ſome ſoldiers met him,
" and believing there was gold in it, ſlew him. But
" what is moſt certain, and wherein all Hiſtorians
" agree, is, that Marcellus was extremely concerned
" at his death; that he would not ſo much as look " upon his murderer, deteſting him as an execrable
" villain; and that having made a diligent enquiry
" after his relations, he granted them his protection,
" and ſhewed them many ſignal favours upon his ac" count." Livy (2) ſays he was ſlain by a ſoldier, who did not know who he was, whilſt he was drawing ſchemes in the duſt; that Marcellus was grieved at his death, and took care of his funeral; making his name at the ſame time a protection and honour to thoſe who could claim being related to him. Archimedem memoriæ proditum eſt, in tanto tumultu, quantum capta urbs in diſcurſu diripientium militum ciere poterat, intentum formis quas in pulvere deſcripſerat, ab ignaro milite, quis eſſet, interfectum. Ægre ia Marcellum tuliſſe, ſepulturæque curam habitam: & propinquis etiam inquiſitis honori præſidioque nomen ac memoriam ejus fuiſſe.

(2) Lib. 25. cap. 31.

[B] He is ſaid to have formed a glaſs ſphere &c.] Claudian has an Epigram on this invention:

Jupiter in parvo cum cerneret æthera vitro,
Riſit, & ad ſuperos talia dicta dedit;
Huccine mortalis progreſſa potentia curæ?
Jam meus in fragili luditur orbe labor.
Jura poli, rerumque fidem, legeſque deorum,
Ecce Syracuſius tranſtulit arte ſenex.
Incluſus variis famulatur ſpiritus aſtris,
Et vivum certis motibus urget opus.
Percurrit proprium mentitus ſignifer annum,
Et ſimulata novo Cynthia menſe redit.
Jamque ſuum volvens audax induſtria mundum
Gaudet & humana ſidera mente regit.
Quid falſo inſontem tonitru Salmonea miror?
Æmula naturæ parva reperta manus.

That is,

" When in a glaſs's narrow ſpace confin'd
" Jove ſaw the fabrick of th' Almighty Mind,
" He ſmil'd and ſaid, can mortal's art alone
" Our heav'nly labours mimick with their own?
" The Syracuſian's brittle world contains
" Th' eternal law, which thro' all nature reigns.
" Fram'd by his art ſee Stars unnumber'd burn,
" And in their courſes rolling orbs return.
" His Sun thro' various ſigns deſcribes the year,
" And ev'ry month his mimick Moons appear.
" Our rival's laws his little Planets bind,
" And rule their motions with a human mind.
" Salmoneus could our thunder imitate,
" But Archimedes can a world create.

(3) In Commentario, Ne ſuaviter quidem vivi poſſe ſecundum Epicuri decreta, decente, p. 1094.

[C] He was remarkable for an extraordinary cloſe attention to mathematical ſtudies, and a ſingular delight in them.] Plutarch (3) tells us " he uſed to be carried " to the baths by force, and whilſt the ſervants were " anointing him, he would be drawing lines upon his " body. It is ſaid that having one day diſcovered, " by the effuſion of the water on his going into the " bath, a method of finding out the quantity of gold " in a crown (4), he leaped out, and as if inſpired on " a ſudden by ſome divine fury, he ran about cry- " ing, I have found it. Ἀρχιμήδω ϗ βία τῶν διαγραμμάτων ἀποσπᾶσης σωήλειφεν οἱ θεράποντες. ὁ ϗ ἐπὶ τῆς κοιλίας ἔγραφε τὰ σχήματα τῷ σληγίδι, ϗ λιπόμενος, ὡς φάσιν, ἐκ τῆς ὑπερχύσεως εὑρήσας τὸν τοῦ στεφάνου μετρήσιν εἶτα ἐκ τίνος κατοχῆς ἢ ἐπιπνοίας ἐξήλατο βοῶν, Εὕρηκα.

(4) See the note [D].

[D] We have ſeveral of his works preſerved, tho' many are loſt.] Thoſe which remain are, περὶ τῆς σφαίρας ϗ κυλίνδρου βιβλία β, two books of the Sphere and Cylinder: κύκλου μέτρησις, the Dimenſion of a Circle: ἐπιπέδων ἰσορροπιῶν ἢ κέντρα βαρῶν ἐπιπέδων, of Centres of gravity or æquiponderants: περὶ κωνοειδέων καὶ σφαιροειδέων, of Sphæroids and Conoids: περὶ ἑλίκων, of Spiral Lines: τετραγωνισμὸς παραβολῆς, the Quadrature of a Parabola: ψαμμίτης, of the Number of the Sand: περὶ τῶν ὀχουμένων, of Bodies that float on fluids. Amongſt thoſe works of Archimedes which are loſt, we may reckon the deſcriptions of ſuch inventions as we can gather from himſelf, and other ancient Authors, theſe are 1, περὶ τῆς στέφανης, a Method to diſcover the mixture of gold and ſilver in a crown: Vitruvius (5) tells us, that " Hiero King of Syracuſe having a mind " to make an offering to the Gods of a golden crown, " agreed to have one made of great price, and weigh- " ed out the gold to the maker, who brought one " home of the full weight. It was afterwards diſco- " vered, that a quantity of the gold was ſtolen and made " up with a like weight of ſilver. Hiero being very " angry at this impoſition, deſired Archimedes to take " into conſideration, by what method ſuch a fraud " might be diſcovered for the future. Whilſt he " was engaged in the ſolution of this difficulty, he " happened to go into the bath, where obſerving that " a quantity of water overflowed, equal to the bulk " of his body, it immediately occurred to him, that " Hiero's queſtion might be anſwered by a like me- " thod, on which he leaped out and ran homewards, " crying εὕρηκα, εὕρηκα. He then made two maſſes, " each of equal weight with the crown, one of gold " and the other of ſilver. When he had done this, " he filled a large veſſel to the brim with water, and " put the ſilver maſs into it; upon which a quantity " of water overflowed, equal to the bulk of the maſs. " Then taking the maſs out, he filled up the veſſel " again, meaſuring the water exactly, which he put " in. This ſhewed him what meaſure of water an- " ſwered to a certain weight of ſilver. Then he " tried the gold in like manner, and found that it " cauſed a leſs quantity of water to overflow, the " gold being leſs in bulk than the ſilver, tho' of the " ſame weight. Then he filled the veſſel a third time, " and putting in the crown itſelf, he found that it " cauſed more water to overflow, than the golden " maſs of the ſame weight; whence he computed the " mixture of ſilver with the gold, and ſo manifeſtly " diſcovered the fraud." Hiero Syracuſii auctus regia poteſtate, rebus bene geſtis, cum auream coronam votivam, diis immortalibus in quodam fano conſtituiſſet ponendam, immani pretio locavit faciendam, & aurum ad ſacoma appendit redemptori. Is ad tempus, opus manufactum ſubtiliter, regi approbavit, & ad ſacoma pondus coronæ viſus eſt præſtitiſſe. Poſteaquam indicium eſt factum, dempto auro tantundem argenti in id coronarium opus admixtum eſſe, indignatus Hiero ſe contemptum, neque inveniens qua ratione id furtum deprehenderet, rogavit Archimedem, uti in ſe ſumeret ſibi de eo cogitationem. Tunc is cum haberet ejus rei curam, caſu venit in balneum ibique cum in ſolium deſcenderet, animadvertit quantum corporis ſui in eo infidret, tantum aquæ extra ſolium effluere. Itaque cum ejus rei rationem explicationis offendiſſet, non eſt moratus, ſed exiluit gaudio motus de ſolio, & nudus vadens domum verſus, ſignificabat clara voce inveniſſe quod quæreret.

(5) Vitruv. l. 9. cap. 3.

Nam

monument had a ſphere and a cylinder carved on it [E].

Nam currens identidem Græcè clamabat ἵυρηκα, ἵυρηκα. Tum verò ex eo inventionis ingreſſu duas dicitur feciſſe maſſas æquo pondere, quo etiam fuerat corona, unam ex auro, alteram ex argento. Cum ita feciſſet, vas amplum ad ſumma labra implevit aqua, in quo demiſit argenteam maſſam. Cujus quanta magnitudo in vaſe depreſſa eſt, tantum aquæ effluxit. Ita exempta maſſa, quanto minus factum fuerat refudit, ſextario menſus; ut eodem modo quo prius fuerat ad labra æquaretur. Ita ex eo invenit, quantum ad certum pondus argenti certa aquæ menſura reſponderet. Cum id expertus eſſet, tum auream maſſam ſimiliter pleno vaſe dimiſit, & ea exempta, eadem ratione menſura addita, invenit ex aqua non tantum defluxiſſe, ſed tantum minus, quantum minus magno corpore eodem pondere auri maſſa eſſet quam argenti. Poſtea verò repleto vaſe in eadem aqua ipſa corona demiſſa, invenit plus aquæ defluxiſſe in coronam, quam in auream eodem pondere maſſam, & ita ex eo quod plus defluxerat aquæ in corona quam in maſſa, ratiocinatus, deprehendit argenti in auro mixtionem, & manifeſtum furtum redemptoris.

2. The Κόχλια or Κόχλιον was an engine to drain water out of places where it ſtagnated. Athenæus (6) ſpeaking of the prodigious ſhip that was built by the order of Hiero, tells us that "Archimedes invented "an engine called Cochlion, by means of which the "hold, notwithſtanding its depth, could be drained "by one man. Diodorus Siculus (7) informs us, that Archimedes invented the Cochlea, to drain Egypt, which by a wonderful mechaniſm would empty the water from any depth. Ἀποφύσιοι γὰρ τὰς ῥύσεις τῶν ὑδάτων τοῖς Αἰγυπτιακοῖς λεγομένοις Κοχλίαις, οὓς Ἀρχιμήδης ὁ Συρακούσιος εὗρεν, ὅτε παρέβαλεν εἰς Αἴγυπτον. Διὰ δὲ τούτων συνεχῶς ἐκ διαδοχῆς παραδιδόντες μοχλὸν τοῦ καμόντος τῶν μετάλλων τόπον ἀναξηραίνουσι, ὃ κατασκευάζουσιν ἔντεχνον πρὸς τὴν τῆς ἐργασίας πραγματοῖαν. Φιλοτέχνου δ' ὄντος τοῦ ὀργάνου καθ' ὑπερβολὴν, διὰ τῆς τυχούσης ἐργασίας ἄπλετον ὕδωρ ἀναῤῥιπίζεται παραδόξως, ὃ πᾶν τὸ ποτάμιον ῥεῦμα ῥαδίως ἐκ βυθοῦ πρὸς τὴν ἐπιφάνειαν ἐκχύται Θαυμάσαι δ' ἄν τις εἰκότως τοῦ τεχνίτου τὴν ἐπίνοιαν, οὐ μόνον ἐν τούτοις, ἄλλα καὶ ἐν ἄλλοις πολλοῖς κ) μείζοσι, διαπρεπομένους κατὰ πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην.

3. The Ἕλιξ, by means of which (according to Athenæus (8) he launched Hiero's great ſhip. Κατασκευάσας ἕλικα, τὸ τηλικοῦτον σκάφος εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν κατήγαγε. πρῶτος δ' Ἀρχιμήδης εὗρε τὴν τῆς ἕλικος κατασκευήν.

4. The Τρίσπαστον or Τρίσπαστος, of the power of which Tzetzes (9) gives a hyperbolical relation.

Καὶ τῇ τρισπάστῳ μηχανῇ χειρὶ λαιᾷ κ' μόνῃ,
Πεντηκοντορίσμυρίμνιον καθεῖλκυσεν ὁλκάδα.

5. The Machines he uſed in the defence of Syracuſe againſt Marcellus. Of theſe we have a large account in Polybius, Livy and Plutarch.

6. His Burning-Glaſſes, with which he is ſaid to have ſet fire to the Roman gallies (10).

7. His Pneumatic and Hydraulic Engines, of which he wrote books, according to Tzetzes (11).

—— Πνευματικὴν, τὰς ὑδροσκοπικάς τε
Καὶ τούτῳ ὃ ἔγραψε τῶν βιβλων Ἀρχιμήδες.

8. The Sphere. See the note [B].

[E] His monument had a ſphere and a cylinder carved on it.] This remarkable monument, Tully informs us, was quite unknown at Syracuſe in his time, being overgrown with buſhes. But when he was Quæſtor there, he found it out and cauſed the palace to be cleared. There was an inſcription upon it, but the latter part of all the verſes was conſumed. Cujus ego Quæſtor, ſays he (12), ignoratum ab Syracuſanis, cum eſſe omnino negarent, ſeptum undique, & veſtitum vepribus, & dumetis indagavi ſepulchrum. Tenebam enim quoſdam ſenariolos, quos in ejus monumento eſſe inſcriptos acceperam; qui declarabant, in ſummo ſepulchro ſphæram eſſe poſitam cum cylindro. Ego autem, cum omnia colluſtrarem oculis (eſt enim ad portas Agragianas magna frequentia ſepulchrorum) animadverti columellam non multum è dumis eminentem, in qua inerat ſphæræ figura, & cylindri. Atque ego ſtatim Syracuſanis (erant autem principes mecum) dixi, me illud ipſum arbitrari eſſe, quod quærerem. Immiſſi cum falcibus multi purgarunt & apparuerunt locum. Quo cum patefactus eſſet aditus, ad adverſam baſim acceſſimus, apparebat epigramma exeſis poſterioribus partibus verſiculorum, dimidiatis fere. Ita nobiliſſima Græciæ civitas, quondam verò etiam doctiſſima, ſui civis unius acutiſſimi monumentum ignoraſſet, niſi ab homine Arpinate didiciſſet.

(6) Athen. Δειπνοσοφιστῶν, lib. 5.

(7) Diod. Sicul. lib. 5.

(8) Athen. Δειπνοσ. lib. 5.

(9) Tzetzes, Chil. 2. Hiſt. 35.

(10) Idem, ibid. Galen. περὶ κράσεων, lib. 3.

(11) Tzetzes, Chil. 2. Hiſt. 35.

(12) Cic. Tuſc. lib. 5.

ARCHIMELUS, a Greek Poet, flouriſhed in the time of Hiero King of Syracuſe [A]: which appears by the preſent he received from this Monarch. He had made an Epigram in praiſe of a ſhip of a prodigious bulk, that Hiero had built (a). This Epigram was worth a thouſand buſhels of corn to him, which this Prince ſent to him to the Piræum (b). Here then is a Poet to be ranked with thoſe few, who have found men of the humour of the Admiral de Joieuſe (c).

(c) The Admiral of this name gave an Abbey for a Sonnet. Balzac, Entret. 8.

(a) See the deſcription of it in Athenæus, book 5, pag. 206.

(b) Athen. pag. 209.

[A] He flouriſhed in the time of Hiero King of Syracuſe.] That is, about the year of Rome 520, and the 136th Olympiad. It is probable that he lived at Athens, ſince the corn that was given him for a preſent was carried to Piræum. I am ſurpriſed that Voſſius ſhould forget that there was ſuch Poet as this: the reward for his Epigram made him remarkable. Athenæus has preſerved the 18 verſes for which he was ſo largely paid (1). Monſieur Catherinot has not related faithfully the reward. Archimelus, ſays he (2), was regaled by King Hiero with ſix thouſand buſhels of corn, for an Epigram of 20 verſes upon his ſhip.

(1) Athen. lib. 5. pag. 209.

(2) Cather. Traité de la Marine, pag. 6.

ARCHIROTA (ALEXANDER) [A], Abbot of Olivet (a), was of Naples; he compoſed among other Books, a Collection of the Actions of the Kings mentioned in ſcripture [B], and dedicated it to the Queen of Poland, Bonna Sforza, who was then at Bari. She rewarded him with a penſion for life of 300 crowns a year. He lived a hundred and twenty years (b): M. Konig makes him to flouriſh in 1636, and attributes to him a Commentary upon the Books of Samuel, and of the Kings, and a treatiſe upon the vow of Poverty.

(a) A ſort of Monks in Italy.

(b) Lancelot de Perouſe, p. 987 of the book intitled, Chi l'indovina è ſavio.

[A] ALEXANDER.] Lancelot de Perouſe ſays in the body of his work intitled Chi l'indovina è ſavio, that this Author's name was Alexander: but in the margin and table of contents he calls him Agoſtino.

[B] A Collection of the Actions of the Kings mentioned in Scripture.] This work was compoſed in Italian. I do not know whether it is the ſame with that which is intitled Diſcorſi ſopra diverſi Luoghi della ſacra Scrittura. The Oxford Catalogue expreſſes its being divided into two parts, the firſt of which was printed at Florence, in 1581, in 8vo; and the ſecond, at the ſame place, in 1583, in 8vo. In the ſame Catalogue we ſee that the treatiſe de Voto Paupertatis appeared at Florence in 1580 in 8vo, and that the Author of theſe three books was named Alexander Archirola. I believe it ought to be Archirota.

☞ARCHYTAS of Tarentum, was the ſon of Mneſagoras, or according to Ariſtoxenus, of Heſtiæus (a). He was a Philoſopher of the Pythagoræan ſect, and a famous Aſtronomer and Geometrician. His doubling the cube is mentioned by Eutocius, and he was almoſt the firſt that brought down the Mathematicks to human uſes (b). He commanded the army ſeven times, and was never defeated. There are two Epiſtles preſerved in Diogenes Laertius, one from Achytas to Plato, and another from Plato to Archytas. He is ſaid to have made a wooden Pigeon that could fly (c). He was caſt away in the Adriatic Sea, and thrown on the ſhore of Apulia [A]. Diogenes Laertius mentions three of this name, beſides our Archytas; one of Mitylene, a Muſician; another a Writer on Agriculture (d); a third, an Epigrammatiſt.

(a) Diog. Laert. in Archyta.

(b) Whiſton, Introduction to Euclid's Elements, edit. Lond. 8vo, 1719.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. 10. cap. 12.

(d) He is mentioned by Varro and Columella.

[A] He was caſt away in the Adriatic Sea, and thrown on the ſhore of Apulia.] We find this in Horace (1): for that Poet being an Epicurean takes occaſion to ridicule Archytas, on his knowledge in Aſtrology, Geometry, and the Pythagorean Philoſophy:

(1) Horat. Od. 28. lib. 1.

Te maris & terræ numeroque carentis arenæ
Menſorem cohibet, Archyta,
Pulveris exigui prope littus parva Matinum
Munera: nec quidquam tibi prodeſt
Aërias tentaſſe domos, animoque rotundum
Percurriſſe polum, morituro.

That is;

"A narrow grave by the Matinian ſhore
"Confines thee now, and thou canſt have no more.
"Ah learn'd Archytas, ah how ſmall for thee,
"Whoſe wond'rous mind could meaſure Earth and Sea?
"What ſands make up the ſhore minutely teach,
"And count as far as number's ſelf could reach!
"What did it profit that thy nimble ſoul
"Had travell'd Heav'n, and oft ran round the Pole,
"Purſu'd the motions of the rowling light,
"When death came on, and ſpread a gloomy night."
Creech.

And a little after,

Me quoque devexi rapidus comes Orionis
Illyricis Notus obruit undis.

That is,

"A boiſterous ſtorm my feeble tackling tore,
"And left me naked on th' Illyrian ſhore:
Creech.

☞ARDSHIR ſurnamed Dirâz deſt, [Artaxerxes Longimanus,] King of Perſia. See BAHMAN.

☞ARDSHIR [or ARTAXERXES,] ſurnamed Babegân, King of Perſia, was the Prince who put an end to the Parthian monarchy, and reſtored the empire to the Perſians; or, as the Oriental Hiſtorians expreſs it, wreſted the crown from the race of Aſhghân, and founded a fourth royal family, named Sâſânians, who held the throne of Perſia till that country was conquered by the Arabs. He was the ſon of a private perſon, though deſcended, as is generally ſuppoſed, from a King of Perſia of the ſecond race [A], by the daughter of Bâbec, Governor of the Province of Farſiſtân, or Proper Perſia, under Ardawân, the reigning Prince at that time; and had the ſurname of Babegân from his maternal grandfather (a). Young Ardſhir being of an excellent natural diſpoſition, and educated with the utmoſt care, made ſo extraordinary a proficiency in all the exerciſes becoming a perſon of his birth, that the King hearing of it, would needs ſee him; and being greatly pleaſed with his behaviour, ordered him for the future to be brought up with his own children. One day, as Ardſhir accompanied the Princes to a hunting match, the King followed them to ſee what paſſed, and finding Ardſhir far ſurpaſſed his own ſons in grace and dexterity, as well in uſing the bow as in managing his horſe, conceived a jealouſy of him, and reſolved to ſend him from court, and accordingly gave him the command of ſome troops in a diſtant Province. There he continued till he received the news of his grandfather Bâbec's death, upon which he returned to court to beg his government, but could not obtain it; Ardawân having deſigned it for his eldeſt ſon. About this time the King had a dream, which, as he was told by thoſe whom he conſulted thereon, portended that ſome fugitive from his court ſhould deprive him of his crown. A young woman in the King's ſeraglio gave notice to Ardſhir, with whom ſhe held a private correſpondence, of this dream and its interpretation, and perſuaded him to make his eſcape with her, building great hopes on what was thereby foretold. Ardawân was acquainted with their flight, and began to fear the accompliſhment of his dream. Ardſhir, on the other hand, being arrived at Iſtakhr, the capital of Farſiſtân, was extremely well received by his grandfather's friends [B], who waited on him in great numbers, and offered to riſk their lives and fortunes in his ſervice; ſo that in a little time he was in a condition to make open war againſt the King's ſon, who bore the ſame name with his father, and was then Governor of the Province. Several battles were fought between them, but the laſt was deciſive, young Ardawân being ſlain therein. On the news of this defeat, the King himſelf

(a) Khondemir, e Tarik Gozideh, & Binakiti.

[A] He was the ſon of a private perſon, tho' deſcended, as is generally ſuppoſed, from a King of Perſia of the ſecond race.] Some (1) call Ardſhir's father Sâſân; but others (2) ſay Sâſân was the name of his grandfather, who was lineally deſcended from another of the ſame name, ſon to Bahman the ſixth King of the race of the Cayanians. Hiſtorians add, that this Sâſân, having either voluntarily reſigned his right of ſucceſſion, to lead a religious and contemplative life, or being diſinherited by Bahman in favour of his daughter Khamâni (3), left Perſia, and retired into a foreign country, whence one of his poſterity returning, entred into the ſervice of Babec, and, as ſome ſay (4), kept his ſheep; but his maſter ſoon diſcovered ſuch good qualities in him, that he gave him his only daughter in marriage (5).

(1) Lobb al tawarikh.
(2) Tarik Gozideh, & Binakiti, apud Khondemir.
(3) Al Beidawi, in Nodhâm al tawarikh, MS. See the Articles of BAHMAN and KHAMANI.
(4) Lobb al tawarikh, Khondemir.
(5) Supra citati hiſtorici, & Hezârſen.

[B] Ardſhir was extremely well received by his grandfather's friends.] The reaſon of this favourable reception, and the people's ſo readily embracing Ardſhir's party, was the great reſpect they had for the memory of Babec, who had governed them with great juſtice and humanity, and exerciſed none of thoſe violences and tyrannical acts for which the Princes of the race of Aſhghân were ſo infamous (6).

(6) Al Beidawi, ubi ſupra.

ſelf marched againſt Ardſhir with all his forces, but had no better fortune than his ſon, loſing the battle and his life at the ſame time. Ardſhir after this victory, which reſtored him the throne of his anceſtors, took the title of Shâhinſhâh, i. e. King of Kings, or Emperor, and extended his conqueſts on every ſide. This Prince is ſaid to have poſſeſſed all military and civil virtues in ſo high a degree, that he became the model of ſuch of his ſucceſſors as had the good of their people at heart: and in reality, his great atchievements in war, tho' hiſtory ſpeaks of them in general only, the number of magnificent cities which he built, the prudent laws and regulations which he made in the ſtate (b), and the writings which he left behind him [C], give us an idea of a moſt accompliſhed Prince. To ſecure to himſelf the poſſeſſion of the crown, he married the daughter of Ardawân, his predeceſſor; but that Princeſs not being able to put off the affection ſhe bore to her own family, and having a ſecret averſion for the King her husband, laid a deſign to poiſon him, and to ſet one of her brothers on the throne: her plot, however, was diſcovered, and ſhe was found guilty, and delivered to one of the chief miniſters to be put to death. The miniſter, going to execute his orders, found the Queen to be with child, and conſidering that the King his maſter had no iſſue, reſolved to ſpare her life, to preſerve him an heir; and ſhe being delivered of a ſon, he brought the child up privately, and took great care of his education, till he at laſt preſented him to the King, as he was exerciſing himſelf at mall on horſeback according to the Perſian cuſtom, and diſcovered the ſecret to him. The King received his ſon with much pleaſure, and having commended the miniſter's prudence, and rewarded him proportionably to his ſervice, ordered the young Prince, who was named Shâbûr, or Sapores, to be treated in all reſpects according to his quality, and declared him his ſucceſſor (c). Ardſhir reigned thirty years (d) [D], as the beſt Hiſtorians agree; for the fourteen laſt of which he had been ſovereign of all Aſia, or, as the Perſians expreſs it, of the fourth part of the world (e).

(b) As to the reformation made by this Prince in religion, ſee the Article of ERDAVIRAF.

(c) Idem, apud D'Herbel. Bib. Orient. pag. 125. Al Beidawi, in Nodhâm al tawarikh, MS.

(d) Iidem, Hezarſen, MS.

(e) Al Beidawi, ubi ſupra.

[C] The writings which he left behind him.] He wrote a Gâr nâmeh, or Journal of his life, in which he ſet down his expeditions, conqueſts, private actions, and even his diſcourſe, without any diſguiſe; for he had ſo great an abhorrence to flattery, that he appointed one of his court to examine him every morning, and make him give an account of all he had ſaid or done the preceding day.

Beſides theſe Commentaries, he alſo left another work, entitled Adab al aiſh, or Rules of life, for the uſe of his ſucceſſors and ſubjects. This book Nuſhirwâu, one of his ſucceſſors, ordered to be copied and publiſhed, to re-eſtabliſh good order and policy in his dominions (7).

(7) Khondemir, apud D'Herbel. Biblioth. Orient. p. 125.

[D] Ardſhir reigned thirty years.] Eutychius places this Prince's reign too early, making him contemporary with the Emperor Commodus; whereas he obtained not the crown of Perſia, at the ſooneſt, before the reign of Caracalla, in the beginning of the third Century. Y.

☞ARETÆUS of Cappadocia was a Phyſician of the Sect of the Pneumatiſts (a). Authors differ very much about the age in which he lived. Some place him in the time of Auguſtus Cæſar [A], others after Galen [B]. Voſſius (b) is one of thoſe who make him very antient, and founds his conjecture on our Author's uſing the Ionic dialect, which, as this learned Critic obſerves, was out of uſe long before the time of the Cæſars. But he is evidently miſtaken [C]. It is more probable that he lived under Trajan or Adrian [D]. We

(a) This was firſt diſcovered by Mr. Le Clerc, Hiſt. de la Medicine, Part 2. liv. 4. Sect. 2. chap. 3. See an account of this Sect, under the Article of ATHENÆUS.

(b) Voſſius, de Philoſophia, cap. 13.

[A] Some place him in the time of Auguſtus Cæſar.] Mercklin (1) ſays he lived under the reign of Auguſtus, and at the ſame time, by a moſt unaccountable blunder, makes him contemporary with Strabo, who flouriſhed under Tiberius, and with Gregory Nazianzen, who flouriſhed under Valens and Theodoſius.

(1) Linden. renovat. p. 87.

[B] Others place him after Galen.] Thoſe who hold this opinion, found it chiefly on Galen's not having mentioned Aretæus. They think he would hardly have paſſed him over in ſilence, if he had written before his time, becauſe he is ſo frequent in the mention of other Pneumatiſts. To this it is anſwered (2), that we have not all the works of Galen, and beſides that it is not poſſible he ſhould quote all the Phyſicians that wrote before him. It was enough for him to ſpeak of the chief of each ſect, and ſo to quote only Athenæus and Archigenes, who were the moſt famous, and held the firſt place among the Pneumatiſts. They might alſo have been contemporaries, and ſo Galen could not have quoted him. It is farther obſerved (3), that the fragments of Archigenes, preſerved in Aëtius, are ſo like the writings of Aretæus, that we find in them not only the ſame method of cure, but alſo the ſame deſcriptions and obſervations, expreſſed almoſt in the very ſame words. Hence it is no wonder, if the fame of Archigenes, who practiſed Phyſick at Rome itſelf, exſtinguiſhed that of Aretæus, who was a more obſcure perſon, and wrote in a leſs faſhionable ſtyle.

(2) Le Clerc, Hiſt. de la Medicine, Part 2. liv. 4. Sect. 2. ch. 3.

(3) Wigan, de Aretæi ætate, pag. 15.

[C] Voſſius is miſtaken.] Mr. Menage (4) has ſhewn that the Ionic Dialect was uſed long after the time ſuppoſed by this Author. For Arrian wrote in it, as alſo one Cephalo, who, as well as Arrian, lived under Adrian, and is quoted by Suidas: it was uſed alſo by Dionyſius Mileſius, a contemporary of Philoſtratus, who lived under Severus. But what puts this out of diſpute, is that it appears from Aretæus himſelf, that he did not live before the time of Nero: for he mentions the Antidote of Vipers, which was the invention of Andromachus, Nero's Phyſician (5).

(4) In Amœnitat. Juris.

(5) See the Article of ANDROMACHUS.

[D] It is more probable that he lived under Trajan or Adrian.] The knowledge of his ſect proves, that he muſt have lived after Athenæus the founder of it, who is thought to be contemporary with Pliny, who flouriſhed under Veſpaſian. He is quoted by that Dioſcorides, who was Author of the Euporiſta, and dedicated his book to Andromachus. There were three Authors who bore the name of Dioſcorides. The firſt was ſurnamed Phacas, and lived in the time of Anthony and Cleopatra, with whom he was acquainted. The ſecond was the famous Author of the books on the Materia Medica; he was ſurnamed Anazarbæus, and wrote his books, in all probability, under the reign of Veſpaſian. The third, ſurnamed Alexandrinus and Junior, is ſaid by Galen to have lived a little before his time. The firſt can by no means be ſuppoſed to have lived till the time of Nero, whoſe Phyſician Andromachus was. And the ſtyle and manner of writing is ſo unlike what we find in the books on the Materia Medica, that we can hardly ſuppoſe them to be the compoſition of the ſecond Dioſcorides. It muſt then be the third, that wrote theſe Euporiſta, and lived a little before the time of Galen, who was born about the 15th year of Adrian. Andromachus the Archiater had a ſon of the ſame name, who might be the perſon to whom the Euporiſta were dedicated. Thus I think it is certain that our Aretæus muſt have lived between the reign of Veſpaſian and the latter

We have had but few editions of this valuable writer [E].

end of the reign of Adrian: and it ſeems to me very probable that it was under Trajan, in whoſe reign Archigenes alſo flouriſhed, who was probably contemporary with Aretæus.

[E] We have had but few editions of this valuable Writer.] The firſt was a Latin Tranſlation by Junius Paulus Craſſus, Profeſſor at Padua; printed at Venice in 1552, in 4to. In this edition the ſecond, third, fifth, ſixth and ſeventh chapters of the ſecond book περὶ χρονίων παθῶν θεραπείας are wanting. The firſt edition in Greek was that of Jacobus Goupylus, printed at Paris by Turnebus, in 1554, in 8vo. The ſame year a new edition of the tranſlation of Craſſus was publiſhed, with Annotations by G. M. T. (6): to this edition there was added alſo a verſion of the five books, omitted in the former edition by Craſſus. It was printed at Paris, in 8vo (7). This edition was reprinted by H. Stephens, in his Medicæ Artis Principes (8), but without the Annotations. After this, a new edition of the verſion of Craſſus came out, reviſed by himſelf, with a tranſlation alſo of the five books, which he had omitted in his firſt edition (9). It was publiſhed after his death by his ſon. In the year 1603, there came out a Greek and Latin edition (10), in folio, by Heniſchius, who pretends to have collated three Manuſcripts, the Venetian, the Bavarian and the Auguſtan: but, as Dr. Wigan (11) obſerves, tho' he had inſpected theſe three Manuſcripts, yet he does not ſeem to have amended the text in any one place, and has even tranſcribed the typographical errors in the edition of Goupylus, and ſuffered ſeveral new ones to creep in, and at the ſame time has left the Latin verſion without the leaſt emendation. Mercklin (12) mentions an edition in Greek and Latin at Paris in 4to, without aſſigning any date, and ſays it is illuſtrated with the annotations of Peter Petit: but there is good reaſon to believe this edition never was printed, and that Mercklin took it upon truſt from Mr. Menage, who mentions ſuch a book, as being ſoon to be publiſhed (13). Beſides theſe, we have an elegant and correct edition of Aretæus, publiſhed at Oxford, in 1723, in folio, by Dr. Wigan, who collated a manuſcript in the Library of the preſent Earl of Oxford, and procured the collation of that in the Vatican Library, and made a new tranſlation. In his Preface he gives an account of the ſeveral editions of this Author, which we have followed in this note. To this are ſubjoined Diſſertations on the age of Aretæus, his ſect, his ſkill in Anatomy, and his method of cure. At the end is a large collection of various Readings, with Notes on them; a treatiſe on the Author's Ionic Dialect, and a Greek Index, by the learned Mr. Mattaire: to which are added an Appendix to the Greek Index, containing chiefly the phyſical terms, made uſe of by Aretæus, and a Latin Index. There has been alſo lately publiſhed another edition by the learned Profeſſor Boerhaave (14). In this the Greek text is the ſame with that in the edition of Goupylus: and the Latin verſion is that of the anonymous Author mentioned above. In the Notes we have about fifty emendations which Joſeph Scaliger had written in the margin of a copy of Heniſchius's edition, now in the Library of the Univerſity of Leyden, and the emendations and various readings of Goupylus, Heniſchius and Petit. After the text of Aretæus our learned Editor has added the whole Comment of the famous M. Petit (15), which had been long lamented by the learned, being ſuppoſed to be loſt; the ſeveral improvements of Dr. Wigan, for which he had the leave of that learned Editor; the Conjectures and Emendations of the learned Triller, publiſhed by him in the Acta Lipſienſia; and a copious Index by the diligent Pellerinus.

(6) Dr. Wigan thinks this anonymous author was Goupylus, Præf. Aret. pag. 3. but M. Petit affirms it was Celſus Craſſus, the ſon of Junius.

(7) Apud Guliel-mum Morelium, & Jacobum Puteanum.

(8) Anno 1567, in folio.

(9) Baſileæ, ap. Petrum Pernam, 1581, in 4to. His Epiſtle to the Reader is dated in 1555.

(10) Auguſtæ Vindelicorum, ap. Georgium Willerum.

(11) Præfat. pag. 4.

(12) Linden. renovat. p. 87.

(13) Menagius ad Laert. edit. 1692, p. 253.

(14) Printed at Leyden in 1731, by Peter Vander Aa.

(15) The emendations made by this author are founded on the authority of three manuſcripts, as he himſelf tells us in his Preface.

☞ ARETAPHILA, a Lady of diſtinguiſhed fortitude in the time of the Mithridatic War. She was daughter of Æglator, and wife of Phædimus. Her beauty and knowledge in the management of civil affairs were very remarkable; and the calamities, in which her country was involved, rendered her merit more conſpicuous. For Nicocrates having ſeized the government of Cyrene in Libya, among many other acts of cruelty [A], killed Menalippus the Prieſt of Apollo with his own hand, and took poſſeſſion of the Prieſthood, and put Phædimus the huſband of Aretaphila to death, and obliged her to marry him. Aretaphila, regardleſs of her own intereſt [B], reſolved to revenge the injuries done to her country, and to diſpatch the Tyrant; for which purpoſe ſhe prepared poiſon, but being diſcovered, her huſband, at the inſtigation of his mother Calbia, a woman of an implacable diſpoſition, ordered that ſhe ſhould be put to the torture. Upon this ſhe confeſſed, that ſhe had indeed prepared poiſon, but inſiſted that it was not of a deadly nature, and only a mere love potion [C]; and bore the torture with ſuch reſolution, that ſhe was acquitted of the crime. This however did not prevent her from trying another method

[A] Among many other acts of cruelty.] In order to ſecure himſelf in the poſſeſſion of his government, he deſtroyed a great number of the citizens. He introduced a great many things, which were contrary to the laws; and in particular appointed centinels to ſtand at the gates of the city, to examine whether thoſe, who were carried out, were really dead, by wounding their bodies with ſwords, and burning them with fire, in order to prevent any of the citizens from eſcaping, under ſuch a diſguiſe (1).

(1) Plutarch. de Virtut. Mulierum.

[B] Regardleſs of her own intereſt.] Nicocrates had ſo great an affection for her, that tho' he was ſtern and inexorable to every other perſon, yet he behaved with the utmoſt humanity to her, and ſuffered her to enjoy a very large ſhare in his power. But this did not abate of her regard for her country, or the pain ſhe felt in viewing the diſtreſſes, which it laboured under. She obſerved, that the citizens were deſtroyed one after another without any proſpect of revenge; and very little aſſiſtance could be expected from the exiles, who were diſperſed in ſeveral parts, and could not unite in ſuch a manner as to be able to attempt any thing of importance. Aretaphila therefore being deſtitute of all other methods, determined upon poiſon as the moſt effectual, and ſacrificed all conſiderations of her own ſafety to the generous regard, which ſhe had for her country.

[C] She confeſſed that ſhe had prepared poiſon, but inſiſted, that . . . . it was only a love potion.] When her deſign was detected, and Calbia urged Nicocrates to put her to death immediately, his great love for Aretaphila occaſioned him to defer the execution of her as long as poſſible; and he was the more inclined to ſpare her, becauſe ſhe reſolutely denied the crime. But when ſhe ſaw that there was ſtrong evidence againſt her, ſhe told him, that as ſhe had enjoyed a great ſhare in his favour, and by that means had a very conſiderable authority, this had expoſed her to the hatred of ſeveral Ladies; and therefore being apprehenſive of their arts to draw over his affection to them, ſhe had determined to prepare a love potion to ſecure him to herſelf. This ſhe owned might be conſidered as a piece of very weak conduct in her; however ſhe hoped, that her too violent love for him would not ſubject her to the puniſhment of death. Nicocrates thought proper to put her to the torture, to ſee whether ſhe would perſiſt in this defence, and Calbia was appointed to preſide at the tryal. But Aretaphila bore the torments with ſuch undaunted reſolution, that Calbia notwithſtanding her cruel temper, was abſolutely tired out with viewing the torture, and Nicocrates being convinced of her innocence, acquitted her, and repented of his ſeverity; and after ſome time came to her, and endeavoured by all the gentle methods imaginable to regain her affections.

method of deſtroying Nicocrates, which was by engaging Leander his brother in her intereſt [D], to whom ſhe promiſed her daughter in marriage. He was prevailed upon to procure his brother to be aſſaſſinated by a ſervant, whoſe name was Daphnis. But when he began to act like his predeceſſor in an imperious and tyrannical manner, ſhe took meaſures to deſtroy him likewiſe, which ſhe at laſt effected by means of Anabus, a Prince of Libya [E]. The people of Cyrene being thus reſcued from tyranny offered to give Aretaphila a ſhare in their government in conjunction with their Magiſtrates. But ſhe rejected this offer, and having had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the city reſtored to its former liberty, ſhe retired from all publick affairs, and ſpent the remainder of her life after a private manner in the converſation of her friends, and the management of her domeſtick employments (a).

(a) Plutarch. de Virtutibus Mulierum.

[D] By engaging Leander his brother in her intereſt.] She had a daughter who was extremely beautiful, whom ſhe ſent to Leander, in order that by the force of her charms, ſhe might prevail upon the youth to enter into her deſign. It was reported, that Aretaphila had made uſe of magical methods, that ſhe might engage his affections to the young Lady. After Leander had obtained with great difficulty his brother's conſent for the marriage, he was induced to reſolve upon the deſtruction of Nicocrates, partly by the ſollicitations of his wife, who had inſtructions from her mother how to act, and who urged him to reſtore liberty to the city, ſince under ſuch a tyranny he could not poſſibly enjoy ſufficient freedom; and partly by the perſuaſions of Aretaphila's friends, who were perpetually ſuggeſting to him all the diſadvantageous things imaginable againſt his brother, and raiſing ſuſpicions in his mind of the danger, which he might apprehend from him.

[E] Which ſhe at laſt affected by means of Anabus, a Prince of Libya.] Aretaphila enjoyed a great ſhare of power under the government of Leander, whom ſhe did not oppoſe openly, but took all the ſecret methods imaginable to procure his ruin. She firſt raiſed a war in Africa againſt him, having engaged Anabus to make an incurſion into his country, and to come even to the city in an hoſtile manner. She then complained to her ſon-in-law of his friends and Generals, as men of no reſolution or conduct in the war, but more inclined to peace, which ſhe acknowledged indeed was neceſſary for his intereſt, if he propoſed to maintain his authority in the city, firm and unſhaken. She promiſed therefore, that ſhe would procure a pacification if he thought proper, and engage Anabus to treat with him, ſince there might be very great danger from continuing the war. Leander conſented immediately, that ſhe ſhould undertake this negotiation; upon which ſhe had firſt a conference with Anabus, whom ſhe prevailed upon by a great many conſiderable preſents and promiſes to engage, that he would ſieze upon Leander, when he came to treat with him. Leander was very unwilling to go, and yet he could not avoid it out of regard to Aretaphila, who had promiſed that ſhe would be preſent at the conference; and accordingly he went without arms or guards. But when he came in ſight of Anabus, he ſtop'd, and ſeem'd to wait for his guards; upon which Aretaphila went to him, and urged him to go on to the conference; and when he ſtill delayed, ſhe took him by the hand, and forced him thither, and delivered him to Anabus. Leander was immediately ſeized by the Africans, and kept in chains, till Aretaphila's friends with the reſt of the citizens brought the money, which ſhe had promiſed. For moſt of the citizens, when they heard of this affair, came out to the place deſign'd for the conference. In the evening they returned with Leander into the city; and having paid the higheſt honours to Aretaphila for reſtoring their liberties, they ordered Calbia to be burnt alive, and the Tyrant to be put into a ſack, and thrown into the ſea. In the Edition of Moreri publiſhed at Paris in 1732, we are told that it was Anabus, who order'd him to be puniſhed in this manner, which is one of the infinite number of miſtakes, with which that book abounds. T.

ARETIN (CHARLES) was of Arezzo in Tuſcany, as his ſurname ſhews; (which may be ſaid for all the others who have been named Aretin.) He held a conſiderable rank among the learned men of the fifteenth Century. Poggius gives him great praiſes (a); but they ought to be ſuſpected, becauſe Charles Aretin was a great enemy of Philelphus, and Poggius mortally hated Philelphus. This laſt complains bitterly of our Aretin, and repreſents him as a wicked man, full of fraud and malicious cunning (b). That alſo ought to be ſuſpected, coming from ſuch an enemy as Philelphus, who being naturally abuſive, was become more ſo by the quarrels he had with ſome other learned men. There are ſome diſintereſted people however, who ſay that Charles Aretin underſtood Latin and Greek perfectly, and that he has ſhewn this by ſome tranſlations out of the Greek (c). He was alſo a pretty good Poet [A], and has written ſome Comedies in proſe, of which Albert de Eyb has inſerted ſome fragments in his Margarita Poetica (d). But what is the moſt evident proof of his ability is, that after the death of Leonard Aretin in 1443, he was choſen to ſucceed him in the office of Secretary of the Republick of Florence [B]. We do not know the year of his death; but it is certain that Moreri is

(a) Poggius, init. Hiſt. Diſcept. and 11 Invect. in Philelph.

(b) Philelphi, Epiſt. ad Carol. Aretin. an. 1433, & Epiſt. ſeq.

(c) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. p. 96.

(d) Geſneri Bibliothec.

[A] He was a pretty good Poet.] We muſt underſtand this with regard to that time: And I am afraid that even with this reſtriction, I ſhall not be able to make my text generally appear well grounded; for Mr. de la Monnoie has written to me as follows: Lilius Gyraldus, who ſaw the Poems of Charles Aretin, did not approve of them, and in truth by the quotations we ſee of them in Tortellius's Dictionary, we may judge there is but little in them. Note that Tortellius quotes only ſome Elegiac Verſes; but F. Labbe * quotes in two or three places a verſion of the Batrachomyomachia in hexameter verſe by Charles Aretin.

* Labbe, Nova Bibliotheca MSS.

[B] He was choſen to ſucceed Leonard Aretin in the office of Secretary of the Republick of Florence.] We learn this from Leander Albertus, Diem functus eſt (Leonardus Aretinus) anno poſt C. N. MCCCCXL, ætatis ſuæ LXXIV, Florentiæ, cum illi Reipublicæ diu à ſecretis fuiſſet, & ſucceſſorem in eo munere habuit Carolum item Aretinum, & Græcis Latiniſque literis eruditiſſimum, qui etiam ipſe quædam de Græcis Latina fecit (3). i. e. "Leonard Aretin died in 1440, in the "74th year of his age, at Florence, having been a "long time Secretary to that Republick. He was "ſucceeded in that office by Charles Aretin, who was "very learned in Greek and Latin, and tranſlated "ſome things out of Greek into Latin." Let us add to this teſtimony that of Æneas Silvius, tho' it be ſomething long; for it ſerves us as a proof of more than one thing. Commendanda eſt, ſays he (4), multis in rebus Florentinorum prudentia, tum maxime quod in legendis Cancellariis non juris ſcientiam ut pleræque civitates, ſed oratoriam ſpectant, & quæ vocant humanitatis ſtudia. Norunt enim rectè ſcribendi dicendique artem non Bartolum aut Innocentium, ſed Tullium Quintilianumque tradere. Nos tres ex ea urbe cognovimus, Græcis & Latinis & conditorum operum famâ illuſtres, qui

(3) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. p. 96.

(4) Æn. Silvius, Hiſt. de Europâ, cap. 54.

is miſtaken when he ſays it was in 1443 [C]. The Authors whom he quotes do not ſay that our Aretin left a volume of Letters. Some are of opinion that he was brother to John Aretin (e), of whom we ſhall ſpeak in his proper place; but they are miſtaken. He envied very much the glory of Leonard Aretin his predeceſſor (f).

(e) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 579.

(f) See the note [H] of the Article of (LEONARD) ARETIN.

qui Cancellarium alius poſt alium tenuere, Leonardum & Carolum Aretinos, & Poggium ejuſdem Reipublicæ civem, qui Secretarius Apoſtolicus tribus quondam Romanis Pontificibus dictârat epiſtolas. i. e. "The diſcretion of the Florentines is in many things to be "commended, but above all becauſe in the choice of "their Chancellors they do not regard the knowledge "of Law, like other cities, but of Oratory and polite "Learning. For they know, that the art of ſpeaking and writing well is delivered not by a Bartolus "or an Innocent, but by a Tully and a Quintilian. "We have known three out of that city famous for the "Greek and Latin tongues and works of their own compoſing, who have been Chancellors ſucceſſively, Leonard and Charles Aretin, and Poggius a citizen of the "ſame Republic, who was Secretary to three Popes." We muſt correct by this paſſage the obſcurity or miſtake of another paſſage of Æneas Silvius, which has given Voſſius ſome trouble. This is the other paſſage: Leonardum Aretinum ex te primum ſenſi obiiſſe, qui Latium ornavit literis, quo nemo poſt Lactantium Ciceroni proximior fuit. Gaudeo Poggium ejus locum apud Florentinos tenere. Sed maluiſſem potius locum non vacaſſe, ne tanto ſplendore caruiſſet Hetruria (5). i. e. "I firſt underſtood from you, that Leonard Aretin "was dead, who adorned Italy with learning, than "whom none came nearer Cicero after Lactantius. "I am glad that Poggius has ſucceeded him at "Florence. But I had rather the place had not been "vacant, that Tuſcany might not have wanted ſo "great an honour." See the note [A] of the article of (Leonard) ARETIN.

(5) Æn. Silvius, Hiſt. de Europâ, cap. 51.

[C] Moreri was miſtaken when he ſaid that he died in 1443.] It is certain that Poggius ſucceeded our Aretin in the Secretaryſhip of Florence; and it appears by the Oration, wherein he congratulates Nicholas V on his promotion to the Papacy, that he had no employment at Florence in 1447 (6). We muſt ſay then, that in 1447, Charles Aretin was Secretary of Florence; for Leonard Aretin his predeceſſor was dead in 1443. But here follows a more demonſtrative proof of Moreri's miſtake. Poggius, in a letter written under the Pontificate of Nicholas V, mentions that Charles Aretin was come to ſee him. Quo primum anno, ſays he (7), Nicolaus Pontifex quintus peſtis cauſa, Fabrianum, Piceni oppidum ſeceſſit, cum me ad Terram novam natalem patriam cum familiâ contuliſſem; venit eò poſtmodum rogatus à me, qui Florentiam ob negotia publica adibat, Carolus Aretinus. What led Moreri into his miſtake is, that Voſſius (8) does not refute the German Author whom he quotes, and who has ſaid in his Collection of Births and Deaths, that Charles Aretin, an Orator and Hiſtorian, died in 1443, at the age of ſeventy four years. All this agrees ſo well with Leonard Aretin, that in all probability the German Author has confounded Charles with Leonard. However, Voſſius ought to have ſhewed him his miſtake, concerning the year of the death of our Aretin.

(6) That is the year of the election of Nicolas V.

(7) Poggius, init. Diſceptat. 1.

(8) Voſſius, de Hiſtoricis Latinis, pag. 578.

ARETIN (FRANCIS) lived in the fifteenth Century. He was a man of great reading, and a good Grecian. He tranſlated into Latin the Commentaries of St. Chryſoſtom upon St. John, and about twenty of the ſame Father's Homilies. He alſo tranſlated the Letters of Phalaris into Latin [A]. We have beſides of his compoſition a treatiſe de Balneis Puteolanis. John Anthony Campanus, who was a favourite of Pius III and of Sixtus IV, was one of his moſt intimate friends (a). Eraſmus did not eſteem the performance of our Aretin upon St. Chryſoſtom [B]. Some think that our Francis Aretin was the ſame perſon with the famous Civilian FRANCISCUS ARETINUS, who was of the family of the Accolti. But others can hardly be perſuaded to believe that the tranſlator of ſome works of St. Chryſoſtom, &c. is the ſame with Francis Accolti, whoſe Law works are filled with the groſſeſt barbariſms, without any ſhadow of the knowledge of Greek. I have ſome obſervations to produce thereupon, which may convince many perſons that there was but one Francis Aretin [C]. However, let us ſpeak of Aretin the Lawyer. He ſtudied at Sienna about the year 1443 (b), and afterwards

(a) Taken from Aubert le Mire, Auctar. de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 268.

(b) Panzirol de Clar. Legum Interpretib. lib. 2. cap. 103. p. 249, & ſeq.

[A] He tranſlated the Letters of Phalaris into Latin.] I have ſeen in a book printed in Germany in 1689 (1), ſeveral curious inquiries concerning theſe Letters; but I cannot forbear ſaying that the Author aſcribes to Leonard Aretin, what is due only to Francis. Latinè emiſit Leonhardus Aretinus Florentiæ 1480. We ſhall ſee in its proper place (2), that Leonard was not alive when this edition was publiſhed.

(1) Decas Decadum Joh. Alberti Fabricii, num. 8.

(2) In the note [G] of the article of (LEONARD) ARETIN.

[B] Eraſmus did not eſteem the performance of our Aretin upon St. Chryſoſtom.] He takes notice in two places of the miſtake, which this Author has committed about the word οἴησις *, in the verſion of the Comment on the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians. Quod attinet ad fidem bene reddendi Græca, magis peccatum eſt ab Aniano, Aretino, & cæteris, quam ab Oecolampadio, qui magis peccat feſtinatione quam imperitiâ. Verſionem Franciſci Aretini in priorem ad Corinthios habemus uſque ad cap. 30. Cepi guſtum quam ſcitè tractaſſet rem, & ecce in ipſo ſtatim limine, quod eſt τὸ τυφοῦσθαι καὶ χαυνοῦσθαι ἔρριψε πᾶσιν αὐτῶν, οἴησιν, ὄιησιν opinionem vertit pro arrogantia (3). He obſerves in another place (4), that Aretin had finiſhed the tranſlation of the Commentaries on the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, to the 20th Homily.

* He tranſlates οἴησις Opinion inſtead of Arrogance.

(3) Eraſm. Epiſt. 59. lib. 26. pag. 1478. See alſo Epiſt. 4. lib. 28. p. 1591.

(4) Pag. 1591.

[C] I have ſome obſervations to produce . . . . which may convince a good many . . . . that there is only one Francis Aretin.] Let us propoſe in the firſt place the doubt of Panzirolus. Liberalibus artibus imbutus non ſolum Latinis, ſed etiam Græcis literis operam dediſſe creditur, & Joannis Chryſoſtomi in D. Joannem & Epiſtolam primam Pauli ad Corinthios Commentaria Latina feciſſe, vereor tamen ne is ſit Accoltus, cum quæ in jure ſcripſit, illum ſtylum non oleant, neque ullum ſervent linguæ Græcæ veſtigium (5). i. e. "Being inſtructed in the liberal arts, he is thought to have "applied himſelf to the learning not only of Latin "but alſo of Greek, and to have tranſlated into Latin Chryſoſtom's Comments on St. John and the firſt "of St. Paul to the Corinthians; but I am afraid it "was not Accoltus, ſince what he wrote in Law "has nothing of that ſtyle, neither does it ſhew any "trace of the Greek tongue." Now let us ſee what Mr. de la Monnoie has written to me upon that doubt (6). "Francis Accolti of Arezzo, having written his "Counſels, and other works in Law, in a ſtyle "which ſhews not only an intire ignorance of Greek, "but alſo of Latin, I have queſtioned, as well as "Panzirolus, his being the ſame Francis d'Arezzo, "who has given us ſome Greek tranſlations, the ſtyle "of which is not inferior to that of moſt of the other "humaniſts of his time. I ſaw that the Lawyer "took the name of Accolti and the titles of Doctor "and Knight; whereas the Humaniſt was called ſimply Franciſcus Aretinus. However, having lately "ſeen a copy of the Epiſtles of Francis Philelphus, "printed at Venice, in fol. in 1502, which is a "very ſcarce edition, and larger than the others of "21 books, I have found in it wherewithal to clear "up my doubt, by reading ſeveral of theſe Epiſtles, "wherein the Author ſpeaks of one Francis d'Arezzo "his diſciple, equally ſkilled in the Law and the "Belles Lettres. The time and circumſtances ſhew "evidently

(5) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. lib. 2. cap. 103. p. 249.

(6) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

wards he taught Law there with ſuch a vivacity of genius, that they ſurnamed him the Prince of Subtilties, and Aretin's wit became a proverb. This talent of his principally ſhone in diſputes, for no body could withſtand him. He gave his advice with ſo much confidence, as to aſſure the clients they ſhould gain their cauſe; and experience did not contradict him; for it was a common ſaying at the bar, ſuch a cauſe has been condemned by Aretin, and therefore it muſt be loſt. He taught alſo in the Univerſity of Piſa, and in that of Ferrara. He was at Rome under the Pontificate of Sixtus the Fourth, and did not ſtay there long, for he ſoon ſaw that the great hopes that he had built upon his reputation would come to nothing. This Pope declared that he would willingly have given him the dignity of Cardinal, if he had not been afraid of injuring the publick by taking from the youth ſuch an excellent Profeſſor. When old age would not permit him to perform all the functions of his office any longer, they diſpenſed with his reading of Lectures, and continued his ſalary. But he did not quite give over going into the chair, and although his Lectures had no great ſpirit in them, yet he had many Auditors on account of his reputation. One day when the Students ran to ſome publick ſhews, he perceived that there

" evidently that it is he of whom Volaterranus, a " writer about the ſame time, makes mention at the " end of his 21ſt book. Beſides his Law Compoſi- " tions, his tranſlations of St. Chryſoſtom, of the Epi- " ſtles of Phalaris, and of thoſe of Diogenes the Cy- " nick, there is a treatiſe aſcribed to him of the " Baths of Puzzoli, which however he is not the Au- " thor of, but only dedicated them to Pope Pius II, " in an ill written Epiſtle. He had alſo compoſed a " book of the Life and Manners of St. Anthony " Archbiſhop of Florence. Philelphus in the 12th " Letter of the 17th book, ſpeaks of this work with " commendation. In the 28th book of the Letters " of the ſame Philelphus there are ſix addreſſed Fran- " ciſco Arretino, Equiti aurato ac Jureconſulto, at that " time Profeſſor of Law in the Univerſity of Sienna. " In moſt of his Letters he gives him great praiſes, " upon which may be made large abatements. Quaſi " dubitandum ſit, ſays he to him in the firſt, minus tibi " eſſe apud florentiſſimam iſtam Rempublicam ſecunda " omnia, qui vir in omni eruditionis ac ſapientiæ ge- " nere præſtantiſſimus ſis, atque ea virtute præditus, " quâ non modo ex hominibus hujuſce tempeſtatis nemini " cedis, ſed potes jure cum univerſa antiquitate de laude " contendere. i. e. " As if it were to be doubted that " all things ſucceed with you in that moſt flouriſh- " ing Republick, who are a man of the greateſt ex- " cellence in all kinds of learning and knowledge, " and of ſuch virtue, that you not only do not yield " to any men of the preſent age, but may alſo juſtly " diſpute the praiſe with all antiquity." " By the " third, dated the 8th of March 1468, it appears " that Francis d'Arezzo was at that time a little above " fifty years of age; which was the reaſon he made " uſe of to diſpenſe with being married. Upon " which Philelphus ſays to him very merrily: Nam " quod ais ſentire te debilitatas tibi eſſe corporis vires, " cum ſis quinquagenarius, aut paulo amplius, id nulla " tibi cauſa accidit alia, quam quod ætatis robur re- " miſeris ut quo tempore tendendus erat arcus, tum eum " tu maximè relaxaveris. Quod ſi eam ſervaſſes me- " diocritatem, quam & Philoſophi probant, & ego ſe- " cutus ſum, conſuluiſſes tu ſanè & poſteritati & tibi. i. e. " For as to what you ſay, that you perceive the " ſtrength of your body to be weakened, being fifty " years old or a little more, that happens only be- " cauſe you have abated a little of your ſtrength, ſo " that when the bow ought to be bent, you have " ſlackened it moſt. But if you had obſerved that " mediocrity, which even the Philoſophers approve, " and I have followed, you would have ſerved poſte- " rity and yourſelf." " In the 4th of the 28th, he " aſks him for ſome news about his ſtudies: Cæterum " cupio ex te noſſe quid rerum agas? Non enim ſatis " tuo præſtanti ingenio, ſingularique doctrinæ eſſe duco, " quod doceas leges, & jus civile, nam hæc jam tibi " nullius ſunt induſtriæ, cujus memoria divinâ eſt potius " quam humana. Majora quædam te arbitror medi- " tari, nec enim in eodem ſemper verſaris ludo, itaque " fieri non poteſt, quin aliquid novi ſemper cudas ex- " cudaſque. i. e. " But I deſire to know of you what " you are about; for I do not think it equal to your " excellent genius and ſingular learning, to teach the " common and civil Law; for theſe ſhew nothing " of induſtry in you, whoſe memory is rather divine " than human. I am of opinion that you have " greater things in your thoughts; for you are not " always upon the ſame thing, and ſo you muſt always " be ſtriking out ſomething new." " In the 5th, he de- " ſires him to get him copied upon parchment the " Hiſtory of Ammianus Marcellinus. In a Letter of " the 19th book, he propoſes to him to receive De- " metrius Caſtrenus of Conſtantinople at Sienna, at " the expence of the Republick, to teach the young " people Greek. In another Letter of the 31ſt book, " he gives him advice of the deſign the Senate of " Venice had of drawing him to Sienna, and offering " him a chair at Padua. Ad hæc ego, adds he, con- " tra locutus ſum, & quæ vera eſſe novi, & quibus te " delectari exiſtimavi, quippe qui non eſſem oblitus quæ " mecum nuper cum ad Octobrem Senæ fuiſſem, & de " temperamento corporis tui, & de iſtius cœli quantum " ad te attinet, intemperie locutus fueras. i. e. " To " this I anſwered what I knew to be true, and what " I thought would pleaſe you, not having forgotten " what you had ſaid when I was with you at Sienna " in October, about your conſtitution and the badneſs " of that air for it." " It is very ſurprizing that he " ſhould ſay in the ſame Letter, that Francis d'Arezzo " is an enemy to a barbarous ſtyle: Nec illud ſanè " prætereundum cenſui; Appianum Alexandrinum eſſe " jam ab me magna ex parte Latinum factum, quo- " niam tu nullâ barbariæ linguâ delectaris. i. e. " Nor did I think this was to be omitted, that Appia- " nus Alexandrinus has been in great part rendered " by me into purer Latin, becauſe I know you can- " not be pleaſed with any barbarity of ſtyle." Is it " then to the cuſtom of that time, that we muſt " aſcribe the barbarous expreſſions of Francis d'Arezzo " in his writings on the Law? There is methinks " room to believe that he expreſly affected them, for " fear of being eſteemed a leſs able Lawyer, on ac- " count of his deſire to paſs for a polite writer. I have " run thro' ſome of his Counſels, which are barbarity it- " ſelf. His 42d has been much laughed at, where, " in conſequence of the agreement made between " Francis Sforza Duke of Milan, and Louïs de Gon- " zaga Marquis of Mantua, that in caſe Dorothy " the daughter of the Marquis ſhould be found with- " out any deformity or defect at the age of fourteen " years, ſhe ſhould be married to Galeazzo the Duke's " ſon, he maintains that the Duke had a right to " demand that the Phyſicians ſhould viſit the Princeſs, " to examine her naked, according as circumſtances " ſhould require. It appears however that this viſit, " how uneaſy ſoever it might be in the execution, " might be required by Law: ſo it was demanded " by the Duke, but refuſed by the Marquis."

After having examined theſe obſervations of Mr. de la Monnoie; I propoſed to him yet another doubt, and this is the manner in which he confirmed his opinion anew. You have no reaſon to queſtion that Francis d' Arezzo, the tranſlator of ſome Greek works, and Francis d' Arezzo the Civilian, whoſe Comments we have upon the law, with his counſels, " was one " and the ſame author. Volaterranus, who might " have ſeen the Civilian, aſcribes to him, beſides his " skill in the law, a great knowledge of polite lite- " rature (7). Philelphus, who wrote ſome years be- " fore, ſays the ſame thing. You may ſee by the " teſtimonies of the Epiſtles, that I have quoted to " you, that there was in his time one Francis Areti- " nus, there were but forty perſons in his Auditory, he was ſo angry that he flung away his book, and cried out, Aretin will never explain Law to a few perſons. He retired in a paſſion, and would teach no more. He was of a ſevere temper, and he never kept the ſame ſervant longer than a month or two. New brooms ſweep clean, ſaid he. He was honoured with the title of Knight, and ſpent all his life in celibacy, and a parſimony, which gave him an opportunity of amaſſing a great deal of wealth. He was no leſs honoured on account of his continence than of his learning. It will be pleaſing to know what art he uſed in order to teach his diſciples of what conſequence it is to paſs for an honeſt man [D]. Though he had deſigned his wealth for the maintenance of a College, he left it to his relations (c).

(7) Theſe are Volaterranus's words, at the end of the 21ſt book, p. 782. Alexander Imolenſis & Franciſcus Aretinus, ambo ſcriptis excellentibus nuper relictis in memoria poſteritatis vivent. Franciſcus, præter jura, ceteras etiam liberales artes eſt adeptus, princeps ſæculi hujus habebatur. Xiſti tempore magna expectatione in hanc urbem venit, pauloque poſt ſpe fruſtratus remigravit impari doctrinæ ſapientia vitæque inſtituto, cum in cælibatu vixerit, ac opibus inhiaverit, quas cumulatiſſimas cognatis demum reliquit. i. e. " Alexan- " der Imolenſis " and Francis A- " retinus will " both of them " live in their " excellent writ- " ings which " they have left " to poſterity. " Francis, be- " ſides the Law, " was acquainted " with the other " liberal arts. He " came into this " city in the time " of Xiſtus with " great expecta- " tions, and be- " ing diſappoint- " ed, he went " back a little " afterwards, " with an une- " qual learning " and way of life, " as he lived in " celibacy, and " hunted after " riches, which " he left at laſt " in great plenty " to his relations.

" nus, or Arretinus (as he and others always write) " his Diſciple, a Knight, a Civilian, and Profeſſor " of Law in the Univerſity of Sienna, a man excel- " lent in all ſorts of literature. I add this paſſage to " thoſe which I have ſent you already. It is in the " 1ſt Epiſtle of the XXVIth Book, which is an in- " vective againſt Leodriſio Crivello. At laudas Fran- " ciſcum Arretinum, & jure quidem, ſed, ut arbitror, dor- " mitans. Egiſti enim præter ingenium, & conſuetudinem tuam. At meretur Franciſcus Arretinus, cum ſit tum Jureconſultorum omnium præſtantiſſimus, tum nullius præclaræ diſciplinæ ignarus. Tamen laudari à te flagitiorum omnium ſcelerumque ſentinâ, dedecoroſum eſt. Jubes ab illo ut diſcam: recte mones, nam non ab iſto ſolum, ſed etiam abs te ipſo, ſi quid boni afferre poſſes, non invitus diſcerem. Sed cur quem tantopere laudas, non item imitaris. Illud prædicat apud omnes diſcipulum ſe meum extitiſſe, mihique tribuit tantas laudes, quantis vellem me non carere. At eſt te, inquis, omni doctrina præſtantior. Non eo inficias, neque fero graviter me à multis etiam diſcipulis meis ſuperari, id quod ſine aliqua mea laude fieri non potuerit, ſiquidam hi grati eſſe voluere. i. e. " But you commend Francis Arreti- " nus, and juſtly; but, I believe, in your ſleep. For " you have acted contrary to your diſpoſition and " manner. But Francis Arretinus deſerves it, as he " is both the moſt excellent of all Lawyers, and alſo " acquainted with all excellent parts of learning. Yet " it is a diſgrace to be commended by you, who are " the ſink of all crimes and wickedneſs. You bid " me learn of him: and you give me good advice, " for I would willingly learn not only of him, but " even of you too, if I could not get any benefit by " you. But why did you not imitate him whom you " commend ſo much? He declares every where, that " he was my diſciple, and gives me ſuch praiſes " as I would not willingly be without. But he is, " you ſay, my ſuperior in every part of learning. I " do not deny it, nor am I offended at being ex- " celled by many of my diſciples, which cannot hap- " pen without ſome praiſe to my ſelf, if they have " a mind to be grateful." This letter is dated Auguſt 1, 1465. Much about the ſame time, Janus Pannonius, who ſtudied at that time in Italy, addreſſed an Epigram to our Francis d' Arezzo, of which theſe are the two firſt verſes:

Franciſce, interpres legum, ô Aretine, ſacrarum,
Nec minus Aonia nobilis in citharâ.

That is,

" Thou learn'd Expounder of the Sacred Laws,
" Whoſe tuneful Lyre deſerves no leſs applauſe."

It is certain then, that this Profeſſor of Law at Sienna, named Francis d' Arezzo or Aretin, was converſant in polite learning: It is no leſs certain that the family name of this Profeſſor was Accolti. You may believe himſelf. Ego Franciſcus de Accoltis de Aretio, ſays he at the bottom of his XVIIIth Counſel, Decretorum Doctor, ſenis ordinariè legens, & illuſtris D. Marchionis Eſtenſis Conſiliarius, & ad fidem me ſubſcripſi, & meo ſolito ſigno ſignari juſſi. " The times agree. Volaterranus ſays " that Francis Aretin, a Humaniſt and Civilian, was " at Rome under Sixtus IV. It was againſt the ſame " Sixtus that Francis Accolti wrote his CLXIIId Coun- " ſel in favour of Laurence de Medicis and the Flo- " rentines, whom this Pope had excommunicated be- " cauſe of the murther of the Archbiſhop of Piſa, " and the impriſonment of the Cardinal his great ne- " phew. Volaterranus ſays, that Francis Aretin be- " ing gone to Rome full of great hopes, ſoon went " away again, ſeeing that the ſucceſs did not anſwer " his expectation. Whence I draw the conſequence, " that Francis Accolti, who is the ſame with the Fran- " cis Arretin of Volaterranus, took upon himſelf the " more willingly to write for the Florentines againſt " Sixtus, becauſe he remembred that this Pope had " ſuffered him to depart from Rome without acknow- " ledging his merit. Perhaps alſo it was upon the " view of ſome eccleſiaſtical dignity, with which he " flattered himſelf (as has been ſaid of the Lawyer " Jaſon) that he would not marry. There remains " the ſcruple relating to the difference between the " ſtyle of Aretin the Profeſſor of Law, and that of " Aretin the Tranſlator. It is true that this diffe- " rence is enormous. And tho' the Verſions which " he has given us are not exquiſite in their Latinity, " one may ſay however, that in compariſon of his " law works, it is more than Ciceronian. If he had " intended, like ſome other authors, to write in a " Macaronic ſtyle on purpoſe, he could not have ſuc- " ceeded better. Sunt etiam multi teſtes, ſays he, in his LXXXIIId Counſel, qui viderunt aquam bene ire ad molendinum, & ipſum benè molere, & Stecbariam lignaminis benè in puncto. And in the XIIIth Counſel. Probatur per duos teſtes noſtros, quod iſta mulier geſſit portaturam capitis ſecundum habitum nuptarum à ſex annis citra. " The whole Book is full of theſe flowers. " The Orthography of the words taken from the Greek " is ſtrangely diſfigured in it. We find there Eco- " nomus, Emologatio, Cyrothecæ, Griſogonus, Emphithe- " ota. I have hinted at the reaſon why this Civilian " did ſo; which was that his brethren wrote after " the ſame manner. His language, if it had been " better, would not have been underſtood by the reſt " of his Profeſſion. Francis Aretin, or Accolti, call " him which you pleaſe, could have ſpoken better; " but he loved money, and if he had thought fit to " have uſed the ſtyle of a Papinian, he might have " ruſted in his ſtudy, and been univerſally abandoned. " The ſame barbarity reigned at that time amongſt " the Divines and the Phyſicians. Thoſe amongſt " them who were the firſt to introduce politeneſs, " were accounted neither Divines nor Phyſicians, but " only Grammarians. The world was not quite clear " of this prejudice in the time of Ludovicus Vives. " His words are worth relating:" Quæ Lyranus & Hugo ſcribunt (ſays he, in the firſt Book de Cauſis corruptar. Art.) Theologia eſt: quæ Eraſmus, Grammatica. Idem de Hieronymo, Ambroſio, Auguſtino, Hilario dicturi, niſi nomen obſtaret, tametſi hîc etiam neſcio quid muſſant. Quod ſi Johannes Picus Apologiam ſuam corrupto illo non ſcripſiſſet ſermone, haud quaquam haberetur Theologus, ſed Grammaticus. Alciatus, Zaſius, Cantiuncula, Grammatici ſunt, cum de jure diſputant: Accurſius eſt Juriſconſultus, vel cum interpretatur que id eſt et; ait id eſt dixit; ſeu id eſt aut; &c. i. e. " What Lyra- " nus and Hugo write is Divinity; what Eraſmus " writes is Grammar. The ſame might be ſaid of " Jerom, Ambroſe, Auguſtin, Hilary, if it was not " for their name, and yet there is ſome murmuring " againſt them too. But if Joannes Picus had not " written his apology in that corrupt ſtyle, he would " not have been accounted a Divine, but a Gram- " marian. Alciatus, Zazius, Cantiuncula, are Gram- " marians, when they diſpute about Law: Accurſius " is a Lawyer, even when he interprets que, that is, " &; ait, that is, dixit; ſeu, that is, aut." It was then a ſort of neceſſity, Sir, that Francis Aretin the Lawyer, ſhould accommodate himſelf to the cuſtom of his time; and I am of opinion, that theſe reflections added to the preceding, will be ſufficient to perſuade you that he differs from the Humaniſt only in elocution.

[D] It will be pleaſing to know what art he uſed

to lations (c). He had a brother who became very famous under the name of BENEDICTUS ACCOLTUS ARETINUS [E]. I shall speak of him in a note.

(c) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. 2. cap. 10, p. 249, & seq.

to teach his disciples of what consequence it is to pass for an honest man.] He made use of this stratagem, after having seen that frequent exhortations to preserve a good character signified nothing. Ubi (Ferrariæ) studiosos ad famam boni nominis conservandam sæpe hortatus, cum nihil proficeret, ridiculum commentum excogitavit, ut quam vim maximam habeat existimatio, ostenderet (8). The Butchers of Ferrara left their meat in the shambles all night. He went thither with his servant, before day; and having broke open their shops took away all the meat. Two scholars, who were looked upon as more mischievous than all the rest, were accused of this action, and imprisoned. Aretin went to Duke Hercules, and desired their liberty, taking the whole fault upon himself. But the more he insisted upon his having done it, the more the prisoners were suspected to be guilty; for no body dared to suspect a professor of such a thing, whose gravity and wisdom were so well known. The affair being at last brought to a conclusion, he declared what had been his drift. This was shewing the weight and authority of a good reputation. Quo constantiùs se facti autorem fatebatur, eo magis qui in vinculis erant rei credebantur, cum ob viri gravitatem nemo id de eo suspicari auderet. Re demum compositâ, id se Aretinus ad demonstrandam hominis bonæ opinionis auctoritatem feciſſe dixit (9). Every body knows, that those who pass for great liars are not believed, even when they speak truth. It happens quite otherwise to those who have the reputation of being very sincere: they are believed even when they tell a lye. See in Valerius Maximus, what is the effect of the good opinion one has conceived of a man (10).

(8) Panzirol. de claris Legum Interpret. p. 250.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 251.

(10) Val. Max. lib. 3. cap. 7. num. 8.

[E] His brother became very famous under the name of BENEDICTUS ACCOLTUS ARETINUS.] He was born in 1415; and after having made a good progress in polite learning, he applied himself to the study of the law, with so much ardour, that he was not long before he reached the degree of Doctor: after which, both by publick lectures and consultations (11), he raised himself to the rank of the most famous Lawyers. He did not renounce the Belles Lettres, and it appears by some of his Treatises, that he was not indifferent about them. His Dialogue de Præstantia Virorum sui ævi was printed at Parma, in 1692, from a manuscript of Monsieur Magliabecchis. He was principal Secretary of the Republic of Florence, the seven last years of his life. He died at Florence, in 1466, at the age of fifty one. His son Peter, a great Lawyer, being Auditor of the Rota, for twenty five years, was honoured with a Cardinal's hat by Pope Julius II. He had another son, named Michael, who was the father of Benedict Accoltus. This last was Secretary to Clement VII, and afterwards Cardinal (12). See Moreri's Dictionary under the word ACCOLTI.

(11) Some of them are printed.

(12) Taken from the Life of Benedictus Accoltus at the beginning of the Dialogue de Præstantiâ Virorum sui ævi.

ARETIN (GUY) a Benedictin Monk lived in the eleventh Century. He became famous for discovering a new method of learning Music. He published a book upon that subject, which he intitled Micrologus, and a Letter, which has been inserted by Cardinal Baronius in his Annals, under the year 1022. He was four and thirty years old when he published the Micrologus, under the Pontificate of John XX, and he had been already invited three times to Rome by Pope Benedict VIII. This Pope had examined the Antiphonaire of Aretin, and admired several things he had learnt from this Author. This is what Possevin tells us in his Apparatus (a). To say something concerning this invention of Guy Aretin, I ought to take notice that it was he who found the six notes, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. They will have it that the names of these six notes were borrowed from a Hymn, which contains these saphick verses.

(a) Pag. 694.

UT queant laxis
MI ra gestorum
SOL ve pollutis
RE sonare fibris
FA muli tuorum
LA biis reatum (b).

(b) See Vossius, de Musice, p. 40.

For that purpose you need but take the first and sixth syllable of each verse. Some pretend that the word Gammut, so frequent in Music, came from Guy Aretin's having made use of the first letters of the alphabet to design or mark his notes, and using therein the letter G, which the Greeks call Gamma; and that he did it to shew that Music came from Greece (c). Those who ascribe to him a book against Berengarius are mistaken [A].

(c) Furetiere, at the word Gammut.

[A] Those who ascribe to him a Book against Berengarius are mistaken.] Vossius has fallen into this mistake, and so has made him flourish under the Emperor Conrad the younger, and accused those of being mistaken who have placed him a hundred years after (1). The mistake which I speak of here, arose from confounding Guy Aretin with another Monk named Guitmond, who was of the Convent of Saint Leufred, of the order of Saint Bennet, in the diocese of Evreux, and became Cardinal, and Bishop of Aversa in Italy. They were almost contemporaries; for Guitmond died in 1080. It is he that has written three Books de Veritate corporis & sanguinis Christi in Eucharistiâ, adversus Berengarium, which were printed separately, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum (2). The cause which I assign of this error is so true, that the same Vossius says expressly in another place, that in 1070, under the Pontificate of Gregory VII, flourished Guido, or Guidmond, a native of Arezzo, Patriâ Aretinus, at first a Monk in the Monastery of Saint Leufred in the diocese of Evreux in Normandy, and afterwards Cardinal and Bishop of Aversa; that he composed, whilst he was a Monk, two treatises of Musick, one in verse, the other in prose; and that he is the same, who wrote three Books against Berengarius (3).

(1) Vossius, de Musice, p. 40.

(2) Vide Labbeum, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. pag. 402.

(3) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 95.

ARETIN (JOHN) surnamed Tortellius, is considered as one of the most learned men of the fifteenth Century. He composed a Life of St. Athanasius [A], at the desire of Pope Eugenius IV. He was admitted to the confidence of Nicholas V, whose Chamberlain

[A] He composed a life of Saint Athanasius.] Paulus Jovius insinuates plainly enough that he did but turn it into Latin: Divi Athanasii Vitam Eugenio expetenti Latinam fecit (1). Gesner says it much more expressly: Athanasii Alexandrini Vitam ad Eugenium Pontificem in Latinum transtulit (2). But Vossius ascribes to him much more than the part of a translator: Athanasii Vitam ex variis, Eugenii postulato, consarcinavit; and he quotes Paulus Jovius, and Volaterranus (3). The quotation of Paulus Jovius cannot be very exact, as any one may see by comparing the words. That of Volaterranus is not more exact; for he has said thus: Joannes

(1) Jovius, Elogiorum, cap. 108. pag. 251.
(2) Gesneri Bibliotb. fol. 458.

(3) Vossius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 579.

berlain he was (a). He was agreeable in converſation, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf glorioufly from the other learned men his contemporaries, in not diſhonouring, as they did, the profeſſion of the belles Lettres by violent and reproachful diſputes. He was principally ſkilled in the knowledge of Grammar, as he ſhewed by his book de Poteſtate Literarum [B]. Geſner's Bibliotheca relates the title of many other works of Tortellius; but his Lexicon is forgotten, which is quoted by Magius (b). Laurentius Valla was one of his great friends, and has dedicated to him his books de Latina Elegantia [C]. Voſſius, who affirms that he was brother of Charles Aretin (c), muſt be very much deceived, if he has no other proof than the words of Volaterranus, to whom he ſeems to refer us; Volaterranus ſays nothing of this pretended relation between them [D].

(a) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 108.

(b) Magius, Miſcellan. lib. 2. cap. 14.

(c) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 579.

(d) See in one of the notes on the Article NICOLAS V, the paſſage of the firſt Letter of the 26th book of Philelphus.

There are Connoiſſeurs who believe that Tortellius had but a moderate ſhare of learning, even for the time he lived in; but as he was very ready to do ſervices, and held a conſiderable poſt near the Pope, the wits of that time gave him great praiſes, which ſome of them afterwards retracted. Philelphus was of this number [E]. I ſhall elſewhere take notice (d) that Tortellius was Librarian to Nicholas V.

Joannes (Aretinus) cognomento Tortellius, Romanæ Eccleſiæ ſubdiaconus apud Eugenium quartum fuit. Orthographiam, Vitamque Athanaſii ac nonnulla alia conſcripſit (4). Voſſius affirms, that Wicelius has put this life of Saint Athanaſius into his Hagiologia. He conjectures, that Tortellius is the author of the life of St. Zenobius, Biſhop of Florence, inſerted in the compilation of Surius under the 25th of May. The reaſon of his conjecture is taken from the circumſtances of the time, and from the author of this life, being named Joannes Archipreſbyter Aretinus.

(4) Volater. lib. 21. p. 773.

[B] He has ſhewn his skill in Grammar, by his Book de Poteſtate Literarum.] "What Volaterranus calls "Orthographia, Paulus Jovius a Book de Poteſtate Literarum, Geſner Commentarii Linguæ Latinæ, and "Magius Lexicon, is but one and the ſame volume of "Tortellius, in two parts, of which the firſt, which "is very ſhort, contains ſome chapters upon the invention, the number, the figure, the pronunciation, "and the aſſemblage of the letters of the alphabet. "The ſecond which is very long, contains an alphabetical catalogue of the Latin words, moſt of which "are taken from the Greek, whereof he ſhews or "endeavours to ſhew the orthography (5)."

(5) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

[C] Laurentius Valla has dedicated to him his Books, de Latinâ Elegantiâ.] As Geſner has expreſſed himſelf, there is no body but muſt imagine that it is Tortellius, who has dedicated this work to Laurentius Valla. Theſe are Geſner's words: Joannes Tortellius, natione Aretinus, Laurentiæ Vallæ amiciſſimus, ad quem Elegantiarum linguæ Latinæ ſex libros perſcripſit, Nicolai poſtmodum Pontificis contubernalis, & ſtudiorum ejus intimus comes (6). Compilers, who, being inclined to make a great Book in a little time, or for other reaſons, never look beyond the page before them for the neceſſary inſtructions, would eaſily commit three groſs faults, if they join their own conjectures never ſo little to this text of Geſner. I. They would ſay that Tortellius wrote ſix Books of the elegancies of the Latin Tongue, which he dedicated to Laurentius Valla. II. That after that he had entered into the ſervice of Pope Nicholas V, and was his companion in his ſtudies; and that it was the great ſucceſs of his Book, which procured him this honour. III. That Nicolas V, was Pope in 1420; for ſeeing Geſner places at that time the flouriſhing ſtate of Tortellius, and common ſenſe declares that this flouriſhing ſtate muſt be placed in the time when Tortellius was in favour with Nicholas V, it follows that according to Geſner, he was Pope at the time that I have ſaid. The truth is, he was elected in 1447, and he was his chamberfellow and companion in his ſtudies, when Laurentius Valla dedicated his Elegantiæ to him. I do not know what Moreri means upon this article, with his vague quotation of Valerius Andreas. Why did he not conſult Voſſius and Paulus Jovius, who would have furniſhed him with ſome remedy for dryneſs in this Article?

(6) Geſneri Bibliotheca, fol. 458, ex Tritbemio.

[D] Voſſius makes him the brother of Charles Aretin. Volaterranus ſays nothing of this pretended relation between them.] I have reaſon to ſpeak as I do, ſeeing Tortellius, ſpeaking of Charles and Leonard d'Arezzo, makes them only his countrymen: A doctiſſimis viris noſtræ ætatis, ſays he (†), & conterraneis meis Leonardo & Carolo Aretinis; and when he makes mention of Charles, he ſays always, either Carolus Aretinus conterraneus meus, or Carolus noſter Aretinus (‡). This was communicated to me by Mr. de la Monnoie. Let us relate the words of Volaterranus, and thoſe of Voſſius. We ſhall ſee whether the latter could build upon the former. Carolus & Johannes Aretini nobilia temporis illius ingenia, quorum alter ſcriba Florentinorum Leonardo ſucceſſit, alter Joannes cognomento Tortellius Romanæ Eccleſiæ Subdiaconus apud Eugenium quartum fuit (7). i. e. "Charles and John Aretin, the "noble Genius's of that time, of whom the one "ſucceeded Leonard as Secretary of Florence; the "other, John, ſurnamed Tortellius, was Subdeacon "of the Roman Church under Eugenius the fourth." Here follows what Voſſius relates: Joannes Aretinus cognomento Tortellius Caroli Aretini, qui poſt Leonardum Aretinum ſcriba Florentinorum fuit, frater, Romanæ Eccleſiæ Subdiaconus apud Eugenium IV. . . . . præter grande de Orthographiâ volumen, etiam Athanaſii Vitam . . . . conſarcinavit, ut præter Jovium auctor eſt Volaterranus lib. xxi. Anthropol. ubi & hoſce Aretinos fratres nobilia illius temporis ingenia appellat (8). i. e. "John Aretin ſurnamed Tortellius, the brother of "Charles Aretin, who was Secretary of Florence af"ter Leonard Aretin, Sub-deacon of the Roman "Church under Eugenius IV. . . . . beſides a great "volume of Orthography, he compiled alſo the Life of "Athanaſius, as not only Jovius but Volaterranus "alſo relates lib. xxi. Anthropol. where he alſo calls "theſe Aretins, two brothers, the noble Genius's of "that time." If he had contented himſelf with ſaying they were relations, that might have been founded upon theſe words of Philelphus: Putabam Carolum Aretinum rediiſſe mecum in gratiam. Ita enim Joannes Aretinus ejus NECESSARIUS tuis verbis mihi renunciaret (9); for tho' Neceſſarius is ſometimes taken for an intimate friend, yet Philelphus, and moſt of the writers of that time, never uſe it but in the ſenſe of a relation. This obſervation is Mr. de la Monnoie's.

(†) In the 1ſt Part of his work, in the chapter of the Greek T.

(‡) In the 2d Part, which contains the words in the order of the alphabet.

(7) Volaterranus, lib. 21. p. 773.

(9) Philelphus, Epiſt. lib. 9.

[E] Philelphus was one of thoſe who retracted the praiſes they had given to J. Aretin.] In the article of Nicholas V I ſhall quote a Letter of Philelphus, dated Aug. 1, 1465, where the Latin and Greek learning of Tortellius is much commended. But ſee what the ſame Philelphus wrote May 29, 1473. Video quoſdam noſtræ tempeſtatis homines, qui cum magnum de ſe quiddam voluerunt in arte Grammatica profiteri, in maximos errores devenerunt. E quorum numero principatum mihi tenere viſus eſt Joannes Tortellius Aretinus, qui cum & Græcam & Latinam literaturam noviſſe videri vult, utramque ignoraviſſe apertiſſimè declarat (10). i. e. "I ſee ſome men of our time, who hav"ing a mind to be thought great Grammarians have "fallen into the greateſt errors. Of whom John "Tortellius Aretinus ſeems to me the principal, who "being deſirous to ſeem to underſtand both Greek "and Latin, moſt evidently declares his ignorance "of both.

(10) Monſ. de la Monnoie has furniſhed me with this.

ARETIN (LEONARD) is better known under this name, which was given him becauſe he was of Arezzo, then under that of Brunus or Bruni, which was his family name.

name. He was one of the moſt able men of the XVth Century [A]. He learned Greek under Emanuel Chryſoloras, as he himſelf ſays (a); and having made his merit known to Pope Innocent VII, he obtained of him, altho' young, the office of Secretary of the Briefs, of which he acquitted himſelf worthily under this Pope, and under the four following ones (b). He was afterwards Secretary to the republick of Florence (c) and amaſſed a great deal of riches (d) as well by his living in Celibacy (e), as by his being very frugal. He tranſlated out of Greek into Latin ſome lives of Plutarch [B], and the Ethics of Ariſtotle; he compoſed three Books of the Punic War, which may ſerve as a ſupplement to ſome of thoſe which are wanting of Livy [C]. He alſo compoſed the Hiſtory of the things which were done in his time in Italy [D], that of the Republic of Florence, that of the ancient Greece [E], and that of the Goths: but this laſt, which did him a great deal of honour, whilſt it was not known that he had only tranſlated it from the Greek of Procopius, drew upon his memory ſome kind of infamy (f), as ſoon as it was known after his death, by the care of Chriſtopher Perſona, that Procopius whoſe name he had ſuppreſſed, by appropriating his work to himſelf, was the Author of this Hiſtory of the Goths [F]. He compoſed many other Books of which the Catalogue may be ſeen in Geſner's Bibliotheca. He died in the year 1443, being ſeventy four years old [G], at Florence, where there is his marble monument to be ſeen in the church of the Holy Croſs (g). Poggius was one of thoſe who criticiſed him [H]. M. de la Mare, Counſellor of the Parliament of Dijon, publiſhed in 1653 a Catalogue of the Books of Leonard Aretin, which he deſigned to have printed. I believe the thing was never executed. I have heard, that there is lately found, among the Manuſcripts of the Library of Oxford, a copy of the letters of Leonard Aretin, where there are forty

(a) Leon. Aretinus, Hiſt. Rer. Italicarum. Vide etiam Jovium, Elogior. cap. 23.
(b) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 9.
(c) Leand. Alberti Deſcrip. Italiæ.
(d) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 9.
(e) Volaterranus, lib. 21. pag. 772.
(f) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 9. and 116.
(g) Idem, ibid. cap. 9.

[A] He was one of the moſt able men of the fifteenth Century.] According to Paulus Jovius, it was Leonard Aretin, who was the firſt reſtorer of the Greek tongue in Italy (1). Philelphus aſcribes to him a great deal of eloquence and a large fund of genius and erudition (2), Poggius (3), and Laurentius Valla (4) have ſet him above all his contemporaries, in point of eloquence and ſcience: but Floridus Sabinus is a little more moderate in his praiſes, and gives no advantageous idea of his Latin (5): from whom Eraſmus does not ſeem greatly to differ (6). Æneas Silvius praiſes our Aretin very much in his 51ſt Letter, and informs us that the Florentines had conferred his place on Poggius. Upon this, Voſſius obſerves that Æneas Silvius and Leander Albertus do not agree, the latter ſaying in his Deſcription of Italy, that Charles Aretin ſucceeded Leonard in the Secretaryſhip of the Republick of Florence. See the article of (Charles) ARETIN (7), where we prove from Æneas Silvius himſelf, that Leander Albertus was in the right.

(1) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 9. pag. 27.
(2) Philelphus, Conviviorum, lib. 1. & Epiſt. ad eum ſcripta.
(3) Poggius, in Philelph. Invect. 2.
(4) Apud Philelph. Invect. 1. in Vallam.
(5) Flor. Sabin. adverſ. Calumniat. Ling. Lat.
(6) Eraſm. in Ciceron.
(7) In the note [B].

[B] He tranſlated ſome of Plutarch's Lives.] Namely that of Paulus Æmilius, that of the two Gracchi, that of Pyrrhus, that of Sertorius, that of Demoſthenes, that of Mark Anthony, and that of Cato of Utica (8). The Printers have made a ſtrange blunder in Moreri's Dictionary, by putting Vers de Plutarque (Verſes of Plutarch) inſtead of Vies de Plutarque (Lives of Plutarch.)

(8) Geſner. in Biblioth.

[C] He compoſed three books of the Punick War, which may ſerve as a Supplement . . . . to Livy.] The two firſt treat of the firſt Punick War, which is wanting in Livy: the third treats of the diſorders into which the Carthaginians fell, by the mutiny of the ſoldiers, and the revolt of the people; as alſo of the war againſt the Gauls, and againſt thoſe of Illyria; all of them things that are wanting in the Roman Hiſtory (9). Aretin has done nothing but tranſlate the Greek of Polybius, tho' he has denied it in his Preface; and from thence it comes that Badius Aſcenſius has put the name of Polybius at the beginning of this work in his edition of Paris (10).

(9) Ibid.
(10) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latin. pag. 557.

[D] . . . that of the things that were done in his time in Italy.] This work begins with the ſchiſm that aroſe againſt Pope Urban VI, in 1378, and reaches to the victory obtained by the Florentines before Anglara, in 1440.

[E] . . . that of the ancient Greece.] This work reaches from the command of Theramenes and Thraſybulus amongſt the Athenians, to the death of Epaminondas. This contains forty five or fifty years.

[F] It was known by the care of Chriſtopher Perſona, that Procopius, and not our Aretin, was the Author of the Hiſtory of the Goths.] Perſona determined with himſelf, according to Voſſius, to tranſlate Agathias, when he had obſerved our Aretin's want of fidelity (11). Voſſius alledges Paulus Jovius thereupon; but it is certain that Paulus Jovius ſays nothing of Agathias, either in the place that is quoted (12), or in any other that can be quoted (13), and that he ſpeaks there expreſly of Procopius. I acknowledge that Perſona has alſo tranſlated Agathias; but it is of the verſion of Procopius that Voſſius muſt have ſpoken in the place where he was treating of the Plagiat of Aretin. It is thus, I think, we muſt ſay, and not Plagiariſm, as a modern Author has done, whoſe whole paſſage I am going to relate, becauſe it is full of errors. We owe, ſays he (14), the Hiſtory of Procopius in Greek to David Hæſchelius. Leonard Aretin had already given it in the Gothick tongue; but he had ſuppreſſed the name of the Author: ſo that, when this Aretin was dead, Chriſtopher Perſona accuſed him of theft, becauſe having found himſelf another copy of this Hiſtory in the ſame language, he publiſhed it under the name of its Author, and ſo convicted Aretin of Plagiariſm. Of what monſter is he ſpeaking here? Procopius, in the Gothick tongue, publiſhed firſt by Aretin, and afterwards by Perſona, is a chimera that never was nor will be ſeen. Beſides, it is ſpeaking without any exactneſs, to ſay that Leonard Aretin and Perſona have given the Hiſtory of Procopius, for they have tranſlated only a part of that Hiſtory. The Printers of Moreri's Dictionary have made a groſs blunder, when they put it, that the Hiſtory of the Goths was properly nothing but a tranſlation of Plutarch.

(11) Idem, pag. 558.
(12) It is in the 116th chapter of the Elogia.
(13) It is in the 9th chapter of the Elogia.
(14) Le Gallois, Traité des plus belles Bibliotheq. pag. 169. (wrong marked 163) Paris edit. in 1680.

[G] He died in 1443, at the age of ſeventy four (15).] Leander Albertus is in the right, when he ſays he died at the age of ſeventy four; but he places his death in the year 1440. His computation does not agree with Matthæus Palmerius, who puts the year of the birth of Leonard Aretin in 1370 (16): and as I ſee beſides in Volaterranus, that our Aretin died in 1443 (17), (on the 9th of March according to Bucholcer) I have been unwilling to follow Leander Albertus. I have obſerved already (18) the miſtake of a modern Author, who thought Leonard Aretin was alive in 1480.

(15) Varillas, in the Anecdot. de Florence, p. 162, is miſtaken when he makes him live to above 80.
(16) Palm. in Chronic. ad ann. 1370. The Printers of Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. p. 557. have put thro' miſtake CIↃCCCCLXX.
(17) Volat. lib. 21. pag. 772.
(18) In the note [A] of the article of (FRANCIS) ARETIN.

[H] Poggius was one of thoſe who criticiſed him.] The following words of Philelphus ſhew this. They are in a Letter which he wrote to Laurentius de Medicis the 29th of May 1473. Quod eo feci accuratius, quoniam & Leonardus Aretinus familiaris noſter, vir ſane facundiſſimus, adverſus Blondum Flavium multa diſſeruit, & poſt Leonardi obitum Poggius Carolo gratificatus Aretino, quem diſſertiſſimi concivis gloria offenderet, libellum etiam contra illius ſcripta contexuit, cum neuter ſuo ſit functus officio (19). i. e. "Which I did "the more accurately, becauſe Leonard Aretinus alſo, "our acquaintance, a very eloquent man, has written "much againſt Blondus Flavius, and after the death "of Leonard, Poggius to gratify Charles Aretin, "who was offended at the glory of his moſt excel-"lent fellow-citizen, drew up a piece againſt his "writings, when neither of them had done his duty." This paſſage was communicated to me by Monſr. de la Monnoie.

(19) Philelphus, Epiſtolar. lib. 37.

forty letters which were never printed; and which perhaps may give somebody an inclination to set to work about a new Edition.

ARETIN (LEONARD). We presume the reader will not be displeased to find here a supplement to Mr. Bayle's Article of this famous man, since we have borrowed the following particulars from a very eminent Author (a). Leonard Aretin was born about the year 1370 [A]; he applied himself to the study of law during four years (b) before he learned Greek under Emanuel Chrysoloras. In the year 1434, he was made Secretary to Pope Innocent VII [B]; whence it appears that he was not then very young as Mr. Bayle insinuates, since he was about thirty years old. In the year 1413 he was Secretary to Pope John XXIII, and accompanied him to the Council of Constance. He was the same year employed in a very difficult negotiation [C]. He was in the neighbourhood of that city, when Poggius wrote to him a famous letter concerning the death of Jerom of Prague (c), which Leonardus thought a little too free (d) [D], wishing his friend had been more cautious and politic. When the council was ended, Aretin returned to Florence, where he was made Chancellor [E] of the Republic, which high Post he enjoyed till the year 1444, when he died aged seventy four years (e). The inscription

(a) The late Reverend Mr. LENFANT.
(b) Lenfant, in his Poggiana, tom. 1. Part 1. pag. 11.
(c) Idem, ibid.
(d) Idem, p. 20.
(e) Lenfant, Preface de l'Hist. du Concile de Pise, pag. xx.

[A] Leonard Aretin was born about the year 1370.] This is clear, if it be true that he died in 1444, being then seventy four years of age. But Mr. Bayle places his death in 1443, with Volaterranus, tho' at the same time he does not take notice of the contradiction of Matteo Palmieri, according to whom Aretin was born in 1370. This may perhaps seem trifling; but we remark it only, to shew, that the most accurate Authors may sometimes be guilty of an oversight. This happened to Mr. Lenfant. He tells us in his Poggiana (1), that Aretin was seventy (2) years old when he died, and in his Preface (3) to his History to the Council of Pisa he makes him seventy four years old when he died. But in that same place he has committed another mistake; he says that Aretin might be about twelve years old when the great schism began, since he died in 1444, being then seventy four. But according to Mr. Lenfant himself, the schism began in 1378 (4) by the election of Robert Cardinal of the twelve Apostles, who was chosen Pope the 20th of September 1378, and took the name of Clement VII. Now Aretin could be then but eight years old. We observe this mistake only, because Mr. Lenfant supposes that Aretin being twelve years old at the beginning of the schism, might be considered as an eye-witness of what passed at that time; which indeed may be true of a child of twelve years old. At that age he may take notice of several things, and remember them very well afterwards; but I doubt whether the same could be expected from a child of eight years only.

(1) Tom. 1. Part 1. p. 11.
(2) It is perhaps an error of the press.
(3) Pag. xx.
(4) Hist. du Concile de Pise, tom. 1. liv. 1. p. 29.

[B] He was made Secretary to Pope Innocent VII.] Mr. Recanati pretended (5), that Leonard Aretin was Secretary to Pope Boniface IX, when Poggius came to Rome. But Mr. Lenfant shews (6) by Poggius's own words, that it was he himself, who engaged Aretin to go to Rome, and procured him the place of Secretary to Pope Innocent VII. The words of Poggius are as follows; Innocent VII, says he (7), having succeeded to Boniface, Leonard Aretin entreated me by word of mouth and by letters, to endeavour to procure him at the court of Rome some employment, by which he might live in an honourable manner. As I was very intimate with all those, who had the greatest access to the Pope, I was continually extolling the great qualities of Leonard; and to support what I used to say of the elegance and politeness of his style, I sometimes communicated to them his letters. At last I procured by my recommendations, that tho' he was unknown to them and to the Pope, yet he was chosen to be Innocent the seventh's Secretary. It is plain therefore, that Mr. Recanati must be mistaken; yet we are not to be surprized at it, adds Mr. Lenfant (8), since this may happen to the most learned men.

(5) Ap. Lenfant, Pogg. tom. 1. Part 1. pag. 21.
(6) Ibid.
(7) Baluz. Misc. tom. 3. p. 254, 255.
(8) Ibid. p. 22.

[C] He accompanied him (the Pope) to the Council of Constance, where he was the same year employed in a very difficult negotiation.] This is what Mr. Lenfant says in the Poggiana (9); but in the preface to the second edition of his History of the Council of Constance (10), he says that he doubts of Leonard's attending the Pope. It is very certain, says he, that Leonardus was at Constance, since amongst his letters, there is one dated from that place, in which he gives his friend Nicolas Nicolo a very diverting account of his journey. But he cannot have accompanied the Pope to Constance, since the latter arrived there the 28th of October 1414; whereas it appears by this letter of Aretin, that he stayed at Verona till the latter end of November (quinto Kalendas Decembris). Nay he must have continued but one year at Constance; for on the first of January 1415 (11) he received at Arezzo a Letter from Poggius dated December the 13th of the foregoing year. With regard to Leonard's negotiation, Mr. Lenfant refers us to his History of the Council of Constance; but there we find only that Emanuel Chrysoloras was employed in a negotiation by the Pope, and Leonard is only mentioned for having said, that Chrysoloras contributed to the restoration of learning in Italy.

(9) Tom. 1. Part 1. pag. 1.
(10) Pag. xv.
(11) The year began then in March, as it still does with us in England.

[D] Poggius wrote to him a letter concerning the death of Jerom of Prague, which Leonard found a little too free.] Mr. Lenfant's judgment of that letter was as follows; Poggius's account of the fact, says he (12), agrees exactly with the Acts of the Council, and with History. But it is also wrote with such a moderation, and with such sentiments of admiration and love, as would not have been expected from a Secretary of the Pope towards so odious an heretick, as Jerom of Prague was with regard to the court of Rome. That Letter of Poggius may be considered as a funeral Oration, and as an Elogium of Jerom, so much the less suspected as it comes from a person otherwise a zealous Roman Catholick. It is a pretty curious contrast to see Poggius on one hand declare that Laurentius Valla deserved to be committed to the flames, on account of some subtle and trite speculations, and on the other lament the death of a man, who had overthrown the foundations of the Church of Rome, and make his apology as much as he could safely do, without running the same danger with his Heroe. Leonard Aretin very well understood, that his friend had gone too far, and spoke too much in praise of an heretick. He censures him gently for it in a letter which he wrote to him on that subject. I have received, says he (13), your letter concerning the death of Jerom of Prague, and greatly admire the style and elegance of it; but you speak more in his behalf, than I wished you had done. It is true, that sometimes you add a few words, which serve to qualify the judgment you pass upon him, but after all there runs thro' your whole letter too visible an affectation. I think, that we are to write on such subjects with more caution. The consequence that may be drawn from Poggius's and Aretin's Letters, is that the former was open and sincere, and the latter more reserved and politic in his sentiments.

(12) Ibid. p. 239.
(13) Aret. Epist. lib. 4. Ep. 9.

[E] He was made Chancellor of the Republick.] Mr. Bayle says only Secretary. If this was not the same post with that of Chancellor, we may rely the more upon Mr. Lenfant, who seems to have made a more particular study of the History of these times, than on Mr. Bayle, who does not seem to have been so well acquainted with what passed then in Italy. It is true Leander Albertus seems to call him Secretary, à Secretis (14), but Æneas Silvius calls him (15) Cancellarius, Chancellor, and seems to hint that in his post he had occasion for eloquence and polite Literature rather than for the knowledge of the Law, which is very true of a Chancellor, who is in a manner the mouth of the Commonwealth.

(14) See the passage in the article of CHARLES ARETIN, remark [B], quotation (1).
(15) Ibid. quotation (2).

inſcription on his tomb is very honourable to him [F]. Poggius made his funeral oration, which according to Mr. Lenfant (f), is a very elaborate piece, in which amongſt other curious particulars we find, that Poggius and Leonard Aretin lived forty years in ſo conſtant a friendſhip, that it never ſuffered the leaſt interruption or indifference. Mr. Bayle ſays, that Aretin was exceſſively frugal; yet we find that when Poggius, who was not very rich, was travelling to diſcover ancient Manuſcripts, ſeveral of his friends, and amongſt them Leonard Aretin and Franciſco Barbaro furniſhed him with all the money he wanted for his deſign (g). Aretin's hiſtories of Florence and of Italy, as well as his letters contain ſeveral particulars, which can hardly be found in any other authors, and which have been of great uſe to Mr. Lenfant, in his hiſtory of the council of Piſa, as he tells us himſelf in the place referred to in the margin (h). Though Aretin had been Secretary to ſeveral Popes during the grand Schiſm, and tho' his maſters were men of very ill characters, yet it appears by his letters, that he did not approve their conduct [G], and that he was a man of great virtue and probity.

(f) Poggiana, tom. 1. Part 1. pag. 12.

(g) Ibid. p. 24.

(h) Preface de l'Hiſt. du Conc. de Piſe, p. 21.

[F] The inſcription on his tomb is very honourable to him.] It was as follows: "Since the death of Leonard hiſtory is in mourning, eloquence is become "mute, the Greek and Latin Muſes cannot forbear "ſhedding tears (16)."

(16) Mabill. It. Ital. p. 165. ap. Lenfant, Poggiana, tom. 1. p. 11.

[G] It appears by his letters that he did not approve the Pope's conduct, and that he was a man of virtue and probity.] Here follow the proofs of theſe aſſertions. Firſt with regard to his diſapproving the conduct of Pope Gregory XII, whoſe Secretary he was, he writes to Petrillo his friend in the following manner: Since you left this city (17), ſays he (18), the Pope went from Rome, and retired for ſome months to Sienna. The time to go to Savona (19) was now come; but the Pope did not think fit to perform his promiſe, which ſcandalized all well-meaning perſons. His competitor had been there at the time appointed, and was continually reproaching Gregory with his affected delays. O ſhame to us and to our poſterity! that having freely and after a mature deliberation accepted a place, where we were to reſtore the union amongſt the Chriſtians, we ſhould now be backward, and refuſe to go thither. Yes, I am extremely grieved at what paſſes, both as a Chriſtian, and as an Italian. I cannot comfort myſelf, when I conſider, that the Chriſtians are diſappointed in the hopes they had conceived of ſeeing the Church united again; and when I think that the Italians (20) my countrymen, will be looked upon as falſe and perfidious men, without ſincerity or honour. When I ſpeak after this manner, I ſhew myſelf more ſollicitous about the true glory and the reputation of the Pope, than thoſe who by their flatteries and deceitful Councils diſſuade him from a deſign, which would raiſe him an immortal glory. Leonard, who was in Gregory's ſervice, thought he could not in honour abandon him; but at the ſame time he abhorred his maſter's conduct, and was heartily afflicted at the approaching ruin of the Church, thro' the ambition and obſtinacy of the Antipopes. It grieves me in the moſt terrible manner, ſays he (21), to be here. There is no deſart, no cavern, tho' ever ſo dreadful, where I ſhould not chooſe to live, rather than be here. Any place would be agreeable to me, where I might not ſee the conflagration and aſhes of the church, which I am forced to behold here. Such expreſſions and ſentiments certainly ſhew the benevolent and virtuous diſpoſition of our Aretin. His conduct had been agreeable to his words; for the Conclave, in which Gregory XII was choſen, being met, Aretin was admitted to ſpeak to the Cardinals, and exhorted them with the utmoſt ſtrength and vigour, to ſuſpend the election, becauſe he was of opinion, that this was the only method to put an end to the ſchiſm (22). This is a ſtrong proof that Aretin was a man of virtue and probity. We may add to it what he ſays of John Dominic, who before he was made a Biſhop ſeemed very zealous to promote the union of the Church, but was thought to oppoſe it after he had obtained a Biſhoprick. Aretin had a great eſteem for him, yet read what he ſays of him. They complain, ſays he (23), that this man, who was one of the moſt zealous promoters of the union, did not ſpeak a word of it, as ſoon as he had got a Biſhoprick, nay that he even ſeems to oppoſe it by his advice. The manner in which he uſed to ſpeak before his promotion, made every one believe that he would refuſe that preferment; yet he has accepted it with all his heart, and it is pretended, that ſince that he has betrayed the cauſe, which he ſo warmly eſpouſed. He aſpires to a ſtill higher rank (24). We are not to judge of his heart, but we cannot but blame thoſe intrigues, which ſeem to be ſo inconſiſtent with his former conduct. Ambition, I fear, has a much greater ſhare in his actions, than wiſdom and real prudence. I love the man for his great abilities; and I am ſorry that by his conduct he ſhould deſtroy the good opinion, which the world had of him. As he cannot be thought to act out of ignorance, it is eaſily judged, that he is blinded by covetouſneſs or ambition. A man who writes after this manner, concerning a perſon for whom he had a great eſteem, muſt certainly have the true principles of virtue in himſelf.

P.

(17) Rome.

(18) Apud Lenfant, Hiſt. du Conc. de Piſe, tom. 1. liv. 2. pag. 192, &c.

(19) Where Gregory was to meet Benedict XIII the other Pope, in order to conſult how to put an end to the ſchiſm.

(20) Gregory was an Italian.

(21) Lenfant, Conc. de Piſe, ubi ſupra, p. 195.

(22) Leon. Aret. Epiſt. lib. 2. Ep. 3. apud eund. ibid. p. 161.

(23) Epiſt. lib. 2. Ep. 19. apud eund. ibid. pag. 196.

(24) That of a Cardinal, which he obtained afterwards.

ARETIN (PETER) a native of Arezzo, famous for his obſcene and ſatyrical writings, lived in the ſixteenth Century. Thoſe who have a mind to know what ſort of a Medal is pretended to have been ſtruck, to inform all the world that the greateſt Princes were afraid of his Satyrs, will find it in Moreri's Dictionary. Aretin boaſted in this Medal of having put under contribution thoſe to whom other men paid tributes and taxes. This tradition is ſo general, that he is no leſs known by the title of the Scourge of Princes, than by the name of Aretin or Peter Aretin [A]. They have alſo given him another very glorious title, which was the ſame that all antiquity beſtowed on the great merit of Plato, which is that of Divine, il Divino Aretino [B]: he was ſtiled upon the medals Divus Petrus

[A] He is no leſs known under the title of Scourge of Princes, than under the name .... of P. Aretin.] He boaſted of having this reputation all over the world. Read his letter to Herſilia del Monte, a relation of Pope Julius III: In tanto è manifeſto ch'io ſono noto al Sophi, à gli Indiani, & il Mondo al paro di qualunche boggi in bocca de la fama riſuoni: che piu? i Principi da i populi tributati di continuo, tuttavia me loro ſchiavo & flagello tributano (1). i. e. "So far it is plain that "I am known to the Sophi, and to the Indians, "and that the world is at this time filled with "my renown: What more? the Princes of the "people being under a continual tribute, inceſſantly "call me their ſcourge." He ſays in another letter, that it was ſworn the Princes were his tributaries, not becauſe he praiſed them, but for fear he ſhould blame them; and adds, that it was thoroughly deceiving themſelves, ſeeing moſt of the great maſters are not afraid of the wrath of God. Would they then dread my pen? continues he: Impero che la maggior parte de i gran maeſtri non temona l'ira di Dio, è temeranno il furore de la mia penna (2)? This reaſoning is not good; the fear of men makes us abſtain from a thouſand things, from which we ſhould not abſtain out of fear of divine vengeance (3).

[B] They give him the title .... of Divine, il Divino Aretino] It will not be unpleaſing to ſee the judgment

(1) Aretin, in the ſixth book of his Letters, fol. 115.

(2) Ibid. folio 120 verſo.

(3) See the Penſées ſur les Cométes, num. 162 & ſuiv.

Petrus Aretinus (a). Some have ſaid that perhaps he gave himſelf this title to ſignify that he performed the functions of a God upon earth by the thunderbolts, with which he ſtruck the heads of the moſt illuſtrious [C]. He boaſted that his Libels did more good in the world than Sermons [D]. He was told in a Letter that his pen had ſubjected more Princes to him, than the greateſt Kings had ever overcome by their arms [E], and was encouraged to continue in that ſtrain, that the Monarchs might reform [F]. Our age has Satyriſts as full of venom and as bold as Aretin could be; but I do not believe that any of them has eſtabliſhed his contributions in the enemy's country. Several miſtaken writers make him paſs for the Author of the book de tribus Impoſtoribus [G]. I cannot tell how to believe that they have engraven on his tomb, in St. Luke's church at Venice, the Epitaph

(a) Spizelius, in his Scrutin. Atheiſmi, pag. 19, affirms he has ſeen of them.

The JUDGMENT of Montagne upon Aretin.

judgment of Montagne on this elogium: Plato, ſays he (4), has born this ſurname of Divine by ſo univerſal a conſent, that no one has attempted to vie with him; and the Italians, who juſtly boaſt of having commonly a more lively wit, and more ſound diſcourſe, than the other nations of their time, have lately aſcribed it to Aretin, who does not ſeem to me to have any thing above the common Authors of his age, if you except his meteorus manner of ſpeaking, teeming with thoughts ingenious indeed, but far fetcht and fantaſtical, not to mention his very indifferent eloquence; ſo far is he from coming near this antient divinity.

(4) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 1. chap. 51. at the end.

[C] Some ſay that he performed the functions of God upon earth by the thunder-bolts with which he ſtruck the heads of the moſt illuſtrious.] I have ſeen this thought in an Italian Author, quoted by a German Author. Cur verò ſibi arrogaverit aliorum conſenſu divinitatem, neſcio, niſi fortè Dei munus exercuiſſe dicendus ſit, cum ſumma capita velut celſiſſimos montes fulminaverit, linguâ corrigens & mulctans, quæ ab aliis caſtigari nequeunt (5). i. e. "But why he arrogated Divinity to "himſelf by the conſent of others, I know not, unleſs perhaps he be ſaid to have exerciſed the office "of GOD, when he ſtruck the higheſt heads like the "loftieſt mountains, with lightning, correcting and "puniſhing thoſe with his tongue, who cannot be "chaſtiſed any other way."

(5) Jacobus Gaddius, de Scriptoribus non Eccleſiaſticis, tom. 1. pag. 13. apud Spizelium, in Felice Literato, pag. 112.

[D] He boaſted that his libels did more good in the world, than Sermons.] He ſays in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the ſecond part of his Raggionamenti, that if he is not eſteemed on account of his inventions, he muſt at leaſt be allowed ſome glory for the ſervice he has done to truth, by thruſting it into the chambers and into the ears of the great, to the ſhame of flattery and lying. He relates that an Ambaſſador of the Duke of Urbino ſaid, that if the Miniſters of Princes, and their Courtiers were recompenſed for their ſervices, they would owe the obligation to the pen of Peter Aretin. He adds, that another ſaid: Aretin is more neceſſary to human life than ſermons, becauſe ſermons put only the meaner perſon into the good way; but his writings put the great Lords into it. Theſe are his words in Italian: Quando io non foſſi degno di honor veruno, mercè de le inventioni con le quali do l'anima a lo ſtilo, merito pur qualche poco di gloria per havere ſpinto la verita ne le camere, e ne le orecchie de Potenti ad onta de l'adulatione, & de la menzogna: & per non difraudere il mio grado, uſero le parole ſteſſe del ſingulare M. Gianiacopo, Ambaſciadore d'Urbino: Noi che ſpendiamo il tempo ne ſervigi de Prencipi inſieme con ogni huomo di Corte, e non ciaſcun virtuoſo, ſiamo riguardati e riconoſciuti da noſtri padroni, bontà de gaſtighi che gli ha dati la penna di Pietro. E lo ſa Milano, come cadde de la ſacra bocca di colui, che in pochi meſi mi ha arrichito di due Coppe d'oro: l'Aretino è piu neceſſario a la vita humana, che le Predicationi, e che ſia il vero eſſe pongono in ſu le dritte ſtrade le perſone ſemplici, & i ſuoi Scritti le ſignorili, & il mio non è vanto, ma un modo di procedere per ſoſtener ſe medeſimo obſervato da Enea, dove non era conoſciuto.

[E] He was told in a letter, that his pen had ſubjected more Princes to him, than the greateſt Kings had ever ſubdued by their arms.] I read this in a letter written to him by Baptiſta Tornielli (6). He declares to him that he deſerved the title of Germanicus, Pannonicus, &c. as formerly the Emperors took the name of the Provinces where they had triumphed. Non ſapete voi, che non la penna voſtra in mano havete ſoggiogato piu Principi, ch' ogni altro potentiſſimo Principe con l'arme? La penna voſtra à qual non mette terrore, à quale non è formidabile, à chi anche non grata, a chi non cara, ove ſi moſtra amica? La penna voſtra ſi puo dir, che v' ha fatto trionfator quaſi di tutti i Principi del Mondo; che quaſi tutti vi ſono tributarii, & come infeudati. Meritareſte eſſer chiamato Germanico, Pannonico, Gallico, Hiſpanico, & finalmente inſignito di quei titoli, quali ſi davano a gli antichi Imperadori Romani, ſecondo le provincie per forza d'arma, & per eſſer piu di loro potenti, non era gran meraviglia, maggior meraviglia aſſai è, che un privato, inerme, haggio ſaggiogato infiniti potenti: che l'un potente l'altro, non è meraviglia. i. e. "Do you not know that you "have ſubdued more Princes pen-in-hand, than "any one of the moſt powerful Princes has with "his arms? Whom does not your pen terrify, to "whom is it not formidable? to whom alſo is it "not agreeable, to whom is it not dear, when it ap"pears favourable? Your pen has, if I may ſo ſay, "triumphed in a manner over all the Princes of "the world; who are all become a ſort of tributa"ries and vaſſals to you. You deſerve to be called "Germanicus, Pannonicus, Gallicus, Hiſpanicus, in "ſhort, to be diſtinguiſhed with ſuch titles as were "given to the ancient Roman Emperors, according "to the Province they had ſubdued. But that they "ſhould conquer a Province by force of arms, and "by being more powerful, is no great wonder; but "it is very wonderful that a private man, unarmed, "ſhould ſubdue an infinite number of thoſe, who are "powerful: but that one Potentate ſhould ſubdue an"other, is no wonder."

(6) It is in a collection publiſhed in 1558, at Venice, appreſſo Dominico Giglio, in 8°, page 128 verſo of the firſt book.

[F] He was encouraged .... to ſatyriſe Princes, that they might reform.] It is the Marquis du Guaſt, that gave him this exhortation, in a letter written with his own hand (7). He does not deſire to be privileged: he deſires his deſects to be cenſured by Aretin; and exhorts him to do it. Probably he was pretty ſure he ſhould not be taken at his word. Aretin did not confound his friends with his enemies: he made his executions only upon thoſe who had neglected to redeem themſelves. Seguite dico col ſolito animo, ſays the Marquis du Guaſt to him, e ſe in me voſtro amico alcuna coſa men che laudabile conoſcete, ricordatevi di non laſciar di riprenderla: accioche fatto accorto dell' error, come deſidero, lo fugga, e divenga migliore. Seguite lo ſtil voſtro, che di nuovo ve ne prego: accioche, ſe i defetti con verità ſaranno in altri trovati, ſi vergognino, & vergognandoſi, & mendandoſi fuggano dal vitio alla virtù. Onde i rei divenuti buoni, abbraciati con eſſa virtù, ſi confermino nel bene Del che quanto in ciò l'humana Repub. ſi avanzi; lo giudichino quelli, che lo ſanno meglio intender, ch' io no'l ſo eſprimere. i. e. "Purſue your own manner, and if you obſerve any "thing that is leſs commendable in me your friend, "be ſure you do not forget to reprove me; that ſo "being admoniſhed of my error, as I deſire, I may "avoid it and become better. Purſue your own man"ner, I entreat you again: that ſo, if the faults ſhall "indeed be found in others, they may be aſhamed, "and by amending may fly from vice to virtue. "Whence the guilty being become good, and engaged "in virtue, may be confirmed in goodneſs. Whence "how much mankind will improve herein, thoſe may "judge, who can underſtand it better than I can ex"preſs."

(7) It is in the 44th page of the ſecond book of the Collection, the title of which is in the preceding quotation.

[G] He has had the Book de tribus Impoſtoribus falſly imputed to him.] We ſhall perhaps have occaſion to examine this matter at large, and to ſhew that there is very little probability of this Book having ever exiſted. Mr. L'Abbé Nicaiſe, one of the worthieſt men of this age (8), who holds correſpondence with all the learned in Europe, amongſt whom he maintained a very honourable place, was ſo kind as to ſend me laſt year (9), a very curious diſſertation of Mr. de la Monnoie

(8) See the commendation given of him in the Menagiana. tom. 2. pag. 68. edit. Pariſ. 1715.

(9) That is, the year 1693.

Epitaph related by Moreri [H]. The Author of this Epitaph exaggerated the affair without doubt. If they had reaſon to think that Aretin did not love God, they could have no reaſon to ſay that he did not know him. His works of piety ſufficiently ſhew the noie, his countryman (10), upon the Book de tribus Impoſtoribus. It is full of very well choſen Remarks, and highly deſerved to be printed *. Mr. de Beauval has juſt given a little extract of it (11). The author ſhews by very ſtrong reaſons, that this Book is a meer chimæra. Grotius thought, and perhaps upon bad grounds, that this Book was ſpoken of before Aretin was born. He ſays the enemies of Frederick Barbaroſſa accuſed him of having cauſed this Book to be written (12). He ſhould have ſaid that Frederick II was accuſed of having ſaid that the world had been deceived by three impoſtors (13). The good father Merſenne has related, that one of his friends, who had read the Book in queſtion, found in it the ſtyle of Peter Aretin (14). Mere trifles theſe! Yet there is no ſaying how far this propoſition of father Merſenne has ſpread.

(10) They are of Dijon.

* [It was printed in 1715, at the end of the 4th tom. of the Menagiana, edit. de Pariſ. Add. of the Amſterdam edition.]

(11) Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, mois de Fevrier, 1694, pag. 278, 279. He has related the commendation which the Menagiana gives of M. de la Monnoie.

(12) Grotius, Append. ad Comment. de Antichriſto, p. 133.

(13) Vide Dickherum, de Scriptis Adeſpotis, p. 374. edit. anni 1686.

(14) Merſennus in Geneſim, pag. 1830.

[H] I cannot believe that the Epitaph related by Moreri was engraven on his monument.] He does not ſay poſitively and preciſely, that this Epitaph was engraven on Peter Aretin's monument, in the church of St. Luke: but there is no man who has not a right to ſuppoſe that it is what he meant; for he expreſſed himſelf after this manner: "He died at Venice, "where he is buried in the church of Saint Luke." Here follows his Epitaph:

"Condit Aretini cineres lapis iſte ſepultos,
"Mortales atro qui ſale perfricuit.
"Intactus Deus eſt illi, cauſamque rogatus
"Hanc dedit, ille, inquit, non mihi notus erat (15).

(15) Voetius, Diſputation. vol. 1. pag. 206. and Spizelius, Atheiſmi Scrutinio, pag. 18.

"It is more ingenious in Italian, in theſe terms:

"Qui giace l'Aretin Poëta Toſco,
"Che d'ognun diſſe malo che (16) di Dio,
"Scuſandoſi col dir' io no' l'conoſco."

(16) It ſhould be read mal fuor che.

There is nothing in Moreri's narration, that can give us the leaſt ſuſpicion in the world, that theſe four verſes are not the very inſcription on Aretin's monument. It is deceiving a reader then, who is not capable of avoiding the miſtake by his own reflections. It is in particular laying a ſnare for the Proteſtants, who if they do not tread a little cautiouſly, are ready to believe that there is hardly any ſubject of offence which the Italians do not admit into their churches. Several amongſt them would eaſily believe, upon Moreri's word, that the Patriarch of Venice ſuffered, not only that an Atheiſt ſhould be buried in holy ground, but alſo that the Epitaph of this Atheiſt in four verſes, which turn the thing into a jeſt, ſhould be expoſed in a church to the eyes of the world. For my part I cannot believe that the corruption and negligence of the Clergy ever went ſo far as to ſuffer ſuch ſepulchral inſcriptions in a church. I am apt to think that the four verſes related by Moreri are one of thoſe ſatyrical pieces, which are made upon the death of perſons, and have the title and form of an Epitaph. How many ſuch have been made upon the Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin? Thoſe who make the Elogies of illuſtrious men, and after the example of Paulus Jovius, delight in ſetting down their Epitaphs, ought always to explain whether they were verſes actually engraven on the monument, or only a piece of wit. If this precaution had been taken with regard to Aretin, we ſhould not have ſeen in Paul Freherus's Theatre, and in the Felix Literatus of Spizelius (17), that the four verſes in queſtion are upon the monument of the perſon at Venice (18). A Divine of Utrecht affirms, that the Epitaph of Peter Aretin, inſerted in the Elogies of Paulus Jovius, and that which Pazzi has related, teſtify that he was a great Apoſtle of Atheiſm. "Aretini Epitaphium, apud Jovium in Elo- "giis Virorum doctorum, ſays he (19), & alterum "apud Giuzeppe Pazzi, indicat qualis & quantus Atheiſmi præco fuerit; ſic enim Pazzi in libro cui tit. "Continuatione della monſtruoſa farina, Venetiis, "1609. Qui giace l'Aretini Poeta Toſca (20), che "diſſe mal d'ogn' un fuor che di Dio; ma ſi ſcuſo "dicendo, no, 'l (21) conoſco. Aliter ſic: Qui giace "eſtinto quell' amaro Toſco, ch' ogn' huom vivendo "con mal dir trafiſſe. Vero e che mal di Dio giamai "non diſſe, che ſi ſcuſo dicendo io no 'l conoſco." Upon this, I have to ſay in the firſt place, that Paulus Jovius does not relate Peter Aretin's Epitaph. How ſhould he relate it, when he died before him? It is that of Leonard Aretin which he relates; but it contains nothing that can call the Chriſtianity of the deceaſed in queſtion; it mentions nothing of Religion. In the ſecond place there is nothing to be built upon the two Italian Epitaphs; for they were made without being owned, and were not engraven on the monument. It was a piece of wit of ſome ſatyrical Poet. Spizelius has copied almoſt word for word the whole paſſage of Voetius without quoting it (22). Obſerve that Lorenzo Craſſo (23) inſinuates ſtill more plainly than Moreri, that the four Latin verſes are upon the tomb of this Atheiſt in the Church of Saint Luke.

(17) Page 111.

(18) Venetiis ſepultus jacet, cum hoc Epitaphio, Condit Aretini &c. Paulus Freher. in Theatro Viror. illuſtrium, pag. 1461.

(19) Voetius, Diſput. tom. 1. pag. 206.

(20) It ſhould be Toſco.

(21) It ſhould be io no'l.

(22) Spizelii Scrutinium Atheiſmi, pag. 18.

(23) In page 38 of the firſt volume of his Elogia.

Let us add here a good Supplement (24). "It is "the cuſtom, among the Catholicks, to fix to ſome "column, or other thing, near the grave of the "dead, and upon all the dead of reputation, ſome "funeral inſcriptions in paper. The truth is that "theſe inſcriptions are and ought to be always to "the honour of the deceaſed. But Aretin having "been a diſtinguiſhed libertine, it is very poſſible that "ſome banterer, during the time of or ſoon after the "interment, had carried into the church of Saint "Luke the Epitaph related by Moreri and ſo many "others before him. It is thus that we muſt under- "ſtand the words of Ghilini, who has expreſſed him- "ſelf clearly enough about it in this ſenſe, when, af- "ter having ſaid, e ſopra il ſuo ſepolcro fu poſto queſto "Epitaffio, i. e. "and this Epitaph was put upon his "tomb," "Condit Aretini cineres, &c. he adds imme- "diately, fu parimente appeſo alla ſua tomba queſt' altro "quaſi tradotto d'al ſuddetto, che va attorno nella bocca ſino "delle perſone idiote, Qui giace l'Aretin, &c. i. e. "this "other alſo was hung on this monument, being as it were "tranſlated from the beforementioned, which goes about "in the mouth of every illiterate perſon, Qui giace "l'Aretin, &c. The Italian Epitaph, as it is related "by Ghilini, is much more correct than it is in Pazzi, "in Voetius, or in Moreri; and I do not underſtand "this laſt, when he ſays it is more ingenious than "the Latin. He alſo and Ghilini ſeem to me to be "miſtaken in taking the Italian for a copy of the "Latin. It is in my opinion quite the contrary; "and what convinces me of the truth of this, is that "the Italian one is related in the Nouvelles Récréati- "ons, printed under the name of Bonaventure des "Periers, in 16, at Paris, in 1572 *, and that the "Latin cannot be ſhewn in any book ſo old. . . . . "There are ſome miſtakes in the Italian Epitaph pro- "duced by Moreri, and by Voetius. . . . . The moſt "correct is that, which is in theſe words in Ghilini:

(24) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

* I quote this edition, becauſe in the firſt, which was printed at Lyons in 8°, by Robert Granjon, in 1558, and which is not ſo full as this by 35 tales, the Epitaph of Aretin is not related.

"Qui giace l'Aretin amaro toſco
"Del ſem' human, la cui lingua trafiſſe
"Et vivi, & morti: d'Iddio mal non diſſe,
"Et ſi ſcuſo, co 'l dir, io no 'l conoſco.

That is,

"Here Aretin the bitter Tuſcan lies
"A man, who never fail'd to ſatyriſe
"Both dead and living: God alone was free;
"He gave this reaſon; he's unknown to me."

This, far from enervating my criticiſm on Moreri, is rather a confirmation of it.

In the converſation I had in 1696, with Father Coronelli, who accompanied the Ambaſſadors from the Republick of Venice, to England, I aſked him what he thought of Aretin's Epitaph. He anſwered, he did not think it was as Moreri had related it, and promiſed to inform himſelf about it. He wrote to me from Venice, the 2d of November of the ſame year, and told me that it was very true, that Aretin was interred in the church of Saint Luke; but that he had not yet been able to diſcover any thing concerning the Epitaph. He ſent me a paſſage taken (25) out the contrary [I]. I do not believe that any principle of Atheiſm is found in his writings; but as many of his Libels violently attack the diſorders of the Clergy, and deſcribe in a profane and debauched ſtile, an infinite number of impurities aſcribed to the monaſtic life, it out of the Venetia deſcritta dal Sanſovino, coll' Additioni de Martinioni. This is what it contains: Vi dorme parimente in un depoſito poſto in aria quel Pietro Aretino, il quale fu cognominato flagello de Principi, per la licentioſa preſuntione della ſua mordaciſſima penna, & il quale morendo perde del tutto il nome: poiche eſſendo ignaro di lettere, e operando per forza di natura ne' ſuoi caprici, hebbe dopo morte il meritato premio della ſua petulantia: conciofia che eſſendo le coſe ſue reputate dalla Chieſa poco Criſtiane, furono vietate del tutto à Lettori, e ſi ſarebbe affatto cancellata la memoria, ſe l'Arioſto burlandoſi del titolo ch' egli ſi haveva preſo indebitamente, non haveſſe detto nel Furioſo,

(25) Page 120.

Ecco il flagello
De Prencipi, il divin Pietro Aretino.

i. e. "Here alſo is depoſited Peter Aretin, who was "ſurnamed the Scourge of Princes, for the licentious "preſumption of his moſt ſtinging pen, and who be-"ing dead loſt all his reputation; for being igno-"rant of letters, and writing by the mere force of "nature, and his own caprice, he has received after "death the due reward of his petulance; for his pieces "being thought by the Church not very conſiſtent "with Chriſtianity, were entirely prohibited from "being read, and his memory had been entirely ef-"faced if Arioſto, by way of ridicule on the title "which he had unjuſtly taken, had not ſaid in his "Furioſo.

"Behold the ſcourge
"Of Princes, the divine Peter Aretin."

Obſerve theſe words of Mr. Miſſon. "I can hardly "believe, as ſome have aſſured me, that the ſevere "Epigram againſt Aretin has been turned into an E-"pitaph. At a venture I will ſet down here the co-"py of it, which was given me (26)." It is a miſ-fortune that he never found St. Luke's church open; he went thither ſeveral times on purpoſe to ſee Aretin's Monument. If he could have ſeen it, he would have furniſhed us with a good deciſion of this affair. The Journaliſts of Utrecht, ſpeaking of this Voyage, relate the four verſes, Condit Aretini cineres, &c. and declare that they are ſaid to be engraven on the monument of this Satyriſt, Cujus ſepulchro ſequentes verſus inſcripti eſſe dicuntur (27). Once again, I do not believe a word of it.

(26) Miſſon, Nouveau Voiage d'Italie, tom. 1. p. 281, Hague edition, in 1698. This book has been ſo well received by the public, and not without reaſon, that it has been already printed three times.

(27) Biblioth. Librorum novorum, tom. 3. pag. 630.

[I] It was doing him injuſtice to ſay that he did not know God: his works of piety ſufficiently ſhew the contrary.] Paul Freher relates, that ſome Princes of Italy being far from imitators of the Emperor and the King of France, who made preſents to Aretin, that they might not be laſhed by him, cauſed him to be well cudgelled; and that this chaſtiſement had ſo good an effect, that our Author renounced Satyrs and defamatory Libels, and ſpent the reſt of his time in writing books of piety. Quidam Principes Italiæ minus ſibi convenire exiſtimantes donis eum afficere, fuſtibus ad mortem uſque cædere per alios curârunt, & hoc modo linguam ejus maledicam refrænârunt, qui deinceps à ſcriptis ſatyricis abſtinens ſacra ſcripſit, non ſicut priora per inquiſitionem prohibita (28). It happened to him much as it did to thoſe of whom Horace ſpeaks in the firſt Epiſtle of the ſecond book, verſ. 154.

(28) Freher. Theatr. Viror. illuſtrium, pag. 1461. Ghilini ſays the ſame thing in the 132d page of the firſt part of his Teatro.

——— Vertere modum formidine fuſtis
Ad bene dicendum delectandumque redacti.

That is,

"Fear made them civil, and deſign to write
"With modeſty; ſpeak well and to delight."
Creech.

I ſhall mention only two differences. The firſt is, that he did not give over out of fear. The cudgel had plaid to ſome purpoſe upon his poor ſhoulders. The ſecond is that he did not divert much by changing his ſtyle, he was gone out of his element. One does not much ſignalize one's wit, when in the latter part of our days one ſets about writing books of Devotion: This is ſaid upon Freher's ſuppoſition, which I ſhall examine by and by. In the opinion of ſome perſons however, his books in this way ſhew him a true convert. It is well known what was the converſion of the famous Aretin. Every thing was changed in him, even his very name: and ſome pretend that he has ſucceeded ſo well in it, that it is ſcarce poſſible to find in the books of devotion of Partenio Etiro (29), any marks of the old man, which are ſo ſtrongly imprinted in the works of Pietro Aretino (30). There is a paſſage in the Converſations of Mr. Menage which ought to have a place here. "Aretin has written alſo ſome books "of devotion, and that has cauſed it to be ſaid of "him, Ubi benè, nemo melius; ubi malè, nemo pejus. "... The following is an Epigram on Aretin's Pa-"raphraſe on the ſeven Penitential Pſalms.

(29) He took this Anagram of his name at the beginning of his books of piety.

(30) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, tom. 1. pag. 133.

"Si ce Livre unit le deſtin
"De David & de l'Aretin
"Dans leur merveilleuſe ſcience,
"Lecteur, n'en ſois pas empêché,
"Qui paraphraſe la péché
"Paraphraſe la penitence (31)."

That is,

"When in this book the lot you find
"Of Aretin and David join'd
"Alike in their offence,
"Reader, be not ſurpriz'd, that he "Who paraphras'd the ſin, ſhould be
"The Paraphraſt of Penitence."

(31) Menagiana, pag. 266.

Note that in the ſecond edition of the Menagiana, the words ubi benè, nemo melius, are taken out, and it is ſaid that upon ſubjects of devotion, the ſtyle of Aretin is inſufferable, and that nothing in the world can be more wretched than the Life of J. C. of the Virgin, of S. Thomas Aquinas, Geneſis, and the Paraphraſe upon the Pſalms, either for the thoughts, or the expreſſion.

It appears by the paſſage I have quoted from Freher, that it was thought the books of Libertiniſm and thoſe of Devotion were compoſed at different times by Aretin; the firſt before, the latter after his converſion. Moreri ſays he wrote, towards the latter end of his days, ſome works of piety. I queſtion this very much, for he ſays himſelf in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond part of his Ragionamenti, that he valued himſelf chiefly upon working quick, and upon his own fund; and, to prove the fruitfulneſs and readineſs of his pen, he enumerates the titles of ſeveral works which he had compoſed in a very little time, ſome upon religious, the others upon gay ſubjects. Tutto e ciancia, eccetto il far toſto, e del ſuo. Eccovi lai Salmi, eccovi la Hiſtoria di Chriſto, eccovi le Comedie, eccovi il Dialogo, eccovi i volumi divoti & allegri, ſecondo i ſoggetti, & ho partorito ogni opera quaſi in un di, e per che ſi forniſca di vedere cio che ſa far la dote, che ſi ha ne le faſce, toſto udiranſi i furori de l'armi è le paſſioni d'amore, che io doverei laſciar di cantare per deſcrivere i geſti di quel Carlo Auguſto. i. e. "All is a "trifle, except the doing them inſtantly, and without "help. There are the Pſalms, there is the Hiſtory of "Chriſt, there is the Comedy, there is the Dialogue, "there are the Books of devotion and of gaiety, ac-"cording to the ſubjects, and I have brought forth "each work as it were in a day, and to ſhew how "far my talent reaches, whilſt the fury of arms and "the paſſion of love was heard, I was inſtantly ob-"liged to leave off ſinging, to deſcribe the actions of "Charles Auguſtus." His Paraphraſe on the Penitential Pſalms was tranſlated into French, and printed at Lyons, in 1540. His Paraphraſe upon Geneſis with the Viſion, wherein Noah knew the myſteries of the old and new Teſtament, was printed at Lyons, in 1542, tranſlated from the Italian (32). Who dare to ſay, that at that time this Author had renounced his ſins and his libels? Be that as it will, here is the title of ſome of his works of Devotion. Specchio delle Opere di Dio; Parafraſi ſopra i ſette Salmi; Vita della beata Virgine; Humanita del Figliuolo di Dio; Vita di Santo Tomaſo d'Aquino; Vita di Santa Catarina Vergine & Martire (33).

(32) Biblioth. de du Verdier.

(33) Freherus, Theatr. Viror. illuſt. p. 1461, ex Theatro Ghilini.

Here

it muſt not be wondered at that they have made him paſs for an Atheiſt. But however, a man that had any reſpect for religion, and for moral honeſty, would never have written dialogues upon ſuch ſubjects as Aretin has choſen, and would not have employed in it ſuch looſe expreſſions. It may eaſily be perceived that I ſpeak of his Ragionamenti [K]. They

Here follows a complete confirmation of what I have advanced (34). "Aretin compoſed his works of piety, "only to exerciſe his imagination, and to ſhew that "he was capable of every thing, to appeaſe the de- "votees that were ſtirred up againſt him, and to "draw to himſelf the greateſt part of the liberalities "of ſome great Ladies, to whom he ſent copies of "ſuch Books as theſe. He was not a whit the more "virtuous for that, ſeeing after he had publiſhed his "Paraphraſe upon the ſeven Pſalms, and his Huma- "nita di Chriſto in 1535, he thought fit about the "end of 1537, to dedicate to Battiſta Zatti, of Breſ- "cia, a Roman citizen, thoſe infamous poſtures, which "have been ſo much ſpoken of, at the bottom of "each of which he had put a ſonnet, as ſhameful, "according to Mr. Felibien, as the actions repre- "ſented. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Battiſta Zatti "is in the firſt volume of Aretin's letters. It appears "alſo by the portrait, which this author makes of "his manners in the CCXCth letter of the fourth "volume, dated December 1547, that notwithſtand- "ing he was then in the fifty ſeventh year of his age "* he led a life not leſs licentious. The place where "he ſpeaks of the interruption, which he is obliged "to make whilſt he is writing this letter, is ſome- "thing very ſingular (35)." .... The CCCCXXXIXth letter of the ſame volume, ſhews alſo that he was not very ſcrupulous in his profeſſion of morality.

(34) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript remarks.

* The proof of this is taken from his ſpeaking of his being 54 years of age in a letter to Paulus Jovius, May 1545, pag. 141. verſ. of the 3d volume, Paris edition in 1609, in 8vo.

(35) This paſſage is too licentious to be related.

They have been in the wrong therefore who have pretended that he compoſed his pious Books after having renounced his libertine life by a ſerious repentance. He compoſed Books of piety and Books of debauchery alternately, being always a man of ill principles, and plunged in corruption; and if, with regard to men, he was leſs pernicious when he exerciſed himſelf in pious ſubjects, than when he treated of ſuch as were obſcene, he was ſtill more criminal in the eyes of God in the former than in the latter. It did not belong to ſuch a profane perſon to touch upon holy things: he did them a greater injury, in explaining them with a depraved heart, and upon ill motives, than if he had openly inſulted them. We may apply to him the terrible cenſure contained in theſe words of the Pſalmiſt:

Auſſi dira l'Eternel au Meſchant,
Pourquoi vas-tu mes édits tant preſchant,
Et prens ma Loi en ta bouche maligne,
Veu que tu as en haine diſcipline,
Et que mes dits jettes & ne reçois?
Si un larron d'avanture apperçois,
Avec lui cours: car autant que lui vaux,
T'accompagnant de paillards & ribaux:
Ta bouche mets à mal e mediſances,
Ta langue braſſe & fraudes & nuiſances,
Cauſant aſſis pour ton prochain blâmer,
Et pour ton frere ou couſin diffamer:
Tu fais ces maux, & cependant que riens
Je ne t'en dis, tu m' eſtimes & tiens
Semblable a toi: mais quoique tard le face,
J'en reprendrai quelque jour en ta face (36).

That is,

"But to the wicked thus ſaith God,
"How dar'ſt thou teach my laws abroad,
"Or in thy mouth my Cov'nant take?
"For ſtubborn thou, confirm'd in ſin,
"Haſt proof againſt inſtruction been,
"And of my word didſt lightly ſpeak.
"When thou a ſubtle thief didſt ſee,
"Thou gladly didſt with him agree,
"And with Adult'rers didſt partake.
"Vile ſlander is thy chief delight;
"Thy tongue by envy mov'd and ſpight,
"Deceitful tales does hourly ſpread.
"Thou doſt with hateful ſcandals wound
"Thy brother, and with lies confound
"The off-ſpring of thy mother's bed.
"Theſe things didſt thou, whom ſtill I ſtrove
"To gain with ſilence and with love;
"Till thou didſt wickedly ſurmiſe,
"That I was ſuch a one as thou;
"But I'll reprove and ſhame thee now,
"And ſet thy ſins before thine eyes.

Brady and Tate.

(36) Pſalm l. I make uſe of the verſion of Clement Marot.

I confeſs that the generality of mankind are not ſhocked at the Books of Devotion, which are compoſed by an irreligious and profane perſon; but thoſe who have a nice and delicate taſte are more offended at them, than they would be if the Author was to ſpeak ſincerely. Such as theſe would ſay, Take your choice; be either the one or the other: do not give the Printer a Book of Piety to day, and one of Libertiniſm to morrow. We do not deſire ſuch a Comedy: ſince you perſevere in the evil, we had rather you would inceſſantly keep the appearances of it.

. . . . . Quanto conſtantior idem
In vitiis, tanto levius miſer ac prior ille,
Qui jam contento, jam laxo fune laborat (37).

That is,

"He that is conſtant in his vicious race,
"Runs the ſame courſe, and keeps an equal pace,
"Is certainly not half ſo great a wretch,
"As he that now rides looſe, and now on ſtretch.

Creech.

(37) Horat. Sat. 7. lib. 2. ver. 18.

It were to be wiſhed that nobody would meddle with Books of Devotion, without being well perſuaded of what he ſays, and putting it in practice; for to perſons of reflection, it is a great ſubject of offence to ſee a frequent claſhing between the thoughts and words of thoſe, who write ſuch Books, and ſtill more between their actions and their writings.

[K] I ſpeak of his Ragionamenti.] They are divided into a hundred and eleven parts, the laſt of which, that treats of the court, and of cards, is much more tolerable than the reſt. The firſt treats of the diſorders of the Nuns, the married women, and the Ladies of pleaſure. It is enough to ſay in general, that the ſecond is the ſpirit and hiſtory of Whoring. How abominable ſoever theſe dialogues may be, they are yet leſs ſo than the Book, which is imputed to him de omnibus Veneris Schematibus.

The following remark was ſent me (38). "This "Book (de omnibus Veneris Schematibus,) which is here "aſcribed to Aretin, and which abundance of people "believe to have been compoſed by him in Latin, be- "cauſe out of modeſty you give it a Latin title, is "nothing but a collection of ſixteen immodeſt figures, "engraven by the famous Marco Antonio of Bologna, "after the deſigns of Julio Romano, at the bottom "of each of which is a ſonnet of Aretin's. He ſpeaks "of it in a letter dated the 27th of November 1527, "wherein he tells Seignior Cæſar Fregoſa, that he ſends "him il Libro de i Sonnetti e de le Figure luſſurioſe. Va- "ſari, and after him Mr. Felibien, have ſaid that "theſe figures and ſonnets were to the number of "twenty; but Aretin himſelf, in the dedication "which he made to that Battiſta Zatti, of whom I "ſpake before, reckons only ſixteen. There is a "dialogue of Maddalena and Giulia, entitled la Putana "errante, which treats at large de i diverſi Congiun- "gimenti, to the number of five and thirty. This "is greatly ſurpaſſing the ancient debauchery,

(38) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

"Quales nec Didymæ ſciunt puellæ,
"Nec molles Elephantidos libelli....
"Sunt illic Veneris novem figuræ.

"It is thus that Lindenbruch (39) quotes the XLIIId "Epigram of the twelfth Book of Martial; others "read novæ inſtead of novem. Aretin, notwithſtand- "ing the work was always printed under his name, "diſavows it, and ſays it was done by one of his "pupils, named Veniero. He explains himſelf "upon this ſubject to the Duke of Mantua, in the "following manner, in his Capitolo.

(39) Notis in Priapeia, p. 305.

"Ma

They were printed during his life; but it is difficult to discover when they were printed the first time [L]. We have six volumes of his Letters, which are not worth much [M].

" Ma perch' io ſento il preſente all' odore,
" Un operetta in quel cambio galante.
" Vi mando hora in ſtil ladro traditore
" Intitolata la Putana errante
" Dal Veniero compoſta mio creato,
" Che me in dir mal quatro giornate inante."

I add to this a fine paſſage of Mr. Chevillier: " It " was about the year 1525, that Julio Romano, the " moſt famous Painter of Italy, being inſtigated by " the enemy of the ſalvation of mankind, invented " drawings to engrave twenty plates. The ſubjects " of them are ſo immodeſt that I dare only name " them. Peter Aretin, a man publickly infamous " for his impiety and Atheiſm, compoſed ſonnets for " each picture. George Vaſari, who relates this in " his lives of the Painters, ſays, he does not know " which would be the greateſt impurity, to caſt one's " eyes upon the drawings of Julio, or to dip into the verſes of Aretin:" Io non ſo qual fuſſe piu o brutto lo ſpettacolo de i Deſigni di Giulio all' occhio, o le parole dell' Aretino à gl' orecchi. 3. Part. pa. 302. " An En- " graver named Marco Antonio, had the aſſurance to " engrave ſuch a number of infamous things upon " twenty plates, that Pope Clement VII cauſed him " to be put into priſon; but the Cardinal de Medi- " cis ſaved his life. And notwithſtanding Julio's great " merit as a Painter, he would have been very rigo- " rouſly puniſhed if he had not retired to Mantua. " It happened in 1527, when Rome was plundered " by the army of Charles the fifth, that this Engra- " ver's lot was to loſe all his wealth, and being obliged " to quit the city, he died ſoon afterwards." Mr. Chevillier adds, " that Mr. Jollain, a Merchant in the " Rue St. Jaques at Paris, knowing where there were " ſome of theſe infamous plates, which repreſented " theſe abominable drawings of Julio, and the im- " pure ſonnets of Aretin, went thither, and bought " them for a hundred crowns, with an intent to de- " ſtroy them, which he executed.... He has always " believed they were the original plates engraven by " Marco Antonio, which he deſtroyed (40).

(40) Chevillier, Origine de l' Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 224.

[L] His Ragionamenti were printed during his life; but it is difficult to diſcover when they were printed the firſt time.] The Preface of the Edition of 1584, leaves us no room to doubt of the firſt of theſe two facts. The Bookſeller under the fictitious name of Barbagrigia, declares that the Author had reſolved to publiſh his dialogues, divided by days, after the manner of Boccace, and as they are in the Edition which I have quoted; but that others prevented him, and publiſhed this work againſt his will, and in great diſorder. Hoggi oi preſento di loro una buona parte.... da me ridotte ne la maniera ch'egli le compoſe, e ne la medeſima maniera ch'egli haveva diterminato di farle la prima volta ſtampare, s'altri (contra ſua voglia) non haveſſero prima da lui date per mezzo de la ſtampa in luce aſſai male acconcie: concioſia coſa che Giornate queſto nomaſſe per ſeguitare l'alte pedate del gran Giovanni Boccacio. I add to this ſomething more exact, and I do it with ſo much the more ſatisfaction, becauſe I acquit my ſelf at the ſame time of an indiſpenſable duty towards Mr. Minutoli, by the public teſtimony I give him of my ſingular eſteem, and of the great value I ſet upon the friendſhip, with which he honours me. I had conſulted this able Profeſſor of Geneva, and he communicated to me the following extract of a letter that had been written to him from Dijon. " I muſt ſpeak " to you at preſent, Sir, of a Book that is quite the " reverſe of that (41), the Ragionamenti di Pietro Aretino. You deſire me to clear up ſome things re- " lating to them. The Ragionamenti, or whimſical " diſcourſes of Aretin appeared before his death: we " cannot queſtion this ſince in 1551, there was an " invective of Joachim Perion a Benedictine Monk " againſt the Author of the Ragionamenti, who did " not die till 1556 (42). Antonio Franceſco Doni, " in the firſt part of his Librairie, publiſhed in 1550, " which contains the printed Books, ſpeaks of two " dialogues delle Donne (43), which are different from " the Ragionamenti, of which he does not ſpeak a " word, becauſe they were certainly not then printed. " With regard to the Letters, the firſt volume only " deſerves to be read, tho' it contains very little ſatyr: " the other five are extremely inſipid, and you may de- " pend upon Mr. Menage, in the Menagiana, who " does them rather too much honour, when he values " them for the ſtyle." In another letter, Mr. Minutoli has been ſo kind as to communicate two remarks to me, which he made in reading the letters of illuſtrious men publiſhed by John Michael Brutus. He found theſe words in the 369 page, in a letter of Joannes Maludanus to Dionyſius Lambinus: Pœnè me fugerat, quod ſcribendum in primis fuiſſe arbitror. A Perionio editam eſſe audio orationem adverſus Petrum Aretinum. Periculum eſt ne ut jampridem Principum, ita poſthac & Μοναχῶν flagellum eſſe & nominari velit laceſſitus Aretinus. i. e. " I had almoſt forgotten what " was principally to be written. I hear that Perion's " oration againſt Peter Aretin is publiſhed. There " is ſome danger that Aretin being provoked may have " a mind to be and be called the ſcourge of Monks, " as he has been before that of Princes." In this letter there is only the date of the day, Nonis Maiis; but as Lambinus's anſwer is dated Nonis Juniis anno CIↃ IↃ LI, it is eaſy to gueſs in what year Maludanus had written to him. My reader will be very glad to find in this place, what Lambinus, who was then at Rome, judged of Perion's Oration. Perionii Orationem in Petrum Aretinum jampridem legeramus, ſed multo non ſine riſu. Quid enim magis ridiculum excogitari poteſt, quam hominem Benedictinum, Philoſophum, Ciceronianum, Theologum, cum P. Aretino verbis decertare? Omnino ſuæ exiſtimationi parum conſuluiſſe judicatur, nam quod arguit illum eſſe impurum, ſceleratum, impium, quid tum poſtea? Tales homines non verbis aut ſcriptis caſtigandi, ſed legibus & pœnis ſunt coërcendi. Sed hac de re alias plura. i. e. " I have read Perion's Ora- " tion againſt Peter Aretin, and not without laughing " heartily. For what can be imagined more ridicu- " lous, than that a Benedictin, a Philoſopher, a Ci- " ceronian, a Divine ſhould diſpute with P. Aretin? " He ſeems intirely to have neglected his own repu- " tation, for what ſignifies it to prove him to be im- " modeſt, wicked, and impious? Such men are not " to be chaſtiſed by a pen, but by the ſeverity of the " laws."

With regard to the ſecond part of the text of this remark, read what follows, and you will admire the exactneſs and extent of the inquiries of that learned man whom I quote (44). " It is difficult to note the " preciſe time of the firſt edition of the Ragionamen- " ti, both becauſe it is become ſo ſcarce, that it is " almoſt impoſſible to meet with any copies of it, " and alſo becauſe the Dialogues, which compoſe the " two parts of this work, did not all appear at the " ſame time. The firſt part came out ſome years " before the reſt; and it is certain, that they were " both printed in 1537; the Epiſtles Dedicatory of " both parts being inſerted in the edition of the firſt " volume of Aretin's Letters, at Venice, in folio, by " Franceſco Marcolini, the ſame year. The title of " theſe Ragionamenti has varied. The Author, in " the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond part of theſe " Diſcourſes, calls the firſt i tre Giorni di capricci, and " alſo barely Dialogo; for this is what he underſtands " by theſe words, eccovi il Dialogo, which are not found " however in the ſame Epiſtle inſerted amongſt the " Letters of the firſt volume: where there is ſtill an- " other conſiderable variation, which is, that after " theſe words e per non defraudare il mio grado, all " that follows to, e lo ſa Milano come cadde incluſive- " ly, is entirely omitted; inſtead of which there is " uſaro le parole cadute de la ſacra bocca del magno " Antonio da Leva, l'Aretino è più, &c. Sometimes, " inſtead of Dialogo, he ſpeaks at length, as in the " Epiſtle to his ape, il Dialogo de la Nanna e de la " Antonia. Sometimes, as in his Dialogue della Cor- " te, by the Nanna, he underſtands the firſt part of " the Ragionamenti, and by the Pippa, the ſecond. " In a Letter of the 15th of May 1537, to Franceſco " da l'Orme, he means the two parts by i due Dia- " loghi, when Antonio Franceſco Doni means the " ſame alſo by Dialoghi due delle Donne *. It is " manifeſt

(44) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript remarks.

* Libraria de l Doni, Part 1. pag 39. verſa.

(41) He had juſt ſpoken of Mr. Baillet's book concerning the devotion to the Holy Virgin.

(42) See the note [N].

(43) Freher puts theſe two Dialogues amongſt the works of Aretin, and does not ſpeak of the Ragionamenti. Perhaps theſe two Dialogues are this 1ſt edition, which was publiſhed againſt the will of the Author, and in a different order from his own.

it muſt not be wondered at that they have made him paſs for an Atheiſt. But however, a man that had any reſpect for religion, and for moral honeſty, would never have written dialogues upon ſuch ſubjects as Aretin has choſen, and would not have employed in it ſuch looſe expreſſions. It may eaſily be perceived that I ſpeak of his Ragionamenti [K]. They

(34) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript remarks.

Here follows a complete confirmation of what I have advanced (34). "Aretin compoſed his works of piety, "only to exerciſe his imagination, and to ſhew that "he was capable of every thing, to appeaſe the de- "votees that were ſtirred up againſt him, and to "draw to himſelf the greateſt part of the liberalities "of ſome great Ladies, to whom he ſent copies of "ſuch Books as theſe. He was not a whit the more "virtuous for that, ſeeing after he had publiſhed his "Paraphraſe upon the ſeven Pſalms, and his Huma- "nita di Chriſto in 1535, he thought fit about the "end of 1537, to dedicate to Battiſta Zatti, of Breſ- "cia, a Roman citizen, thoſe infamous poſtures, which "have been ſo much ſpoken of, at the bottom of "each of which he had put a ſonnet, as ſhameful, "according to Mr. Felibien, as the actions repre- "ſented. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Battiſta Zatti "is in the firſt volume of Aretin's letters. It appears "alſo by the portrait, which this author makes of "his manners in the CCXCth letter of the fourth "volume, dated December 1547, that notwithſtand- "ing he was then in the fifty ſeventh year of his age "* he led a life not leſs licentious. The place where "he ſpeaks of the interruption, which he is obliged "to make whilſt he is writing this letter, is ſome- "thing very ſingular (35)." .... The CCCCXXXIXth letter of the ſame volume, ſhews alſo that he was not very ſcrupulous in his profeſſion of morality.

* The proof of this is taken from his ſpeaking of his being 54 years of age in a letter to Paulus Jovius, May 1545, pag. 141. verſ. of the 3d volume, Paris edition in 1609, in 8vo.

(35) This paſſage is too licentious to be related.

They have been in the wrong therefore who have pretended that he compoſed his pious Books after having renounced his libertine life by a ſerious repentance. He compoſed Books of piety and Books of debauchery alternately, being always a man of ill principles, and plunged in corruption; and if, with regard to men, he was leſs pernicious when he exerciſed himſelf in pious ſubjects, than when he treated of ſuch as were obſcene, he was ſtill more criminal in the eyes of God in the former than in the latter. It did not belong to ſuch a profane perſon to touch upon holy things: he did them a greater injury, in explaining them with a depraved heart, and upon ill motives, than if he had openly inſulted them. We may apply to him the terrible cenſure contained in theſe words of the Pſalmiſt:

Auſſi dira l'Eternel au Meſchant,
Pourquoi vas-tu mes édits tant preſchant,
Et prens ma Loi en ta bouche maligne,
Veu que tu as en haine diſcipline,
Et que mes dits jettes & ne reçois?
Si un larron d'avanture apperçois,
Avec lui cours: car autant que lui vaux,
T'accompagnant de paillards & ribaux:
Ta bouche mets à mal e mediſances,
Ta langue braſſe & fraudes & nuiſances,
Cauſant aſſis pour ton prochain blâmer,
Et pour ton frere ou couſin diffamer:
Tu fais ces maux, & cependant que riens
Je ne s'en dis, tu m' eſtimes & tiens
Semblable a toi: mais quoique tard le face,
J'en reprendrai quelque jour en ta face (36).

(36) Pſalm l. I make uſe of the verſion of Clement Marot.

That is,

"But to the wicked thus ſaith God,
"How dar'ſt thou teach my laws abroad,
"Or in thy mouth my Cov'nant take?
"For ſtubborn thou, confirm'd in ſin,
"Haſt proof againſt inſtruction been,
"And of my word didſt lightly ſpeak.
"When thou a ſubtle thief didſt ſee,
"Thou gladly didſt with him agree,
"And with Adult'rers didſt partake.
"Vile ſlander is thy chief delight;
"Thy tongue by envy mov'd and ſpight,
"Deceitful tales does hourly ſpread.
"Thou doſt with hateful ſcandals wound
"Thy brother, and with lies confound
"The off-ſpring of thy mother's bed.
"Theſe things didſt thou, whom ſtill I ſtrove
"To gain with ſilence and with love;
"Till thou didſt wickedly ſurmiſe,
"That I was ſuch a one as thou;
"But I'll reprove and ſhame thee now,
"And ſet thy ſins before thine eyes.

Brady and Tate.

I confeſs that the generality of mankind are not ſhocked at the Books of Devotion, which are compoſed by an irreligious and profane perſon; but thoſe who have a nice and delicate taſte are more offended at them, than they would be if the Author was to ſpeak ſincerely. Such as theſe would ſay, Take your choice; be either the one or the other: do not give the Printer a Book of Piety to day, and one of Libertiniſm to morrow. We do not deſire ſuch a Comedy: ſince you perſevere in the evil, we had rather you would inceſſantly keep the appearances of it.

. . . . . Quanto conſtantior idem
In vitiis, tanto levius miſer ac prior ille,
Qui jam contento, jam laxo fune laborat (37).

(37) Horat. Sat. 7. lib. 2. ver. 18.

That is,

"He that is conſtant in his vicious race,
"Runs the ſame courſe, and keeps an equal pace,
"Is certainly not half ſo great a wretch,
"As he that now rides looſe, and now on ſtretch.

Creech.

It were to be wiſhed that nobody would meddle with Books of Devotion, without being well perſuaded of what he ſays, and putting it in practice; for to perſons of reflection, it is a great ſubject of offence to ſee a frequent claſhing between the thoughts and words of thoſe, who write ſuch Books, and ſtill more between their actions and their writings.

[K] I ſpeak of his Ragionamenti.] They are divided into a hundred and eleven parts, the laſt of which, that treats of the court, and of cards, is much more tolerable than the reſt. The firſt treats of the diſorders of the Nuns, the married women, and the Ladies of pleaſure. It is enough to ſay in general, that the ſecond is the ſpirit and hiſtory of Whoring. How abominable ſoever theſe dialogues may be, they are yet leſs ſo than the Book, which is imputed to him de omnibus Veneris Schematibus.

(38) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

The following remark was ſent me (38). "This "Book (de omnibus Veneris Schematibus,) which is here "aſcribed to Aretin, and which abundance of people "believe to have been compoſed by him in Latin, be- "cauſe out of modeſty you give it a Latin title, is "nothing but a collection of ſixteen immodeſt figures, "engraven by the famous Marco Antonio of Bologna, "after the deſigns of Julio Romano, at the bottom "of each of which is a ſonnet of Aretin's. He ſpeaks "of it in a letter dated the 27th of November 1527, "wherein he tells Seignior Cæſar Fregoſa, that he ſends "him il Libro de i Sonnetti e de le Figure luſſurioſe. Va- "ſari, and after him Mr. Felibien, have ſaid that "theſe figures and ſonnets were to the number of "twenty; but Aretin himſelf, in the dedication "which he made to that Battiſta Zatti, of whom I "ſpake before, reckons only ſixteen. There is a "dialogue of Maddalena and Giulia, entitled la Putana "errante, which treats at large de i diverſi Congiun- "gimenti, to the number of five and thirty. This "is greatly ſurpaſſing the ancient debauchery,

"Quales nec Didymæ ſciunt puellæ,
"Nec molles Elephantidos libelli....
"Sunt illic Veneris novem figuræ.

"It is thus that Lindenbruch (39) quotes the XLIIId "Epigram of the twelfth Book of Martial; others "read novæ inſtead of novem. Aretin, notwithſtand- "ing the work was always printed under his name, "diſavows it, and ſays it was done by one of his "pupils, named Veniero. He explains himſelf "upon this ſubject to the Duke of Mantua, in the "following manner, in his Capitolo.

(39) Notis in Priapeia, p. 305.

"Ma

They were printed during his life; but it is difficult to discover when they were printed the first time [L]. We have six volumes of his Letters, which are not worth much [M].

" Ma perch' io ſento il preſente all' odore,
" Un operetta in quel cambio galante.
" Vi mando hora in ſtil ladro traditore
" Intitolata la Putana errante
" Dal Veniero compoſta mio creato,
" Che me in dir mal quatro giornate inante."

I add to this a fine paſſage of Mr. Chevillier: " It " was about the year 1525, that Julio Romano, the " moſt famous Painter of Italy, being inſtigated by " the enemy of the ſalvation of mankind, invented " drawings to engrave twenty plates. The ſubjects " of them are ſo immodeſt that I dare only name " them. Peter Aretin, a man publickly infamous " for his impiety and Atheiſm, compoſed ſonnets for " each picture. George Vaſari, who relates this in " his lives of the Painters, ſays, he does not know " which would be the greateſt impurity, to caſt one's " eyes upon the drawings of Julio, or to dip into the verſes of Aretin:" Io non ſo qual fuſſe piu o brutto lo ſpettacolo de i Deſigni di Giulio all' occhio, o le parole dell' Aretino à gl' orecchi. 3. Part. pa. 302. " An En- " graver named Marco Antonio, had the aſſurance to " engrave ſuch a number of infamous things upon " twenty plates, that Pope Clement VII cauſed him " to be put into priſon; but the Cardinal de Medi- " cis ſaved his life. And notwithſtanding Julio's great " merit as a Painter, he would have been very rigo- " rouſly puniſhed if he had not retired to Mantua. " It happened in 1527, when Rome was plundered " by the army of Charles the fifth, that this Engra- " ver's lot was to loſe all his wealth, and being obliged " to quit the city, he died ſoon afterwards." Mr. Chevillier adds, " that Mr. Jollain, a Merchant in the " Rue St. Jaques at Paris, knowing where there were " ſome of theſe infamous plates, which repreſented " theſe abominable drawings of Julio, and the im- " pure ſonnets of Aretin, went thither, and bought " them for a hundred crowns, with an intent to de- " ſtroy them, which he executed.... He has always " believed they were the original plates engraven by " Marco Antonio, which he deſtroyed (40).

(40) Chevillier, Origine de l' Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 224.

[L] His Ragionamenti were printed during his life; but it is difficult to diſcover when they were printed the firſt time.] The Preface of the Edition of 1584, leaves us no room to doubt of the firſt of theſe two facts. The Bookſeller under the fictitious name of Barbagrigia, declares that the Author had reſolved to publiſh his dialogues, divided by days, after the manner of Boccace, and as they are in the Edition which I have quoted; but that others prevented him, and publiſhed this work againſt his will, and in great diſorder. Hoggi oi preſento di loro una buona parte.... da me ridotte ne la maniera ch'egli le compoſe, e ne la medeſima maniera ch'egli haveva diterminato di farle la prima volta ſtampare, s'altri (contra ſua voglia) non haveſſero prima da lui date per mezzo de la ſtampa in luce aſſai mala acconcie: concioſia coſa che Giornate queſto nomaſſe per ſeguitare l'alte pedate del gran Giovanni Boccacio. I add to this ſomething more exact, and I do it with ſo much the more ſatisfaction, becauſe I acquit my ſelf at the ſame time of an indiſpenſable duty towards Mr. Minutoli, by the public teſtimony I give him of my ſingular eſteem, and of the great value I ſet upon the friendſhip, with which he honours me. I had conſulted this able Profeſſor of Geneva, and he communicated to me the following extract of a letter that had been written to him from Dijon. " I muſt ſpeak " to you at preſent, Sir, of a Book that is quite the " reverſe of that (41), the Ragionamenti di Pietro Aretino. You deſire me to clear up ſome things re- " lating to them. The Ragionamenti, or whimſical " diſcourſes of Aretin appeared before his death: we " cannot queſtion this ſince in 1551, there was an " invective of Joachim Perion a Benedictine Monk " againſt the Author of the Ragionamenti, who did " not die till 1556 (42). Antonio Franceſco Doni, " in the firſt part of his Librairie, publiſhed in 1550, " which contains the printed Books, ſpeaks of two " dialogues delle Donne (43), which are different from " the Ragionamenti, of which he does not ſpeak a " word, becauſe they were certainly not then printed.

(41) He had juſt ſpoken of Mr. Baillet's book concerning the devotion to the Holy Virgin.

(42) See the note [N].

(43) Freher puts theſe two Dialogues amongſt the works of Aretin, and does not ſpeak of the Ragionamenti. Perhaps theſe two Dialogues are this 1ſt edition, which was publiſhed againſt the will of the Author, and in a different order from his own.

" With regard to the Letters, the firſt volume only " deſerves to be read, tho' it contains very little ſatyr: " the other five are extremely inſipid, and you may de- " pend upon Mr. Menage, in the Menagiana, who " does them rather too much honour, when he values " them for the ſtyle." In another letter, Mr. Minutoli has been ſo kind as to communicate two remarks to me, which he made in reading the letters of illuſtrious men publiſhed by John Michael Brutus. He found theſe words in the 369 page, in a letter of Joannes Maludanus to Dionyſius Lambinus: Pœnè me fugerat, quod ſcribendum in primis fuiſſe arbitror. A Perionio editam eſſe audio orationem adverſus Petrum Aretinum. Periculum eſt ne ut jampridem Principum, ita poſthac & Μενιππου flagellum eſſe & nominari velit laceſſitus Aretinus. i. e. " I had almoſt forgotten what " was principally to be written. I hear that Perion's " oration againſt Peter Aretin is publiſhed. There " is ſome danger that Aretin being provoked may have " a mind to be and be called the ſcourge of Monks, " as he has been before that of Princes." In this letter there is only the date of the day, Nonis Maiis; but as Lambinus's anſwer is dated Nonis Juniis anno CIↃ IↃ LI, it is eaſy to gueſs in what year Maludanus had written to him. My reader will be very glad to find in this place, what Lambinus, who was then at Rome, judged of Perion's Oration. Perionii Orationem in Petrum Aretinum jampridem legeramus, ſed multo non ſine riſu. Quid enim magis ridiculum excogitari poteſt, quam hominem Benedictinum, Philoſophum, Ciceronianum, Theologum, cum P. Aretino verbis decertare? Omnino ſuæ exiſtimationi parum conſuluiſſe judicatur, nam quod arguit illum eſſe impurum, ſceleratum, impium, quid tum poſtea? Tales homines non verbis aut ſcriptis caſtigandi, ſed legibus & pœnis ſunt coërcendi. Sed hac de re alias plura. i. e. " I have read Perion's Ora- " tion againſt Peter Aretin, and not without laughing " heartily. For what can be imagined more ridicu- " lous, than that a Benedictin, a Philoſopher, a Ci- " ceronian, a Divine ſhould diſpute with P. Aretin? " He ſeems intirely to have neglected his own repu- " tation, for what ſignifies it to prove him to be im- " modeſt, wicked, and impious? Such men are not " to be chaſtiſed by a pen, but by the ſeverity of the " laws."

With regard to the ſecond part of the text of this remark, read what follows, and you will admire the exactneſs and extent of the inquiries of that learned man whom I quote (44). " It is difficult to note the " preciſe time of the firſt edition of the Ragionamen- " ti, both becauſe it is become ſo ſcarce, that it is " almoſt impoſſible to meet with any copies of it, " and alſo becauſe the Dialogues, which compoſe the " two parts of this work, did not all appear at the " ſame time. The firſt part came out ſome years " before the reſt; and it is certain, that they were " both printed in 1537; the Epiſtles Dedicatory of " both parts being inſerted in the edition of the firſt " volume of Aretin's Letters, at Venice, in folio, by " Franceſco Marcolini, the ſame year. The title of " theſe Ragionamenti has varied. The Author, in " the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the ſecond part of theſe " Diſcourſes, calls the firſt i tre Giorni di capricci, and " alſo barely Dialogo; for this is what he underſtands " by theſe words, eccovi il Dialogo, which are not found " however in the ſame Epiſtle inſerted amongſt the " Letters of the firſt volume: where there is ſtill an- " other conſiderable variation, which is, that after " theſe words e per non-diſraudare il mio grado, all " that follows to, e lo ſa Milano come cadde incluſive- " ly, is entirely omitted; inſtead of which there is " uſaro le parole cadute de la ſacra bocca del magno " Antonio da Leva, l'Aretino è più, &c. Sometimes, " inſtead of Dialogo, he ſpeaks at length, as in the " Epiſtle to his ape, il Dialogo de la Nanna e de la " Antonia. Sometimes, as in his Dialogue della Cor- " te, by the Nanna, he underſtands the firſt part of " the Ragionamenti, and by the Pippa, the ſecond. " In a Letter of the 15th of May 1537, to Franceſco " da l'Orme, he means the two parts by i due Dia- " loghi, when Antonio Franceſco Doni means the " ſame alſo by Dialoghi due delle Donne *. It is " manifeſt much [M]. His works of devotion have had no great ſale (b), and yet they have met with approvers, who have given them a great many praiſes (c). His Comedies in proſe are much better in their kind. He died about the year 1556, being ſixty five years old, more or leſs [N].

(44) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript remarks.

* Libraria de l Doni, Part 1. pag 39. verſo.

It is reported that he fell into ſuch a fit of laughing on hearing ſome ſmutty diſcourſes, that he overturned the chair upon which he ſat, and that in the falling he hurt his head, and died upon the ſpot [O]. He repented his making of verſes againſt Peter Strozzi, for this brave man threatened to have him ſtabbed even in his bed, which affrighted this Poet ſo much, that he durſt not let any body come into his houſe, and had not the courage to go out of it himſelf, as long as Strozzi ſtaid in the State of Venice. I ſhall quote my Author [P]. Note that this ſo ſatyrical a Poet was laviſh of his praiſes to the laſt exceſs. We find the moſt pompous hyperboles and the moſt fawning flatteries, in the letters which he wrote to Kings and Princes, to Generals of armies, to Cardinals, and other great men of the world. So far are they from the appearance of an Author, who made himſelf be feared, or who required tribute, that they ſhew all the meanneſs of an Author, who in the moſt abject manner is begging a bit of bread. He makes uſe of moving expreſſions to repreſent his poverty; he has recourſe even to the language of Canaan, I mean pious phraſes, the better to excite compaſſion, and animate to charity thoſe who expect from God the recompence of their good works. We muſt not forget that one of his ſubjects of importunity was the portion of his beloved daughter Adria [Q].

He

" manifeſt that theſe Dialogues were never intitled Ragionamenti by the Author of them. It is " only ſince the edition of 1584 that they have born " this title; for the true one was Capricci. Perion " ſhews it in his Invective againſt Aretin. Scripſit e- " nim, ſays he, atque edidit nefarium librum quem- " dam, quem Capricium à caprarum laſciviâ & libi- " dine inſcripſit. i. e. " For he wrote and publiſhed " a wicked book, which he intitled Capricci from the " goatiſh laſciviouſneſs and luſtfulneſs of it." " And " a little afterwards, Galli plerique jam Italicè ſciunt; " quo quidem ſermone iſtius Capricius aliique libri ſcrip- " ti ſunt. i. e. " Moſt Frenchmen now underſtand " Italian, in which his Capricci, and his other books " are written." " Bandel miſtakes, when in his 34th " Novel, pag. 235 of the firſt part, he ſays that for " la Zanina read la Nanna; theſe are his words, O " ſia Raffaella de l'Aretino. In ſhort, the Nanna " and the Raffaella are two different works, and by " two different Authors. By the Nanna we ought to " underſtand the firſt part of the Ragionamenti of A- " retin: by the Raffaella, the Dialogue of Madonna " Raffaella and Margareta, intitled della bella Creanza " delle Donne, which teaches women Coquetry. It " is Aleſſandro Piccolhuomini's, under the name of " Stordito Intronato, which was his name as an Aca- " demician. This quotation of the Nanna by Ban- " del ſerves however to ſhew, that the firſt part of " the Ragionamenti appeared at leaſt about the year " 1535; for towards the end of this ſame Novel, " where the Nanna is quoted, there is mention made " of Bernia as then alive, who, notwithſtanding Mr. " Baillet places him after thoſe Poets, who died in " 1606, died moſt certainly in May 1535. Il Ber- " nia Vicario Poëta d'Aretino morì apopletico, ſays " Paulus Jovius in a Letter of the laſt of May 1535 " to the Biſhop of Faenza Rodolfo Pio, afterwards " called the Cardinal de Carpi, Nuncio at that time " in France. Mr. Menage, who has written a chap- " ter expreſly upon Bernia in the firſt part of his " Anti-Baillet, has not taken notice of this miſtake."

[M] His ſix volumes of Letters . . . . are not worth much.] We have ſeen the opinion of a learned man of Dijon upon this ſubject already (45); to which I ſhall add that of Mr. Menage. I have read, ſays he (46), all Peter Aretin's Letters, without finding any thing in them that I could inſert in any of my books. There is nothing but the ſtyle of them worth regarding. One cannot give a more expreſſive idea of a work that is dry, and like a houſe ſtript of its furniture, like a ſandy ſoil, uncultivated, or like heaths; for Mr. Menage was one of the beſt men in the world to make advantage of reading, and had the beſt art of varying the applications of it.

(45) Above, immediately after the quotation (43).

(46) Menagiana, pag. 396 of the firſt Dutch edition.

[N] He died about the year 1556, and at the age of 65, more or leſs (47).] " What makes me con- " jecture, that Aretin died either about the end of " 1555, or in the year 1556, is, that after the month " of October 1555, being the date of the Epiſtle De- " dicatory of the laſt volume of his Letters, it does " not appear that he wrote any thing; and that Ruſ- " celli, who wrote his Rimario, in 1557, ſpeaks " therein of Aretin as of a perſon lately dead. Onde " il mio Aretino di buona memoria, ſays he at the " word Roſta, in the Vocabulary at the end of the Ri- " mario. That this Rimario was compoſed in 1557, " appears by the paſſage I have marked above (48) " with relation to Silvio Antoniano (49)." Paul Freher is miſtaken, when he ſays that Aretin died about the year 1566 (50).

(47) See the marginal quotation *, between (34) and (35).

(48) At the end of the note [D] of the article ANTONIANO.

(49) Mr. de la Monnoie's manuſcript notes.

(50) Paul. Freher. in Theatro Virorum illuſtrium, pag. 1461.

[O] It is reported, that he fell into ſuch a fit of laughing, on hearing ſome ſmutty diſcourſes, that he tumbled down . . . and died upon the ſpot.] Theſe are the very words of the Author, who relates this fact. Infandas obſcœnitates de meretricibus, ut aiunt, ſoro- ribus ſuis, cum audiret, ex riſu ſellam in qua ſedebat evertiſſe, occiputque vehementer graviterque ad terram affixiſſe atque alliſiſſe, ut extemplo nequiſſimè interi- ret (51).

(51) Ant. Laurentinus Politianus, in Dialogo de Riſu, pag. 78.

[P] He repinted his making of verſes againſt Strozzi . . . . I ſhall quote my Author.] It is Remi of Florence. Volſe, ſays he (52), Pietro Aretino burlare & mottegiare il Sig. Pietro Strozzi, quando egli diede Ma- rano a Venetiani, e gli fece un Sonetto, che commin- ciava:

(52) Remigio Fiorentino, Conſiderat. civili ſopra Guicciardini, cap. 6. folio 8 verſo. See Rime Piacevoli, Part 2. folio 12.

Mentre il gran Strozzi Arma virumque cano, &c.

Ma il Signior Pietro, come huomo valoroſo, & che non voleva ſue burle nè ſuoi motti, gli fece intendere, che attendeſſe ad altro, perche lo ſarebbe ammazzare in- ſin nel letto. Onde il povero Aretino, che conoſceva il Signor Pietro huomo pui da farlo che da dirlo, ſi miſe tanto ſpavento, che ſerrato in caſa, nè dando ingreſſo a perſona alcuna, guardava pure ſe i pognali piovevano, & menò giorno e notte una vita infeliciſſima, e per fin che lo Strozzi ſtette in paeſe de Veneziani, non ardì mai uſcir di caſa. i. e. " Peter Aretin had a mind " to ridicule Signior Peter Strozzi, when he gave Ma- " rano to the Venetians, and he made a Sonnet on " him, which began,

" Whilſt the great Strozzi Arva virumque cano &c.

" But Signior Strozzi being a man of courage, and " not liking his drollery, gave him to underſtand, " that if he proceeded, he would have him killed in " his bed. Whereupon poor Aretin, who knew Sig- " nior Strozzi to be a man more of deeds than words, " was ſo affrighted, that he ſhut himſelf up in his " houſe, not ſuffering any body to come in, and " thought inceſſantly that daggers were ſhow'ring " down upon him, and led a moſt unhappy life " night and day, and as long as Strozzi ſtaid in the " territories of the Venetians, he durſt not go out of " doors." I fancy, that when his danger was over, he returned to his old courſes.

[Q] One of his ſubjects of importunity was the portion of his beloved daughter Adria.] He loved her very tenderly, and had engaged himſelf to give a thouſand ducats to him,

He took a great deal of pains to get her married, and he ſaw her ſo unhappy in that ſtate, that he repented of his impatience [R], a misfortune too common among men; for how many things diſquiet them extreamly when they are not done, and yet afflict them much more when they are done?

him, to whom he had promiſed her in marriage. But this lover was not one, that could be referred to the dedication of the next book: ſuch an aſſignment, which ſeveral Authors have made to their creditors, was not able to content him; he ſtipulated that a thouſand ducats ſhould be told on the table, before he gave his miſtreſs the ring. Mille ducati è la promeſſa da me fatta allo ſpoſo in contanti, prima che ſe li dia l'anello (53). Aretin had nothing to make up the payment of this ſum with, but the golden chain which he had received from the Prince of Spain (54). He addreſſed himſelf to the Cardinal of Lorrain, for aſſiſtance in this neceſſity: I do not know whether he obtained any thing from him; but I know he was aſſiſted by the Duke of Florence. The bill of exchange which this Prince remitted to him (55), had this condition, that it ſhould not be paid but upon good atteſtations that the marriage had been conſummated (56). This condition made the wedding be haſtened: the father had a mind to defer it, becauſe the young Adria ſeemed to be of too tender an age: He ſaid that his daughter, by ſubmitting herſelf to the nuptial bed, ſeemed like a pure victim laid upon the ſacred altar: Per importarmi piu l'honore della parola obligata, che il riſpetto della etade tenera, conſentii che la innocentia ſi copulaſſe co 'l ſacramento. Ella, nello entrare nel letto, parue una oſtia pura, poſta ſopra l'altare ſacro (57). It appears that the ſon-in-law did not rigorouſly inſiſt upon the ſum being paid him in ſpecie before the marriage: he contented himſelf with being ſecured by the golden chain which the Emperor's ſon had given Aretin: with being ſecured, I ſay, for the payment of what was wanting of the thouſand ducats; but that embarraſſed the father-in-law nevertheleſs, who had a mind to keep this golden chain, and at the ſame time ſaw himſelf incumbred with his daughter till the whole ſum was paid; for till then the ſon-in-law would not carry his ſpouſe home. The Duke of Florence was again importuned and diſburſed ſomething (58).

(53) Aretin, Letter 145 of the 5th book, folio 72 verſo, Paris edition in 1609.
(54) Ibid.
(55) See the 24th Letter of the ſame book. It is dated from Venice in 1548.
(56) See the 220th Letter of the 5th book. It is dated in March 1549.
(57) Ibid. folio 102.
(58) See the 6th book of Aretin's Letters, folio 121.

[R] He ſaw his daughter ſo unhappy in marriage, that he repented his impatience.] This marriage was not happy: poor Adria was treated ſo ill by her huſband, that ſhe was forced to return home to her father; but her huſband having promiſed to uſe her better, ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be perſuaded to a re-union, and was not more happy than before (59). He continued to take from her the power of the keys; a power that is never annexed to the diſtaff in the church, but is much affected by the women in a family. She could neither eat, nor drink, but when others were pleaſed to diſpoſe of the keys in her favour. She was eternally cavilled at about her dreſs; ſhe was not ſuffered to wear jewels: and he would have forced her to ſell a diamond which her father had given her. Thus ſhe was attacked in the moſt ſenſible points: it was tearing out her very bowels. Aretin implored the protection of the Ducheſs d'Urbino for her (60). What a heart-breaking was this, to ſee himſelf deſpiſed by his ſon-in-law, whilſt his fame was ſpread as far as to the court of Perſia (61)! What domeſtick bitterneſs, in the midſt of the pretended ſweetneſſes of a great reputation! Could he comfort himſelf with the conſideration that this brute deſpiſed alſo the Duke of Florence, who had ſo much recommended to him the good treatment of his ſpouſe? It was on the contrary a new ſubject of confuſion to him, that he had choſen ſuch a ſon-in-law. Benchè en quanto al non fare niſſuna ſtima di me ſimil' cane, non è maraviglia, è ben' da ſtupire del ſi poco riſpetto che moſtra d'havere lo aſinaccio al gran' Duca, la cui benignità manſueta, uſcendo noi di Peſaro, per il viaggio di Roma, coſì qual era à cavallo, chiamollo, & diſſegli: Se tu vuoi che non ti ſi manchi di gratie, tratta la moglie tua, ſi come di me nata fuſſe (62). i. e. "That he ſhould regard me no "more than if I had been a dog is no wonder, but "it is enough to aſtoniſh one that the fool ſhould "ſhew ſo little reſpect to the Grand Duke, whoſe "goodneſs and condeſcenſion was ſuch, that, as we "were going from Peſaro, in the way to Rome, as "he was on horſeback, he called to him and ſaid: "If you would not be out of my favour, treat your "wife as if ſhe was my daughter." Note that Peter Aretin had another daughter, whom he was very deſirous of getting married (63).

(59) See the 6th book of the Letters of Aretin, folio 281.
(60) His Letter to the Ducheſs of Urbino is dated from Venice in Nov. 1554.
(61) See the note [A].
(62) Aretin, in the 282d page of the 6th book of his Letters.
(63) Her name was Auſtria. See the 210th Letter of the 5th book, and page 258 of the 6th book.

ARGHUN KHAN, the eighth Emperor of the Mogols of the race of Jenghiz Khân, was the eldeſt ſon (a) of Abâka Khân, and ſucceeded his uncle Nicûdâr Oglan, or Ahmed Khan, in the year of the Hejra 683 (b), having diſpoſſeſſed him of the throne in the manner which will be related elſewhere (c). Arghûn had the government of Khoraſân, and the chief command of the troops in that province conferred on him in his father's life-time, being by him deſigned his ſucceſſor (d). He had no ſooner got rid of his uncle, who had ſtepped in between him and the crown, than he committed the chief management of his affairs to the Emir Buga, the great inſtrument of his advancement, who to get the adminiſtration wholly into his own hands, cauſed Shamſo'ddin Saïd, Preſident of the Diwân or Council, and a man of extraordinary merit, to be put to death [A], on a falſe accuſation of having poiſoned the Emperor Abaka Khan, and gave the office to a creature of his own. Buga having no longer a partner in power, ſet no bounds to his ambition, and flattered himſelf that he might eaſily place the crown on his own head; ſo that in the year 686 (e) he openly rebelled againſt his maſter, but with ill ſucceſs, being defeated and ſlain in the attempt. After Buga's death a Jewiſh Phyſician, named Saado'ddawla,

(a) Al Beidâwi, in Nedhâm al tawârikh. MS.
(b) A. C. 1284. Abu'lfeda places his acceſſion a year ſooner.
(c) In the article of NICUDAR OGLAN.
(d) Al Beidâwi, ubi ſupra.
(e) A. C. 1287.

[A] Buga cauſed Shamſo'ddin Said, Preſident of the Diwân, to be put to death.] Shamſo'ddin had ſerved Abaka and Ahmed Khan in the ſame high ſtation, and had been in the laſt reign accuſed of the crime imputed to him by Buga; but his maſter refuſed to deliver him up to Arghun when he demanded him (1). Abu'lfaragius, who lived in the time of thoſe Princes, relates the ſtory of Shamſo'ddin in a different manner from Khondemir. He ſays that when Arghun came to the Empire, Shamſo'ddin, not thinking himſelf ſafe, fled to the mountains of Ahwâz, and put himſelf under the protection of a certain tribe of Curds, whoſe Prince, named Yuſof Shah, to curry favour with Arghun, delivered him up to that Prince. When he was brought before the Emperor, he offered a prodigious ſum to ſave his life; but after having ſold all he had, and borrowed what he could of his relations and friends, not being able to make up the whole demanded of him, he was obliged to ſubmit to fate, and was accordingly put to death (2). Khondemir (3) ſays, that Shamſo'ddin fled to Iſpahân, and was ſetting out from thence for the Indies; but that he came back voluntarily, on promiſe of ſecurity from Arghun, who reinſtated him in his office. Abu'lfaragius (4) gives him a great character for wiſdom, experience in public affairs, and ſingular humility. It is ſaid that (5) when the executioner came in to put him to death, he made the ablution, and then opening his Koran to conſult it for an omen, (a common practice among the Mohammedans (6),) the words he firſt light on were theſe: As for thoſe who ſay, Our Lord is God, and who behave uprightly; the angels ſhall deſcend unto them, and ſhall ſay, Fear not, neither be ye grieved; but rejoice in the hopes of paradiſe, which ye have been promiſed (7).

(1) Abu'lfarag. Hiſt. Dynaſt. p. ult.
(2) Idem, ibid.
(3) Vide D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. p. 226.
(4) Ubi ſupra.
(5) Vide D'Herbel. p. 227.
(6) See the Preliminary Diſcourſe before the tranſlation of the Koran, by Mr. Sale, p. 69.
(7) Koran, chap. 41. p. 391.

Saado'ddawla, a man of very agreeable converſation, inſinuated himſelf ſo far into the good graces of Arghun Khân, that the chief affairs of the Empire depended on his favour and credit. This man greatly advanced thoſe of his own nation, preferring ſeveral of them to poſts of power and truſt, by which means their intereſt equalled that of the Chriſtians, which was very conſiderable under the Mogol Emperors of this race (f), and the Mohammedans, who had begun to raiſe their heads in the laſt reign, were deprived of all offices, diſcountenanced, and at length forbidden to appear at court: nay ſome pretend that Arghun had promiſed the Chriſtians to convert the temple of Mecca into a church, and that images ſhould be worſhipped there inſtead of the true God; but Divine Providence, ſay the Moſlems, prevented the execution of ſo impious a deſign, the Emperor falling ſick about this time of the illneſs of which he died. Saado'ddawla lived not quite ſo long as his maſter, being aſſaſſinated by his enemies under pretence of having poiſoned Arghun, who had the mortification to hear the news of his favourite's tragical end when near his laſt agony. This Prince died in the year 690 (g), having reigned about ſeven years. After his death the Tartars took the opportunity of revenging themſelves on the Jews, whoſe high credit they had beheld with an evil eye, by maſſacring great numbers of them, on a ſuſpicion, as was given out at leaſt, of their being acceſſary to the Emperor's death. Arghun Khan is allowed to have been valiant and of great agility of body. Some Hiſtorians charge him with tyranny and cruelty; but others commend him for his great juſtice and moderation: however the Mohammedan writers agree to place his death among the moſt ſignal acts of Providence in favour of their Religion, which had greatly ſuffered in his reign (h). Y.

(f) See the Article of GAYUC KHAN.

(g) A. C. 1291.

(h) Abu'lfeda, Khondemir, apud D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. Art. ARGOUN KHAN.

☞ ARGONNE (NOEL D'), an eminent Carthuſian Monk, and Author of a celebrated Treatiſe concerning the method of reading of the Fathers of the Church [A], was born at Paris, as we are informed by Mr. du Pin (a); and was a Monk of the Monaſtry of Gaillon in the Dioceſe of Roan. He publiſhed the work abovementioned in the year 1688, but it was afterwards reprinted with very conſiderable additions in 1697. It appeared from thence, that this Author was a man of good taſte, ſagacity, and judgment. He was ſuppoſed to have been the Author of the Mêlanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, publiſhed under the fictitious name of Monſieur de Vigneul-Marville at Roan. But Mr. Du Pin (b) is of opinion, that this book was not written by a perſon, whoſe profeſſion excluded him from all commerce with the world. But it is abſolutely affirmed in the Paris edition of Moreri in 1732, that he was actually the Author of the Mêlanges, and that the extenſive converſation which he had with the Men of Letters, before he entered himſelf into the Order

(a) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 19. p. 352. edit. Amſterdam 1715.

(b) Pag. 354.

[A] Author of a celebrated treatiſe concerning the reading of the Fathers.] The firſt Edition of it was divided into two parts; in the former of which the Author treated of the diſpoſitions neceſſary for a perſon in order to receive advantage by reading the Fathers. The firſt and moſt neceſſary is to read them with the ſame ſpirit, with which they were written, with charity and humility, without which even ſacred ſtudies are abſolutely profane. Beſides theſe virtues of the mind, there are ſeveral other qualifications both natural and acquired requiſite. It is neceſſary to have a conſiderable ſhare of genius, to underſtand the languages, criticiſm, Philoſophy, hiſtory, and the laws, and to be able to explain one Science by another. The ſecond part ſhews the method proper to be obſerved in reading of the Fathers. The ſubject of their writings may be ranged under four heads, the Interpretation of Scripture, Doctrines of Faith, Chriſtian Morality, and the Diſcipline of the Church. The ſecond Edition of this work is as large again as the former, and divided into four parts. The firſt is concerning the authority of the Fathers. The name of Fathers may be applied to the writers of the twelve firſt centuries. The Author divides them into three ages. The firſt contains thoſe of the three firſt centuries; the ſecond thoſe of the three following ages; and the laſt extends to the thirteenth century, in which School-Divinity was eſtabliſhed. He pays ſo much the greater regard to the Fathers of the firſt age, as they lived nearer to the Apoſtles time. He is of opinion, that no leſs deference is to be paid to thoſe of the ſecond age in the eſſential points of faith, which they have maintained with equal learning and eloquence. And with reſpect to the Fathers of the third age, which have neither the antiquity nor the learning of the two former, he ſuppoſes that they have the ſame advantages with them, ſince they have faithfully collected what the others had ſown. The Proteſtants have ſometimes rejected, and at other times admitted the authority of the Fathers. The Roman Catholic Divines are divided with regard to their authority. Some of the latter have put them on an equality with the canonical Writers themſelves. Cardinal Cajetan affirmed, that in interpreting the ſcripture, we ought, without any regard to the character of perſons, to rely upon thoſe, who were moſt capable of explaining the ſenſe of it. Others have taken the middle way, and declared that there are ſome occaſions, when the opinions of the Fathers can only paſs for mere conjectures, and only form a kind of probability; but upon other occaſions, when they determine unanimouſly upon a point of doctrine, their conſent is an infallible proof of the truth, and it is not lawful to recede from their deciſions. St. Auſtin and St. Jerom were of opinion, that it was allowed to examine the ſentiments of the Fathers, who lived before them, and that there were none but the Canonical Writers, to whom an entire ſubmiſſion of mind was due. Vincentius Lirinenſis lays it down as a certain maxim, that we ought to hold every thing as indubitable, which the Fathers have maintained and taught in points of faith unanimouſly, clearly, and without ever contradicting it. The errors, which ſome of the Fathers have committed, do not deſtroy their authority. Several of them have eſpouſed opinions, which are not approved of. Some of them were Millenarians; others, as Clemens Alexandrinus, adopted the falſe imaginations of the Pagans; but they all agree in the eſſentials of religion. They had not a very extenſive knowledge of the Sciences and Languages; which are of uſe to a Divine. Logic, Grammar, Chronology, and Geography ought not to be neglected; but then they ſhould not be raiſed ſo high, as to make religion depend upon them. St. Auſtin did not underſtand the languages; and therefore he is never conſulted with regard to the hiſtory or letter of the ſcripture. There are difficulties in the Fathers. The ſtyle of Tertullian is ſo very peculiar and unaccountable, that Salmaſius aſſures us, that there was not a ſingle perſon, who could underſtand perfectly his Book de Pallio. St. Epiphanius has ſo little perſpicuity, that it is difficult to penetrate into the ſenſe of him. St. Hilary has a great deal of affectation in his ſentiments and expreſſions. It is a prodigious taſk to diſtinguiſh in the polemical works of theſe ancient wri-

Order of St. Bruno, was the occaſion that he received even after his retirement an infinite number of Letters, and other little pieces, containing a variety of curious obſervations with ters the principal point, which they intend from the incidental ones, which they treat of. They quote ſometimes paſſages out of ſcripture by memory, without troubling themſelves to give the expreſs terms. They make uſe of Apocryphal books; and ſome of them give the title of Canonical to thoſe only, which were received by the Jews. St. Jerom has inſerted in his writings paſſages from ſuſpected Authors, and made uſe of the works of Heretics, and their explications of ſcripture. He has vindicated his conduct in this point by alledging, that Heretics are not Heretics every where; and that a great many valuable things are to be found in their books, which we ought to make the proper uſe of. The Fathers ſometimes alledge the teſtimonies of the Heathens after the example of St. Paul, who cites profane Authors in his diſcourſe to the Corinthians. The Author concludes this firſt part with explaining the reaſons, which occaſion'd the forging of ſuppoſititious books. The ſecond part is that which was placed in the beginning of the firſt Edition of this work. He treats there of the neceſſity of School-Divinity in order to read the Fathers. By School-Divinity he does not mean the art of diſputing upon all ſubjects, but a real ſcience founded upon the ſtrength of reaſoning, and digeſted into order. From the earlieſt times the church had ſchools, in which the ſcriptures were taught. The ancient Fathers were Logicians; and St. Auſtin wrote a piece upon that art. In the ſeventh century Tayon Biſhop of Saragoſſa compiled a ſum of Divinity from St. Auſtin and Pope Gregory the Great. St. John Damaſcenus publiſhed in the following age a Body of Divinity under the title of the Orthodox Faith. This method opened a way for School-Divinity, which began to appear in the Weſt towards the end of the eleventh century under the care of St. Anſelm, who wrote concerning the Doctrines of Faith. Peter Lombard publiſhed in the following century a ſyſtem of Divinity drawn from the ſcriptures and the Fathers; which afterwards gave occaſion to an infinite number of commentators. This School-Divinity afterwards degenerated into a ſett of mere ſubtleties, which were unworthy to be taught in Chriſtian ſchools. In this manner d'Argonne traces up the original and progreſs of School-Divinity, which the reader may compare with what we have already obſerved in the article of AQUINAS, note [E]. He tells us afterwards, that the ſtudy of the Scriptures is neceſſary to the underſtanding of the Fathers. He thinks it proper, that we ſhould know the Author of every one of the ſacred books; that in order to explain his work, we ſhould be acquainted with his peculiar character and manner of writing; that we ſhould attend to what precedes and what follows, in order to ſee the full ſenſe of a paſſage. He directs us, to examine whether the copy be corrupted or not; and obſerves that Lucas Bragenſis Dean of St. Omers has given us an account that notwithſtanding all the care, which had been taken by two eminent Popes in the edition of the Vulgate Tranſlation, there are ſtill in it above four thouſand paſſages, which want to be reviſed; which Bellarmin, who took care of the edition of Pope Clement VIII, could not venture to deny. Eccleſiaſtical and Profane Hiſtory is likewiſe neceſſary in order to underſtand the Fathers. If we want to have a clear idea of what St. Athanaſius, St. Auſtin, and St. Optatus have written againſt the Arians, Pelagians and Donatiſts, it is requiſite to read what the Hiſtorians have given us an account of concerning the genius and manners of thoſe hereticks. To know the Hiſtory of the Martyrs it is neceſſary to know that of the Emperors. The Hiſtory of Julian written by Ammianus Marcellinus confirms what St. Gregory Nazianzen has ſaid concerning the levity and inconſtancy of that Emperor. And here the Author lays down rules for the ſtudying of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He ſpeaks likewiſe of the manuſcripts and editions of the Fathers; and quotes ſeveral curious books, as that of Henry Stephens de Origine mundorum, that of Poſtellus de duodecim Linguis; and that of Duretus de Linguis & Characteribus omnium Linguarum. The third part of this work of d'Argonne contains the method of reading the Fathers. The little order, which is obſerved in reading, is the occaſion, that very ſmall advantage is gained by it. The Author remarks, that the Fathers themſelves are defective in point of order and method. There are two things to be obſerved in reading them: the firſt is to read them according to the order of time, and the ſecond to do it according to the difference of their ſubjects. Some perſons are of opinion, that we ſhould read them all; others, that we ſhould make a proper choice of them. The Author follows the diviſion, which he had marked in the firſt edition of the four kinds of works of the Fathers. With regard to the literal explanation of the Scripture, he acknowledges, that moſt of them have not confined themſelves to it. With relation to the explication of the Scripture concerning Doctrines of Faith, the Author obſerves, that the Fathers, who wrote before the hereſy of Pelagius, ſpoke in very ſtrong terms of free-will; and that thoſe, who wrote againſt the Pelagians, have expreſſed themſelves very poſitively in favour of Grace. However that there is no contradiction between them, and though they have explained themſelves in a different manner, their doctrine is the ſame. He mentions the critical works of the Fathers, which may be of uſe in underſtanding the Bible, as the Philocalia of Origen, the treatiſe of the Chriſtian Doctrine of St. Auſtin, the Synopſis of St. Athanaſius, and the Letters and Prefaces of St. Jerom. He prefers this laſt to all the other Fathers with regard to the explanation of the letter of the Scripture. The works of the Fathers with reſpect to Doctrines, are either Catecheſes, or Homilies, or Letters, or Treatiſes. Their Catecheſes contain only a plain Expoſition of Faith. Their Homilies were addreſſed either to believers alone, or in general to all, who were preſent. The fathers ſpeak more explicitly in the former, and obſerve more caution in the latter. The Author has a great deal of regard for the Letters of the Fathers, and directs that they ſhould be read with great attention. He adviſes, that we ſhould begin the reading of their works with thoſe againſt the Pagans; to proceed then to their treatiſes againſt the Jews; and afterwards to thoſe againſt Hereticks. When we find in them ſome paſſages clear, and others obſcure, we ſhould take care to explain the latter by the former; upon which occaſion he mentions ſeveral rules drawn from Father Petavius, and the Treatiſe concerning the Perpetuity of the Faith of the Euchariſt. He excepts particularly againſt the conduct of thoſe, who conſult the modern Caſuiſts rather than the Fathers in points of morality. He recommends upon this ſubject the reading of the Pedagogue of St. Clemens Alexandrinus, the Letters of St. Paulinus, St. Auſtin, and St. Bernard, the Treatiſe of St. Auſtin againſt Lying, the Letters of St. Baſil, the Paradoxes of St. Chryſoſtom, the Letters of St. Jerom, and the Morals of St. Gregory. With relation to Diſcipline, it is proper to read the Canons of the Councils, and the Canonical Letters of the Fathers. The Author obſerves, that a great many points of diſcipline have been changed; that there are ſome practices founded merely upon errors; that ſome have been transferred from the old Law into the new, and others, which have been derived from the cuſtoms of the Pagans; in ſhort, that there are others, which ſprung from the concupiſcence of carnal men, or the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the weak. Theſe laſt are ſuch abuſes as the Church ſometimes ſuffers, but which it never can approve of. The fourth part is concerning the uſe which we ought to make of the Fathers. The Author adviſes, that we ſhould not undertake to read more than we can conveniently perform; that our ſtudies ſhould be regulated in a proper manner, and we ſhould read with attention. He takes notice of the manner of making collections, and of the different views which we may have in making them. He commends the editions of the Fathers publiſhed by the Benedictins. He propoſes for a model of obſervations thoſe of Father Petavius upon St. Epiphanius, and extolls the Diſſertations of Father Queſnel upon St. Leo. He does not even omit the tranſlations of the works of the Fathers, and ſhews the uſe, which may be made of them. The Author promiſed another work, in which he deſigned to treat with great exactneſs of the Divinity of the ancient and modern Writers. T.

with regard to History and Literature, which he afterwards formed into that work, in which we meet with a great deal of useful and agreeable knowledge. There have been four editions of that book, the last of which was published in three volumes at Paris 1725, with Additions and Corrections, since the death of D'Argonne. There was ascribed to him likewise a piece intitled L'Education de Moncade, printed in 12°. in 1691. He died at Paris in the year 1705 (c).

(c) Idem ibid.

(a) And not Argirophilus, nor Argyrophylus, as in Moreri.

ARGYROPYLUS (a) (JOHN) a native of Constantinople, retired into Italy, whilst the Turks ravaged all Greece [A]. He was very well received by Cosmo de Medicis, who made him Tutor to his son and his grandson Laurence (b), and Professor of Greek in the city of Florence. He testified his gratitude in the translation that he made of the Physics and of the Ethics of Aristotle. He had a particular happiness in this work, since Theodore Gaza, who had made a version of the same Author, threw it into the fire, that he might not prejudice the fortune of Argyropylus his good friend. Gaza surpassed him in eloquence, his version had infallibly obscured the other; and, as he was not ignorant of the ambition of Argyropylus, he made a sacrifice to him, which, considering his humour, did not cost him much. He was a man who did not care either for praises or money. Argyropylus's discourses offended and tired learned men, especially when he maintained that Cicero was ignorant of Greek. He left Tuscany in a time of pestilence, and went to Rome, and there read Lectures upon the Greek text of Aristotle. He had a considerable salary; but as he loved to eat a great deal, and to drink as much; and as his constitution was able to bear it, he spent all that he got. Thus what has been reported of his corpulency will easily be believed [B]. He died at the age of seventy years of a fever that he got by eating too many melons (c). He shewed a great deal of constancy when one of his sons was killed at Rome (d). See concerning the order that Pope Paul II gave to pursue the murderers, and about the funerals of the deceased, the CCth Letter of the Cardinal of Pavia, pag. 620. It has been observed that he was the first of the Greeks who taught Philosophy in that city [C]. He disputed with much warmth, and had a very extensive knowledge. He left one son, who was an excellent Musician (e). The judgments they have made of his translations differ extremely from one another [D].

(b) And not his Nephew, as in Moreri.

(c) Taken from Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 27.

(d) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato priore, pag. 25.

(e) Obiit relicto filio Isacio, nobili Musico. Volat. lib. 21. p. 776.

[A] He retired into Italy, whilst the Turks ravaged all Greece.] I did not dare to say with Moreri, that he retired into Italy, after they had conquered Constantinople; for I have two reasons to doubt of that. One is, that Paulus Jovius, says Argyropylus, was driven into Italy by the same storm that forced Theodore Gaza to retire thither (1). Now he observes that this Theodore fled thither, when Amurath made all Greece tremble with his victorious arms. Amurathe Græciam omnem victricibus armis quatiente in Italiam venit (2). This intimates that Argyropylus quitted his country before the city of Constantinople had been taken by the Ottomans. My second reason is, that he addressed a Treatise of Consolation to the Emperor of Constantinople. I acknowledge that, to make a good argument of this, I should prove that he composed this piece in Italy; and I confess, that I cannot prove it. So I give you this observation, only as a motive to continue in suspence. Paulus Jovius is greatly to be blamed for his neglecting Chronology so much as he does in his Elogies; for it would have been easy for him to discover the date of the offices, the voyages, and the death of his illustrious men. But this by the by. Vossius observes, that this Treatise of Argyropylus, and his Monody, and his book de Regno, and his Parallels between the ancient and modern Princes, are in the Library of the most Christian King (3). Moreri, who had never seen these works, affirms nevertheless, that the Author dedicated them to the glory of the House de Medicis. Why did not he content himself with affirming that concerning the versions of Aristotle? for his Guide goes no farther (4).

(1) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 27. pag. 64.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 26. p. 61.

(3) Vossius, de Histor. Græcis, lib. 4. cap. 19. pag. 493.

(4) Paulus Jovius, Elogior. cap. 27.

[B] What has been reported of his corpulency, will easily be believed.] Let us quote Paulus Jovius. Vini & cibi æquè avidus & capax, & multo abdomine ventricosus; immodico melopeponum esu autumnalem accersivit febrem, atque ita septuagesimo ætatis anno ereptus est (5). i. e. "He was greedy both in eating and "drinking, and could bear a prodigious deal. His "belly was very protuberant, and by eating melons "immoderately, he got an autumnal fever, and so "was taken off in the seventieth year of his age." To die of too much eating is a scandalous thing for any rational creature; but more so for a man of letters. It would have been more for the honour of Argyropylus to have died of hunger or fasting. But however let us not take the enormous bulk of his belly, for a reason to oppose those who praise him as an ingenious person. The success of such a dispute would be very uncertain. See the collections which I shall exhibit in the notes on the article GORGIAS.

(5) Idem, ibid. pag. 65.

[C] It has been observed that he was the first of the Greeks who taught Philosophy at Rome.] I am going to quote his disciple, Politian: I read these words of Hornius: Primus ex Græcis Romæ Philosophiam professus fuit Argyropylus, cujus sectatorem se fuisse memorat Angelus Politianus Miscel. cap. 1. eumque cum literarum Latinarum minime incuriosum, tum sapientiæ decretorum, disciplinarumque aded cunctarum quæ Cyclicæ à Martiano dicuntur, eruditissimum illis temporibus habitum atque in disputando acerrimum (6). i. e. "Argyropylus was the first of the Greeks that profes- "sed Philosophy at Rome, whose follower Angelus "Politianus; in the first chapter of his Miscellanies, re- "lates himself to have been: and adds that he was "no incurious person in Latin; that he was greatly "skilled in Philosophy, Law and the whole circle of "Sciences, and a very sharp disputant in them."

(6) Hornius, Historia Philos. lib. 6. cap. 6. pag. 304, 305.

[D] The judgments they have made of his translations differ extremely from one another.] Thuanus observes, that Perion having a mind to depart from the method of Argyropylus, threw himself into another extreme. He found that Argyropylus had translated Aristotle more faithfully than elegantly; therefore he undertook a translation capable of pleasing those who love fine Latin; but by attaching himself too much to the elegance of the style, he came to be accused of not following the sense of the Author. Is (Joachimus Perionius) cum Aristotelem hactenus à Johanne Argyropylo fideliter potius quàm ornatè versum auribus Latinis proponendum statuisset, dum elegantioris stili potius quàm veri rationem plerumque Ciceroni suo addictus habet, in contrariam ab Argyropylo reprehensionem incidit (7). That judgment amounts to this: the translations of Argyropylus are faithful, but without beauty and ornaments. Others judge of them after a quite contrary manner; for they say we find in them more elegance than fidelity, and blame him for not having translated his original word for word, "as it is the "duty of those, who translate the holy Scriptures and "Aristotle." Aliquot Aristotelis libros convertit magis eleganter quàm fideliter; cum in hoc Philosopho haud aliter quàm in sacris literis verbum verbo reddere oporteat (8). If we consult a Professor of Louvain, we shall find this judgment of Volaterranus to be ill

(7) Thuan. Hist. lib. 23. pag. 472, ad ann. 1559.

(8) Volater. lib. 21. pag. 776.

grounded,

ARIARATHES, the name of ſeveral Kings of Cappadocia. See the Article of CAPPADOCIA.

ARIGONI (POMPEIUS) Cardinal and Archbiſhop of Benevento, was born at Rome in the year 1552. Whilſt he was of the number of the Conſiſtory-Advocates, he pleaded the cauſes of Philip II King of Spain. He harangued under the Pontificate of Sixtus V, to ſhew that the bleſſed Diego de Alcala ſhould be canoniſed. He was made an Auditor de Rota in the year 1591, and Cardinal in 1596, and exerciſed the office of Datary under Leo XI, and Paul V. The Archbiſhoprick of Benevento was conferred on him by this laſt Pope. He died the 4th of April 1616, at the Grecian Tower near Naples, whither he had retired for change of air. His corps was carried to Benevento, where his nephew erected a marble monument for him in the metropolitan church. Beſides the Oration I mentioned before, which was printed by Peter Galeſini (a), there are ſome Latin Letters of our Pompey among thoſe of John Baptiſta Lauri. As for his Deciſions of the Rota they are only in manuſcript in the cloſets of many learned men. Charles Carthari gives him great praiſes in his liſt of Conſiſtory Advocates (b).

(a) In Libello pro Canonizatione B. Didaci Complutenſis. Vide etiam Franciſcum Pegna, in Vitâ ejuſdem Didaci.

(b) Ex Bibliothecâ Romanâ Proſperi Mandoſii.

grounded, we ſhall ſee that Argyropylus attached himſelf more ſervilely to the words than to the thoughts of Ariſtotle, and that his tranſlations cannot be accounted either faithful, or elegant. Theſe are the words of this Profeſſor: Superiori ſeculo, quidam verba verbis ita admenſi ſunt, ut ſententiam depravârint, non aliter quam indocti pictores, qui operoſi in cultu effingendo, membra ſecundum veſtem diſtorquent: quum Apelles Parrhaſiique prius nudum corpus efformare, quam amictum ſuperinducere ſoleant. In quorum numero Argyropylum reponas & Ruffinum, alterum interpretem Ariſtotelis, alterum Gregorii Nazianzeni, de quibus ferè ad hemiſtichii dici poteſt: Dant fine mente ſonum. Fit autem illud vel ex inſcitia, vel ex κακοζηλία, quum enim ſententiam apprehendere nequeunt, verba reddunt, quaſi quod ipſi non intellexerint, alius ex illorum verbis intelligere queat, cum verba non minus ex ſententia vim ſuam & ſignificatum accipiant, quam ſententiam conſtituant. Aliqui rurſus fidem exiſtimant à numero verborum non diſcedere (9). i. e. "In the laſt age, ſome "meaſured out their tranſlations word for word in "ſuch a manner that they corrupted the ſenſe, like "ſome unſkilful Painters, who being very laborious "about the drapery, diſtort the members to make "them ſuit the garments: whereas Apelles and Par"rhaſius uſed to draw the naked body before they "put on the cloaths. In which number Argyropy"lus and Ruffinus may be reckoned, of whom the "firſt tranſlated Ariſtotle, and the other Gregory Na"zianzen, and who may almoſt have that hemiſtich "applied to them; They give a ſound without a mean"ing. Now this is done either thro' ignorance or a "falſe zeal, for when they cannot underſtand a ſen"tence, they tranſlate the words, as if another could "underſtand from their words what they do not "underſtand themſelves; whereas words receive their "force and ſignification from a ſentence, as well "as compoſe it. Others again think that to be "faithful it is neceſſary not to depart from the number "of words." Some learned men pretend, that Argyropylus was accuſed of confining himſelf to the words of the original; and, if he could not take the thought and the ſenſe of his Author, of having recourſe to a round of words that mean nothing (10). I queſtion its being exactly as Nannius has ſaid. Huetius agrees with the opinion of Thuanus (11); and conſequently condemns that of Volaterranus. He condemns Paulus Jovius alſo, who has preferred Gaza's verſions to thoſe of Argyropylus; and declares, that if the former is more eloquent, the latter is more faithful. Non efficies quin major quidem eloquentiæ laus Gazæ, accuratè autem interpretandi Argyropylo debeatur (12). See above, in the note [B] of the article of DONATUS ACCIAIOLI, and admire the diverſity of theſe judgments.

(9) Petrus Nannius, Alcmariamus, in Collegio Buſlidiano apud Lovanienſes Latinus Profeſſor, Συμμίκτων, lib. 1. cap. 3. p. 6.

(10) See Mr. Baillet, Jugem. des Sçavans, tom. 4. num. 814. pag. 355.

(11) Huetius, claris Interpretibus, pag. 239.

(12) Idem, ibid.

ARIMANIUS, one of the principal Divinities of the Perſians. This nation owed its Philoſophy to Zoroaſter, of whom the Manichees revived one of the moſt fundamental doctrines, which was, that there are two firſt principles, the one of good, the other of evil. The Perſians named Oromaſdes the Divinity, whom they acknowledged for the principle of all good, and for the author of the firſt ſtate wherein things were produced; and they called Arimanius the Divinity whom they acknowledged for the principle of evil, and for the author of the corruption into which the firſt nature is fallen. They ſay that Oromaſdes having produced the good ſpirits and the ſtars, ſhut them up in an egg [A], and that Arimanius produced the evil genii who broke this egg; whence proceeded the confuſion and mixture of good and evil. They add, that at laſt, after many combats, wherein the victory ſhall be ſometimes on one ſide and ſometimes on the other, Oromaſdes ſhall entirely overcome Arimanius, and utterly deſtroy him, which will be followed by a great

[A] Oromaſdes . . . . ſhut up the Stars in an egg.] I have mentioned in another place (1), that I would ſay ſomething here concerning the egg, which, according to the ancient Heathen Theology, ſerved to produce beings, when the chaos was cleared up. I ſay then, that according to the Phœnicians, the obſcure air, and the chaos were the principle of all things. This obſcure air is, without doubt, the ſame thing that others call night, and to which they aſcribe the generation of an egg, from which love and mankind proceeded. Τίκτει πρώτιστον νὺξ ἡ μελανόπτερος ὠόν (2). We may explain this ingeniouſly of the earth, and adjuſt it to the words of Moſes, by ſuppoſing that the groſſeſt parts of this obſcure and thick air precipitated themſelves upon the circumference of the abyſs, where they found a fat and glutinous ſcum, with which they entangled themſelves, to form together a ſort of mud, which hardening itſelf became the habitable earth (3). Some of the ancients have ſaid that a dove, ſitting upon an egg, had produced Venus or Love. Verba citat Grotius ex Nigidio in Scholiaſten Germanici, ovum miræ magnitudinis quod volventes ejecerunt in terram, atque ita columbam inſedisſe, & poſt aliquot dies excluſiſſe Deam Syriæ quæ vocatur Venus (4). Lucius Ampelius ſaid that it was a fiſh's egg: Ovum piſcis columbam adſedisſe dies plurimos, & excluſiſſe Deam Benignam (5). Dr. Burnet by the egg underſtands the chaos, by the dove the Holy Spirit, and by Venus the earth (6). But methinks he ſhould not confine this Venus that comes out of the egg to the production only of the earth. It ſeems rather to expreſs the univerſe. The Doctor obſerves, that the egg was a very ſacred thing in the myſteries of Bacchus, on account of its conformity with the Being, that engenders and encloſes every thing in itſelf: Ὡς μίμημα τοῦ τὰ πάντα γιγνόμενος καὶ περιέχοντος ἐν ἑαυτῷ (7). He does not forget to obſerve that the expreſſion of Moſes alludes to the action of fowls when they ſit. Huic doctrinæ de Ovo mundano datæque interpretationi tacitè favere mihi videtur incubatio Spiritus Sancti in abyſſum, de qua Moſes in prima telluris productione, ubi ad ovum manifeſto alluditur (8).

(1) In the note [A] of the article ADAM.

(2) Ariſtophanes, apud T. Burnetium, Tell. Theor. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 7. p. 243.

(3) This is what Dr. Burnet does, ibid. p. 244.

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 259.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Ex Plutarchi Sympoſ. lib. 2. Qu. 3.

(8) Burnet. Telluris Theoria Sacra, p. 286.

great happineſs for mankind, and with a very advantageous charge, which will cauſe the body of man to become tranſparent, and preſerve itſelf without nouriſhment (a).

(a) Taken from the Telluris Theoria Sacra (Theory of the Earth) of Dr. T. Burnet, book 2. chap. 10. pag. 289, 290: he quotes Plutarch. de Iſide & Oſiride.

What I have juſt now ſaid was taken out of an author, who had borrowed it from Plutarch, whoſe paſſage I ſhall relate entirely in another place (b). It is obſerved that the King of Perſia, ſeeing Themiſtocles taking refuge under his protection, beſought Arimanius always to inſpire his enemies with ſuch thoughts, that they ſhould baniſh their braveſt men (c); which is a proof that the Perſians looked upon Arimanius as a Divinity that delighted only in doing evil [B]. They meant without doubt the ſame Divinity, when, upon the complaints that Darius made againſt the Perſian Dæmon, when he heard that the Queen his wife died a priſoner of Alexander; it was anſwered him, with regard to the honours of Sepulture, &c. you have no reaſon to accuſe the evil genius of the nation (d). There was nothing of their firſt fortune wanting either to your wife, to your mother, or your children, but to ſee your light, which the Lord Oromaſdes will reſtore to its ſplendor (e). We may ſee in theſe words the oppoſition that the Perſians made between Oromaſdes and Arimanius.

(b) In the note [C] of the article MANICHEES, and in the note [E] of the article ZOROASTER.

(c) Plutarch. in Themiſt. p. 126.

(d) Τὸν αὐτῶν δαίμονα. Plutarch in Alexandro, p. 682.

(e) Idem, ibid.

[B] The Perſians look'd upon Arimanius as a Divinity that delighted only in doing evil.] If any one would deny me this, he might object that the King of Perſia was greatly delighted with having gained Themiſtocles: wherefore he muſt have thought that it was a great happineſs to his land, that ſuch perſons were baniſhed from their own country, and took refuge in his court. Thus when he prayed Arimanius to inſpire his enemies with the reſolution of baniſhing the braveſt of their citizens, he aſked a particular favour of him; and conſequently he look'd on him as a beneficent being in ſome reſpects to the Perſians. I anſwer that this reaſoning does not prove what it intends. This Monarch did not differ from the ſentiments of his Divines: he conſidered Arimanius only as a being that did evil: he aſked of him the baniſhment of the great men of Greece, only as it was prejudicial to that country. It was an action ſuitable to the diſpoſition of Arimanius, as it was unjuſt and pernicious to the cities which baniſhed them: but ſo far as it benefitted the Perſians, it was diſagreeable to him; and it was not under this notion that he entreated him to operate. In a word, to remove this objection, it is ſufficient to ſay, that the affairs of the world being ſo mingled, that ordinarily ſpeaking one country reaps advantage from the misfortune of another, Arimanius could hardly do any thing that was purely and ſimply pernicious: there always aroſe ſome advantage from it, either by accident, or ſome other way. But as he did a thing, only on account of the evil that he ſaw in it, one cannot pretend that he was the principle of any good. He would have hindred, if he could, the Perſians from gaining any advantage by the prejudice of the Athenians. Thus it is true that the prayer, of which we are ſpeaking, does not prove that he is to be look'd upon any otherwiſe than as a Being, that delighted only in doing harm.

ARIMINI (GREGORY Dr.) See RIMINI.

ARION, an admirable horſe, and much more famous in Poetic Hiſtory, than Bucephalus in the Hiſtory of Alexander. They ſpeak variouſly of his origin, although they agree in giving him a divine one. Some ſay that Neptune, being willing to procure to men the ſervices that horſes were capable of doing them, ſtruck the ground in Theſſaly with his trident, and cauſed ſuddenly two horſes to come out of it, one of which was our Arion (a). Others ſay that Neptune, diſputing with Minerva who ſhould name the city of Athens, the Gods ſaid, that thoſe who made the beſt preſent to men, ſhould give the name to this city; upon that Neptune ſtruck the ſhore, and made a horſe come out of it [A]; but Minerva produced an olive tree, and carried the victory, becauſe they judged that peace, of which the olive tree is the ſymbol, is better than war, for which the horſe is proper. There are ſome, who pretend that the horſe which was produced on this occaſion, was named Arion; others ſay that this horſe had Ceres for his mother and Neptune for his father (b). This Goddeſs wandring about the world to look for her daughter, met Neptune, who ſpoke earneſtly of love to her; ſo that, as ſhe did not think proper to ſatisfy him, ſhe thought fit to take the form of a mare. This was done near the city of Oncium in Arcadia. It was in vain for Ceres to feed among other animals; Neptune did not fail of diſcerning her, and enjoying her in the form of a horſe. She was angry at firſt, but being afterwards appeaſed, ſhe waſhed her ſelf in a neighbouring river. She had by Neptune not only a daughter, whoſe name was not lawful to be told the prophane, but alſo our horſe Arion. Some ſay that ſhe was under the form of a Fury, when Neptune impregnated her with this horſe: or that in effect a Fury procreated him from the embrace of Neptune [B]. The Poet Antimachus, quoted by Pauſanias, gives him no other origin than the earth in Arcadia; but Quintus Calaber makes him the ſon

(a) Lutatius in Statii Theb. lib. 4. ver. 43.

(b) Pauſan. lib. 8. pag. 257.

[A] Neptune diſputing with Minerva who ſhould name the city of Athens .... ſtruck the ſhore, and made a horſe come out of it.] Servius informs us of this upon the words of Virgil:

. . . . . Tuque ô, cui prima frementem
Fudit equum magno tellus percuſſa tridenti
Neptuno (1)

That is,

"And thou, whoſe trident ſtruck the teeming earth,
"And made a paſſage for the courſer's birth."

Dryden.

See alſo Probus upon the ſame paſſage of Virgil.

(1) Virgil. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 12.

[B] Some ſay that Ceres was under the form of a Fury, when Neptune impregnated her with this horſe, or that in effect a Fury procreated him from the embrace of Neptune.] Theſe are the ſentiments of Apollodorus and of Heſychius. Here follow their words. Τοῦτον δὲ Ποσειδῶνος ἵππον Δημήτηρ ἐποιήσατο Ἐρινύι κατὰ τὴν συνουσίαν (2). i. e. "Ceres brought him forth, being in the "form of Erynnys at the time of her being embraced "by Neptune." Ἄρειον ὁ ἵππος Ποσειδῶνος υἱός, ἐ μῆτερ αὐτῶ Ἐρινύς (3). i. e. "Arion the horſe, the ſon of "Neptune and Erynnys." Barthius has confounded the opinion of Apollodorus with that of Heſychius. Unius ex Erynnibus (ſays he (4), fabulam aſſentitur Apollodoro Heſychius Lexicographus. This expreſſes that Apollodorus relates that Arion was born of one of the furies; but he ſays expreſly, that Ceres was the mother

(2) Apollodor. Bibliothec. l. 3.

(3) Heſychius.

(4) Barth. in Stat. Part 1. pag. 899.

ſon

ſon of the wind Zephyrus and of a Harpy [C]. However, it is believed that he was nurſed by the Nereïds [D], and that being ſometimes yoked with the Sea-Horſes of Neptune to the Chariot of this God, he had drawn him with incredible ſwiftneſs thro' all the ſeas (c). He had this ſingularity in him, that his right feet reſembled thoſe of a man (d). Hercules mounted him, when he took the city of Elis, and afterwards preſented him to Adraſtus. This is what Pauſanias tells us, who adds that Antimachus made Adraſtus the third poſſeſſor of him [E]. Heſiod repreſents him in the ſervice of Hercules in the combat againſt Cygnus (e). Statius ſays in general that he ſerved Hercules in his travels, and that afterwards the Gods gave him to Adraſtus (f). Probus aſcribes to Neptune all the honour of this preſent (g). It is under this laſt maſter, that Arion has ſignalized himſelf the moſt: he won the prize for racing at the Nemean games [F], which the Princes who went to beſiege Thebes, inſtituted in the honour of Archemorus; and was the cauſe that Adraſtus did not periſh in this famous expedition, as all the other chiefs did. Apollodorus affirms it in the third Book.

(c) Stat. Theb. lib. 6. ver. 308.
(d) Lutat. in Stat. Theb. lib. 6. ver. 302.
(e) Heſiod. in Clypeo Herculis.
(f) Statius, Thebaidos, lib. 6. ver. 308.
(g) Probus, in Virgil. Georg. 1.

ther of this horſe, and that ſhe had only taken the form of a fury at the time of copulation. Lloyd has copied after Barthius, without correcting him in this place.

[C] Quintus Calaber makes him the ſon of the wind Zephyrus, and of a Harpy.] Here is a ſecond miſtake of Barthius, which Mr. Lloyd has tranſcribed into his Dictionary, juſt as he found it. Intercedit Quintus Smyrnæus, ſays Barthius (5), Harpyiæ patronus, cujus fuerit potius ſeminio oriundus patre Zephyro, ingratiis etiam Neptuni. i. e. Quintus Smyrnæus comes in the "way, a patron of the Harpy, from whoſe ſeed he "rather ſprung, having Zephyrus for his father, even "in ſpite of Neptune." There is nothing in this Poet, which expreſſes that Zephyrus and the Harpy produced Arion, either with the conſent of Neptune or without it (6).

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) See in the 4th book, ver. 571.

[D] It is believed that he was nurſed by the Nereïds.] I ſhall quote only Claudian.

Si Dominus legeretur equis, tua poſceret ultro
Verbera, Nereïdum ſtabulis nutritus Arion (7).
That is,
"If the whole race of horſes ſhould accord,
"To chuſe o'er all an univerſal Lord,
"Tho' bred by Nereïds, to thy regal ſway
"The glad Arion willing would obey."

(7) Claudian. Conſul. 4. Honorii, verſ. 555. Lloyd quotes this twice.

[E] Adraſtus was the third poſſeſſor of him.] That was true according to the ſtory of the Scholiaſt on Homer, upon the three hundred and forty ſixth verſe of the twenty third Book of the Iliad. He ſays, that Neptune fell in love with Erynnys (8), metamorphoſed himſelf into a horſe, and had to do with her in Bœotia near the fountain Tiphlouſa; that he got this horſe upon her, which was called Arion, becauſe he ſurpaſſed all others; that he gave him to Capreüs King of Haliartus; that he made a preſent of him to Hercules, who gained the prize in the race with this horſe, againſt Cygnus the ſon of Mars near Trœzena; and that at laſt, Hercules made a preſent of him to Adraſtus.

(8) That is, with one of the Furies.

[F] He won the prize for racing at the Nemean games.] Apollodorus, in the third Book, ſays, that Adraſtus was conqueror at the horſe-race; but Statius feigns that this Prince gave his Arion to Polynices his ſon in law, and that Arion threw this new rider, and continuing to run outſtripped all the reſt; which did not hinder Amphiaraüs from carrying off the crown; for tho' he did not gain it from Arion, it was ſufficient that he had gained it from his antagoniſts, and that Polynices being thrown off his ſeat, could have no pretenſion in virtue of the ſuperior ſwiftneſs of his horſe.

Forſitan & victo prior iſſet Arione Cygnus,
Sed vetat æquoreus vinci pater: hinc vice juſta
Gloria manſit equo, ceſſit victoria vati (9).
That is,
"Cygnus perhaps Arion had out-run,
"And from the horſe divine, the race had won:
"But his earth-ſhaking father this denies,
"Gives him the glory, but the Seer the prize.

(9) Statius, Thebaidos, lib. 6. ver. 528.

Apollodorus allows that Amphiaraüs carried the prize at the chariot-race, ἅρμασι; which his Latin tranſlator ought to render curru, and not curſu, as Barthius has obſerved (10). As for the diſtich of Propertius, which repreſents Arion as a ſpeaking animal,

Qualis & Adraſti fuerit vocalis Arion
Triſtis ad Archemori funera victor equus (11),
That is,
"And how Adraſtus' vocal horſe became
"Sadly victorious at the fun'ral game
"Of great Archemorus,"

(10) Barth. in Stat. tom. 3. p. 537.

(11) Propert. Elegia ult. lib. 2.

I am not of opinion that we ought to underſtand ſuch a ſadneſs as Paſſerat imagines: I think the word triſtis relates to the misfortune of Archemorus, which occaſioned the celebration of this game; and not to the vexation of Arion, for finding himſelf made uſe of by another than Adraſtus (12).

(12) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, July 1702, pag. 110.

ARIOSTA (LIPPA) Concubine of Opizzon, Marquis of Eſte and Ferrara, confirmed in ſuch a manner by her faithfulneſs and political ſkill, the impreſſions that her beauty had made upon the heart of this Marquis, that at laſt he made her his lawful wife, in 1352. He died in the ſame year, and left to her the adminiſtration of his dominions, in which ſhe acquitted herſelf very well, during the minority of her eleven children. From her came all the houſe of Eſt, which ſtill ſubſiſts in the branch of the Dukes of Modena, and of Rhegio (a) The author, from whom I borrow this, obſerves, that Lippa Arioſta did more honour to her family, which is one of the nobleſt in Ferrara .... than ſhe had taken from it [A]. There are ſome reflections upon that ſubject, in the remark which I join to this Article.

(a) Le Laboureur, Relation du Voyage de Pologne, Part 3. p. 172.

☞ ARIOSTO

[A] She did more honour to her family .... than ſhe had taken from it.] I have ſpoken already (1) of the ſingular efficacy of marriage. One cannot ſufficiently admire it; for in ſhort it changes the three different ſorts of time: the paſt is no more free from its influences, than the preſent and the future. "Do not "you admire what force and what authority cuſtom "has upon the world? With theſe words, Ego con- "jungo vos, it makes a young fellow lie with a girl, "in the ſight and with the conſent of the whole "world; and this is called A ſacrament adminiſtred "by a ſacred perſon. The ſame action, without theſe "three words, is an enormous crime, that diſhonours "a poor woman; and he that has conducted the "affair, is called a .... The father and mother, in "the firſt of theſe caſes, rejoice, dance, and carry "their daughter to bed themſelves; and in the ſe- "cond they are almoſt diſtracted, get her ſhaved, "and put her into a Nunnery. Theſe laws muſt be "confeſſed to be very pleaſant (2)." This is not the moſt

(1) In the article of ALES, note [D] immediately after the quotation (11).

(2) Buſſi Rabutin, Letter 136 of the 4th Part, p. 192. Holland edition.

☞ARIOSTO (LODOVICO or LEWIS), a celebrated Italian Poet of the XVIth Century was born at the caſtle of Reggio in Lombardy in the year 1474 (a), and deſcended from a good family [A]. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf when he was very young by the marks of an excellent genius, which prompted him to try his talent in Poetry, and compoſe ſeveral pieces of that kind; among which his tale of Pyramus and Thiſbe was the moſt remarkable. He formed this ſtory into a play, which was acted by his brothers and ſiſters (b). This performance of his was ſo highly applauded, that every perſon who ſaw it preſaged, that he would undoubtedly prove one of the greateſt Poets of the age, if his father had not oppoſed his inclinations, and inſiſted upon his applying himſelf to the ſtudy of the law, in order to make his fortune [B]. When he was twenty four

(a) Franceſco Sanſovino, Vitâ di M. Lodovico Arioſto tratta dall' opere ſue medeſime, prefixed to his edition of the Orlando Furioſo publiſhed at Venice in 4to, 1562.

(b) Sir John Harington's Life of Arioſto, publiſhed in the 3d edition of his tranſlation of the Orlando Furioſo at London 1634, p. 415.

moſt ſurpriſing part of the affair: the principal ſingularity conſiſts in the retroactive effect. Our Arioſta had been a concubine: her children were baſtards; it was a blemiſh upon her honour and her family: but all this was effaced, waſhed off, and annihilated by the three words of the Prieſt Ego conjungo vos. The Marquis of Ferrara, marrying this miſtreſs of his a little before he left the world, converted her into a woman of honour, and gave a legitimacy to his children, who legally deſerved the contrary title. A like metamorphoſis may be ſeen every day, and ſome have pretended that the very children, that are born at a time when the fathers and mothers could not be married for want of a diſpenſation, ought to be legitimated by a ſubſequent marriage; but the Parliament of Paris decreed againſt this pretenſion, in 1664 (3). It may be asked perhaps why this Marquis kept off till the year of his death. I could anſwer that a keeper, who perceives himſelf near his end, is much more diſpoſed to conduct himſelf in this manner, than if he had hopes of living ſtill a long while. The remorſes of conſcience, ſtirred up either of themſelves, or by the diſcourſes of a Caſuiſt, are more lively, when one is afraid of dying: ſo that we make the leſs difficulty about going thro' a troubleſome ceremony that appeaſes them. Add to this, that a great Lord, being ſollicited to marriage, by a miſtreſs he is fond of, may imagine ſhe will be a thouſand times more complaiſant and faithful, whilſt ſhe flatters herſelf with the hopes of obtaining the character of a lawful wife; and that when ſhe has obtained it ſhe will ſhew her haughtineſs, ill temper, &c. It is therefore thought proper to keep her in ſuſpence by a bare hope; but when once we ſee our ſelves paſt hope of recovery, we renounce all thoſe managements. Some perſons however are ſo ſevere, that the conduct of this Marquis of Ferrara, and his imitators, does not pleaſe them; they would have a girl, or a woman, that has diſgraced herſelf, and been a long time a ſcandal to a whole country, live all her life under diſgrace, and by the example of not being reſtored to her reputation, be prevented from ſerving as a bait to allure other girls, and concealing under ſuch a hope the infamy of concubinage (4).

(3) See the Journal des Sçavans, Jan. 12, 1665, pag. 46.

(4) See above the note [D] of the article ALES.

[A] Deſcended from a good family.] This family was originally from Bologna, tho' it was not derived, as ſome imagined, from the old Ariſtii or Arioviſti: It was ſo conſiderable for its rank in that city, that Margues Obyſo (1), the third of the houſe of Eſt, did not think it beneath his quality to marry a Lady of that family, whoſe name was Lippa Arioſta. She was a woman of great beauty and wit, and by her intereſt ſeveral of that family removed to Ferrara, where they eſtabliſhed themſelves, and were treated with great reſpect (2). Our Poet himſelf obſerves in his Satyrs, that the origin of his family was from Bologna;

(1) Mr. Bayle calls him Opizzon. See the preceding Article.

(2) Sir John Harington's Life of Arioſto, publiſhed at the end of his Tranſlation of the Orlando Furioſo, at London 1634, p. 415.

Ch' altro a quel ne in Ferrara ne in Bologna,
Onde hai l'antica origine s'accoſta.

His Father, whoſe name was Nicholas Arioſto, was Governor of the caſtle of Reggio in Lombardy at the time, when our Poet was born there. His uncles likewiſe were men of great merit and diſtinction, and poſſeſſed the moſt conſiderable offices in Ferrara (3). His mother, whoſe name was Daria, was deſcended from the noble family of Malaguzza, and is mentioned by him in the following lines (4);

(3) Sanſovino, Vita di M. Lodovico Arioſto.

(4) Idem, ibid.

Che s'al mio genitor toſto ch' a Rheggio
Daria mi partorì facevo il givoco.

Our Author was the eldeſt ſon; and he had four brothers and five ſiſters, as appears from theſe verſes;

Si che di me ſol foſſe queſto poco;
Nel quel dieci tra i frati & le ſirocchie:
E biſognato, che tutti habbiam loco.

He obſerves afterwards, that the eſtate of the family was not very conſiderable;

Ne mai fu troppo a miei Mercurio amico:

By which verſe, wherein he tells us that Mercury was no great friend to his family, he inſinuates, that none of them had endeavoured to enlarge their eſtate by trade or merchandize, or, as Sanſovino obſerves, by the practice of the Law. His brothers names were Charles, Cleandro, Galaſſo, and Gabriel, and he gives an account of them in his ſecond Satyr.

Di cinque che noi ſiam Carlo è nel regno,
Onde cacciero i Turchi il mio Cleandro,
Et di ſtarvi alcun tempo ſà diſegna.
Galaſſo brama in la città d'Evandro,
Por la camicia ſopra la guarnaccia,
Et ne ſei col Signorito Aleſſandro.
Ecci Gabriel ma che vuoi tu che faccia,
Che da fanciul reſtò per mala ſorte
De li piedi impedito e de le braccia?

[B] Inſiſted upon his applying himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law in order to make his fortune.] His caſe was very like that of Ovid, as appears from the tenth Elegy of the fourth book of the Triſtia.

At mihi jam puero cæleſtia ſacra placebant;
Inque ſuum furtim Muſa trahebat opus.
Sæpe pater dixit, ſtudium quid inutile tentas?
Mæonides nullas ipſe reliquit opes.
Motus eram dictis, totoque Helicone relicto,
Scribere conabar verba ſoluta modis.
Sponte ſuâ carmen numeros veniebat adaptos,
Et quod tentabam ſcribere, verſus erat.

Arioſto laments his misfortune in this reſpect in the following verſes to Bembo:

Ahi laſſo quando hebbi al Pegaſeo melo
L'età diſpoſta, & che la freſche guancie
Non ſi vedeano ancor fiorir d'un pelo,
Mio padre mi cacciò con ſpiedi e lancie
Non che con ſproni a volger teſti & chioſe,
Et mi occupò cinque anni in quelle ciancie.
Ma poi che vide poco fruttuoſe
L'opre, & il tempo in van getterſi, dopo
Molto contraſto in libertà mi poſe.

Our celebrated Milton has written a fine Latin Poem to his Father, in order to perſuade him to give him the liberty of purſuing his inclinations to Poetry. He ſhews him the great eſteem, in which that art was held among the ancients, and the advantages, which reſult from it. He tells his father, that he cannot poſſibly be averſe to the Muſes, ſince he was ſo well ſkilled in Muſic; and therefore he is not to wonder, if his ſon ſhould be inclined to Poetry, ſince there is ſo ſtrict a connexion and affinity between it and Muſic.

Nec tu perge, precor, ſacras contemnere Muſas,
Nec vanas inopeſque puta, quarum ipſe peritus
Munere, mille ſonos numeros componis ad aptos,
Millibus & vocem modulis variare canoram
Doctus, Arionii merito ſis nominis hæres. Nunc four years of age his father died, and left him in very indifferent circumstances, either because the estate was divided among all his brothers, or because his fathers's fortune consisted principally of places of profit, which determined at his death. Our Ariosto was therefore extremely perplexed with the charge of so great a family, so that he had almost taken a resolution to abandon his studies, if the emulation, which he had with Pandolfo Ariosto, a gentleman of his own family, had not awakened in him his former inclination. But some time after Pandolfo died; which proved a great discouragement to our Author, who discontinued the prosecution of his studies for a while. However, he had before given the world some proofs of his admirable genius in Poetry. When he was about thirty years of age, his reputation for wit introduced him to the acquaintance of Hippolito Cardinal of Est, a great patron of learned men, who entertained him at his Court in a very honourable manner (c). Before that time he had only written some few Sonnets, which were highly applauded. This success inspired him with a new ambition of distinguishing himself by some nobler work, and gaining immortal honour. He considered with himself that Sannazarius, Bembo, Naugerius, and Sadolet were eminent for the beauty of their Latin Poems; he resolved therefore to apply himself chiefly to the cultivation of his native tongue [C], tho' he wrote likewise several pieces in Latin [D]. He read over all the French, Provencal, and Spanish Poems, which he could procure; and proposing to himself the idea of the great originals of Homer and Virgil, as Sansovino (d) tells us, he undertook a Poem upon the loves of Orlando. He took the subject of it from Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, or Orlando in Love (e), upon (c) Idem, ibid. pag. 416.

(d) Ubi supra.

(e) See Sign. Rolli's Remarks upon M. Voltaire's Essay on the Epic Poetry, &c. pag. 48. edit. 1727.

Nunc tibi quid mirum, si me genuisse poetam
Contigerit, charo si tam prope sanguine juncti
Cognatas artes studiumque affine sequamur.
Ipse volens Phœbus se dispartire duobus,
Altera dona mihi, dedit altera dona parenti;
Dividuumque Deum genitorque puerque tenemus.

He then observes, that tho' his father might pretend an aversion to the Muses, yet it was not a real one, since he had not obliged him to apply himself to any of the lucrative professions, and particularly to that of the Law, which he represents as very disagreeable; but had permitted him to indulge his fondness for polite Literature, and to learn the treasures of the Latin, Greek and Hebrew tongues, and all the beauties of the French and Italian.

Tu tamen, ut simules teneras odisse Camœnas,
Non odisse reor; neque enim, pater, ire jubebas,
Quà via lata patet, quà pronior area lucri,
Certaque condendi fulget spes aurea nummi.
Nec rapis ad leges, malè custoditaque gentis
Jura, nec insulsis damnas clamoribus aures.
Sed magis exultam cupiens ditescere mentem,
Me procul urbano strepitu, secessibus altis
Abductum Aoniæ jucunda per otia ripæ
Phœbæo lateri comitem finis ire beatum.

He then professes his disregard for all the riches of Peru in comparison of learning; and declares that he was as much obliged to his father for giving him an education in Literature, as Phaeton would have been to his father Apollo, even tho' he could have securely enjoyed the command of his chariot. He promises himself a rank superior to the common herd of mankind and to all the attacks of envy, with the honour of an immortal name.

I nunc, confer opes quisquis maledanus avitas
Austriaci gazas, Peruanaque regna peroptas.
Quæ potuit majora pater tribuisse, vel ipse
Jupiter, excepto, donâsset ut omnia, cœlo?
. . . . . .
Ergo ego jam doctæ pars quamlibet ima catervæ
Victrices hederas inter laurésque sedebo;
Jamque nec obscurus populo miscebor inerti,
Vitabuntque oculos vestigia nostra profanos.
Este procul vigiles curæ, procul este querelæ,
Invidiæque acies transverso tortilis hirquo,
Sæva nec anguiferos extende calumnia rictus,
In me triste nihil, fœdissima turba, potestis,
Nec vestri sum juris ego: securaque tutus
Pectora, vipereo gradiar sublimis ab ictu.

These inchanting prospects of glory, and the strong enthusiasm which possesses the minds of great genius's, such as Ariosto and Milton, render them insensible to all the low pursuits of interest, and afford them such an exquisite satisfaction, as is more than equivalent for the want of all the gratifications of sense. We find, that Ariosto's Father was a man of no taste for learning, and consequently regarded more what study would be most profitable for his son to follow, than what nature and inclination determined him to. He obliged him therefore to apply himself to the study of the Civil Law; which he did for several years together, tho' with great reluctance, and made but little progress in it. At last he entirely abandoned it, and returned to the more agreeable pursuits of Poetry. He tells us, that when he was twenty years old, he wanted a schoolmaster to qualify him to understand Æsop's Fables;

Passar venti anni io mi trovava & huopo
Haver di pedagogo, ch' a fatica
Intesi haurei quel che tradusse Esopo.

But this seems very surprizing, since it is said, that when he was very young he composed and spoke in publick a Latin Oration, which was greatly admired. It is most probable therefore, that when his Father obliged him to apply himself to the Law contrary to his own inclination, he lost his knowledge of the Latin tongue. But afterwards he used his utmost efforts to recover it under the care of Gregorio da Spoleti, a man of great merit and learning, as he tells us in the verses immediately following those quoted above;

Fortuna multo albora mi fu amico,
Chi me offersi Gregorio da Spoleti,
Che ragion vuol che sempre lo benedica.

He was extremely conversant in Horace, and understood the most difficult and obscure passages in his Odes; which was very uncommon at that time (5).

(5) Sir John Harington, ubi supra, p. 416.

[C] Applied himself to the cultivation of his native tongue.] He had a great mastery of the Latin tongue; but he chose to write in his own language, either because he thought, that he could not raise himself to the highest rank among the Latin Poets, which was already possessed by others; or because he found it most suitable to his subject and the Age he lived in; or because he was desirous to enrich his own language with such works, as would render it more valuable and important to other nations. But the first of these, as Sir John Harington observes (6), was the true cause; for when Bembo would have dissuaded him from writing in Italian, alledging that he might gain much more honour by the Latin tongue, which was more lasting and extensive; his answer was, that he had rather be the principal of the Tuscan Writers, than the second or third among the Latins; and he added, that he found his genius most inclined to the former.

(6) Pag. 417.

[D] He wrote likewise several pieces in Latin.] They were printed by Valgrese with the Poems of Pigna and Calcagnini (7), and afterwards published in the first volume of the Deliciæ Poetarum Italorum. They are confounded in that collection with the works of several other Poets of very little reputation (8).

(7) See Mr. de la Monnoye's Notes upon Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. Part 1. n. 1261. pag. 140. edit. Amsterdam 1725.

(8) Baillet. ubi supra.

upon whoſe model he proceeded, becauſe that work of Bojardo was familiar to every perſon, and becauſe he thought it proper to avoid the introducing of names and ſubjects, which were quite new to his countrymen, who on the other hand would be pleaſed to ſee Bojardo's ſcheme compleated (f). This Poem he began when he was about thirty years of age; and it is the moſt celebrated of all his works, tho' there have been very different opinions concerning it [E]. His attachment to Poetry did not ſo far engage him, (f) Sir John Harington's Life of Arioſto, pag. 417.

[E] There have been very different opinions concerning his Orlando Furioſo.] The firſt judgment, which was paſſed upon this Poem, was by no means favourable to it. It was that of Cardinal Hippolito d'Eſt, who being preſented with it, as it was dedicated to him, and having read it over, aſked Arioſto, "Where the Devil he had got ſuch a number of "ſtrange unaccountable whimſies?" Dove, Diavolo, Meſſer Ludovico, avete pigliate tante coglionerie? However Muretus (9) and Paulus Jovius were of opinion, that this work would be immortal as well as its Author; and it is certain, that he ſucceeded in that point, ſince Bumaldi (10) aſſures us, that there is ſcarce a country in the world, where it has not been printed, nor a language, eſpecially in Europe, into which it has not been tranſlated. It is a common notion in Italy, that this Orlando has eclipſed the reputation of every thing, that was publiſhed before it, and particularly the Orlando of Bojardo and the Morgante of Pulci; the latter of which has been excelled by Arioſto in the grandeur of the ſubject and the dignity of the verſe; and the former by our Poet's aſſuming the ſame title, and improving and perfecting Bojardo's Invention (11). So that, according to Mr. Roſteau (12), the Orlando Furioſo has no rival or ſuperior except the Godfrey of Taſſo, which was publiſhed ſince. There never was any Poem ſo full of a variety of incidents, battles, enchantments, and ſtrange adventures, as this of Arioſto; and it is ſaid, that the men of taſte in Italy are divided in their opinion between this and Taſſo's performance abovementioned. It ſeems to be a Trophy compoſed of the ſpoils of the other Italian Authors; and that nothing has been omitted, which Arioſto's genius or induſtry could ſuggeſt to him in order to compleat his work, and furniſh it with all the ornaments imaginable (13). The Gentlemen of Port-Royal (14) tell us, that he wrote with prodigious exactneſs, and that he may be read to great advantage, if we retrench ſome paſſages, which are inconſiſtent with decency. However he has not taken ſufficient care to give his ſtyle all the ſublimity and grandeur, which were proper for Epic Poetry; and we may eaſily diſcover in it the comic Author from the ſimilitude of the diction in many places. Notwithſtanding this defect, he does not want elevation even in the humorous and agreeable parts of his Poems. This Boileau particularly recommends in him in the third Canto of his Art of Poetry:

On peut être à la fois & pompeux & plaiſant,
Et je hais un ſublime ennuyeux & peſant:
J'aime mieux Arioſte & ſes fables comiques,
Que ces Auteurs toujours froids & melancholiques.

That is,

"At once be grand and pleaſant;
"I hate the tedious, heavy, dull ſublime.
"I'd rather read Orlando's Comic Tale,
"Than a dull Author always ſtiff and ſtale;
"Who thinks himſelf diſhonour'd in his ſtyle,
"If on his works the Graces ever ſmile."

But with all theſe excellencies of Arioſto, the Critics are not agreed that his Poem is a perfect one, or even a true Poem, if we judge of it according to the rules of art. Taſſo objects, that there is neither unity of fable nor action in it. James Mazzoni undertook the defence of Arioſto, and endeavoured to convince Taſſo of his miſtake, and obliged him to acknowledge, that the ſubject of the Orlando Furioſo is ſimple, without any multiplicity in the fable or action. Ut etiam Torquatum Taſſum brevi argutâque argumentatione incluſum fateri coegerit poematis Arioſti argumentum non multiplex & varium, ſed eſſe ſimplex & unum (15). But Father Mambrun in his Latin Diſſertation upon Epic Poetry (16), who never ſaw or heard of Mazzoni's reaſons, has determined very poſitively, that there is no unity of action in the Orlando Furioſo, and that the Poem is not a regular one either with regard to the œconomy of the whole, or the proportion of the parts of it. The other French Critics have not paſſed ſo favourable a judgment upon it. James Peletier of Mans in the firſt Book of his Art of Poetry (17), has found a great many things worthy of his cenſure in it. He objects in the firſt place againſt the title of it as ill-choſen; and he affirms that it is improper, or elſe the Poet has not anſwered it in his ſubject. For tho' he has aſſumed that of Orlando, yet he never mentions him, but in three or four Canto's; and after a variety of Digreſſions and incidents he concludes his Book with Ruggiero. This ſhews, that the Poem is faulty in the contrivance, and that the diſpoſition of it is defective. If he deſigned to do any ſervice or pay any compliment to the houſe of Eſt, he ſhould have done it under the title of Ruggiero rather than that of Orlando. He aſſerts likewiſe, that Arioſto ſhould not have confined himſelf ſo ſervilely to an imitation of Virgil in all the parts of his ſcheme, but ſhould have ſtudied more the genius and manners of his own age than that of the ancient Poet; and had a proper regard to the different circumſtances of the times. He obſerves likewiſe, that he introduces a great many trifling things unworthy of the grandeur of an heroic Poem; and that he amaſſes together a heap of ſtories and humorous paſſages, which are very unſuitable and ill-placed. Mr. de Balzac in his Critical Diſcourſe upon the Herodes Infanticida of Daniel Heinſius tells us, that if the Italians had reaſon to ſtile Arioſto the Prince of the Poets of their country, it was perhaps founded upon this conſideration, that he has acted in his Poem like a Prince in his dominions. It is, ſays he, in virtue of this ſovereignty that he acknowledges no laws, and aſſumes a ſuperiority above the common rights of mankind. He forms the myſteries of our religion into his Fables, and he diverts himſelf with what we adore. He treats religion with an unaccountable freedom and irreverence. Tho' it often happens, that his want of Order is agreeable in his writings, and his confuſion frequently occaſions more pleaſure than perplexity; yet it is ſtill diſorder and confuſion. He mingles almoſt every where falſhood with truth, and forms ſometimes a compoſition of them, which is ſhocking even to thoſe men of judgment, who are otherwiſe Libertines in their manner of thinking about religion. He introduces the true God ſwearing by the river Styx; and when he blends together and compares the miracles and hiſtory of the old teſtament with fable, he ſeems to caſt diſhonour upon the truth of the ſacred hiſtory. Father Rapin in his General Reflections upon Poetry (18), has been as ſevere as Balzac in diſcovering the errors of Arioſto. He obſerves in one place, that he had too much fire; in another, that he was too full of miraculous and ſupernatural events, which have too much reſemblance with the crude imaginations of a ſick man, and which ſhock the perſons of good ſenſe, becauſe they have no ſhadow of probability in them. He tells us likewiſe in the Second part of his Reflections (19), that our Poet's deſign was too vaſt, and diſproportionate, and indigeſted; that it is a bad model of an Epic Poem; that his Epiſodes are too forced, and improbable, and very often impertinent to the ſubject (20); that his heroes are mere Knight-errants; and that his Poem has rather the air of Romance than of true Heroiſm. He owns however in another place (21), that Arioſto is pure, ſublime, grand, and admirable in his expreſſions, and his deſcriptions are maſter-pieces in their kind; but that he wants judgment, and that there is nothing valuable in him but the beauty of his ſtyle and the charms of his verſe, which have ſo far impoſed upon mankind, and prejudiced other Poets in his favour that they have not been able to diſtinguiſh the enormous errors, which he has been guilty of (22). His genius, continues our critic, ſeems to be like thoſe fruitful lands, which produce flowers and weeds at the ſame time; and tho' all the ſeveral parts of his Poem are very beautiful, yet the work entire does not deſerve

(9) Variar. Lect. lib. 18. cap. 8. edit. 1604. Francof. in 8°, apud Baillet, p. 142.

(10) Minerv. Bonon. ſive Anadem. Civ. Bonon. Script. illuſtr. p. 152, &c.

(11) See Paul. Jovius, in Elogiis pag. 84.

(12) Sentimens ſur quelques Livres qu'il a lus. apud Baillet, p. 142.

(13) Paul. Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(14) Aut. Anon. de la Gram. Ital. Nouv. Method. Preface pag. 13 and 14. de P. R. apud Baillet, pag. 143.

(15) Jan. Nicius Erythr. Pinacoth. p. 67. edit. Lipſiæ 1712.

(16) Quæſt. 5. pag. 372.

(17) C. 5. de Imitation; and in Du Verdier's Biblioth. apud Baillet, p. 144.

(18) Reflex. 2. 11 and 23.

(19) Reflex. 3.

(20) Ibid. Reflex. 18.

(21) Ibid. Reflex. 16.

(22) Reflex. Partic. 3. Part 2.

him, but that he was employed in Embaſſies, and the management of affairs in ſeveral parts ſerve the character of an Epic Poem. Father Mambrun in his Diſſertation concerning Epic Poetry (23), had cenſured Arioſto for introducing too raſhly women in the armies. This ſeems likewiſe to be diſapproved of by Father Rapin (24), where he tells us, that this Poet diveſts women of their proper character, which is modeſty and a fear of danger; and adds, that he has fallen into the ſame error with regard to his Heroes whom he ſinks below their proper dignity, and repreſents as acting the moſt trifling parts imaginable. In ſhort, Arioſto had never ſtudied the rules of Ariſtotle, as Taſſo afterwards did with great application; who is therefore much ſuperior to Arioſto, ſays Father Rapin, notwithſtanding all that the academy of Florence can urge to the contrary. Rapin's judgment in this point is exactly agreeable to that of the French academy and of the beſt judges on this ſide the Alps; ſince according to Mr. Godeau Biſhop of Graſſe in the preface to his Poem upon St. Paul, it was commonly ſaid, that Arioſto's tomb was in Taſſo. However, he has had a great many partizans in Italy. But next to the Academy della Cruſca and Mazzoni above-mentioned, there have not been more zealous defenders of him than Simon Fornari, who wrote commentaries upon him; Paul Beni, who made a compariſon between him and Homer; and Ludovico Dolce, who made an apology for him. Sir John Harington in his Apology of Poetry prefixed to his Engliſh tranſlation of the Orlando Furioſo, tells us, that he had heard, that this Poem had been diſliked by ſome perſons, tho' by few of any wit or judgment; and he compares Virgil and Arioſto together. The one, ſays he, begins,

Arma virumque cano;
The other,
Le Donne i Cavalieri, l'arme, gli amore,
Le Corteſie, l'audaci impreſi io canto.
That is,
" Of Dames, of Knights, of Arms, of Loves de" light,
" Of Courteſies, of high Attempts I ſpeak."

Virgil ends with the death of Turnus; Arioſto with that of Rodomont.

Beſtemmiendo fuggì l'alma ſdegnoſa,
Che fu ſi altera al mondo, e ſi ergoglioſa:
That is,
" Down to the lake, where damned Ghoſts do lie,
" Sunk his diſdainful ſoul, now cold as ice,
" Blaſpheming as it went, and curſing loud,
" That was on earth ſo lofty and ſo proud."

Virgil extols Æneas to pleaſe Auguſtus, from whom he was ſuppoſed to be deſcended: Arioſto extols Rogero in honour of the houſe of Eſt. Æneas hath his Dido, who detains him; Rogero his Alcine. In ſhort, there is nothing remarkable in Virgil, but has very happily been imitated by Arioſto. Virgil's Poem has been juſtly admired for the excellent morality of it; and Dante the Italian Poet expreſly declares, that he was firſt reclaimed from his vicious indulgences by reading it. Now every thing that is commendable upon that account in Virgil, is equally to be found in Arioſto, with ſeveral things, which the former could not give us thro' the ignorance of the age in which he lived. In proof of which Sir John Harington inſtances in the devout and Chriſtian behaviour of Charlemagne in the fourteenth Book, with his prayer,

Non voglia tua Bonta per mio fallire,
Ch'l tuo popol fidele habbia a patire, &c.

And in the beginning of the XVIIth Book;

Il giuſto Dio, quando i peccati noſtri, &c.
That is,
The moſt juſt God, when once man's ſins do grow
Beyond the bounds of pardon and of grace,
Becauſe that men his judgments juſt may know,
No leſs than love, to rule on earth doth place
Vile monſters, ſuch as tyrannize us ſo,
With wrong the right, with luſt they laws deface:
For this ſame cauſe were Sylla ſent and Marius,
The Nerons both, and filthy-minded Varius (25).

(25) It is Caio Furibundo, i. e. " Furious Caius" in the original.

And then in the fifth Stanza:

No doubt but God in heav'nly throne that ſits,
And thence our deeds and thoughts doth plainly ſee,
Us to be ſpoil'd and conquer'd thus permits
By thoſe, that are perhaps as ill as we.
But if to pleaſe him we would bend our wits,
Then from theſe foes he ſoon would ſet us free,
And we ſhall ſee their puniſhment e'er long,
That us oppreſs by villany and wrong.

In the forty firſt Book we have an account of the converſion of Rogero to the Chriſtian religion, where the Hermit is introduced diſcourſing with him, and guarding him againſt preſumption and deſpair.

Now, (as I ſaid,) this wiſe the Hermit ſpoke,
And part doth comfort him, and part doth checke.
He blameth him, that in that pleaſant yoke
He had ſo long deferred to put his necke,
But did to wrath his Maker ſtill provoke;
And did not come at his firſt call and becke.
But ſtill did hide himſelfe away from God,
Until he ſaw him comming with his rod.
Then did he comfort him, and make him know,
That Grace is ne'er deny'd to ſuch as aſke;
As do the workmen in the Goſpel ſhow,
Receiving pay alike for divers taſke.

Sir John Harington then endeavours to vindicate Arioſto from the imputation of obſcenity, with regard to ſeveral parts of his Poem; and to ſhew, that however looſe the Stories may be, there is no manner of impurity in the expreſſion, any more than in Virgil; and ſo I dare, continues he, take upon me, that in all Arioſto (and yet I think it is as much as three Æneids) there is not a word of ribaldry or obſcenouſneſſe. Farther, there is ſo meet a decorum in the perſons of thoſe, that ſpeak laſciviouſly, as any of judgment muſt needs allow. And therefore tho' I rather crave pardon than praiſe for him in this point, yet methinks I can ſmile at the fineneſs of ſome, that will condemn him, and yet not allow, but admire our Chaucer, who both in words and ſenſe incurreth farre more the reprehenſion of flat ſcurrilitie, as I could recite many places, not only in his Miller's tale, but in the good wife of Bathe's tale, and many more, in which only the decorum which he keeps is that that excuſeth it, and maketh it more tolerable. In anſwer to the objection, that Arioſto wants art, and recedes from the example of Homer and the precepts of Ariſtotle, Sir John Harington obſerves, that what was proper in Homer at the time when he wrote, would now appear otherwiſe from the different circumſtances of the age. Beſides, tho' our Poet's tales are thought by many perſons to be introduced without any propriety, we may remark, that Homer himſelf has ſeveral of the ſame kind; as in the Iliad, the converſation between Glaucus and Diomedes with regard to Bellerophon; and in the Odyſſey, the diſcourſe of the Hog with Ulyſſes. The title of the Poem has likewiſe been objected to, becauſe the Author called it Orlando Furioſo, inſtead of Rogero; but he may be defended from the example of Homer, who tho' he profeſſes to write the actions of Achilles, yet has entitled his Poem the Iliad from Troy, and not the Achilleid. With reſpect to the rules of Ariſtotle, Sir John Harington is of opinion, that he followed them very ſtrictly. For Ariſtotle and the greateſt Critics determine, that the Epopæia or heroic Poem ſhould be founded upon ſome hiſtory, and include a ſhort period of time in it. Agreeably to this Arioſto choſe the ſtory of Charles the Great, and has not exceeded a year in his whole work. The Critics again preſcribe, that no fiction ſhould be made uſe of, which is abſolutely incredible. And ſure, ſays our Author, Arioſto neither in his inchantments exceedeth credit, (for who knows not how ſtrong the illuſions of the Devil are?) neither in the miracles, that Aſtolfo by the power of St. John is fained to do, ſince the church holdeth that Prophets both alive and dead have done mighty great miracles. " Thirdly they would have an heroical Poem " (as parts of Italy [F]. The Cardinal of Eſt afterwards reſolved to carry him to Hungary among other illuſtrious perſons, who attended him; but upon Arioſto's refuſal to go, he loſt

(23) Prefix'd to his Conſtantin. pag. 390, 391. apud Baillet, p. 147.
(24) Reflex. General. 25. ſur la Poetique.

" (as well as a tragedy) to be full of Peripetiæ; " which I interpret an agnition of ſome unlooked " for fortune either good or bad, and a ſudden change " thereof. Of this what ſtore there be the reader " ſhall quickly find. As for apt ſimilitudes, for paſ- " ſions well expreſſed, of love, of pity, of hate, of " wrath, a blind man may ſee, if he can but hear, " that this work is full of them." There are two other objections urged againſt him, which Sir John Harington imagines rather to be two peculiar excellencies in him ſuperior to all other writers before him in that kind. The former is, that he breaks off his narrations very abruptly, ſo that the reader without a ſtrong attention will ſcarce be able to retain the thread of the ſtory. But this may be conſidered as an inſtance of the Author's art, which engages us to read over the whole work with an impatient deſire to ſee the Cataſtrophe, and which at laſt unravels the different ſubjects in a ſhort and perſpicuous manner. If Sir Philip Sidney had eſteemed this a fault, he would undoubtedly have avoided it in his Arcadia. The latter objection is, that he ſpeaks too much in his own perſon by way of digreſſion; which the objectors ſay is contrary to the laws of Poetry, becauſe neither Homer nor Virgil did it. Methinks, ſays Sir John Harington in anſwer to this, it is a ſufficient defence to ſay, Arioſto doth it. Sure I am, it is both delightful and very profitable to have a ſeat or reſting place for the reader; and even as if a man walked in a fair long alley, to have a ſeat or reſting place here and there is eaſie and commodious. But if at the ſame ſeat were planted ſome excellent tree, that not only with the ſhade ſhould keep us from the heat, but with ſome pleaſant and right wholeſome fruit ſhould allay our thirſt, and comfort our ſtomacke, we would think it for the time a little paradiſe. So are Arioſto's morals and pretty digreſſions ſprinkled thro' his long work to the no leſs pleaſure than profit of the reader. Father Bouhours in his *Maniere de bien penſer dans les Ouvrages d'Eſprit cenſures a very extravagant thought of our Poet, who ſays of one of his Heroes, " that in the heat of the " engagement not perceiving that he was killed, he " ſtill fought on vigorouſly, dead as he was."

* Dialog. i.

Il pover' huomo, che non ſen' era accorto,
Andava combattendo, & era morto.

There have been ſeveral editions of this Poem of Arioſto, particularly at Venice, in 4to, 1562, with the following title; ORLANDO FURIOSO di M. Ludovico Arioſto, tutto di nuovo con figure adornato, et riveduto con ogni diligenza; con nuova giunta di Annotationi a ciaſcun Canto, con gli argomenti in Stanze di M. Livio Coraldo e con i cinque Canti, che ne gli altri non erano: i. e. " The Orlando Furioſo of Signor Lewis Arioſto, " adorn'd with Cuts, and reviſed with the utmoſt care, " with Notes upon every Canto, and the Argument " of each Canto in Stanza's by Signor Livio Coraldo; " to which are added five Canto's, which were never " publiſhed in the former editions." The year before Franceſco Sanſovino publiſhed at Venice in 4to. Annotationi ſopra l'Orlando Furioſo di Lodovico Arioſto (26). i. e. " Annotations upon the Orlando Furioſo of " Lewis Arioſto." Several other Commentaries were likewiſe written upon this Poem; among which was La Spoſitione di Simon Fornari ſopra l'Orlando Furioſo dell' Arioſto: i. e. " The Expoſition of Simon Fornari " upon the Orlando Furioſo of Arioſto," publiſhed at Florence in 8vo, 1549; and the ſecond part of it in 1550. There was an edition of this Poem publiſh'd at Venice by Girolamo Porro in 4to, in 1568 and 1584. There was a French tranſlation of Arioſto's Orlando Furioſo in proſe, publiſhed at Lyons in 8vo, 1582. There was likewiſe a Continuation of the ſame Poem, in French proſe, publiſhed in the ſame city the year following in 8vo, " containing the Death of the moſt magnanimous and " moſt valiant Rogero, the Flower of the Paladins " of France, and all the great Succeſſes, high and " noble Attempts propoſed, but not mentioned by the " divine Arioſto; with allegorical Explanations upon " every Canto for the eaſier underſtanding of them, " by which we may comprehend the effects of vice " and virtue: Tranſlated from the Italian into French " by William Chappuys." The title of it is as follows: La Suite de Roland Furieux, contenant la Mort du tres-magnanime & tres-vaillant Roger, Fleur des Paladins de France, & tous les grands Succez, hautes & genereuſes Entrepinſes propoſees, & non fournies par le divin Arioſte: Avec les Sommaires allegoriques ſur chacun Diſcours pour une plus facile Intelligence d'iceux, par leſquels l'on peut comprendre les effects du Vice & de la Virtu. Miſe d'Italien en François par Gabriel Chappuys Tourangeau. It was tranſlated into Engliſh by Sir John Harington about the year 1591, and dedicated it to Queen Elizabeth. The third edition was publiſhed at London in fol. 1634, with the following title: ORLANDO FURIOSO in Engliſh Heroical Verſe, by Sir John Harington of Bathe Knight. Newo thirdly reviſed and amended; with the Addition of the Author's Epigrams. This edition contains I. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Queen's Majeſtie. II. A Preface or rather a brieſe Apologie of Poetry and of the Author and Tranſlator of this Poem. III. An Advertiſement to the Reader before he reads this Poem of ſome things to be obſerved as well in the ſubſtance of this Worke, as alſo in the ſetting forth thereof, with the uſe of the Pictures, Table, and Annotations to the ſame annexed. IV. The firſt XXIII Cantos or Bookes of Orlando, ending with Orlando's falling mad. V. The other XXIII Cantos of Orlando Furioſo, in which he recovered his wits; ending with Bradamant's Marriage. VI. A brieſe and ſummarie Allegorie of Orlando Furioſo, not unpleaſant nor unprofitable for thoſe that have read this Poem. The Tranſlator concludes this Allegory with the following words: " Thus much I thought good to note " of the generall Allegorie of the whole Worke, to " give you occaſion to ruminate, as it were, and bet- " ter to digeſt that, which you before in reading, did " perhaps ſwallow whole down without chewing. Now " methinke it is even high time to take away, and " bid much good do it you, or at leaſt no harme do " it you. Or if you thinke it will for all this, the " beſt phyſicke I can preſcribe you, is a leaf or two " of St. Matthewes Goſpel, or of St. Pauls Epiſtles, and " it ſhall reſtore you to your perfect health." VII. The Life of Arioſto briefly and compendiouſly gathered out of ſundrie Italian Writers by Sir John Harington. VIII. An exact and neceſſary Table &c. with the principal Tales in Orlando Furioſo, that may be read by themſelves. To this edition are added the moſt elegant and wittie Epigrams of Sir John Harington Knt. digeſted into four Bookes.

(26) Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 22. pag. 84. edit. de Paris 1733.

[F] He was employed in embaſſies and the management of affairs in ſeveral parts of Italy] When Pope Julio II intended to make war upon the Duke of Ferrara, Cardinal Hippolito's brother, Arioſto was choſen as a proper perſon to go upon an embaſſy to him, in order to pacify his reſentments and divert his deſign. He tranſacted this affair with ſo much ſucceſs, that he raiſed himſelf a prodigious character at his return. However it was not long after this, that the ſame Pope, who was a man of a reſtleſs ſpirit, and much more inclined to military affairs than to the practice of the mild and pacific precepts of the Goſpel, engaged in a new war againſt the Duke, and ſent a conſiderable body of ſoldiers to paſs the River Po, which runs by Ferrara. They were met by the Duke's forces upon the river; and Arioſto acted with ſuch reſolution, that he took one of the enemy's ſhips, which was the largeſt and beſt ſtored with proviſion and ammunition of all the fleet. But theſe armies being diſbanded, the Duke thought proper to ſend another Embaſſy in order to pacify the Pope; and every perſon avoiding this employment, knowing the violent and revengeful temper of Julio, Arioſto again undertook this commiſſion out of regard to his country, notwithſtanding the dangers, which attended it. For it was very unſafe in the time of war to go with ſo ſlight a guard; and the Pope's reſentment was inſupportable, whenever he thought proper to fix it upon any perſon. However Arioſto performed his journey, and preſented himſelf to the Pope; but finding by ſome ſecret intelligence, that his embaſſy would be to no manner of purpoſe, but expoſe him to the utmoſt danger, loſt all his intereſt with his patron [G]. After the death of Hippolito, he engaged in the ſervice of Alfonſo Duke of Ferrara, the Cardinal's brother, who ſhewed the utmoſt regard for him, and took a great delight in his converſation. He had ſeveral noble offers made him by Pope Leo X, and by many great Princes and Cardinals; but he refuſed to accept them out of the great love, which he had for liberty and an eaſy diſengaged manner of life (f). Signor Rolli in his notes upon the 3d Satyr of our Poet (g), obſerves, that the reaſon why he was not preferred by Pope Leo X, who was a great patron of letters, was as follows. This Pope had inherited from Julio II, a great averſion to Alfonſo Duke of Ferrara, and a ſtrong deſire to poſſeſs himſelf of that city. It happened afterwards that he had Modena delivered to him by the Emperor as a pledge for forty thouſand ducats; and he deſigned to unite it with Reggio, which he had already in his poſſeſſion, as well as with Parma and Placentia, and to give the perpetual government of them to his brother Julian, with the addition of Ferrara (b). This deſign of his was incompatible with any view of promoting Arioſto to the Cardinalſhip, ſince he was a ſubject and very dear to Alfonſo: and therefore if he had been made a Cardinal, he would not only have refuſed to agree to any ſcheme the leaſt injurious to his maſter, but with the advantages of that high preferment would have endeavoured to impede the Pope's deſigns againſt the Duke. It is no wonder therefore, that Leo X ſhould act as almoſt all the men of power have done in every age, by preferring his own ambition to the friendſhip and eſteem, which he had for Arioſto. Sanſovino informs us, that upon Pope Hadrian VI's ſucceſſion to the See of Rome, the Duke of Ferrara appointed him governor of Graffignana [H]; which poſt he executed with great ſucceſs. After his return home he ſpent the reſt of his life in retirement, except when he was employed by the Duke of Ferrara in managing his affairs at Rome; and he proſecuted his ſtudies in a houſe, which he had built for himſelf at Ferrara [I]. He tranſlated divers pieces out of French and Spaniſh into Italian; danger, he returned home thro' all the difficulties and hazards imaginable; and was highly eſteemed and honoured for his great courage and reſolution in this affair.

(f) Idem, ibid. pag. 418.

(g) Publiſhed at London in 1716, among the reſt of Arioſto's Satyrs, Elegies, and Sonnets, p. 56.

(b) See Guicciardin. lib. 12.

[G] He loſt all his intereſt with his patron.] When the Duke of Ferrara's ſucceſs had eſtabliſhed his affairs in the utmoſt ſecurity and tranquillity, Arioſto returned with vigour to his ſtudies, and proceeded in the compoſition of his Poem, which, from what he had already written of it, raiſed a great expectation in the publick. But of a ſudden he unfortunately fell under the Cardinal's diſpleaſure, by refuſing to attend him to Hungary. However Hippolito, out of regard to his merit, would not openly diſgrace him, tho' Arioſto had enemies enough, who prompted the Cardinal to uſe the utmoſt rigour towards him. Our Poet finding this, was ſo greatly diſcouraged, that he diſcontinued writing for many years. And to aggravate his misfortune, a perſon, who took the opportunity of the Cardinal's neglect of him, engaged him in a very expenſive and fatiguing law-ſuit about an eſtate of his; for undoubtedly, ſays Sir John Harington (27), the clattering of armour, the noiſe of great ordinance, the ſound of trumpet and drumme, the neighing of horſes, do not ſo much trouble the ſweete Muſes, as doth the brabling of Lawyers, the paltering of Attorneys, and the civil war, or rather moſt uncivil diſagreeing of forſworne jurors. This interruption of Arioſto with regard to writing continued fourteen years, till the Cardinal's death, when he was taken into favour by the Duke of Ferrara. He mentions himſelf the circumſtance of his falling under the Cardinal's diſpleaſure, in the following verſes:

(27) Life of Arioſto, p. 417.

A me per eſſer ſtato contumace
Di non voler Agria veder ne Buda,
Che ſi ritoglia il ſuo gia non mi ſpiace.

And again afterwards,

Che ſenza fede, & ſenz' amor mi nome
E che dimoſtri con parole e cenni
Ch' in odio e ch' in diſpetto habbia il mio nome.
E queſto fu cagion ch' io mi ritenni
Di non gli comparir inanzi mai
Dal dì ch' indarno ad eſcuſar mi venni,
Ruggier s' a la progenie tua mi fai
Si poco grato & nulla mi preſvaglio
Che gli altri goſti e il tuo valor cantai
Che debbo far io, qui poi ch' io non vaglio
Smembrar ſu la forcina in aria ſtarne
Ne ſo a ſparvier, ne a can metter guinzaglio.

He tells us afterwards, that he choſe an eaſy and ſedentary manner of life, rather than the fatigues of travel.

Et piu mi piache di poſer le poltre
Membra, che di vantarle, ch' a gli Scithi
Sien ſtate, a gli Indi, a gli Ethiopi & oltre.

He expreſſes his fondneſs for his own country in his Satyr, where he ſays:

Da me ſteſſo mi tol chi mi remove Da la mia terra, e fuor non ne potrei
Viver contento ancor ch' in grembo a Giove.

[H] Upon Pope Hadrian VI's ſucceſſion to the See of Rome, the Duke of Ferrara appointed him Governor of Graffignana.] Sir John Harington tells us (28), that he was employed, tho' a little againſt his will, as a Lieutenant or High-Sheriff in the county of Graffignana, which was then full of factions and diviſions. Arioſto acted in this poſt with ſo much reſolution and addreſs, that he reduced the country to a ſtate of abſolute tranquillity, and gained himſelf a great character by his conduct, which endeared him to thoſe of a ſuperior rank, and procured him the higheſt reverence among the lower orders of the people. The robbers themſelves had a great awe of his virtue, as appeared by an accident, which happened to him, while he was Governor there. For as he rid one day attended with five or ſix horſemen in one of the moſt licentious and diſorderly parts of the country, he was obliged to paſs near Rhodea by a company of armed men, who lay diſperſed in the ſhade, at a time when by means of a conteſt between two conſiderable men of that country, whoſe names were Domenico Morotto and Philippo Pacchione, there were daily outrages committed upon the paſſengers. So that Arioſto was under an apprehenſion of being attacked by the men, who lay thus in ambuſh. But as ſoon as he had paſſed by them, the chief of that company demanded of the ſervant, who rode laſt, what his maſter's name was, and hearing it, he ran after him immediately armed as he was. Arioſto ſtop'd ſhort, being doubtful for what purpoſe he came. But when the man came nearer him, he begg'd his pardon for not paying his compliments to him as he paſſed by. He told him likewiſe, that he was Philippo Pacchione, and deſired the honour of his acquaintance, and profeſſed, that he was entirely at his command in all reſpects (29).

(28) Pag. 419.

(29) Sir John Harington, pag. 419.

[I] Proſecuted his ſtudies in a houſe, which he had built for himſelf at Ferrara.] He had a garden adjoining

Italian; and wrote beſides his Orlando Furioſo ſeveral Satyrs, which are ſtill highly eſteemed by the beſt judges, as Monſieur de la Monnoye obſerves (i), tho' Mr. Baillet inſinuates, that they are now abſolutely diſregarded. We have five Comedies of his [K], which the Duke was ſo extremely pleaſed with, that he built a large and magnificent ſtage in the Hall at Ferrara for the repreſentation of them, and made ſeveral noble preſents to him on account of his admirable compoſitions (k). He deſired Arioſto to tranſlate the Mænechmi of Plautus into Italian, which he performed with great ſucceſs; and all his other Comedies were frequently acted, and generally by perſons of the beſt quality; ſo that Ferdinand of Eſt, who was afterwards Marquis of Maſſa, when the Lena was firſt repreſented, ſpoke the Prologue in public, in order to do honour to the Comedy (l). While Arioſto was compoſing his Orlando Furioſo, he roſe very early, ſometimes at one or two a clock in the morning, when he lodged at his friends houſes, as well as when he was at home, and continued to write as long as he found himſelf in the proper diſpoſition for it. He uſed to read his verſes to his friends and the Ladies of his acquaintance, joining to it, which was the uſual ſcene of his meditations and compoſitions in Poetry. He was aſked, why he had not built his houſe in a more magnificent manner, ſince he had given ſuch noble deſcriptions of ſumptuous palaces, beautiful porticos, and pleaſant fountains in his Orlando Furioſo. He replied, that words were cheaper laid together than ſtones. Upon his door he inſcribed a verſe, which, ſays Sir John Harington (30), few of the builders of this latter Age can truly write, or at leaſt if they could, I would ſay, their houſes were ſtrongly built indeed, for more than the third heir;

(i) See his Notes upon Baillet's Jugemens ſur les Poetes, tom. 4. Part 1. n. 1261. p. 140. ed. Amſterd. 1725.

(k) Sir John Harington's Life of Arioſto, pag. 418.

(l) Idem, ibid.

(30) Pag. 421.

Parva, ſed apta mihi, ſed nulli obnoxia, ſed non Sordida, parta meo ſed tamen ære domus.

That is, according to Harington's tranſlation;

" This houſe is ſmall, but fit for me, but hurtful
" unto none,
" But yet not ſluttiſh, as you ſee, yet pay'd for
" with mine owne."

He made alterations in it very frequently; and he ſaid of himſelf, that he uſed his houſe as he did his verſes, mend them ſo much, that he quite deſtroyed the beauty of them. For indeed, ſays the Author quoted above, as a tree planted in an orchard, if it be once or twice well pickt and pruned, it doth further the growing of it; but if a man be ever fidling about it, it will looſe the naturall beauty, and hardly keepe life. So it is with one of his Stanzas or Staves, as we call them, at the firſt conceiving of it, one may mend that which he ſhall ſodainly ſet downe; but if one will ſtill be turning and wreſting of it, he may make it leeſe the grace it had at firſt. But whatever fault he might find in his own verſes, it is certain, that they were univerſally admired in Italy, and procured him a great many noble preſents from the Duke of Ferrara, Pope Leo X, Cardinal Farneſe, Cardinal Bibiena, the Marquiſs of Vaſto, and ſeveral other perſons of the higheſt quality.

[K] His five Comedies.] They are intitled I. La Caſſaria in proſe and verſe, printed in 1536; II. La Lena, in proſe and verſe; III. Il Negromante, in proſe and verſe; IV. Gli Suppoſiti, in proſe and verſe; V. La Scolaſtica, in verſe. Bumaldi in his Minerv. Bonon. ſive Anadem. Civ. Bonon. Script. Illuſtr. (31) tells us, that all theſe Comedies are written in an excellent manner. Mr. de Balzac in his Treatiſe of the Character of Comedy aſſerts (32), that there is in Arioſto's Comedies, as well as in thoſe of Terence, a juſt medium between the ſublime and low ſpecies of writing; and that it was this pure, elegant, and agreeable manner, which was ſo well practiſed and ſo highly admired among the ancients. The ſame Critic likewiſe in the nineteenth Letter of his fourth book to Chapelain obſerves, that he was not ſatisfied with Father Pallavicini, afterwards Cardinal, upon Arioſto's Comedies, and that he did not underſtand that Grande Poſitivo in what he aſſerted. He adds, that he did not think his Epic Poem ſuperior in its kind to his Comedies; and that with regard to regularity there was no compariſon between them. Tho' all his Comedies were received by the publick with great applauſe, yet we are informed by Paulus Jovius (33), that the Suppoſiti had the advantage over the reſt; and that if we conſider the invention and variety of wit and humour in it, it will not be found inferior to any one of Plautus's. Ludovico Riccoboni in his Hiſtoire du Theatre Italien printed at Paris in 1728, p. 145 & ſeq. tells us, that our Poet publiſhed theſe five Comedies, four of which were at firſt printed in proſe, and afterwards turned into verſe by the Author. With regard to the Scolaſtica, he wrote it in verſe as far as the third Scene of the fourth Act, and it was finiſhed afterwards by his brother Gabriel. Our Poet was the firſt, who made uſe of Verſo Sdrucciolo for the comic Theatre. That kind of verſe conſiſts of ten ſyllables. His deſign evidently was to approach as near as poſſible to common converſation. His Comedies ſhew evident marks of his great genius. The comic humour appears every where to ſuch advantage, as gives an exquiſite pleaſure to the reader. Riccoboni (34) had a deſign to introduce upon the Italian Stage ſome of the beſt Comedies which were written in the ſixteenth Century, when Comedy was at the height in Italy, and ſubſiſted without the aid of the Harlequin and other burleſque perſonages now eſſential to the Theatre there. He thought it neceſſary to chooſe an Author, whoſe name would give a ſanction to his attempt of reforming the ſtage: and therefore fixed upon the Scolaſtica of Arioſto. He retrenched the character of the Monk, and ſubſtituted another in the room of it, and by altering about an hundred and fifty verſes in the Play, he render'd it fit for the ſtage, without leaving any thing in it that might claſh with good manners. He exhibited it at Venice for the firſt time; and the name of Arioſto was ſufficient to draw a prodigious number of ſpectators together; but the misfortune was, that all the people did not know that Arioſto had written any Comedies. Before it was begun to be acted Riccoboni was informed, that they had got a notion, that the Play was taken from the Orlando Furioſo of that Author. The Comedy was opened; but the ſpectators not ſeeing Angelica, Orlando, Bradamante, and other perſons appear, they began to be uneaſy, and in ſhort Riccoboni was obliged to drop the curtain at the end of the fourth Act. They had prepared themſelves, as he obſerves (35), for the pleaſure of ſeeing the adventures of Orlando Furioſo, and were exaſperated at the diſappointment. If the piece had not been given out under the name of its Author, they would have attended to it with more patience, and perhaps have been ſenſible of the beauties of it. But the misfortune of this ill ſucceſs made ſo great an impreſſion upon Riccoboni, that he informs us (36), that he was almoſt thrown into a fit of ſickneſs by it. We find in his book (37) a very agreeable ſtory relating to Arioſto. His father one day was in an extreme paſſion with him, and talked with a prodigious ſeverity to him for a long while. The ſon heard him with great attention without making any anſwer; and they parted at laſt without Arioſto's ſpeaking one word to his father to excuſe himſelf with regard to the reproaches, which were made to him. When his father was gone, Arioſto's brother aſked him what was the reaſon, that he did not ſay any thing to his father in his defence. He replied, that he was then actually compoſing a Comedy, and had ſtopt ſhort at a Scene, in which an old man was reprimanding his ſon. That when his father began to ſpeak, the thought came into his head to obſerve him with the utmoſt attention, in order that he might draw the repreſentation after nature; ſo that he only regarded his tone of voice, and geſtures, and expreſſions, without concerning himſelf about his defence.

(31) Pag. 151, 152.

(32) Pag. 38 of the Holland edition, and p. 511 of the 2d volume in fol.

(33) Elogior. num. 84.

(34) See his Hiſt. du Theatre Italien pag. 86, 87.

(35) Pag. 146.

(36) Pag. 87.

(37) Pag. 147.

acquaintance, who were extremely charmed with the agreeableneſs of his converſation (m). He had an excellent manner of reading [L], which gave a peculiar ſpirit to every thing that he pronounced. Titian made an admirable portrait of him. He was honoured with the lawrel by the hands of the Emperor Charles V at Mantua in the year 1533 (n). He was extremely fond of retirement and liberty; upon which account Sanſovino tells us, he would neither marry nor become a Prieſt, knowing the mutability of his own diſpoſition, and being apprehenſive of engaging in a ſtate which he might afterwards repent of in vain. He loved a plain and frugal manner of life, without any inclination to the luxury and delicacies of banquets; ſo that he tells us in one of his Poems, that he was a proper man to have lived in the world, when acorns were the common food of mankind (o). He was of a very amorous diſpoſition, which he indulged in ſeveral inſtances [M]. He had two natural ſons [N]. He was affable, eaſy, and condeſcending in his behaviour, but ſhewed a proper degree of ſpirit and reſolution, whenever he was ill treated even by perſons of the higheſt rank. He was averſe to travelling abroad [O]. He enjoyed the friendſhip of the moſt eminent men of learning of his time, who had a great eſteem for him, and he mentions them with prodigious reſpect in the laſt Canto of his Orlando Furioſo. In his Satyrs likewiſe he pays a compliment to his friends Bembo, Sadolet, Paulus Jovius,

(m) Idem, ibid.

(n) Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

(o) Sir John Harington's Life of Arioſto, pag. 418.

[L] He had an excellent manner of reading.] The Duke of Ferrara, whenever he was at leiſure, took a great pleaſure in hearing Arioſto read his own works and thoſe of other Authors, being charmed with his agreeable pronunciation. Our Poet was always extremely vexed, if he heard his own writings repeated with an ill grace and accent; a remarkable inſtance of which was as follows. As he was paſſing one day by a Potter's ſhop, it happened, that the Potter was ſinging a Stanza out of the Orlando Furioſo, probably the thirty ſecond Stanza of the firſt Book, where Rinaldo calls upon his horſe to tarry for him;

Ferma, Baiardo mio; deh ferma il piede,
Che l'eſſer ſenza te troppo mi noce. &c.
That is,
"Hollo, my boy, holla, (Renaldo cride)
"The want of thee annoy'd me much to day.
"But Bayard will not let his maſter ride,
"But takes his heels, and faſter goes away."

But he pronounced theſe verſes in ſo bad a manner, that Arioſto being really, or pretending to be in an exceſſive paſſion, with a little ſtick, which he had in his hand, broke ſeveral of the pots, which ſtood expoſed to ſale. The Potter expoſtulated with him in very ſevere terms for injuring a poor man, who had never done him the leaſt harm in his whole life. Yes, replied our Poet, I have not yet ſufficiently revenged myſelf upon you, for the injury, which you have done me to my face; for I have broken but half a dozen pots of yours, which are not worth ſo many half-pence; but you have ſpoiled a fine Stanza of mine, which was worth a conſiderable ſum of gold (39).

(39) Sir John Harington, pag. 420, 421.

[M] He was of a very amorous diſpoſition, which he indulged in ſeveral inſtances.] He was known to have been familiar with one Alexandra; tho' ſome affirmed, that he was privately married to her, but durſt not acknowledge it for fear of loſing ſome ſpiritual preferments, which he held, and which were incompatible with a married ſtate. However both the ſons, whom he had by her, were accounted illegitimate. There was likewiſe a beautiful Lady, whoſe name was Genevra, to whom he paid his addreſſes, but with what ſucceſs, is not certain. He fell in love with a Lady, (whether this Genevra or not, is unknown,) at Florence, in the houſe of his friend Niccolo Veſpucci, to whom ſhe was related. Sanſovino tells us, that he wrote a Sonnet upon her in the year 1513, which begins thus;

Non ſo s'io potrò ben chiuder in verſi.

He found her one day dreſſing a coat like a ſuit of armour for one of her ſons, who was to be preſent at a publick ſhew on Midſummer Eve; upon which occaſion he made that compariſon in the fifty fourth Stanza of the twenty fourth book of the Orlando Furioſo concerning the wound, which Zerbino Prince of Scotland had received of Mandricardo:

The Prince ſo eager was, he felt no ſmart,
Yet ran the blood out of his breſt amaine,
And of his armour all the former part,
With crimſon ſtreame of blood it did diſtaine.
So have I ſeene her hand, that to mine heart
Hath bene a cauſe of anguiſh great and paine,
When ſhe a purple ſeame or flowre hath drawne,
In ſilver kirtle or in ſleeve of lawne.

The beginning of the 16th and 35th Canto's of his Orlando ſhews likewiſe that he was ſubject to love, but that his love was fixed upon women of modeſty and merit. He begins his 16th Canto thus:

Great paines in love full many men have found,
Of which my ſelf have prov'd ſo great a part,
As by my ſkill ſome good may hap redound,
To ſuch as are leſſe ſkilful in this Art.
Wherefore what I affirme with judgement ſound,
To breed juſt cauſe of leſſe or greater ſmart,
Believe what I ſet downe for your behooſe,
Probatum eſt, I know 'tis true by proof.

I do affirm, and have, and ever ſhall,
That he, that binds himſelf in worthy bands,
Although his miſtreſſe ſhew him grace but ſmall,
Although he find no favour at her hands,
Sharp words, coy looks, ſmal thanks, hope none at all,
Though more and more aloofe from him ſhe ſtands,
Yet ſo his heart and thoughts be highly plac'd,
He muſt not mourn, no though he die diſgrac'd.

Sir John Harington having mentioned this irregularity in our Poet's conduct, with regard to his liberties with the women, concludes with theſe words: Now though I dare not excuſe him in this ſo great a fault, yet partly in reſpect he was unmarried, partly becauſe theſe white Divels have ſuch a tempting power upon the earth, methinks I ſhould eaſily obtaine a pardon for him of all you that read this ſhort Diſcourſe of his life.

[N] He had two natural ſons.] Their names were John Baptiſta and Virginio; the former of whom went into the army, and the latter applied himſelf to learning, as Arioſto ſays in his Poem to Bembo;

Bembo, io verrei come è il commun diſio
De' ſolleciti padre veder l'artè,
Che fanno lo huom tutte in Virginio mio.

He reſigned a great part of his benefices to Virginio, and left both his ſons in very good circumſtances (40).

(40) Sanſovino, Vita di M. L. Arioſto tratta dall' opere ſue medeſime.

[O] He was averſe to travelling abroad.] He was extremely fearful of the water; and therefore when he went out of a ſhip, he let others go before, uſing that ſaying De puppe noviſſimus exi. He expreſſes his averſion to travelling out of his own country in one of his Satyrs:

Che vuol andare a torno, a torno vada
Vegga Inghilterra, Ungheria, Francia e Spagna,
A me piace habitar la mia contrada,
Viſta ho Thoſcana, Lombardia, Romagna,
Quel monte che divide, e quel che ſerra
Italia, e un mare el' altro che la bagna.

Queſto

Jovius, Cavallo, Bloſio, Molza, Vida, and Tibaldeo. His charity and integrity were very exemplary [P]. His conſtitution was infirm, ſo that he was obliged to make uſe of the Phyſicians the greateſt part of his life (p). He bore his laſt ſickneſs with uncommon reſolution and ſerenity, affirming that he was willing to die on many accounts, and particularly becauſe he found, that the greateſt Divines were of opinion that we ſhall know each other in the other world. And he obſerved to thoſe who were with him, that many of his friends were departed, whom he deſired to viſit, and that he thought every moment tedious till he gained that happineſs (q). He died at Ferrara the ſixth of July 1534, according to Sanſovino, or the eighth of July 1533, according to Sir John Harington (r), being fifty nine years of age. He was interred in a very noble manner in the church of the Benedictine Monks, who, contrary to their cuſtom, attended his funeral. He had a buſt erected to him (s), and an epitaph inſcribed upon his tomb, which was written by himſelf, and begins thus, Ludovici Arioſti humantur oſſa &c. (t). His death was regretted by all who were acquainted with him, and particularly by the Men of Letters, who honoured his memory in Latin and Italian Poems (u). Nicolo Eugenico compoſed a Sonnet in praiſe of him, which we ſhall give the reader [Q]. Sign. Rolli in his Remarks upon M. Voltaire's Eſſay on the Epic Poetry of the European Nations (x), tells us, that Homer's ſteps have been unqueſtionably followed by Virgil, Arioſto, Milton and Taſſo; and he obſerves, that Arioſto is ſo highly eſteemed in Italy, that the Venetian Gondeliers have our Poet and Taſſo almoſt by heart. But he admires, that he ſhould be omitted in Mr. Voltaire's Eſſay [R].

(p) Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

(q) Sir John Harington, ubi ſupra, p. 422.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Idem, ibid.

(t) Sanſovino, ubi ſupra.

(u) Idem, ibid.

(x) Pag. 5.

Mr.

Queſto mi baſta, il reſto della terra
Senza mai pagar l'hoſte, andro cercando
Con Tolomeo, ſia il mondo in pace o in guerra.

That is,

" Who liſt to ride about, about may ride;
" See England, Hungary, and France, and Spain;
" I love in mine owne country ſtill to bide,
" In viewing which I ſure have tane ſome paine,
" Thoſcan, Romagna, Lombardie, beſide
" The hills that Italie cloſe and divide
" Sufficeth me; the reſt of all the maine
" With Ptolomy to ſearch and ev'ry coaſt,
" In peace or warre, and never pay mine hoſt."

[P] His charity and integrity were very exemplary.] His beneficence was very extenſive; and he had a peculiar regard for his mother, whom he treated with the utmoſt reſpect in her old age, and mentions frequently in his Satyrs and other writings; ſaying in one place,

L'eta di cara madre mi percuo te, de pieta il cuore.

His character for honeſty was ſo well known, that an old Prieſt, who had three or four rich benefices, and was under ſtrong apprehenſions leſt he ſhould be poiſoned by ſome of thoſe perſons, who were to ſucceed him in them, choſe our Poet before all his own relations and friends, to live with him, as he tells us himſelf;

Ma ne di vio, ne di piu giunti a lui
D'amicitia fidar unqua ſi volle;
Io di fuor tutti ſcielto vinco fui.

In ſhort Sir John Harington concludes his account of him in theſe words: His learning, his good behaviour, his honeſty, made him both beloved of all good men in his life, and bewailed of all honeſt men in his death; ſo as methink reading over his Life, I could find in my heart to wiſh (ſaving for ſome very few things),

Sic mihi contingat vivere, ſicque mori.

[Q] Nicolo Eugenico compoſed a Sonnet in praiſe of him, which we ſhall give the reader.] It is publiſhed at the end of the Venice edition of the Orlando Furioſo in 4to, 1562.

Porto gran tempo al mare altiero il corno
Il Mincio, e ſparſe le ſue arene d'oro
Mentre che 'l padre de Pierio Choro
Fece nel grembo ſuo dolce ſoggiorno.
Non men hor lietto, e d'egual ſpoglie adorno
Va 'l Po, ſpargando il nuovo ſuo teſoro,
Poi che cantando in lui Cigno canoro
Fa riſonar le ricche ſponde intorno.
L'un perche irriga Mantoa, donde uſcio
Quel ch' i fatti d'Enea piu che mortali
Con ſtil divino a tutto 'l mundo aprio,
L'altro Ferrara, onde i concetti eguali
Spiegò chi l'opre di Ruggier ſcoprio
Monſtrandole ad ogn' un chiare immortali.

That is,

" Long did the Mincio roll his golden waves
" O'er the wide lands in triumph to the ſea,
" While the great Father of the Muſes Choir
" Choſe on its flow'ry banks a calm retreat.
" Not in leſs triumph flows the rapid Po,
" While the ſweet Swan awakes his tuneful ſtrains,
" And bids the waves convey his charming ſong.
" The Mincio waſhes Mantua, which produc'd
" Immortal Virgil, who records the acts
" Of fam'd Æneas, and the riſe of Rome.
" The Po Ferrara viſits, whence aroſe
" Great Arioſto, who with equal force
" And equal fame Rogero's valour ſings."

[R] Admires, that Arioſto ſhould be omitted in Mr. Voltaire's Eſſay on Epic Poetry.] His words are as follow (41). But what is become of Arioſto in this Eſſay? In page 46 'tis ſaid to ſurvey all the Epic Writers in their reſpective countries from Homer down to Milton. Arioſto called by all Italy, Omero Ferrareſe, (the Homer of Ferrara), Divino Arioſto, (the divine Arioſto), a title given only to him and to Dante, the Italian Terence for his Comedies, the Italian Horace for his Satyrs, the Italian Tibullus for his Elegies. Arioſto was not worthy of M. V. his notice. He thinks, I ſuppoſe, that Orlando Furioſo is not an Epic Poem, but a Romance; he being perhaps one of thoſe, of whom Gravina ſays in the aforeſaid book (the ſecond book of his Ragione Poetica), they think Romances a different kind from Epic Poems, perſuaded from the name, which human caprice gives to things, more than from the knowledge of the things in themſelves. If Epic (ſays he) is nothing elſe but narrative, why ſhall not he be as much an Epic Poet, who relates in one volume many great exploits, as he, who relates but few of them, and ſuch as concern a principal one? If the Epic Poet is employed about poetical fictions as well as the Hiſtorian about true events, why ſhould not Arioſto, for example, be as much an Epic Poet, as Titus Livius an Hiſtorian; provided you would not exclude Livius from the number of the Hiſtorians, becauſe he relates all the deeds of the Romans, and put in his ſtead Saluſtius, becauſe he relates only the war of Jugurtha and the Conſpiracy? So far Gravina. Sign. Rolli is of opinion, that our Poet was the greateſt of all the moderns of that nation; and he obſerves that tho' there never was ſo long a Poem as Orlando Furioſo, yet he never heard of any perſon, that read it even in tranſlations, who did not regret, that it was no longer (42). And whereas Monſr. Voltaire had aſſerted in his Eſſay (43), that the Virtuoſi in Italy have diſputed for a long while, and ſtill conteſt which of the two, Arioſto or Taſſo, deſerves the precedency; our Critic anſwers (44), that in this diſpute there were ſo few on the ſide of Taſſo, that it was over at the very ſtarting of it. It is enough to let Mr. Voltaire know that the name of Divino, commonly given to Arioſto, was never given to Taſſo; from whence our Author may argue

(41) Remarks upon M. Voltaire's Eſſay, &c. pag. 32.

(42) Ibid. pag. 28.

(43) Pag. 89. edit. 1727.

(44) Remarks, &c. p. 53.

Mr. Dryden likewiſe in the Dedication of his Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneis (y), tells us, that with all his faults he muſt be acknowledged a great Poet.

(y) Pag. 416. vol. 2. edit. London 1730, in 8°.

gue the National Taſte. Monſr. Voltaire having obſerved (45), that "every where elſe the chiefeſt exception, that men of underſtanding take to Taſſo, is that of having too much of Arioſto in him;" Sign. Rolli replies (46), that in Italy the chiefeſt exception taken to Taſſo would be his having too little of Arioſto in him; and every reader may ſee it in reality.

(45) Pag. 89, 90.

(46) Pag. 54.

T.

ARISTANDER, a famous Soothſayer under Alexander the Great, was of a city of Aſia, where almoſt every body was born with diſpoſitions to prophecy (a). He followed Alexander to the conqueſt of Perſia, and gained a wonderful influence over this Monarch [A] by the good ſucceſs of his art [B]. He had already had the ſame employment at the court of King Philip, and it was he who explained better than his brethren the dream that this Prince had after having married Olympias. He dreamed that he put upon the

(a) TELMESSUS. See the article of it. Plutarch, Arrian, Lucian, Clemens of Alexandria, and ſeveral others, obſerve that Ariſtander was of this city.

[A] He gained a wonderful influence upon Alexander the Great.] It is certain, there was no Soothſayer in the Macedonian army, that had ſo much reputation and authority as Ariſtander; Peritiſſimus vatum (1); i. e. "A moſt ſkilfull Prophet." Cui maxima fides habebatur (2); i. e. "who was in the greateſt credit." Cui tum plurimum credebatur ex vatibus (3). "Who "at that time was more believed than any of the "other Prophets." It is alſo very evident that Alexander was greatly ſuperſtitious. Erat non intactus ea ſuperſtitione mentis (4). i. e. "He was not untouched "with that ſuperſtition of mind." Superſtitionis potens non erat (5). i. e. "He was a ſlave to ſuperſtition." Hence it is eaſy to conclude that Ariſtander had power enough over him. This Prince, as Quintus Curtius obſerves, had given up his faith to him. Qui poſt Darium victum ariolos & vates conſulere deſierat, rurſus ad ſuperſtitionem humanarum gentium ludibria devolutus, Ariſtandrum, CUI CREDULITATEM SUAM ADDIXERAT, exploraré eventum rerum ſacrificiis jubet (6). It was with him that he ſhut himſelf up when he wanted to have the Gods propitious to him in the grand criſes of his affairs; it was with him, I ſay, that he ſhut himſelf up, to execute the moſt myſterious and ineffable ceremonies of religion. We learn this from Plutarch, where he is relating the preparations for the battle of Arbela. Ἀλέξανδρος δὲ τῶν Μακεδόνων ἀναπαυομένων, αὐτὸς πρὸ τῆς σκηνῆς μετὰ τοῦ μάντεως Ἀριστάνδρου διέτριβεν ἱερουργίας τινὰς ἀπορρήτους ἱερουργούμενος καὶ τῷ Φοίβῳ σφαγιαζόμενος (7). i. e. "Whilſt the Macedo- "nians were at reſt, Alexander being before his tent "with Ariſtander the ſoothſayer, performed ſome ſa- "cred rites, and ſacrificed to Apollo." Quintus Curtius ſays that on this occaſion, Alexander had much difficulty to get Ariſtander to him, to implore the ſuccour of the Gods; and that Ariſtander, in his ſacred veſtment, dictated to him the form of the prayers. Alexander non alias magis territus ad vota & preces Ariſtandrum vocari jubet. Ille in candida veſte verbenas manu præferens, capite velato precibus regi Jovem, Minervam, Victoriamque propitiantibus (8). We muſt not be ſurprized that this Prince ſet ſo great a value on his ſoothſayer; for he gained more by him than by any of his Generals. By his means, he filled his army with hopes and courage; which went a great way towards the ſucceſs of his enterpriſes. Do but conſider this Ariſtander, who in the height of the battle of Arbela, cloathed in white, and having the bays in his hand, tells the ſoldiers that he ſees an eagle over the head of Alexander, a ſure pledge of victory, and that they may ſee it as well as he. How much do you think that conduced to the victory, whether the ſoldier ſaw it or no? He would truſt to the eyes of the ſoothſayer; and if he ſaw nothing, he would impute it to his own eyes, or to the little time he had to look for ſuch an object in the middle of the air. Vates Ariſtander albâ veſte indutus, & dextrâ præferens lauream, militibus in pugnam intentis avem monſtravit, haud dubium victoriæ auſpicium. Ingens ergo alacritas ac fiducia paulo ante territos accendit ad pugnam (9). Plutarch obſerves, that Alexander lent a hand to his ſoothſayers (10); and for fear the event ſhould not anſwer the expectation of thoſe who confided in the promiſe of Ariſtander, that the city of Tyre ſhould be taken before the end of the month, ordered that the preſent day which was the laſt, ſhould for the future be reckoned only the 28th of the month. He had a mind to give his Prophet time, who nevertheleſs had not gone too far, for the city was taken on that very day, if we may believe Plutarch, an Author very much to be ſuſpected in theſe affairs! We muſt not forget that no body made ſo good a comforter to his maſter as our Ariſtander. He did not make uſe of a great deal of Rhetoric, to get him out of the moſt grievous troubles. A dream ſerved him for every thing. Alexander, being quite in deſpair, for having killed Clitus, was out of breath with groaning and crying. It was feared he would break his heart; his chamber door was broke open; he would hear no body; but as ſoon as Ariſtander puts him in mind of a dream that related to the death of Clitus, and repreſents to him that this unfortunate man was predeſtined to it a long time before, immediately the Prince was comforted. Ἀριστάνδρου δὲ τοῦ μάντεως ὑπομιμνήσκοντος αὐτὸν τὴν τι ὄψιν ὁ Ἴδιος περὶ τοῦ Κλείτου, καὶ τὸ σημεῖον ὡς δὴ πάλαι καθημαρμένον τοῦτον ἴδοξεν ἐκδιδόναι (11).

(1) Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 2.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 6.

(3) Idem, lib. 5. cap. 4.

(4) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 6.

(5) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 7.

(6) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 7.

(7) Plutarch. in Alexand. p. 683.

(8) Quint. Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 13.

(9) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 15.

(10) Διπορημένου αὐτὸν ἰδὼν ὁ βασιλεὺς καὶ συμφιλοτιμούμενος (the edition of Frankfort of 1620 has it συμφιλοτιμούμενον, which would quite alter the ſenſe) αἰεὶ τοῖς μαντεύμασιν, ἐκέλευε. Plutarch. in Alexandro, pag. 679. The King finding him in a perplexity, and always favouring prophecies, forbad, &c.

(11) Plutarch. in Alexandro, pag. 694.

[B] . . . . . by the good ſucceſs of his art.] Thoſe who meddle with predicting futurity, are happy, when they ſerve a Prince deſigned by Providence for great actions. A thouſand human reaſons lead them to predict all ſorts of proſperity at a venture, and they have the happineſs of ſeeing the event juſtify their raſhneſs. Ariſtander was in this caſe. He embaraſſed himſelf with predictions at all adventures; and Alexander, with his good fortune extricated him. The ſoothſayer had a great deal of reaſon to love ſuch a Conqueror; and the Conqueror was excuſable for confiding in a man that divined ſo juſtly. I was once ſurprized at Alexander's being ſuperſtitious; and ſoon after, I ſhould have been ſurprized if he had not been ſo: and I am aſtoniſhed that his regard for ſoothſayers was interrupted in the time of his higheſt proſperity (12). He could not be ignorant that his good fortune went a thouſand times farther than his wiſdom, or the force of his courage. Hence he muſt neceſſarily believe that an inviſible and moſt powerful virtue took a particular care of his affairs: he muſt, to ſpeak naturally, be always diſpoſed to gain the favour of this power, by all the expedients that the ſoothſayers ſuggeſted to him; the ſoothſayers, I ſay, whom he conſidered as the continual obſervers of the time, when fortune was in a good or bad humour, and as the arbitraters of the means of pleaſing and appeaſing this Goddeſs. We ſhould think it leſs ſtrange that certain Princes deſpiſe all the counſels of thoſe who preſide over their devotions; certain Princes, I ſay, who ſucceed in their enterprizes only in proportion to the human means they employ, to render them almoſt infallible, and who are worſted on all occaſions, when their prudence has not taken all neceſſary meaſures. They are the Antipodes of great Conquerors; but I acknowledge it is always a ſubject of great aſtoniſhment. Could ſuch a great mind as Alexander's repreſent God to it ſelf under the idea that is formed of him by ſuperſtition? He had lucid intervals in his ſuperſtition, as when he rejected one of his ſoothſayers, who came to divert him from an attack, for which he was making great preparations: "In the midſt of "ſuch preparations as theſe, ſays he, nothing can be "more troubleſome than a ſuperſtitious ſoothſayer!" "Si quis, inquit, arti tuæ intentum & exta ſpectan- "tem ſic interpellet, non dubitem quin incommodus ac "moleſtus videri tibi poſſit." Et cum ille ita prorſus futurum reſpondiſſet, "Cenſeſne, inquit, tantas "res non pecudum fibras ante oculos habenti, ullum ma- "jus eſſe impedimentum, quam vatem ſuperſtitione cap- tum (13)?

(12) See what was quoted from Q. Curtius, in citation (5).

the Queen's belly a ſeal, with the figure of a lyon engraven on it. The other Soothſayers adviſed him to obſerve the conduct of his wife more carefully [C]. But Ariſtander maintained that this dream ſignified that the Queen was with child of a ſon, who ſhould have the courage of a lyon (a). She was then big with child of Alexander. King Philip himſelf endeavoured to explain this dream, and underſtood nothing of it [D]. Though Ariſtander applied himſelf much to the underſtanding of dreams, and though he was one of the Authors who wrote the moſt learnedly upon this ſubject (b), he did not forbear exerciſing his art upon all ſorts of prodigies. If they came to tell him that a ſtatue of Orpheus had ſweated, he ſaid that it foretold that the Poets ſhould one day ſweat in ſinging the victories of Alexander (c). If a ſwallow came to trouble this Prince, and even ſettle upon his head, Ariſtander ſaid it was a ſign that there was a conſpiracy againſt the King; but that the conſpiracy ſhould be diſcovered (d). If during the preparations for the ſiege of Tyre, the blood which came from the bread of a Soldier aſtoniſhed the King, Ariſtander ſatisfies him. He told him, that ſince the blood came from the inward part of the bread, it was a fatal ſign to the city, which they beſieged (e). At another time, he interprets the ſignification of a crow, which had let ſomething drop upon the head of Alexander, and afterwards went and ſat upon a tower, where it was taken (f). The entrails of victims were alſo the Province of this great Soothſayer (g): He alſo explained the ſignification of the actions of men [E]. It is very probable therefore that we are to aſcribe to him a Book mentioned by Pliny, which is filled with

(a) Plutarchus, in Alexandr. init. pag. 665.

(b) Artemidor. lib. 1. cap. 33. pag. 30.

(c) Plutarch. in Alexandro, pag. 671.

(d) Arrian. lib. 1. cap. 8.

(e) Q. Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 2.

(f) Idem, ibid. cap. 6.

(g) Q. Curtius, lib. 7. cap. 7. Plutarchus, in Alexandro, pag. 679.

(13) Quint. Curt. lib. 9. cap. 4.

tum (13)? The confidence he had in his own good fortune hindred him ſometimes from ſubmitting to the advice of Ariſtander. He thought himſelf to be deſtined for great things, which is one of the moſt powerful ſprings of Providence; and ſo he raiſed the courage of this ſoothſayer. Rex juſſum conſidere felicitati ſuæ remiſit. Sibi enim ad alia gloriam concedere Deos (14).

(14) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 7.

If any one thinks theſe remarks too long, I muſt let him know that I had my reaſons for the length of them. I had a mind to diſburthen another Article, where there was too great an abundance of matter (15). People read four things with more pleaſure than one, tho' that one be ſhorter than the four. This has obliged me to ſcatter a good many things here and there, which naturally belong only to one ſubject. What muſt not one do, to accommodate one's ſelf to a taſtleſs age?

(15) That of Alexander the Great.

[C] He explained Philip's dream better than his brethren, who adviſed him to obſerve the conduct of his wife more carefully.] Their reaſon was at leaſt as good as Ariſtander's, which was this. One does not ſeal an empty box; and therefore the Queen muſt be with child, becauſe the King has dreamed that he ſealed her womb (16). The others reaſoned in the following manner: One does not ſeal a box, when there is no danger of its being opened: one ſeals it only when one diſtruſts thoſe who may come near it; therefore the Queen's box muſt be expoſed to theft, becauſe the King has dreamed that he ſealed it. The Lyon engraven upon the ſeal ſhews the neceſſity of a great precaution. This diſcovers the place to be beſieged, and that there are thoughts of ſurrendring; and that unleſs a ſtrong and couragious garriſon be ſoon ſent into it, the beſiegers will ſhortly enter. Cicero, to expoſe the interpreters of dreams, alledges the different explications, that were given in a caſe, which very much reſembled this. Parere quædam Matrona cupiens, dubitans eſſetne prægnans, viſa eſt in quiete obſignatam habere naturam: ad conjectorem retulit. Negavit eam, quoniam obſignata fuiſſet, concipere potuiſſe. Ac alter prægnantem eſſe dixit, nam inane obſignari nihil ſolere. Quæ eſt ars conjectoris, eludentis ingenio (17)? i. e. "A certain matron having "a mind to have a child, and queſtioning whether "ſhe was pregnant, ſeemed in a dream to have a "ſeal put upon her womb. She conſulted a Di- "viner, who ſaid ſhe could not conceive, becauſe "ſhe had been ſealed. But another affirmed ſhe "was pregnant, becauſe nothing that is empty "uſes to be ſealed. What is this art of divining "which is deceitfully ingenious?" But, ſome will ſay, Ariſtander had better ſucceſs; therefore he reaſoned better. I deny the conſequence: one may be happier in conjectures, without the leaſt ſhare of ability more; and might not both of them be in the right? Does chaſtity always attend pregnancy? Olympias might be a little like Julia, who ſaid, Nunquam niſi navi plena tollo vectorem (18). i. e. "I never take "up a paſſenger but when my ſhip is full." We ſhall ſee another explication of this dream preſently.

(16) Plutarch. in Alexandro.

(17) Cicer. de Divinat. lib. 2. cap. 70.

(18) Macrob. Saturnalium, lib. 2. cap. 5.

[D] King Philip endeavoured to explain this dream, and underſtood nothing of it.] We do not learn this from Plutarch or any other heathen Author, but from a Father of the church. I ſhall relate all that he ſays thereupon: for we learn ſeveral things from it. Philippus Macedo, nondum pater, Olympiadis uxoris naturam obſignaſſe viderat annulo. Leo erat ſignum: crediderat præcluſam genituram, opinor, quia Leo ſemel pater eſt. Ariſtodemus, vel Ariſtophon, conjectans immo nihil vacuum obſignari, filium & quidem maximi impetus portendi. Alexandrum qui ſciunt Leonem annuli cognoſcunt (19). Hence it appears, I, that the ſeal being applied in a dream to the natural parts of Olympias, made her huſband believe ſhe would have no children. There was ſome probability in this thought; and one might almoſt ſuſpect that Philip was one of thoſe European Pagans, who had read, as they ſay, the holy ſcripture; One might ſuſpect it, I ſay, if the ideas only of common ſenſe did not lead pretty naturally to the conjecture of this Prince: but it is certain that the word of God repreſents the ſterility of women under this idea. If the ſhutting up of the womb is uſed to expreſs the puniſhment, which God inflicted by cauſing barrenneſs (20), the opening of it repreſents the benediction, by which he cauſed this evil to ceaſe (21). II. It appears, that Tertullian made no reflection on this idea, which the ſcripture furniſhes, and which might ariſe naturally. He took notice only of the Lion, which was engraven on the ſeal: he believed that Philip founded his whole conjecture upon this Lion. Tertullian ſuppoſes wrong in this place, and concludes amiſs. It is falſe that a Lion is a father but once (22); and beſides would not a man who could believe that, be thought ridiculous in predicting from it, that he ſhould never have any children? he ought to conclude from it that he ſhould have one at leaſt. III. It appears, that Tertullian had forgotten the name of the ſoothſayer, who got the better of all the reſt: he does not know whether he ought to call him Ariſtophon, or Ariſtodemus. He had retained only the two firſt ſyllables of the name, and could not juſtly ſupply the reſt. In a word, he did not recollect the name of Ariſtander. IV. We ſee that he was very well ſatisfied with the explication of the dream. It is one of thoſe, which he alledges to prove the excellence of our ſoul. Let us conclude here with ſaying, that perhaps King Philip diſputed a long time againſt his ſoothſayers, for the explication which he gave to the dream; and that Ariſtander perhaps ſaid to him as a Muſician did on a like occaſion, God forbid that your Majeſty ſhould ever be ſo unhappy, as to underſtand theſe things better than I. Μὴ γένοιτό σοι οὕτως, ὦ βασιλεῦ, κακῶς, ἵνα ἐμοῦ ταῦτα βέλτιον εἰδῇς (23).

(19) Tertullian. de Animâ, cap. 46.

(20) Geneſ. xx. 18.

(21) Ibid. chap. 30. ver. 22. See alſo chap. 29. ver. 31.

(22) See the Notes of Rigaltius on this place of Tertullian.

(23) Plutarchus, de Diſcrim. Adulat. & Amici, pag. 67.

[E] He explained the ſignification of the actions of men.] For example, he predicted that Lyſimachus, one of Alexander's guards, would come to be King, but that it would not be without much difficulty (24). His reaſon was, that Lyſimachus not being able to follow his maſter on foot, who was well mounted, took hold of the horſe's tail, that he might not quit his maſter.

(24) Appianus, in Syriacis.

with prodigious events [F]. But with regard to the Books of Agriculture, of which Varro and Columella have ſpoken (b), I could eaſily believe they belonged to another ARISTANDER; notwithſtanding Varro has given the ſurname of Athenian to him, who made them. Our Ariſtander out-lived the King his maſter, and was the cauſe by his remonſtrances, that they thought in earneſt of interring him. I do not know if this particularity has been touched upon by any but Ælian, who mentions it in the laſt Chapter of the XIIth Book of his various Hiſtory.

(b) Father Hardouin, in his Index Auctorum, takes the Ariſtander of Varro and Columella, and that of Pliny to be the ſame.

maſter. He had the misfortune to have an accidental blow in the forehead by Alexander's lance, who was ſo kind as to make uſe of his diadem, for want of a bandage to the wound: and the diadem happened to be ſtained with blood. It was upon ſuch a foundation as this, that Ariſtander built his prediction.

[F] It is very probable that we are to aſcribe to him, a book mentioned by Pliny, which is filled with prodigious events.] Theſe are his words: Prodigio autem fiunt ex dulcibus acerba poma, aut dulcia ex acerbis: è caprifico fici, aut contra: gravi oſtento cum in deteriora mutantur ex olea in oleaſtrum, ex candida uva & fico in nigras: ut Laodiceæ, Xerxis adventu platano in oleam mutata: qualibus oſtentis ARISTANDRI apud Græcos volumen ſcatet, ne in infinitum habeamus: apud nos verò C. Epidii Commentarii, in quibus arbores locutæ quoque reperiuntur (25). i. e. "It is taken for "no leſs than a miracle if ſweet apples become ſour "or ſour turn to ſweet: and if a wild fig-tree pro- "duce figs, or on the contrary. It is looked up- "on as an ill omen, if an olive-tree degenerate into "the wild ſort, or a white grape or fig become black. "At Laodicea, upon the arrival of Xerxes, a plane- "tree was changed into an olive-tree. If any one "deſire to know more of ſuch miracles as theſe, I "refer him to ARISTANDER a Greek writer, whoſe "book abounds with them; for it would be endleſs "to recite them all; and to C. Epidius, one of our "own countrymen, in whoſe Commentaries he may "find alſo that trees have ſpoken." Compare with this, the paſſage of Cicero concerning the inhabitants of TELMESSUS, which is related in the article of that city (26), and admire the incredible readineſs of the ancient Heathens to multiply prodigies.

(25) Plinius, lib. 17. cap. 25.

(26) Note [C].

ARISTARCHUS, a Grecian Philoſopher, a native of Samos, is one of the firſt who maintained that the earth turns upon its own center, and that it every year deſcribes a circle around the Sun [A]. He invented one kind of Sun-dial (a). The time in which he lived is not well agreed upon: all that is certainly known is that he was not born after the death of Archimedes [B]. We have none of his works remaining, except a Treatiſe of the greatneſs and diſtance of the Sun and Moon, tranſlated into Latin, and commented upon (a) Vitruv. lib. 9. cap. 9.

[A] He is one of the firſt, who maintained that the earth turns about its centre, and deſcribes a circle around the Sun.] Sextus Empiricus, in ſpeaking of the hypotheſis of the earth's motion, plainly inſinuates, that Ariſtarchus had been the principal diſcoverer of it; for he names nobody but him. Οἵ γε μὲν τὴν τοῦ κόσμου κίνησιν ἀναίλουσιν, τὴν δὲ γῆν κινοῦσι δεξάσθαι φασίν, ὡς οἱ περὶ Ἀρίσαρχον τὸν Μαθηματικὸν, ὑ κωλύσεσθαι νοεῖν χρόνον (1). i. e. "They indeed who diſallowed the Motion "of the univerſe, but were of opinion that the earth "moved, as Ariſtarchus the Mathematician, were no "ways hindered from having a right notion of time." Plutarch, undertaking to clear up a thought of Plato, and aſking the queſtion whether that Philoſopher did not believe the Mobility of the earth, adds that this opinion was agreeable to that of Ariſtarchus and Seleucus, and that Ariſtarchus gave it out as an hypotheſis, and Seleucus as a poſitive aſſertion. Ὡς ὕστερον Ἀρίσαρχος καὶ Σέλευκος ἀπεδείκνυσαν· ὁ μὲν ὑποτιθέμενος μόνον· ὁ δὲ Σέλευκος, καὶ ἀποφαινόμενος (2). i. e. "As "Ariſtarchus and Seleucus afterwards ſhewed; the "one indeed only ſuppoſed it, but Seleucus abſolutely "affirmed it." Which is as much as to inſinuate to us, that Ariſtarchus was reckoned as the Inventor of that opinion. Archimedes inſinuates it to us in a more definitive manner. Theſe are his words: Ταῦτα δὲ ἐν ταῖς γραφομέναις παρὰ τῶν Ἀστρολόγων διαιρέσας Ἀρίσαρχος ὁ Σάμιος, ὑποθέσεών τινων ἐξέδωκεν γράψας, ἐν αἷς, ἐκ τῶν ὑποκειμένων συμβαίνει τὸν κόσμον πολλαπλάσιον εἶναι τοῦ νῦν εἰρημένου· ὑποτίθεται δὲ τοὺς μὲν ἀπλανῆ τῶν ἄστρων, καὶ τὸν ἥλιον μένειν ἀκίνητον· τὴν δὲ γῆν περιφέρεσθαι περὶ τὸν ἥλιον, κατὰ κύκλου περιφέρειαν, ὃς ἐστιν ἐν μέσῳ τῷ δρόμῳ κείμενος (3). That is, as Frederick Commandine has tranſlated it: Hæc igitur in iis quæ ab Aſtrologis ſcripta ſunt, redarguens Ariſtarchus Samius, poſitiones quaſdam edidit: ex quibus ſequitur mundum proximè dicti mundi multiplicem eſſe: ponit enim ſtellas inerrantes atque ſolem immobiles permanere; terram ipſam circumferri circa ſolem, ſecundum circumferentiam circuli, qui eſt in medio curſu conſtitutus. i. e. "Ariſtarchus of Samos refuting thoſe "things which are to be found in the writings of "the Aſtrologers, has advanced ſome poſitions: from "which it follows that the world, as it was juſt now "defined, is manifold: for he lays it down, that "the ſixt Stars and Sun remain unmoved; that the "earth itſelf is carried round the Sun in a circle, "which is placed in the centre of its courſe." The Copyiſts have probably falſified the paſſage of Plutarch, where we read, that Ariſtarchus maintained that Greece ought to proſecute for irreligion Cleanthes, who believed the Motion of the earth. Μόνον (εἶπεν) ὦ τἄν, μὴ κρίσιν ἡμῖν ἀσεβείας ἐπαγγείλῃς ὥσπερ Ἀρίσαρχος ἔφετο δεῖν Κλεάνθη τὸν Σάμιον ἀσεβείας προκαλεῖσθαι τοὺς Ἕλληνας, ὡς κινοῦντα τοῦ κόσμου τὴν ἑστίαν, ὅτι φαινόμενα σώζειν ἀνὴρ ἐπειρᾶτο, μένειν τὸν οὐρανὸν ὑποτιθέμενος. ἐξελίττεσθαι δὲ καγὼ λοξοῦ κύκλου τὴν γῆν ἅμα καὶ περὶ τὸν αὑτῆς ἄξονα δινουμένην (4). i. e. "Hark "ye (ſays he) don't bring us in guilty of impiety, "after the ſame manner as Ariſtarchus thought Cle- "anthes the Samian ought to be proſecuted by the "Greeks for a violation of their Religion, as hav- "ing removed the ſtability of the univerſe, becauſe "the man endeavouring to confirm the Phænomena "of the heavenly bodies by juſt reaſonings, laid it "down that the heaven remained at reſt, and that "the earth rolled by an oblique circle, and in the "mean time turned round its own axis." It ſeems to me as if the Copyiſts have tranſpoſed the names: It ſhould be read, Cleanthes thought that Greece ought to proſecute Ariſtarchus the Samian for irreligion, &c. It is the conjecture of Gaſſendus (5): it is a correction which Mr. Menage adopts as being quite certain. In verbis Plutarchi, ſays he (6), legendum omnino ὥσπερ Ἀρίσαρχον τὸν Σάμιον ἔφετο Κλεάνθης δεῖν ἀσεβείας προκαλεῖσθαι τοὺς Ἕλληνας. Amiot was not at all aware of the miſtake.

(1) Sextus Empiricus adverſus Mathemat. pag. 410. Mr. Menage upon Diogen. Laertius, lib. 8. num. 85. quotes this paſſage twice in the ſame page, the firſt time as from Sextus Empiricus, and the ſecond as from Pyrrho.

(2) Plut. in Quæſt. Plat. p. 1006. C.

(3) Archimedes, in Pſammite, pag. 449. apud Menagium in Diogenem Laertium, lib. 8. pag. 389.

(4) Plutarchus, de facie in Orbe Lunæ, pag. 922. F.

(5) Gaſſend. Phyſicæ. Sect. 2. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. 617. tom. 1. Oper.

(6) Menagius in Diogen. Laert. lib. 8. num. 85. pag. 389.

[B] The time in which he lived is not well agreed upon: all that is certainly known is that he was not born after the death of Archimedes.] The words which I have quoted (7) prove, that at the lateſt our Ariſtarchus could only be contemporary with Archimedes: but we know that Archimedes loſt his life when Syracuſe was taken by the Romans, in the firſt year of the 142d Olympiad, during the ſecond Punic War. Note that according to Plutarch, as quoted above, Timæus of Locris lived before Ariſtarchus; for the thought of Plato, which he endeavours to clear up, is found in Plato, as though Timæus had ſaid it in converſation. But ſince Plato was the Diſciple of this Timæus (8), and that after he had been in Egypt, it muſt be concluded, that if Plutarch has been exact as to time, Ariſtarchus flouriſhed after Plato. We know therefore, that he did not flouriſh after Archimedes, nor

(7) In the foregoing note citation (3).

(8) Cicero de Finib. lib. 5. cap. 29. and Tuſculan. lib. 1. fol. 248. A.

upon by Frederick Commandine, and publiſhed with Pappus's Explanations in 1572. Dr. Wallis publiſhed it in Greek, with Commandine's Latin Verſion, in 1688, and he has inſerted it in the third tome of his Mathematical Works, printed at Oxford, in 1699. The Syſtem of the World, which has appeared under his name, is the work of Roberval (b). We ſhall take notice (c) of a fault which has ſlipped into the text of Plutarch.

(b) See Menage on Diogen. Laertius book 8. num. 85. pag. 389.

(c) In the note [A], citation (4).

nor before Plato, and I do not believe that he can be eaſily fixed to any thing more exact. Blancanus has placed Ariſtarchus two Ages before Hipparchus, and has placed him an hundred years after the death of Alexander, that is to ſay, an hundred years after the first of the 114th Olympiad (9). He therefore thought that Ariſtarchus flouriſhed about the 89th Olympiad, a little after the birth of Plato. That does not agree with the paſſage of Plutarch, which I have cited. The opinion of Simler does not agree better therewith. That writer has made Ariſtarchus flouriſh under the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, which reached from the firſt year of the 79th Olympiad, to the laſt year of the 88th (10). Libertus Fromondus is ſtill wider from Plutarch's opinion, inſomuch as he does not know whether Ariſtarchus preceded or followed Pythagoras (11). I believe Voſſius (12) might have refuted that uncertainty by Plutarch's authority, if he had remembred the words which I have quoted. J. Stadius thought that Ariſtarchus ſurvived Archimedes; for he makes him flouriſh in the 144th Olympiad (13). Note that Vitruvius, in ſpeaking of ſome Mathematicians who had made diſcoveries, places Ariſtarchus in the firſt rank (14). If that were to be a rule, we muſt judge him to have preceded Philolaüs, and Archytas of Tarentum.

(9) Blancanus, in Mathematicorum Chronologia, ad calcem libri de Ariſtotelis locis Mathematicis, pag. 46 and 49.

(10) Simlerus, in Epitome Bibliothecæ Geſneri.

(11) Lib. Fromond. de Orbe Terræ immobili pag. 1. he named that book Anti-Ariſtarchus.

(12) Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. pag. 157.

(13) Joh. Stadius, in Pref. Tabularum Bergenſium, apud Voſſium, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 157.

(14) Vitruv. de Architect. lib. 1. cap. 1.

ARISTARCHUS, a celebrated Grammarian, was born in Samothracia, and for the place of his reſidence made choice of the city of Alexandria (a). He was much eſteemed by Ptolomy Philometor, who committed to him the education of his Son [A]. He applied himſelf exceedingly to criticiſm, and made a reviſal of Homer's Poems, with incredible exactneſs, but in a manner rather too magiſterial; for ſuch verſes as he did not like he

(a) Ἀλεξανδρεὺς μὲν ἦσαι, τὸ δὲ φύσει Σαμοθρᾴξ. Suidas, in Ἀριστάρχος.

[A] He was much eſteemed by Ptolomy Philometor, who committed to him the education of his ſon.] The words of Suidas plainly amount to that. Γέγονε, ſays he (1), κατὰ τὴν ρνς ὀλυμπιάδα, ἐπὶ Πτολεμαίου τοῦ Φιλομήτορος, ᾧ καὶ τὸν υἱὸν ἐπαίδευσεν. i. e. "He lived "in the 156th Olympiad, in the time of Ptolomy "Philometor, whoſe ſon he alſo educated." The Olympiad which he points out anſwers very well to the reign of this Ptolomy; but ſome will ſay, we don't find that this Prince had any ſons. The Hiſtorians allow him only one daughter; and that he who ſucceeded him was his brother. This objection is of no weight; for on one hand, if the ſon which he cauſed to be inſtructed by our Ariſtarchus, died during his minority, the Hiſtorians now extant might not think there was occaſion to mention him. On the other hand, it is falſe that they all are ſilent. Juſtin allows a ſon to Ptolomy Philometor, and ſays further that Ptolomy his uncle cauſed him to be put to death (2). The learned Allatius has not taken notice of this; he will have it that the diſciple which Suidas aſſigns to Ariſtarchus muſt be the ſecond Ptolomy Evergetes: Cujus (Ptolomei Philometoris) filium ſecundum Evergetem erudiit Olympiade CLVI, ut Suidas tradit (3). i. e. "Whoſe ſon, (Ptolomy Philometor's) the "ſecond Evergetes, he taught in the 156th Olympiad, "as Suidas ſays." That is a miſtake: the ſecond Ptolomy Evergetes was the brother of Ptolomy Philometor, and not his ſon. Voſſius was not miſtaken when he thought that Ptolomy Philometor made choice of Ariſtarchus to be the Preceptor of his ſon Ptolomy Lathyrus (4): he ſhould have known Ptolomy Lathyrus, or Lathurus, was the ſon of the ſecond Ptolomy Evergetes. What Suidas obſerves, that Ariſtarchus was the diſciple of Ariſtophanes the Byzantine does not furniſh one objection; for it is well known that an egregious miſtake is ſlipped into that paſſage of Suidas, where we read that Ariſtophanes of Byzantium flouriſhed in the 45th Olympiad. It ſhould be read in the 145th Olympiad, as Allatius and Jonſius have obſerved (5). Ariſtophanis meminit Suidas, in quo obiter Librariorum error in Olympiade notandus eſt. Ipſe namque habet Γέγονε δὲ κατὰ τὴν μέ Ὀλυμπιάδα, quæ Hieronymus Wolphius vertit, Vixit Olympiade XLV, cum omnino ſcribendum ſit ϱμέ, id eſt, CXLV (6). i. e. "Suidas mentions Ariſtophanes, in whom, "by the way, there is an error of the Librarians with "regard to the Olympiad to be taken notice of. For "he has it, Γέγονε δὲ κατὰ τὴν μέ Ὀλυμπιάδα, which "Hieronymus Wolphius tranſlated, He lived in the "45th Olympiad, when it ought to be written ϱμέ, "that is, 145." It is under this that the anonymous Author of the deſcription of the Olympiads places Ariſtophanes of Byzantium. The obſervation of Suidas, that the ſame Ariſtophanes was in his youth a diſciple of Callimachus is no ways contradictory thereto. Μαθητὴς Καλλιμάχου καὶ Ζηνοδότου, ἀλλὰ δ μὲν νέος δ δὲ παῖς ἤκουσε (7). i. e. "The diſciple of Cal- "limachus and Zenodotus, but attended the lectures "of the one when a young man, and the other when "a boy." A man who flouriſhed in the 145th Olympiad, might be the diſciple of Callimachus; for that Poet lived till the reign of Ptolomy Evergetes, the ſon of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and we know that this Ptolomy Evergetes reigned till the end of the 139th Olympiad. But if Ariſtarchus was the diſciple of Ariſtophanes the Byzantian, it is better to take notice of the ſtate where he flouriſhed, than to place him, as Suidas has done, under the 156th Olympiad. They who ſhall well conſider all theſe things, will have ſome trouble to conform to this propoſition: Ariſtarchus . . . . lived in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus, at the ſame time with Callimachus (8). The learned Heinſius obſerves, that there are people who ſay ſo (9); and as he does not cenſure them for it, it may be ſuppoſed that he approved the opinion. He had better have condemned it. Monſr. le Fevre is in this caſe rather to be credited than his ſon-in-law: he places Ariſtarchus under the reign of Ptolomy Philometor (10). See the note [G], where we ſhall prove the truth of this opinion by Crates being contemporary with Ariſtarchus. A paſſage of Athenæus has made it ſeem credible that our Critic lived under Ptolomy Philadelphus: it is the place where Athenæus relates, that Ptolomy Evergetes was one of Ariſtarchus's diſciples (11). For want of examining the matter thoroughly, one might perſuade one's ſelf that this Ptolomy Evergetes was the ſon of Ptolomy Philadelphus; but it is certain that he ought to be underſtood to mean Ptolomy Phyſcon (12), the brother of Ptolomy Philometor. And indeed Athenæus ſpeaks of one Ptolomy, who was a Writer, and who is neceſſarily the ſame with him whom he quotes at the 12th Book (13), and whom he reckons as the ſeventh King of Egypt.

Here are ſome freſh proofs againſt Mr. Dacier's opinion. It is certain, that Demetrius Scepſius (14) lived at the ſame time with Ariſtarchus. This is what Strabo teſtifies, κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν χρόνον γεγονὼς Κράτητι καὶ Ἀριστάρχῳ (15), i. e. "being of the ſame age, "with Crates and Ariſtarchus." Voſſius did not conſider theſe words attentively, when he advanced that Strabo aſſerts, that Demetrius Scepſius was the diſciple of Crates and Ariſtarchus (16). But this Demetrius was contemporary with one Metrodorus (17), whom Mithridates put to death in the 181ſt year of Rome (18). Judge whether a man, who has flouriſhed under Ptolomy Philadelphus, could be contemporary with this Metrodorus. The death of that Ptolomy happened about the 506th year of Rome. Note, one might collect from Diogenes Laertius, that Demetrius was older than Metrodorus; and granting, that nothing can be retorted on me, nor can any one ſay that I prove too much. Note alſo, that a ſon of one of Ariſtarchus's

(1) Suidas in Ἀριστάρχος.

(2) Juſtinus, lib. 38. cap. 8.

(3) Leo Allatius, de Patria Homeri, pag. 103, 104.

(4) Voſſius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 67. Note that in the 21ſt chap. of the 1ſt book de Hiſtoricis Græcis, he ſays that the ſecond Ptolomy Evergetes was the ſon of Philometor.

(5) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 166, 167.

(6) Allatius, de Patria Homeri, pag. 103.

(7) Suidas in Ἀριστοφάνης. Pertus has ill tranſlated theſe words: Hunc quidem, ſays he, adoleſcens, illum verò puer audivit.

(8) Dacier, Remarques ſur l'Art Poetique d'Horace. ver. 450. pag. 371. of the Holland edition.

(9) Heinſius in Prolegomenis Ariſtarchi Sacri, folio 3.

(10) Le Fevre, Vie de Poetes Grecs, p. 7.

(11) Athen. lib. 2. ſub finem, pag. 71. B.

(12) That is the ſame as the ſecond Evergetes.

(13) Pag. 549. He quotes him in ſeveral other places.

(14) That is to ſay, a native of Scepſis, a city of Myſia.

(15) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 419.

(16) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 135.

(17) Diogen. Laert. lib. 5. num. 84, ſays that Demetrius Scepſius advanced his countryman Metrodorus. That is he whom Mithridates put to death.

(18) Plutarch. in Lucullo, pag. 506. See alſo Strabo lib. 13. pag. 419, who does not determine whether Mithridates put him to death.

he treated as ſpurious [B]. That edition of Homer was very much eſteemed, as well as very much criticized (b). He commented upon Pindar (c), upon Aratus (d), and upon other Poets; and it is not true, that in order to criticize every body, without fear of having the like (b) See the note [B].

(c) See Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 80, 81.

(d) See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathemat. pag. 156.

Ariſtarchus's diſciples (19) was ſtill living, when Strabo was of a ſufficient age to attend at the publick Lectures (20). But, as Strabo lived till the reign of Tiberius, he could not hear the Lectures of the ſon of a diſciple of Ariſtarchus, if Ariſtarchus flouriſhed under Ptolomy Philadelphus.

(19) He was called Ariſtodemus; his father, named Menecrates, had been the diſciple of Ariſtarchus. See Strabo, lib. 14. p. 447.

(20) Strabo, ibid.

[B] Such verſes of Homer, as he did not like, he treated as ſpurious.] Cicero teſtifies that in theſe words: Si, ut ſcribis, eæ litteræ non fuerunt diſertæ, ſcito meas non fuiſſe. Ut enim Ariſtarchus Homeri verſum negat, quem non probat, ſic tu (libet enim mihi jocari) quod diſertum non erit, ne putaris meum (21). i. e. "If thoſe letters were not elegant, as you write "word, take notice that they were none of mine. For as "Ariſtarchus does not allow that to be a verſe of Homer which he diſlikes, ſo (give me leave to joke) "I would not have you take that for mine which is "not elegant." To this may be added that other paſſage of the ſame Author: Niſi forte ſcire vis, me inter Niciam noſtrum & Vidium judicem eſſe. Profert alter (ut opinor) duobus verſiculis expenſum Niciæ: alter Ariſtarchus hos ὀβελίζει. Ego tanquam criticus antiquus, judicaturus ſum, utrum ſint τοῦ ποιητοῦ, an παρεμβεβλημένοι (22). i. e. "Unleſs perhaps you have "a mind to know that I am judge betwixt Nicias "and Vidius. The one (as I ſuppoſe) publiſhes in "two verſes the expence of Nicias; the other, Ariſ"tarchus like, puts the mark of expurgation upon "them. I as an ancient Critic am to determine "whether they be the Poet's, or ſuppoſititious." It is ſaid, that Ariſtarchus marked the figure of a dart at the ſide of ſuch verſes as he condemned as ſpurious, and that from thence it came, that ὀβελίζειν ſignifies to condemn. Tranſlatum ab Ariſtarcho, qui Homeri carmina in corpus redegit, atque in libros digeſſit, verſus nothos, hoc eſt adulterinos & ſubditicios, qui non videntur ſapere venam illam Homericam, ὀβελίσκοις, id eſt, minutis verubus præ-notatis damnans: contrà qui viderentur inſignes ac genuini ἀστερίσκοις, id eſt, ſtellis illuſtrans (23). i. e. "Taken from Ariſtarchus, who reduced the verſes of "Homer into a body, and digeſted them into books, "condemning the ſpurious, that is, the ſophiſticated "and ſuppoſititious verſes, which did not ſeem a"greeable to Homer's genius, ὀβελίσκοις, that is, by "little darts ſet before them; and on the other hand "illuſtrating thoſe which ſeemed fine and genuine, "ἀστερίσκοις, that is, by Stars." Obſerve Auſonius's Poem, entitled Ludus ſeptem Sapientum; where he aſks for a rigorous cenſure of his Poem from Drepanius Pacatus. He deſires to be treated after the ſame manner as Ariſtarchus had uſed Homer, and he makes uſe of theſe lines:

(21) Cicero, Epiſt. 11. ad Famil. lib. 3. pag. 169.

(22) Idem, ibid. lib. 9. Epiſt. 10. pag. 23, 24.

(23) Eraſmus, Adag. Chiliade 1. Centur. 5. num. 57. p. 178.

Mæonio qualem cultum quæſivit Homero
Cenſor Ariſtarchus, normaque Zenodoti,
Pone obelos igitur ſuperiorum ſtigmata vatum,
Palmas, non culpas eſſe putabo meas (24).
That is,
"Such treatment as did Ariſtarchus give
"Mæonian Homer's verſe, may I receive:
"Or by Zenodotus's rules be try'd,
"And ſtigmatizing obeliſks apply'd,
"Againſt what you diſlike amongſt my lays;
"And I your cenſure ſhall eſteem as praiſe."

(24) Auſonius, in Ludo Septem Sapientum, circa initium, pag. 265.

It is thought that he ſpeaks of Ariſtarchus in the latter of theſe two verſes:

Quique ſacri lacerum collegit corpus Homeri,
Quique notas ſpuriis verſibus appoſuit (25).
That is,
"Who ſacred Homer's ſcatter'd works combin'd,
"And to each ſpurious verſe a mark aſſign'd."

(25) Idem, Epiſt. 18. pag. 649.

Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman tell us in their Dictionaries, that Ælian teſtifies that Ariſtarchus's criticiſm was ſo juſt, that whenever he had condemned a verſe as not being Homer's, it was treated as ſpurious. Ælianus tradit hunc tam caſtigato fuiſſe judicio, ut Homeri verſus non putaretur, quem ipſe non probaſſet. Quenſtedt aſſerts the ſame thing (26). I do not think that Ælian does ſay ſo: and if he did he was miſtaken; for we learn from Athenæus, that this great Critic's taſte was often condemned (27): and that thoſe have been allowed to be the verſes of Homer, which he had rejected, and that his arguments were laughed at. His aſſurance alone was ſufficient to diſcredit his judgment: he determined upon ſeveral occaſions, that ſuch and ſuch verſes of the Iliad ought to be transferred into the Odyſſey (28). Allatius knew very well that Ariſtarchus's criticiſm was often cenſured. He quotes upon that ſubject Athenæus (29), Plutarch, and the Scholiaſt on Homer. He tells us, that Ptolomy of Aſcalon the Grammarian publiſhed a book de Ariſtarchi correctione in Odyſſea (30), and that Zenodotus of Alexandria was ordered to reviſe Ariſtarchus's criticiſm. Zenodotus alter Alexandrinus ideo advocatus eſt, ut de reprobatis ab Ariſtarcho Homericis carminibus judicium ferret (31). Idem (Suidas) Ζηνόδοτος Ἀλεξανδρεὺς γραμματικὸς ὁ ἐν ἄγει κληθεὶς πρὸς τὸ ὑπ' Ἀριστάρχου ἀθετούμενα τοῦ Ποιητοῦ. And yet he aſſures us, that antiquity had ſo great a regard for the judgment of Ariſtarchus, that it was not believed that the verſes which he diſliked were Homer's. Ariſtarchi porro judicium adeò probavit Antiquitas, ut Homeri verſus non putarentur, quos ipſe non probaret (32). Does not this ſhew a great error in his judgment? Elias Vinetus deſerves much cenſure here. Cujus (Ariſtarchi), ſays he (33), veteres tanti fecerant judicium, ut quem non probaret, Homeri verſum non crederent. Ita Cicero, Suidas, Eraſmus. i. e. "Whoſe (Ariſtarchus's) "judgment the ancients held in ſuch eſteem, that "they would not believe a verſe, which he diſap"proved of, to be Homer's. So ſay Cicero, Suidas, "and Eraſmus." It is falſe that Cicero ſays it: he only ſays that Ariſtarchus allowed none to be true verſes of Homer, but what ſeemed good to him (34). Nor does Suidas ſay what Vinetus imputes to him. I can certify the ſame thing for Eraſmus, with reſpect to the place from whence I have extracted the aforeſaid paſſage (35). Mr. Saldenus having a mind to make ſome alteration in the words of Charles Stephens which I have quoted, has made an unreaſonable blunder. He has not quoted Ælian, and he has not aſſerted that Ariſtarchus's criticiſm was exact: he contents himſelf with ſaying that that Critic thought it ſo. So far all is very well: Charles Stephens is dropped upon a falſe quotation, and no anſwer is made but what is very probable, namely that the corrector of Homer imagined himſelf a perſon of great abilities. But here lies the miſchief: from this high opinion, which he had of his own genius, it is concluded that the ancients received none as Homer's verſes, but ſuch as pleaſed Ariſtarchus. This is a very wrong concluſion. Grammaticus ille, qui hoc nomen (Ariſtarchi) geſſit, tam caſtigato ſe putavit eſſe judicio, ut Homeri verſus nullus haberetur quem ipſe non probaret (36). i. e. "The Grammarian, who bore this name (of A"riſtarchus), thought himſelf to have ſo refined a "judgment, that no verſe which he diſapproved, "ſhould be allowed to be Homer's." Thus reaſons Mr. Saldenus; and to prove his reaſoning, he quotes thoſe words, where Cicero ſays that Ariſtarchus rejected all ſuch verſes as were not to his taſte as foiſted into Homer. This proof amounts to no more than the theſis itſelf, in defence of which it was brought. I have read in the Commentary of a certain Modern, that Ariſtarchus had ſo fine and penetrating a talent of criticiſm, that he was commonly called the Prophet or the Diviner, on account of his great ſagacity (37). I have been ſurprized at not finding the leaſt trace of this great Elogium in an infinite number of writers, which I have run through in the paſſages where they ſpeak of this Grammarian. In ſhort, I have found this in a note of Corradus upon Tully's Epiſtles: Hinc illum (Ariſtarchum) μάλιστα ἐκάλει Παπαίτιος ὁ Ῥόδιος φιλόσοφος διὰ τὸ ῥᾳδίως καταμαντεύεσθαι τῆς τῶν ποιημάτων διανοίας. Athen. l. 14 (38). I have conſulted the XIVth book of Athenæus; but to no purpoſe. Howſoever that be, there is a great difference betwixt this quotation of Corradus, and that of Mr. Dacier. The Greek words only ſignify, that Panetius gave the appellation of (26) Quenſtedt, de Patriis Viror. Illuſtrium, p. 433.

(27) Vide Athenæum, lib. 4. paſſim, & ibi Caſaubonum; item lib. 5. pag. 188, 189. See alſo Plutarch de audiendis Poetis, pag. 26.

(28) Athen. lib. 4. cap. 28. pag. 180.

(29) He only quotes the 5th book of Athenæus.

(30) Ἔγραψε περὶ τῆς ἐν Ὀδυσσείᾳ Ἀριστάρχου διορθώσεως. Suidas apud Allatium, de Patria Homeri pag. 105.

(31) Idem, ibid.

(32) Idem, ibid. pag. 104.

(33) Elias Vinetus in Auſonii Ludum Septem Sapientum, init. pag. 265.

(34) See Cicero's words above, citation (21).

(35) Citation (23).

(36) Salden. de Libris, p. 388.

(37) Dacier, Remarques ſur l'Art Poetique d'Horace, pag. 371, 372.

(38) Corradus in Epiſtolam 14. Ciceronis ad Atticum. lib. 1.

like retorted on himſelf, he had the cunning not to publiſh any thing [C]. They which ſay that he was contemporary with Piſiſtratus are groſsly miſtaken [D]. His reputation laſted a long while: Cicero and Horace made uſe of his name to expreſs a very rigid Critic [E]. It is ſtill uſed upon the ſame occaſion to this day. Some people attribute to him of Diviner to our Ariſtarchus; and not that it was the ordinary ſtyle of antiquity.

Note that ſeveral perſons are of opinion that it was Ariſtarchus who divided each of Homer's two grand Poems into as many Books as there are letters in the alphabet, and that he gave to each Book the name of a letter. Plutarchus lib. de Homero: Iliadem & Odyſſeam Homeri ab Ariſtarcho Grammatico in numerum librorum diviſam ad ordinem & numerum Græcarum literarum. i. e. "That the Iliad and Odyſſey of Homer were divided by Ariſtarchus the Grammarian into a number of Books, according to the order and number of the Greek Letters. Euſtathius in Iliados α tradit. Ariſtarchum & Zenodotum confuſum antea Homeri opus digeſſiſſe in certos libros, eoſque literis diſtinxiſſe. Unde non ſolum primus tam Odyſſeæ quam Iliadis liber α vocatur, ſecundus β, & ſic deinceps; verum etiam ipſum opus γράμματα nominatur. Et ſanè verum eſt, hanc per literas diviſionem recentiorem. Nam antiqui nunquam eâ uſi, ut patet ex Ariſtotele de Poëtica. Cap. XXIV (39). i. e. "Euſtathius tells us in his Commentary upon the firſt Book of the Iliad, that Ariſtarchus and Zenodotus digeſted Homer's works, which before lay in confuſion, into certain Books, and diſtinguiſhed them by letters. From whence not only the firſt Book both of the Iliad and Odyſſey is called α, the ſecond β, and ſo on: but the work it ſelf is likewiſe named γράμματα. And it is really true, that this diviſion by letters is of later date. For the Ancients never made uſe of it, as appears from Ariſtotle de Poetica Cap. XXIV."

(39) Johannes a Wower de Polymathiâ cap. 18. pag. 153, 154.

[C] It is not true that in order to criticize every body, without fear of having the like retorted upon himſelf, he had the cunning not to publiſh any thing.] Saldenus, under the fictitious name of Chriſtianus Liberius, publiſhed a falſity, when he ſaid, Sic Ariſtarchus Grammaticus nullos non reprehendebat, nihil ipſe ſcribens, ne ab aliis reprehendi poſſet (40). i. e. "Thus "Ariſtarchus the Grammarian found fault with every "body, writing nothing himſelf, leſt other people "ſhould find fault with him." I don't know whether he publiſhed it with the ſame reſtriction, as in the work, which he publiſhed under his own name in 1688. If he did make uſe of them, Mr. Menage has not quoted him fairly; for he cut off an eſſential part of the paſſage which he produces. Theſe are Saldenus's words in the work which he publiſhed in 1688. Sicuti Ariſtarchus Grammaticus neminem non reprehendebat, nihil interim ipſe ſcribens, ne reprehendi ab aliis poſſet, ut nonnulli volunt: licet alii ſint, ac plerique quidem qui πολυγράφους ipſum accenſent, ut ſupra diximus (41). i. e. "As Ariſtarchus the Grammarian "found fault with every body, and at the ſame time "wrote nothing himſelf, leſt other people ſhould find "fault with him, as ſome people are of opinion: altho' "there are others, and indeed a good many who will "have it, that he wrote ſeveral pieces, as we have "ſaid above." What he ſays concerning the cunning of thoſe people, who in order to cenſure all writers without fear of a retalliation, publiſh nothing themſelves, might ſerve as a ſupplement to one of the pages of my plan (42). To which might be added to theſe words of Mr. le Fevre addreſſed to a Journaliſt: Yet, if you had publiſhed any Book of your own compoſing, it would have been well enough: but as matters now ſtand, I find that you play with rather too great advantage: it is a jeſt to ſtake but a farthing to a guinea; I don't know who would play with you (43).

(40) Chriſtianus Liberius in Bibliophil. pag. 21. cited by Menage Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. p. 81.

(41) Guill. Saldenus, de Libris pag. 43. he had ſaid pag. 13. Ariſtarchus Grammaticus ſupra mille Commentarios literis conſignavit: he ſhould have ſaid, as Suidas did, ſupra octingentos.

(42) See the latter end of the ſixth paragraph of this plan, at the end of the 4th volume of this Dictionary.

(43) Le Fevre, ſeconde Journaline, pag. 48 of the Holland edition.

[D] They who make him contemporary with Piſiſtratus are groſsly miſtaken.] That miſtake is very ancient. Allatius recites a long paſſage where one of the Commentators upon Dionyſius of Thrace relates that Piſiſtratus cauſed proclamation to be made throughout Greece, that all ſuch as could bring him any verſes of Homer ſhould be rewarded for them at ſo much a verſe. When he had got together as many as he poſſibly could, he ſent for ſeventy Grammarians, and delivered each of them a copy of this collection. They were told that it was deſired, that each of them would ſeparately ſet to work, and put theſe verſes into the beſt order he could. After they had executed this commiſſion, they were aſſembled together by order of Piſiſtratus, and ſhewed each other what every one had done. They unanimouſly agreed in acknowledging that the work of Ariſtarchus and that of Zenodotus merited the preference; after which they declared that the work of Zenodotus ought to give place to that of Ariſtarchus (44). This ſtory amongſt other falſhoods contains this, that Ariſtarchus and Piſiſtratus lived at the ſame time. It were eaſy to diſcover this falſity; and yet the Commentators upon Dionyſius of Thrace have perſuaded a great many people into it. Euſtathius has related it, and after him Genebrard and Jaſon de Nores. Read this paſſage of Allatius: Multis aliis recentioribus fucum fecerunt. Nam Euſtathius in A Iliados idem aſſerit. Οἱ δὲ συνθέμενοι ταύτην κατ' ἐπιταγὴν, ὡς φασὶ, Πισιστράτου τοῦ τῶν Ἀθηναίων τυράννου Γραμματικοὶ, καὶ διορθωσάμενοι κατὰ τὸ ἐκείνοις ἀρέσκον. ὧν κορυφαῖος Ἀρίσταρχος, ὃ μετ' ἐκεῖνον Ξηνόδοτος. Et inferius: Τῷ δὲ ἀπαγγέλλειν τὴν Ὁμήρου ποίησιν σκιδασθῆναι ἀρχὴν ἐποιήσατο Κίναιθος ὁ Χῖος. Ἐλυμῶντο δὲ, φασὶν, αὐτὴν πάμπολλα οἱ περὶ τὸν Κίναιθον. καὶ πολλὰ τῶν ἐπῶν αὐτοὶ ποιήσαντες παρενέβαλον. Διὸ καὶ διαρθώθηναι αἱ Ὁμηρικαὶ βίβλοι, ὡς ἀνωτέρω εἴρηται. Gilbertus Genebrardus Chron. lib. II. Piſiſtrati juſſu Ariſtarchus Homeri rapſodiam recenſuit, & in 24 partes pro numero elementorum diſtribuit. Jaſon de Nores in artem Poëticam Horatii, Ariſtarchus miro quodam acumine caſtigabat veterum ſcripta, atque ideo colligendis Homeri verſibus præpoſitus fuit. In quibus vides miros Anachroniſmos. Primus, qui Ariſtarchum ſub Piſiſtrato collocat. Secundus, qui Cinæthum Chium aſſerit primum Homeri Poeſim diſperſam recitaſſe. Cum uterque poſt Piſiſtrati tempora floruerit. Cinæthus enim, ſi Pindari Scholiaſtæ credimus in Nemeon, od. II. ſub Olympiade ſexageſimâ nonâ apud Syracuſas Homeri carmina ἐρραψώδησε (45). i. e. "They "have impoſed upon many other moderns. For Euſtathius in the firſt Book of the Iliad aſſerts the ſame "thing. But the Grammarians, ſays he, put it together "by the command, as it is ſaid, of Piſiſtratus the "Athenian tyrant, and corrected it as they thought "proper, the chief of which was Ariſtarchus, and "next to him Zenodotus. And a little after; But Ci"næthus the Chian was the firſt who began to recite "the ſcattered Poetry of Homer. But they who fol"lowed Cinæthus debaſed it various ways, and mixed "amongſt it a great many verſes of their own. For "which reaſon the Books of Homer were corrected "as we ſaid above. Gilbert Genebrard in his "Chron. B. 2. tells us, that Ariſtarchus reviſed the "rhapſody of Homer at the command of Piſiſtratus, "and divided it into twenty four parts according to "the number of the letters. Jaſon de Nores obſerves, "that Ariſtarchus corrected the writings of the "Ancients with a ſurprizing ſagacity, and for that "reaſon the care of collecting Homer's verſes was com"mitted to him. Wherein one may ſee ſurprizing "Anachroniſms. The firſt, which places Ariſtarchus "under Piſiſtratus. The ſecond, which aſſerts that "Cinæthus the Chian was the firſt who recited the ſcat"tered Poems of Homer. When they both flouriſhed "after Piſiſtratus's time. For Cinæthus, if we believe "the Scholiaſt of Pindar in Nemeon, od. 2. recited "Homer's verſes at Syracuſe under the 69th Olympiad."

(44) Allatius, de Patria Homeri, pag. 93, & ſeq. He ſays that theſe Commentaries are not printed.

(45) Allatius, de Patriâ Homeri, pag. 96, 97.

[E] Cicero and Horace made uſe of his name to expreſs a very rigid Critic.] Conſult the oration againſt Piſo, you will there find theſe words: Verum tamen, quoniam te non Ariſtarchum, ſed Phalarim Grammaticum habemus, qui non notam apponas ad malum verſum, ſed Poetam armis perſequare, ſcire cupio quid tandem iſto in verſu reprehendas, Cedant arma togæ (46). i. e. "However, ſince we do not take you for Ariſtarchus, "but Phalaris the Grammarian, who do not ſet your "mark againſt a bad verſe, but perſecute the Poet "with your arms, I deſire to know what fault it is "that you find in that verſe, Cedant arma togæ." The ſame Orator declares, that he was afraid of the ſcratches of his friend Atticus. Noſtrum opus tibi probari lætor: ex quo ἄνθη ipſa poſuiſti, quæ mihi florentiora ſunt viſa tuo judicio. Cerulas enim tuas miniatulas

(46) Cic. Orat. in L. Piſonem, cap. 30.

him a thought which others aſcribe either to Theocritus, or Iſocrates [F]. He had a great many conteſts at Pergamus with Crates the Grammarian [G]; and he died in the Iſland of Cyprus, aged ſeventy two years. He was grown dropſical, and found no better remedy againſt that diſtemper, than to ſtarve himſelf to death. There aroſe from his ſchool (46) Cicero ad Atticum, lib. 16. Epiſt. 10.

tulas illas extimeſcebam (46). i. e. "I am glad that "my work has met with your approbation: on which "account you have ſet thereto the very ἄνθη, which "to me ſeem the more beautiful for your judgment; "for I was afraid of your red ſtrokes." That is, as any one would expreſs himſelf at preſent, to ſignify the cenſures, which a reader would mark in the margin of any Book, and the Cerulæ Miniatulæ of the paſſage which I ſpeak of. Atticus then was one of thoſe faithful friends, who examine with ſeverity the compoſitions of their friends. To ſhew this, Cicero calls him his Ariſtarchus. Quid multa? totum hunc locum, quem ego variè meis orationibus, quarum tu Ariſtarchus es, ſoleo pingere, de flamma, de ferro (noſti illas λιχνίδας) valde graviter pertexuit (47). The following verſes of Horace amount to a ſtrong proof of my text.

(47) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. Epiſt. 10.

Vir bonus & prudens verſus reprehendet inertes,
Culpabit duros; incomptis allinet atrum
Tranſverſo calamo ſignum: ambitioſa recidet
Ornamenta: parum claris lucem dare coget:
Arguet ambiguè dictum: mutanda notabit:
Fiet Ariſtarchus: nec dicet, Cur ego amicum
Offendam in nugis (48)?

(48) Horat. de Arte Poeticâ, ver. 445.

That is,

"An honeſt judge will blame each idle line,
"And tell you, you muſt make the cloudy ſhine;
"Shew you what words are harſh, blot out the "rough,
"And cut the uſeleſs gaudy painting off:
"Look through your faults with [Ariſtarchus'] eye
"And tell you what you muſt correct, and why:
"Critique indeed, nor ſay, ſhall I diſpleaſe
"Mine honeſt friend for ſuch ſmall toys as theſe?

Creech.

[F] Some people attribute to him a thought, which others aſcribe either to Theocritus, or Iſocrates.] They relate this ſaying of Ariſtarchus: I cannot write as I would, and I will not write as I can (49). See what Mr. Dacier has ſaid upon theſe words of Horace: Si quantum cuperem poſſem quoque (50). Hitherto none of the writers, whom I have conſulted, has directed me to the original: my ſearches have been ſtill more in vain in this reſpect than with regard to Ariſtarchus being deemed a Prophet. It is that which makes me heartily wiſh that Mr. Dacier, and ſeveral others who reſemble him in that particular, would be ſo good as to leave off the cuſtom of not quoting. Are they afraid that the great and polite world, for whoſe uſe their labours are deſigned, would think that quotations have too much the air of the Author, the learned world, and the univerſity? But I don't know how to believe that ſuch a perſon as the Comte de Guiche (51), for example, would have been ſorry to know where any body had found that Ariſtarchus ſaid this, and where it is that he is conſidered as a Prophet. Every Lady, who has a taſte for learning, would ſtill be better pleaſed to know whether Plutarch or Ariſtotle relates a fact, than to know in general that it is related. But this by the by. Let us return to our ſubject. We read in Stobæus's collections, that Theocritus, being aſked why he did not write, made anſwer, Becauſe I cannot do it as I would, and becauſe I will not do it as I can. Ερωτηθεὶς διὰ τί ὐ συγγράφει, ὅτι ὡς βούλομαι, ὐ δύναμαι, ὡς δὲ δύναμαι ὐ βούλομαι (52). Iſocrates being at the table of Nicocreon King of Cyprus, was deſired to bear a part in the converſation: he would not meddle with it, and alledged this excuſe. What I underſtand is not ſeaſonable, and what would be ſeaſonable I know nothing of. Οἷς μὲν ἐγὼ λέγω, οὐχ ἁ νῦν καιρός. Οἷς δὲ ὁ νῦν καιρός, οὐχ ἐγὼ λέγω (53). This often puts me in mind of that thought of Seneca, "I was never deſirous of pleaſing the po-"pulace; for they do not approve of what I under-"ſtand, and I do not underſtand what they approve." Nunquam volui populo placere, nam quæ ego ſcio non probat populus; quæ probat populus, ego neſcio (54).

(49) Dacier's Notes upon the 1ſt Epiſtle of the 2d book of Horace, p. 435.

(50) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 2. ver. 256.

(51) It is ſaid in la Suite du Menagiana, pag. 6. of the Holland edition, that this Count, in the midſt of the pleaſures and buſineſs of the court, did not fail ſtudying at leaſt three hours a day regularly.

(52) Stobæus, Serm. 21. de cognoſc. ſeipſo.

(53) Plutarchus, in Vita Iſocrat. pag. 838. F. See alſo Sympoſiac. lib. 1. cap. 1. pag. 613. A.

(54) Seneca, Ep. 29. pag. 219.

[G] He had a great many conteſts at Pergamus with the Grammarian Crates] (55). The words of Suidas expreſly imply the meaning above: Κράτης τῷ γραμματικῷ Περγαμήνῳ πλεῖστα διημιλλήσατο ἐν Περγάμῳ (56). Caſaubon, upon the authority of this paſſage, maintains that the antagoniſt of Ariſtarchus was not Crates Mallotes, but another Crates a native of Pergamus (57). As this Crates Mallotes was contemporary with Ariſtarchus, and well known to the King of Pergamus, one might eaſily judge that it was he who diſputed at different times with Ariſtarchus. On this occaſion it is worth the while to take notice that Suidas gives the ſirname of Pergamenian to the adverſary of Ariſtarchus. Perhaps he is miſtaken; for they who cite Crates of Pergamus do not repreſent him to us, near ſo much a Grammarian, as an Hiſtorian (58); and it is certain that Grammar was the principal ſtudy of Crates Mallotes. Read but this paſſage: Primus quantum opinamur ſtudium Grammaticæ in urbem intulit Crates Mallotes Ariſtarchi æqualis, qui miſſus ad Senatum ab Attalo rege inter ſecundum ac tertium bellum Punicum, ſub ipſam Ennii mortem, quum in regione Palatii prolapſus in cloacæ foramen crus fregiſſet, per omne legationis ſimul & valetudinis tempus plurimas ἀκροάσεις ſubinde fecit aſſiduèque diſſeruit, ac noſtris exemplo fuit ad imitandum (59). i. e. "Crates Mallotes the rival "of Ariſtarchus was, as we apprehend, the firſt who "introduced the ſtudy of Grammar into the city, "who being ſent from King Attalus to the Senate be-"twixt the ſecond and third Punic war, about the time "of the death of Ennius, when he had ſlipt into "the hole of a bog-houſe on the mount Palatine, "and broke his leg; during the whole time of his "embaſſy and indiſpoſition, he very often gave lec-"tures, and diſcourſed thereon with great aſſiduity, "and was an example worthy our people's imitation." It is of Crates Mallotes that this paſſage of Varro is generally underſtood: Crates mobilis Grammaticus, qui fretus Chryſippo homine acutiſſimo, qui reliquit ſex libros περὶ τῆς ἀνωμαλίας: heis libreis contra Analogiam atque Ariſtarchum eſt nixus (60). i. e. "Crates a noble "Grammarian, who eſpouſed the tenets of Chryſip-"pus a man of very great acuteneſs, who left ſix books "concerning irregularity: in theſe books he bore "hard upon analogy and Ariſtarchus." If Varro ſpoke in that place of Crates Mallotes, it is probable that Suidas took the one for the other; I mean, that Crates Mallotes, and not Crates of Pergamus, was the rival of our Ariſtarchus. I do not know whether the Commentators upon Suetonius, have ever thought of criticizing him on a point of Chronology, of which I ſhall juſt ſay a word. He ſays that Crates Mallotes came to Rome, in the name of King Attalus, about the time of Ennius's death. The death of that Poet happened in the 585th year of Rome. But at that time he that reigned at Pergamus was called Eumenes. He began to reign in the 556th, and died in the 596th year of Rome, leaving the tuition of his ſon, and the regency to his brother Attalus. So that if Crates Mallotes was deputed to the Romans by this Attalus, Chronological exactneſs will not allow it to be ſaid that he made that voyage about the time that Ennius died. But nevertheleſs Suetonius furniſhes wherewithal to confirm the opinion of thoſe that make Ariſtarchus flouriſh under Ptolemæus Philometor in the 156th Olympiad (61). Euſebius and Suidas are of that number.

(55) Suidas, in Ἀρίσταρχος.

(56) Idem, ibid.

(57) Caſaubon, in Sueton. de Illuſtr. Gram. cap. 2.

(58) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcâ, pag. 347.

(59) Sueton. de illuſt. Grammat. cap. 2.

Voſſius has not followed Suetonius: for inſtead of ſaying that Ariſtarchus and Crates Mallotes were contemporaries, he has ſaid as much of Crates Mallotes and Apollodorus the diſciple of Ariſtarchus (62). I do not pretend to ſay that this is falſe: for the ſame perſon might be contemporary both with the maſter and the ſcholar; but I take occaſion to obſerve that he is miſtaken in another reſpect; he thought that a Dramatic piece, which was tranſlated by Ennius, and which was called the Achilles of Ariſtarchus, bore that name only becauſe that great Critic had corrected it. Ab hoc & vetus quædam Comœdia, quam Ennius poſtea tranſtulit, (60) Varro, de Linguâ Latinâ, lib. 8. initio. See alſo lib. 7. p. 97. See in Voſſius de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 347. Several Authorities which ſay that Crates Mallotes was a Grammarian.

(61) That anſwers to the end of the 6th Century of Rome.

(62) Voſſius de Arte Grammaticâ lib. 1. cap. 6. pag. 24.

school no less than forty Grammarians [H]. He left two sons, whose whole merit consisted in their great simplicity. He who bore the name of his father was sold, but the Athenians redeemed him (e). I shall have something to say against Moreri [I].

(e) Extracted from Suidas in Ἀρίσταρχος.

transtulit, dicebatur Achilles Aristarchi. Meminit ejus Plautus (63). At sic non alia de causa vocabatur, quam quod ab eo esset emendata. i. e. "From him a certain old Comedy, which Ennius afterward translated, "was called the Achilles of Aristarchus. Plautus speaks "of it, but it was called so for no other reason but "because it had been corrected by him." This is a mistake: That piece was a tragedy of Aristarchus the Tegean, who was contemporary with Euripides. See Scaliger (64).

(63) Plautus in Prologo Pœnuli, ver. 1.

(64) Scaliger. Animadv. in Eusebium, num. 1563. p. 103.

[H] There arose from his school no less than forty Grammarians.] He may be reckoned as the Head of a Sect, as appears from these words of Varro: Relinquitur de casibus, in quo Aristarchei suos intendunt nervos (65). Hoc in oratione diligentius quam alii ab Aristarcho Grammatici (66). See also the ralleries of Herodicus (67). It appears from Suidas, that the School of Aristarchus subsisted several Ages in Alexandria (68).

(65) Varro de Linguâ Latinâ, lib. 7. pag. 96.
(66) Idem, ibid. lib. 9. pag. 134.
(67) Apud Athenæum, lib. 5. in fine.
(68) Suidas, in Ἀμμώνιος.

[I] I shall have something to say against Moreri.] I. He has suffered himself to be misled by Vossius, when he said that Aristarchus was of Samos (69). II. Nothing can be more trifling, than to observe that Aristarchus was contemporary with Crates (70). That is explaining one obscure thing by another more obscure, obscurum per obscurius. There have been several Crates's: Diogenes Laertius reckons up ten of them, some of whom were Philosophers, others Poets, Grammarians, Orators, Geometricians, &c. (71). They did not all live at the same time; they were not of the same country; what then can be less to the purpose, than to remark that Aristarchus flourished in the time of Crates? The most famous of all the Crates's was the Cynic Philosopher. So that the most natural sense of Moreri's words, is, that Aristarchus was contemporary with that Cynic: but that is very false; there is a great distance of time betwixt the one and the other (72). This censure does not touch Suetonius, who has said that Crates Mallotes was contemporary with Aristarchus; for there were few men of letters in Suetonius's time, but what knew in what time Aristarchus lived. III. I do not believe that any body says that this Grammarian wrote nine books of Corrections of the Iliad and Odyssey. It is of Crates Mallotes, that Suidas says that (73), as Vossius observes (74), Moreri did not understand the words of Vossius. IV. It is false, that Ptolomy Lathyrus was the son of Ptolomy Philometor. V. I believe that after all it is true, that our Aristarchus was living in the 158th Olympiad; but since Eusebius and Suidas make him flourish in the 156th, that is what should be taken notice of. Vossius falsly charges upon Eusebius the having placed him in the 158th (75).

(69) Vossius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 67.
(70) It is Crates in the ed. of 1688.
(71) Diogen. Laert. in Vitis Philosoph. lib. 4. num. 23.
(72) Diog. Laert. lib. 5. num. 87. says that Crates the Cynic flourished about the 113th Olympiad.
(73) Suidas in Κράτης.
(74) Vossius, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 67.
(75) Idem, de Hist Græcis, cap. 18. pag. 119.

ARISTÆUS, the son of Apollo and Cyrene [A]. His article has been very imperfectly given by Moreri, who has confined himself to telling us: I, That in pursuing Euridice the wife of Orpheus, he was the cause of her being stung to death by a serpent: II, That the nymphs, to be revenged on Aristæus, destroyed his bees: III, That having made a sacrifice of some bulls, he recovered his loss (a): IV, That he found out the secret of extracting

(a) All this is in the 4th book of Virgil's Georgics.

[A] He was the son of Apollo and Cyrene.] That is the general tradition: and there are very few of them amongst the fables that are more certain than that. Notwithstanding Cicero alledges another: The Greeks assure us, says he, that Aristæus was the son of Bacchus. He adds, that he was honoured in Sicily, in the temple of that Deity. Quid? he addresses himself to Verres, ex æde Liberi simulacrum Aristæi non tuo imperio palam ablatum est? .... Aristæus, qui, ut Græci ferunt, Liberi filius, inventor olei esse dicitur, unà cum Libero patre apud illos eodem erat in templo consecratus (1). i. e. "What? Is the image of "Aristæus openly taken away from the temple of "Bacchus without your order? .... Aristæus, who, "as the Greeks relate, is said to be the son of Bac"chus, and inventor of oil, was by them worshipped "in the same temple together with his Father Bac"chus." In another book he adheres to the most common opinion; he says that Apollo was the father of Aristæus. Quid? Aristæus qui olivæ dicitur inventor Apollinis filius (2)? i. e. "What? Aristæus the son "of Apollo, who is said to have discovered the olive"tree?" Let us speak of Cyrene: she was the daughter of Hypseus King of the Lapithæ, the son of Peneus and Creusa (3). This last was the daughter of the earth; Peneus was the son of the Ocean; Cyrene despised the employments of the other daughters and their good cheer (4); and did not love to sleep long in the morning (5). She cared for nothing but hunting, and made a great slaughter of wild beasts. Apollo having met with her at a time, when she was in single combat with a lion, asked Chiron who she was, and whether it would not be right to lay hands on her, and lye with her?

(1) Cicero in Verrem, Orat. 9. cap. 57.
(2) Idem, de Naturâ Deorum, lib. 3. cap. 18.
(3) Pindari, Ode 9. Pythior. pag. 433.
(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 434.
(5) Τὸν δὲ σύγχορτον γυκὺν παῖδον ἐπὶ βλεφάροις ὕπνον πεπαλάκωσε, ῥίπτοντα πρὸς αὐὼ. Pindar. Od. 9. Pythior. p. 433.

Ὦ τία
Κλυτὰν χεῖρά οἱ προσπτύξαι
Ἢ ῥα καὶ ἐκ λοχέων
Κῆρον μελιηδία ποίας (6);

That is,

"Is it lawful to lay my illustrious hand on her? and "crop from its bed that delicious flower?"

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 437.

Chiron, beginning to answer to the last question, represents that lovers ought to use the key of the heart, that is, kind and gentle expressions, which may persuade the fair one to yield to their desires. He adds, that both amongst the Gods and men modesty opposes itself against an over-hastiness, wherewith any one shall make the first offer at enjoyment, and to explain himself in plain terms:

Καὶ ἐν τοῖς θεοῖς
Τοῦτο κἀνθρώποις ἁμῶς
Αἰδὼς ἀμφαδὸν ἀθλίως τυχεῖν τὸ πρῶτον χύτας (7).

That is,

"Both amongst Gods and men there is a like sense "of modesty, if the first request for enjoyment be "over-bluntly urged."

(7) Idem, ibid.

"To conclude, continues he, it is by a visible effect "of your great civility, that you honour me so far as "to ask me the question: You, who know all things, "ask me whose daughter this damsel is." This is the sense of Pindar; I do not pretend to give a verbal translation; it is enough for me to shew his meaning. But if this be what he means, who can see without indignation the liberty that a certain French Writer takes, who makes him speak thus: Is it lawful for "me to look at her? May I venture to approach "her? Shall not I be too bold, if I take hold of "her fair hand, and crop from her mouth one of those "damask roses which I see there painted? But the "Centaur, smiling thereat, answered him in this "manner: A chaste love, Apollo, ought always to "be secret, and the fair sex, both amongst the Gods "and mortals, do not grant their favours in the "sight of the world. That is undoubtedly the reason "why you have just now spoke with so much cau"tion. A lover less chaste than your self would not "have had so much respect; and it is more owing "to your own good manners than my advice, that "you behave with so much modesty (8)." This translation contradicts the original, and is not consistent in its falsities; for if it be supposed that Apollo did not speak his mind bluntly, but in a delicate and chaste manner, Chiron's answer is ridiculous and contradictory. The end was, that Apollo immediately took Cyrene, and carried her into Africa, and enjoyed her without delay:

(8) Notes upon the Aristæus of Virgil, translated into French, and printed at Lions, 1668, p. 28, 29.

Ὠκεῖα

extracting honey, and of making oil, and cheese [B]. There were a great many other things to say concerning this son of Apollo; for we might have been told that he was born in that part of Lybia where the city of Cyrene was built; that he was brought up by the nymphs; that going to Thebes, he there married Autonoe the daughter of Cadmus; that by her he had Actæon, who was torn in pieces by his own dogs; that after the loss of that son he consulted the Oracle of Apollo; that by reason of the answer which was made him with regard to the honours that he should receive in the Island of Cea, he transported himself thither [C]; that a pestilence raging throughout Greece, he offered sacrifices which caused that

Ὠκεῖαι δ' ἐπεμάρανον ἤδη Θεῶν πρᾶξις, ἐδεί τε βραχύβιοι.
καῖνο καὶ' ἄματι δαίτα-
σεν. Θαλάμῳ δὲ μάγῳ
ἐν πολυχρύσῳ Λιβύας (9).

(9) Pindari, Ode 9. Pythior. pag. 443.

That is,

"But the motion of the Gods, that are in haste, is "swift, and their ways of working short. That very "day compleated the business. For they lay together "in a gilded chamber of Lybia."

Chiron was for having him make fine speeches, and spin out his address; but the Gods of the Poets, as Pindar observes, could never bring themselves to have so much patience: they were for bringing matters to bear at once, and coming to the point the shortest way; coming directly to close quarters, and point blank to enjoyment either by fair means or foul. They cared for no part of a romance but the conclusion (10), and might have said like Boreas, Apta mihi vis est (11); i. e. "Force is agreeable to me." Cyrene conceived and brought forth our Aristæus. Note, that Virgil (12), and Hyginus (13), who make her the daughter of Peneus, follow therein an ancient tradition (14). It is for that reason, that we may say that Frischlin was highly wrong in blaming Boccace, and not knowing what they had affirmed. Constat non recte scripsisse Bocatium l. 7. Geneal. c. 28. dum asserit Cyrenem Penei fuisse filiam (15). i. e. "It is "plain that Boccace l. 7. Geneal. c. 28. has written "what is untrue, when he asserts that Cyrene was "the daughter of Peneus." Apollonius supposes that she was a shepherdess, and that she had resolved upon leading a single life; but that Apollo, who carried her off would not let her keep her virginity (16).

(10) Compare the 4th Scene of the Precieuses ridicules.

(11) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. 6. ver. 690.

(12) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 4. ver. 355. See also Servius on the 317th verse of Virgil.

(13) Hygin. cap. 161.

(14) Scholiast. Apollon. in lib. 2. Argonaut. ver. 502.

(15) Frischlin in Callimach. Hymn. 2. pag. 392. edit. Ultraject. an. 1697.

(16) Apollon. Argon. lib. 2. ver. 502, & seq.

[B] He found out the secret of extracting honey, and of making oil and cheese.] Diodorus Siculus relates, that Aristæus having learnt of the Nymphs, who nursed him, the art of curdling milk, of preparing bee-hives, and of cultivating olive-trees, was the first who communicated those three inventions to mankind; the advantages which they drew from thence, made them so grateful, that they paid the same divine honours to him as to Bacchus. The same Historian also says, that the Nymphs gave him three names, that of Nomius, Aristæus, and Agreus (17). This agrees well enough with Pindar (18). But observe, that he says that the Hours and Earth, to whom Mercury carried this infant, nourished him with nectar and ambrosia. Note also that some others say, that Aristæus having found out in the Island of Cea the manner of preparing honey and oil, and having raised those winds, which are called the Etesian, was surnamed Jupiter Aristæus (19), and Apollo Agreus, and Nomius (20). The surname of Nomius fitted him on account of his care of cattle, and that of Agreus by reason of his application to hunting (21). Here is a curious authority relating to this application: Those who catch wolves and bears with pit-falls and traps, offer their devotions to Aristæus, because he was the first who found out the method of catching them in gins and springes. It is a passage of Amiot's Plutarch; here is the original: Εὔχονται δ' Ἀριστέᾳ δολοῦσιν ἐρύγμασι καὶ βρόχοις λύκους καὶ Ἄρκτους ὃς πρῶτος θήρευσιν ἔπυξε παγάς (22). The Scholiast on Apollonius does not give the same explication of the etymology of the two surnames. He deduces that of Nomius from this, that Cyrene had to do with Apollo during the time of her being a Shepherdess; and that of Agreus from the affair's being transacted in the midst of the fields. He adds that, according to others, the etymology comes from Aristæus's having taught the Shepherds Agriculture. Ἀγρέα καὶ Νόμιον, says he, τὸ μὲν ὅτι ἐν Ἄγρῃ ὁμίγη τῇ μητρὶ αὐτοῦ ὁ Ἀπόλλων. Νόμιον δέ, ὅτι νομεῦσι ὁμίγη. οἱ δέ, ὅτι τὴν κατὰ τοὺς ἀγροὺς θηρατείαν τοῖς

(17) Diod. Sicul. lib. 4. cap. 83. pag. 167.

(18) Pindari, Ode 9. Pythior. pag. 441.

(19) Scholiast. Apollon. in Argon. lib. 2. ver. 500.

(20) Apollon. Argon. lib. 4. ver. 1218. mentions a temple of Apollo Nomius.

(21) Benedictus in Pindarum, Ode 9. Pythior. pag. 442.

(22) Plutarch. in Amator. p. 757.

νομεῦσι προσηγόρευσε (23). The passage where Apollonius says, that the inhabitants of Thessaly gave these two surnames to Aristæus, contains some things which it is proper to mention here. It is there found that Aristæus was brought up in Chiron's cave; and that when he was grown up, the Muses gave him in marriage, and taught him Physick, and the arts of Divination, and made him preside over all their flocks (24). It is said in another passage of the same Poet that he found out honey and oil (25). He says in Virgil, that the pains he had taken to improve Agriculture, and breed cattle, had gained him all the glory that he enjoyed.

(23) Scholiast. Apollonii in lib. 2. ver. 509.

En etiam hunc ipsum vitæ mortalis honorem,
Quem mihi vix frugum & pecudum custodia solers
Omnia tentanti extuderat, te matre, relinquo (26).

(24) Apollon. Argonaut. lib. 4. ver. 512. & seq.

(25) Idem, ibid. ver. 1132.

(26) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 4. ver. 326.

That is,

"For thee, inhuman parent, I must leave
"What short-liv'd honours I from men receive,
"Which care of sheep, and the laborious plough
"To thy industrious son will scarce allow."

He is one of the Deities whom Virgil invokes when going to write upon Agriculture:

Et cultor nemorum, cui pinguia Ceæ
Ter centum nivei tondent dumeta juvenci (27).

(27) Idem, ibid. lib. 1. ver. 14.

That is,

"And thou, for whom the Cean shore sustains
"Thy milky herds, that graze the flow'ry plains.
Dryden.

Oppian (28), Nonnus (29), the Scholiast on Pindar, on Apollonius, &c. agree in making him the inventor of those things which I have specified. The reader will find by and by some passages on that subject. Here is one that makes the city of Athens his native place. Oleum & trapetas Aristæus Athenienses. Idem mella (30). The word trapetas signifies mill-stones to grind the olives (31). We must not forget that he found out the Silphium. This is what an ancient writer quoted by the Scholiast on Aristophanes tells us (32), as you may see in pag. 356 of Salmasius's Commentary on Solinus.

(28) Oppian. Cyneg. lib. 4.

(29) Nonnus Dionys. lib. 5.

(30) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 56. p. 99.

(31) Varro, de Linguâ Lat. lib. 4. pag. 34.

(32) Ἀριστᾶιος... πρῶτον τὴν ἐγγασιαν τῷ σιλφίῳ ἐξεῦρεν ὥσπερ καὶ τὸ μέλιτος.

Note, that Justin says (33) that Cyrene being impregnated by Apollo, à Deo repleta, had four sons, Nomius, Aristæus, Authocus, and Argæus (34). So that he has made two men of Aristæus's two surnames (35).

(33) Lib. 13. cap. 7.

(34) It should be read Agræus.

(35) See Vossius, de Theology Gentili, lib. 7. cap. 10. pag. 350.

[C] He transported himself into the Island of Cea.] The Greek of Diodorus Siculus has it εἰς Κῶ νῆσον, and a little after ἐν τῇ Κῶ. Rhodomanus translates it in Co Insulam, and in Co. This translation perplexes the readers; for it leads them to believe that the Greek Historian speaks of the Island of Cos, the country of the great Hippocrates, and not the Island of Cea, as the other writers make it in treating of Aristæus. Nevertheless let us be assured that he speaks of the Island of Cea, and that the text ought to be corrected by putting Κίῳ in the stead of Κῷ (36), whether it were that the rules of contraction allow to say indifferently Κῷ or Κίῳ, when treating of this Island (37). Let us take heed to these words of Diodorus, κατὰ τῶν Κίων τιμαῖς, i. e. "concerning honours amongst the Ceans "(38)." They shew plainly that he does not mean to speak of the Island of Cos. However that be, let us instance some writers who have asserted, that Aristæus fixt his abode in the Island of Cea, and begin with the Commentary of Servius on these words of Virgil:

(36) It is the thought of Vossius, de Theol. Gent. lib. 7. cap. 10. pag. 350.

(37) And not apud Coos as Rhodomanus has translated it.

(38) It is what Salmasius on Solinus pretends, pag. 144, 145.

Et cultor nemorum, cui pinguia Ceæ, &c.

Which we had above (39). Aristæum invocat, id est, Apollinis & Cyrenes filium, ... hic (ut etiam Sallustius

(39) Citation (27).

that evil to ceaſe; that having left his family in the Iſland of Cea he returned to Lybia, from whence with a fleet which his mother gave him, he ſailed for Sardinia [D]; that there he choſe a dwelling; that he cultivated that country with great care; that he baniſhed from thence their barbarity and ſavage way of living; that he viſited ſome other Iſlands; that the largeneſs of the crops, and the multitude of the cattle, obliged him to ſtay ſome time in Sicily, where he taught the inhabitants his excellent ſecrets; that in acknowledgment thereof they honoured him as a God, and principally thoſe who cultivated the olive trees; that at length he paſſed into Thrace; that he was there admitted by Bacchus to the myſteries of the Orgia, and that in the familiarity which he had with him he learnt a great many things profitable to human life; that having dwelt ſome time near Mount Hæmus, he diſappeared; and that not only the barbarous people of that country, but likewiſe the Greeks decreed him divine honours (b). Moreri's obſervation that Diodorus Siculus mentions another Ariſtæus 84th chapter of the 4th book, is wrong; for that and the preceding chapter contain what I have juſt been ſaying. I am ſurprized that no notice has been taken there of Arcadia, which was one of Ariſtæus's principal ſtations [E]. You will ſee in the notes the differences of Authors, the ill grounds of ſome cenſures, and other ſuch particulars; and I ſhall not forget the aſtronomical diſcovery that is aſcribed to Ariſtæus [F], nor his worſhip of the Dog-ſtar, nor his daughter ſtius docet) poſt laniatum à canibus Actæonem filium Thebas reliquit, & Ceam inſulam tenuit primo adhuc hominibus vacuam (40). i. e. "He invokes Ariſtæus, that "is the ſon of Apollo and Cyrene. . .This man (as Salluſt "alſo tells us) after his ſon Actæon was torn in pieces "by his dogs left Thebes, and took the firſt poſſeſſion "of the Iſland of Cea, which till then was uninhabited." Apollonius tells us, that Ariſtæus having been invited by the inhabitants of the Cyclades, to put a ſtop to the peſtilence, paſſed from Theſſaly into the Iſland of Cea.

(b) Taken from Diodorus Siculus, book 4. ch. 83, 84.

(40) Servius in Georgic. lib. 1. ver. 14.

Λίπεν δ' ὅγε πατρὸς ἰφτιμῆ
Φθίην ὁ δὲ Κέω κατνάσσατο λαὸν ἀγείρας
Παῤῥάσιον (41).

(41) Apollon. Argon. lib. 2. ver. 521.

That is,

"He having left Phthia by the command of his fa"ther went to dwell in Cea, having got together a
"company from Parrhaſia."

The Scholiaſt on this Poet aſſures us, as I have already ſaid, that it was in the ſame Iſland, that Ariſtæus taught the manner of making honey and oil. Ἀρισταῖος δὲ ὁ ἐν τῇ Κέῳ νήσῳ τὰ μελισσουργικὰ πρῶτος καὶ τὴν τοῦ ἐλαίου κατεργασίαν (42). We ſhall ſee in the note [F], that he there eſtabliſhed laws for the worſhip of the Dog-Star. Varro Atacinus gave an account in his Poem of the Argonautes, that a great mortality of cattle having viſited this Iſland, Ariſtæus by the advice of Apollo went thither, and delivered it from that plague after having offered ſacrifice to Jupiter Icmæus. The winds and violent heats which occaſioned the mortality ceaſed. Ariſtæus being dead, the inhabitants of the iſland of Cea obeyed the oracle, which commanded them to rank him in the number of the Gods, and they called him Nomius and Agræus, on account of the benefits, which he had procured them by his ſkill in the management of cattle, and the culture of the earth (43). We are not to be ſurprized to ſee here, that he occaſioned the mortality to ceaſe by calming the winds; and to find below that he made it ceaſe by raiſing the wind; for this is the way of ancient traditions; one contradicts another; the one forgets ſuch particulars, as are the only ones that the other does not forget. A compleat narration might teach us that by producing a change of the wind he reſtored health: but thoſe who don't know how to tell the whole, obſerve that the wind ceaſed; expect no more from them: or that the wind aroſe; that is all you are to know: they will not tell you that the adverſe wind was ſtilled, and that a favourable one ſucceeded it. The correction of a paſſage of Heraclides, which I have read in Salmaſius, appears to me to be an happy one: At the ſame time I ſhould not be poſitive that it was not in the original that the plague of the iſland of Cea had its riſe from the wind. Φθορᾶς νόσης φυτῶν & ζώων διὰ τὸ πνεῖν ἐτησίας (44). i. e. "When there happened a devaſtation both of "the plants and animals by reaſon of the blaſts of the "Eteſian winds. Salmaſius corrects it thus, Διὰ ἠτήσατο τὸ πνεῖν ἐτησίας. i. e. "He begged of Jupiter "to make the Eteſian winds blow (45):" which is agreeable to what I have to ſay in the Note [F].

(42) Schol. Apollon. in lib. 2. ver. 500.

(43) See Voſſius de Theolog. Gentili, lib. 7. cap. 10. pag. 350.

(44) Heraclides, de Politiis, p. 20.

(45) Salmaſ. in Solin. p. 144.

[D] From Lybia he ſailed for Sardinia.] According to Diodorus Siculus he ſettled himſelf in the iſland of Cea, after the death of Actæon, and next went into Lybia, and after that into Sardinia (46); but others pretend that his grief for the loſs of Actæon gave him ſuch a diſtaſte for Bœotia, and all the reſt of Greece, that he went to ſeek a dwelling in diſtant countries (47). It was at that time, ſay they, that he conducted a Colony into Sardinia. It is ſaid that Dædalus, having made his eſcape from the Iſle of Crete, joined himſelf with him to conduct this Colony (48); but Chronology abſolutely refutes that. He was contemporary with OEdipus King of Thebes (49); he could not therefore have any correſpondence with Ariſtæus the ſon-in-law of Cadmus. However that be, here are ſome very groſs contradictions. Pauſanias ſays, that a party of Lybians had eſtabliſhed themſelves in Sardinia, and united themſelves with the natives of the country, before Ariſtæus went thither; but Ariſtotle relates that Ariſtæus was the firſt, who cultivated it, and that before it only ſerved for a dwelling place for a great many large birds (50). Conſult Mr. Bochart, who maintains that this voyage of Ariſtæus is a fable (51).

(46) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 84.

(47) Pauſan. lib. 10. pag. 332. See alſo Silius Italic. lib. 12. pag. 498.

(48) Pauſan. lib. 10. pag. 332. Salluſt had ſaid that, as has been ſeen above in a paſſage of Servius, citation (40).

(49) Pauſan. lib. 10. p. 332.

(50) Ariſtotel. de Mirabilibus Auſcult. Oper. tom. 1. p. 831.

(51) Bochart. Geograph. Sacr. Part 2. lib. 1. cap. 31. p. 632, 633.

[E] Arcadia.... was one of Ariſtæus's principal ſtations.] It is for that reaſon that Virgil gives him the ſurname of Arcadius, when he relates the invention of producing new bees:

Tempus & Arcadii memoranda inventa Magiſtri
Pandere, quoque modo cæſis jam ſæpe juvencis
Inſincerus apes tulerit cruor (52).

(52) Virg. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 283.

That is,

"'Tis time to touch the precepts of an art
"The Arcadian maſter did of old impart:
"And how he ſtock'd his empty hives again,
"Renew'd with putrid gore of oxen ſlain.
Dryden.

